adequate legislation to provide funds for a school lunch program. . . . State and local federations called upon to urge and impress upon their respective members in Congress that there is no true economy in their effort to deny food to hungry American children, but that on the contrary, it is their patriotic duty to assure school lunch funds to meet the needs of every child in America. The convention approved the E.C. report and instructed the council to make every effort in the next session to secure increased appropriations for the school lunch program.

(P. 442) Convention directed that all affiliated bodies be urged to cooperate in securing adequate funds to provide school lunches for hungry children in the nation's schools.

Whereas—There are 1,328 lunch-rooms in operation in Puerto Rico with an average daily attendance of 170,000 children at a cost to the insular government of $3,400,000; 420 milk stations with an average daily attendance of 30,057 at an annual cost of $272,900.00; and 39 nursery schools with an average daily attendance of 7,329 at a cost of $339,965.00 annually, and

Whereas—A child feeding program in Puerto Rico with a per capita income of $191.00 is of paramount importance, and

Whereas—The total cost to the insular government to cover the expenses of these programs is $4,012,865, and

Whereas—School lunch programs in Puerto Rico were operated during the fiscal year 1945-46 with insular appropriations and food donations made by the U.S. Department of Agriculture under Section 32 of P.L. 320 of 1935, and

ceived federal grants in cash amounting to $1,848,540.00, non-food assistance to the amount of $284,390, and balance of food stocks (1945-1946) donated by the U.S. Department of Agriculture to the amount of $750,000.00, and

Whereas—During the fiscal year 1947-1948 there will be a reduction of $750,000.00 in the total grants-in-aid to Puerto Rico, thus adding 20,000 children to those deprived of the privilege of attending the school lunch rooms, and

Whereas—Section 4 of P.L. No. 396, approved June 4, 1946, limited the participation of the territories of Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands to 3 per cent of the funds appropriated for agricultural commodities and other foods for the school lunch programs, thus curtailing practically $651,459.08 from the grants-in-aid received by Puerto Rico on the basis of donations, and

Whereas—Each dollar granted by the federal government should be matched by each state taking into consideration (1) the number of school children in the state; and (2) the need for assistance in the states as indicated by the relation of the per capita income in the U.S. to the per capita income in the state, and

Whereas—This formula is not applied to the territories of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, and

Whereas—Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands should be given the privilege of matching the aid in accordance with the formula applied to the states, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the sixty-sixth convention of the A. F. of L. held in San Francisco declares that it will serve to raise the health standards of the American citizens in the territories of Puerto Rico, Alaska, Hawaii and the Virgin Islands if these are granted the same rights and privileges in connection with the application of the national school lunch programs; that it directs and instructs the E.C. to do everything in its power to have the National School Lunch Act amended so as to cover the cases of the above-mentioned territories as it has been exposed in this resolution; that H.R. 1760 by Del. Farrington, Hawaii, and H.R. 1775 by Rep. Morrison, La., be studied and amended by the legislative committee of the A. F. of L. so as to include the purpose of this resolution.

(1948, p. 133) The A. F. of L. is in hearty accord with the purposes of the National School Lunch Act and we therefore urged Congress to appropriate sufficient funds for the continuance and furtherance of this humanitarian project. . . .

The cooperative federal-state-community lunch program, provided for under the National School Lunch Act of 1946, makes possible nutritious, hot food for all children—so that no discrimination is attached. These lunches make all the difference in the world in physical and mental vigor of students who are victims of hunger due to low income, as well as of those who are normal, growing children. School lunches are just as necessary to child health and development as other services, such as transportation, school books, medical examinations, etc., in fact, without the school lunch program the other services cannot fulfill their full functions.

(P. 396) Under the caption of "School Lunch Program" there is recited the efforts of the E.C. to secure an extension of that program, reciting particularly the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture for a greatly enlarged appropriation for that purpose. In spite of that, however, the first session of the 80th Congress reduced the appropriation. The second session of the Congress, however, restored the reduction, but made no increase above the $75,000,000 originally adopted.

If we are to keep our nation strong every child must be properly nourished. This program will assure to many thousands of American children a measure of sustenance who otherwise would become victims of malnutrition with all the horrors and miseries that ensue when humankind is without the means necessary to discharge their full obligations to their offspring.

The E.C. will, we hope, do all they can to bring about these urgent laws.

(1949, p. 180) In its report, the E.C. urged that state federations and city central bodies make the administration of this program their vital concern. This is another of the essential services for all children for which we are fighting.

(P. 205) The position of the A. F. of L. in advocating free lunches to children of school ages has been long and consistent. Our views were set forth in our report for 1948 in considerable detail. At that time, the Congress had merely restored the required appropriation after having materially reduced the sum in 1947.

In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, we are enabled to report a sizable increase in the appropriation to be made available for free school lunches for children of poorer families. The appropriation for 1949 rose from the $75,000,000 for 1948 to $83,500,000 under P.L. No. 146.

Free school lunches have the added advantage of helping to supply stronger bodies and to consume some of the farm surplus we are still beset with despite our export program. Started in the depression years of the 1930s, these free lunches have now become a part of our American scene and demonstrates full well that no one will be permitted to go hungry in the "Land of Plenty."

(1951, p. 126) For the fiscal year 1950, the sum of $83,500,000 was appropriated by Congress for this program. With this amount, the Department of Agriculture was able to aid the states in providing lunches for three out of every ten of the children enrolled in elementary and secondary schools in the U.S. and its territories; 7,840,250 children participated in this program, or 28.5 per cent of the total enrollment.

In 1946, the A. F. of L. strongly supported the enactment of the National School Lunch Act. Again, this year, we urged the necessity of an increase in the appropriation, financing the school lunch program so that a larger percentage of our school children can benefit from the services available under this program.

Despite the sharp increase in food prices since the Korean situation developed, Congress appropriated only $83,500,000 for this program for the next fiscal year, which is the same amount that was appropriated last year. This amount is grossly inadequate, and will deprive thousands of children of the benefits they received under this program in previous years.

In view of the fact that Congress has appropriated funds for the relief of practically every country in the world during the past eight or ten years, there should be no sound reason why we should not appropriate sufficient funds to extend this program to all of our schools throughout the nation.

(P. 506) Convention authorized continued efforts to obtain increased appropriations to support an adequate school lunch program.

(1953, pp. 179, 540) The E.C. briefly reported on the status of the National School Lunch Program and reaffirmed A. F. of L. support as follows: The position of the A. F. of L. in advocating free lunches for school children has been long and consistent. We urge the expansion of this program to meet more adequately the needs of our 30 million or more school children. State federations and city central bodies should make the administration of this program their vital concern.

School Construction (also see: Education and Training)

(1949, pp. 178, 382) We have referred to the need for a large public school construction program. . . . We recommend that the funds for such a program should be allocated to the states on the basis of their relative need and in conformance with a state-planned program which would serve all parts of the state. We further urge that legislation for such a program provide also that sound standards of construction in the building program be established by the Federal Works Agency or other qualified federal agency. Convention unanimously approved report and recommendations.

(Pp. 182, 356) Convention unanimously approved committee report on this subject as follows:

In relation to the important problem of providing adequate school buildings for the educational institutions of the U.S., the E.C. reports that the legislative agencies of the A. F. of L. have given active support to legislation introduced in this field. The council recommends that federal funds for this purpose should be allocated to the states on a basis of need, and that sound standards of construction should be established by the Federal Works Agency or by some other qualified federal agency.

Your committee recommends concurrence in this section of the E.C.'s report and urges all affiliated bodies to survey the needs for new school buildings and additions to existing buildings in their respective areas.

School Health

(1949, p. 180) A bill providing for health examinations and essential health services for all children (S. 1411) has been passed by the Senate. We urge early favorable action by the House. This bill provides some of the essential services for all children for which we are working.

Science Foundation, National—(1948, p. 166) The E.C. pointed out that the A. F. of L. is "convinced that the key to progress in many phases of our civilization is in sustained progress in the sciences. We, as workers, repeatedly take part in technical changes due to new application of scientific information, new machinery, new tools, new processes, and new materials. We further know that continuous technical progress and new uses of known facts and laws can be maintained only by extended research in the basic sciences."

The attempts made in Congress to secure enactment of legislation establishing a National Science Foundation were related, and regret expressed that enabling legislation was not approved.

(P. 409) The council's action toward several measures in Congress for the establishment of a National Science Foundation again reveals their keen desire to advance our common interests in all things. The possibilities through establishment of such a foundation to improvement of humane values and greater security to a democratic way of life are limitless.

We rest much easier when the council so consistently comes to our defense and aid when measures that could be of so much good or ill to all of the people of the United States are pending before Congress.

We commend their foresight in this case and assure them that continuance in the same determination for the preservation of our interests if and when such matters are again pending in Congress they will have our wholehearted support.

(1950, p. 196) The E.C. reported that the A. F. of L. gave full support toward enactment of legislation establishing a National Science Foundation for the following purposes:

1. To develop and encourage the pursuit of a national policy for the promotion of basic research and education in the sciences;

2. To initiate and support basic scientific research through contracts or other arrangements, and to appraise the impact of research upon industrial development and upon the general welfare;

3. To initiate and support (after consultation with the Secretary of Defense) scientific research in connection with matters relating to the national defense through contracts and other arrangements;

4. To grant scholarships and graduate fellowships in the sciences;

5. To foster the interchange of scientific information among scientists in the U.S. and foreign countries;

6. To correlate its research programs with other scientific research programs of individuals and public (including federal governmental) and private groups, as well as to evaluate other programs.

(P. 453) The following committee report unanimously adopted by the convention:

This section reports the enactment of a proposal which grew out of the experiences of World War II and has been before Congress for five years. Such legislation was necessary to secure an adequate number of trained scientists in order to maintain progress in the basic sciences necessary to technical progress.

We recommend that the permanent Committee on Education of the A. F. of L. sees that opportunity for education in the basic sciences is made equally available to boys and girls, as well as adults from all walks of life.

Seamen

(Atlantic Coast Agreement)—(1936, p. 348) Throughout its entire history of more than 40 years, the International Seamen's Union of America has insisted upon an honest observance of agreements with shipowners. Certain self-styled radicals aided and abetted by Communists and other extremists have succeeded in misleading some of the members of the Atlantic District Unions of the International Seamen's Union of America into sporadic strikes, causing the delay of some ships, notwithstanding the fact that the existing Atlantic agreement with the principal shipowners provides for preference in employment to members of the unions and for the adjustment of any and all grievances by a joint board of conciliation. Therefore the A. F. of L. pledges moral support to all the loyal Atlantic coast members of the International Seamen's Union of America who refuse to be coerced or stampeded into an outlaw strike. A copy of this resolution will be supplied to the President of the U.S., to the newly created Maritime Commission and to the press.

(Income Tax)—(1946, pp. 227, 470) Under this heading, the E.C. reports its activity in support of H.R. 3385, designed to alleviate the effect on seamen's wages of the annual accounting period for the purposes of the federal income tax, as under present law seamen are unduly penalized.

Legislation — (1924, p. 188 This convention most emphatically protests against the non-enforcement of the Seamen's Act and heartily endorses Senate bill 2222, in order that freedom for seamen and laws for the safety of life at sea may be respected and enforced.

(1927, p. 349) The Sea Service Bureau and shipowners' association shipping offices are a positive evil and ought to be abolished, and that employment of seamen ought to be through the U.S. Shipping Commissioner's office, being selected by the vessels' officers either at the commissioner's office or before coming there to be signed.

(P. 351) Merchant vessels under our flag are being operated in such condition that they are a menace not only to the lives which they carry, but also to the lives of persons—passengers and crews on other vessels.

The cause is largely to be found in disobedience to such safety laws as we have and the employment of men who are in no sense seamen but just casual laborers, who in some devious way have obtained able seamen's and boatmen's certificates.

This dangerous condition is gradually becoming worse because of the present law, which gives the master the right to sign on his crew without any supervision by the shipping commissioners.

The masters are compelled to violate the safety laws in order to keep their jobs.

We now have no way of even getting reports upon who was on board a lost vessel because there is no place where the names of the crew are kept unless they be shipped before the shipping commissioners.

Such conditions ought to be stopped as quickly as possible, and we most seriously petition Congress to enact into law the bill—S. 1087—which was introduced in the last Congress and which was reported to the Senate with an amendment, which amendment must not, however, be any part of the bill, because it would reestablish involuntary servitude on vessels of the U.S. and of all other vessels coming within the jurisdiction of the U.S.

(1931, p. 305) Bills providing for three watches for the sailors on vessels of 500 tons or more were approved by the A. F. of L. The vessels are either keeping two watches, which means 84 hours per week, twelve hours per day, seven days per week or else a system of calashi watches in which the vessels are running in the night with sometimes one man on the lookout and sometimes not and very often no man at the wheel, the steering being done by a steering machine, known to the seamen as "the iron mike," the rest of the crew sleeping at night and working all day.

(1932, p. 385) Resolutions were adopted opposing Article 54 of the Treaty on Safety of Life at Sea which reads as follows:

Every ship holding a certificate issued under Article 49 or Article 50 is subject, in the ports of the other contracting governments, to control by officers duly authorized by such governments insofar as the control is directed toward verifying that there is on board a valid certificate and, if necessary, that the condition of the vessel's seaworthiness corresponds substantially with the particulars of that certificate; that is to say, so that the ship can proceed to sea without danger to the passengers and the crew. In the event of this control giving rise to intervention of any kind the officer carrying out the control shall forthwith inform the consul of the country in which the ship is registered of all the circumstances in which the intervention is deemed necessary.

(1934, pp. 81, 550) For many years the Seamen's International Union has endeavored to have a law enacted providing that vessels must take as many seamen out of the country as they bring in. The practice has been to smuggle immigrants into the country in the guise of seamen. Under present U.S. laws seamen can leave ship in safe harbor and remain in the country for sixty days for the sole purpose of reshipping in foreign vessels. It is alleged that immigrants who cannot enter the country under the quota law or because of police records abroad, pay a certain amount of money to vessel owners and masters to smuggle them into the U.S. After arrival, they simply disappear and are very seldom located and deported.

The Senate passed bills in several Congresses to correct this serious violation of the immigration laws but they failed in the House. In the Seventy-third Congress the House passed a satisfactory bill, but when it reached the Senate a vigorous campaign against a favorable report by the Senate Immigration Committee was conducted. However, the bill was favorably reported to the Senate but it died on the calendar. Further efforts will be made in the next session of Congress.

H.R. 8597 provides that on all vessels of the United States 75 per cent of the crew, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be citizens of the U.S., native born, or completely naturalized. Up to the enactment of this law American ships not receiving a subsidy could employ as many aliens as they pleased, except licensed officers.

Coal passers and sailors are included in the three-watch system at sea and all hands are given the eight-hour day in port. The nine-hour day prevailed in port heretofore. A continuous discharge-book, as sponsored for several years by Senator LaFollette at the request of the Seamen's International Union of America, furnishes much needed certified records of service. No entry of character or behavior marks will be permitted and, therefore, it cannot be used for blacklisting purposes. Shipowners are prohibited from issuing such books as they have done heretofore. The law provides for regular inspection of crew quarters as to their sanitary condition.

H.R. 8555, the Ship Subsidy Bill, increases the citizenship requirements for crews and provides minimum manning and wage standards for vessels receiving government aid. A maritime commission of five members will administer the Act. It will take over the functions of the U.S. Shipping Board, Merchant Fleet Corporation and various other functions now vested in the Department of Commerce. It will investigate the employment and wage conditions of American seamen and incorporate in ship subsidy contracts minimum manning and wage scales and reasonable working conditions for all officers and crews employed on all types of vessels receiving an operating differential subsidy.

On cargo vessels all members of the crew must be citizens. On passenger vessels in the first year 80 per cent of the crew, exclusive of officers, must be citizens. For the next two years there will be an annual increase of 5 per cent until the new maximum of 90 per cent has been reached. The previous law required only 66 2/3 per cent of the crew to be citizens. Non-citizens who have declared their intention may be employed only in the steward department on passenger vessels and must have been legally admitted to the U.S. for permanent residence. This will prevent the employment of orientals on subsidized ships, since persons ineligible to citizenship cannot be legally admitted to the U.S. for permanent residence.

Public No. 483 extends to seamen on government vessels not in military or naval establishments the facilities of the Public Health Service. This applies to seamen on all vessels of more than five tons' burden and on state school ships. They will be entitled to medical relief by the Public Health Service in the same manner and to the same extent as seamen employees on registered, enrolled and licensed vessels are entitled.

(Medical Examinations Opposed)—(1952, p. 253) The A. F. of L. report by the E.C. reported opposition to an I.L.O. convention calling for medical examinations at two-year intervals on the grounds that such examinations would constitute hardships upon our seamen who perform an extremely loyal job in manning vessels transporting the important merchandise to our prospective allies in a world torn apart by dissension and rumors of wars. It was further pointed out that both employees and employers have agreed that two-year examinations are unwarranted, while the government stands alone in attempting to force this condition of retention in active service upon the men who go to the sea in ships.

(Shipowners Liability)—(1940, pp. 92, 408) A. F. of L. favored enactment of H.R. 6881 (1940) which was drafted to implement the provisions of the Draft Convention No. 55 adopted by International Labor Conference at Geneva in 1936 and ratified by U.S. Senate on June 13, 1938, providing certain additional rights to sick and injured seamen. It does not take away any rights, remedies, etc. to which seamen were entitled prior to ratification of the treaty however. Proposals made by U.S. Senator Overton to make the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act applicable to seamen was opposed by the Seafarers International Union, A. F. of L.

The Subcommittee on Merchant Marine voted to table the bill and Senator Overton sponsored a resolution (S.R. 299) providing for an investigation and study of workmen's compensation with a view of determining whether the same, by act of Congress, should be made applicable to seamen, etc. The resolution, which was adopted by the Senate September 12, 1940, provided that a report on the subject must be made to the Senate on or before February 15, 1941.

(Training Ships)—(1940, p. 409) Resolution 136 of the 1940 convention was a protest against the establishment of training ships for seamen under the Maritime Commission. The Seamen's Union of the Pacific regarded the establishment of training ships under the Maritime Commission as an attempt to regiment the American seamen. The convention authorized the E.C. to give any necessary assistance required to the Sailors Union of the Pacific to secure satisfactory adjustment of their complaint.

United Seamen's Service, Inc.—(1942, p. 596) Res. 108:

Whereas—The American Merchant seamen, prior to the war and before the entry of our country into the war against the Axis, have continually sailed our merchant ships all over the world, carrying supplies, ammunition, food, etc., to our armed forces and to the armed forces of our Allies, and

Whereas—Hundreds of our merchant ships have been sunk by enemy submarines and blasted out of the waters by enemy dive bombers, with the result that approximately 1,800 American merchant seamen have lost their lives and thousands of others have suffered physically and mentally through nerve-wracking attacks by enemy war craft, and by spending days, weeks, and even months in life-rafts and life-boats, and undergoing physical and mental tortures, and

Whereas—Recreational and convalescent facilities have been established by popular subscription for the armed forces, such as the Navy and Army boys, but there are no facilities established to take care of our merchant seamen who are considered in active war service, yet thousands of them have no place to go to regain their health and heal their shattered nerves after experiencing enemy action at sea, and

Whereas—Recently a non-profit corporation was organized in Washington, D. C., by Admiral Emory S. Land, and Henry J. Kaiser was appointed chairman, which is to be called the United Seamen's Service, Inc., specifically to raise $5,000,000 to establish convalescent homes and recreational facilities for American and Allied merchant seamen, and

Whereas—President Roosevelt said as follows about the United Seamen's Service:

In the newly organized United Seamen's Service, the people of our country have an instrument through which we may discharge a small part of our debt to merchant seamen—the men who are vitalizing the vast tonnage we are producing to defend our way of life.

The men of our merchant marine need facilities for rest and recreation, a chance to build up the strength and fortitude necessary for their hazardous journeys carrying the implements of war to our fighting forces. Through the United Seamen's Service, whose purposes and aims I heartily endorse, rest, recreation and recuperation centers will be established for them. Friendly, human service will be ready for them ashore.

The United Seamen's Service is an undertaking deserving the fullest support of the American people. It commands the thoughtful consideration all of us want to show to our merchant seamen. Sept. 11, 1942, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

therefore, be it

Resolved—That the A. F. of L. go on record as wholeheartedly endorsing this organization and this most humane project, and call upon all affiliated organizations and organized labor as a whole to endorse this project and to donate financially to it as much as they possibly can and as soon as possible, and be it further

Resolved—That all financial donations be made payable to United Seamen's Service, Inc., and forwarded to the secretary-treasurer of the United Seamen's Service at Washington, D. C.

Your committee in recommending the adoption of this resolution expresses its approval of the initiative taken by Admiral Emory S. Land in providing for the welfare of the seamen engaged in the hazardous duties now called for in service with the nation of those employed on merchant ships.

In this connection we note the immediate response given by the Seafarers International Union of North America, and the active part they immediately took in making this seamen's service immediately effective.

We note with gratification in this connection that one of the first homes established on the Atlantic seaboard is named after our greatly lamented and highly valued co-worker Andrew Furuseth.

Secession Condemned—(1925, p. 260) The A. F. of L. condemns the so-called organization of express workers known as "The American Federation of Express Workers," and calls upon all affiliated organizations to lend their aid and support in stamping out this movement, and the A. F. of L. does further condemn the outlaw organization for the reason of the misleading name adopted by the secessionists for the obvious purpose of misleading the express workers into joining an outlaw organization whose sole purpose is the disruption of the recognized labor movement.

(1927, p. 380) Secession from the ranks of organized labor, whether by individuals or groups, can have no other effect than to make the problems with which organized labor is confronted more difficult of solution. In principle, the withdrawal of a local union from the national or international organization having jurisdiction over the trade in which its members are engaged, because of some fancied or even real grievance against the parent body, is much like the surrender of membership by an individual worker who becomes dissatisfied with some act of the local union. The first inevitable effect in every instance is to weaken the position of the workers concerned and to strengthen the position of the employers against them. Every informed trade unionist must agree that the proper procedure is to continue the regular union affiliation, whether it be on the part of an individual or a local union, while seeking to adjust their difficulties under the laws of the organization in which they hold membership. The democratic nature of the trade union movement is such that ample opportunity is given for an interchange of opinions on practically all subjects and under such conditions there can be no reasonable excuse for secession. The support of secessionist or dual organizations by any of the affiliated unions is indefensible.

Securities (Blue Sky Law)—(1933, pp. 105, 535) During the decade after the war many billions of new securities were floated in the United States and a substantial part proved to be worthless.

According to a report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives "the flotation of such a mass of essentially fraudulent securities was made possible because of the complete abandonment by many underwriters and dealers in securities of those standards of fair, honest, and prudent dealing that should be basic to the encouragement of investment in any enterprise."

"High-pressure salesmanship," said the Committee, "rather than careful counsel was the rule in this most dangerous of enterprises."

The Committee further said:

"Equally significant with these countless individual tragedies is the wastage that this irresponsible selling of securities has caused to industry. The result has been that investment bankers with no regard for the efficient functioning of industry forced corporations to accept new capital for expansion purposes in order that new securities might be issued for public consumption. Similarly, real estate developments would be undertaken, not on the basis of caring for calculated needs but merely as an excuse for the issuance of more securities to satisfy an artificially created market. Such conduct has resulted both in the imposition of unnecessary fixed charges upon industry and in the creation of false and unbalanced values for properties whose earnings cannot conceivably support them. Whatever may be the full catalogue of the forces that brought to pass the present depression, not the least among these has been this wanton misdirection of the capital resources of the Nation."

A registration statement must be filed with the Federal Trades Commission in which the type of information required to be disclosed is of a character comparable to that demanded by competent bankers from their borrowers.

Security (National) (also see: Communism, Civil Rights)

(1948, pp. 239, 460) Res. 25 outlined seven "minimum essential elements" of a full-scale program of national security in line with report of the Compton Commission which states (page 240):

"To place our complete trust and confidence for the preservation of our lives and liberties in the distant and vague prospect of guided missiles, complete aerial destruction of a possible enemy and so-called 'push-button' atomic war, would, in our opinion be criminally negligent. We do not have faith in any early realization of such an easy, complacent way of bringing war to an attacking enemy. The United States cannot continue to be the only major power without any system of military training for its citizens, as it is today."

(P. 460) Convention adopted following recommendation of the committee which considered Res. 25:

Previous conventions of the American Federation of Labor have taken definite action on the question of National Security. Your committee believes it would be well for this convention to reaffirm all previous actions upon the subject. This being particularly important in view of the worldwide situation created by the activities and the position which has been taken by the Russian dictatorship.

Your committee is not prepared to submit a detailed statement of all of the steps which may be necessary to adequate National Security, as there are other elements in addition to labor which are involved. The detailed steps necessary should be carefully studied by the Executive Council before the convention commits itself to a definite policy.

(1950, pp. 123, 504) Your committee has given the most thorough consideration to this section of the Executive Council Report. We are in full accord with the intent and content of this section and commend its objectives for your indorsement.

We cannot underscore too forcefully our agreement with the Executive Council Report when it states: "The international conspiracy called Communism, as organized by the party dictators in Moscow, becomes an increasing menace to our institutions in war times." This places especially heavy responsibility on the free trade unions because the Communist terrorists have throughout the world, made the house of labor its main field of destructive operations and have sought the capture or destruction of the free trade unions as the first and indispensable requirement for their seizure of power and imposition of their despicable and degrading totalitarian dictatorship on every nation.

In our country, as everywhere else, the maintenance and prowess of a genuine and vigorous free trade union movement are the best guarantee for the health and progress of democracy. But we must stress with equal force that without democracy there can be no free trade unionism. Just as free trade unionism is the mortal enemy of all dictatorships, so dictatorship of every hue and stripe is the deadly enemy of all free trade unions.

Our hostility to totalitarian Communism rests on even broader foundations. Costly and tragic experience has taught millions of workers what the A. F. of L. has always sensed, felt and known. Communist tyranny is the very opposite of everything that is progressive, decent, free and clean in life.

Democratic societies and free nations not only have a right but a sacred duty to defend themselves not only against aggressors from without but also against their subverters and agents operating within every democratic country. We must not permit these totalitarian enemies of human liberty in our midst to exploit our democratic rights for the purpose of destroying democracy and advancing their dictatorship—no more than we permit incendiaries, rapists, burglars and murderers to advance their crimes through legal protection or legalization of their specific criminal acts.

All open or concealed activities to weaken our nation as a target for attack and conquest by a foreign power and all such activities for furthering this objective by operations within our country for the purpose of imposing on the American people a totalitarian dictatorship shall be considered as criminal acts—as traitorous and anti-social crimes to be treated as such by the law.

During the past year noteworthy gains have been made toward eliminating certain developing threats to our civil liberties. These dangers have considerably lessened with the all but complete eclipse of what has come to be known as "McCarthyism." The development of McCarthyism was associated particularly with irresponsible congressional investigations which, hiding behind the cloak of anti-Communist zeal, deprived innocent citizens of their lawful rights. As a result of the excesses and the undemocratic procedures utilized by Senator Joseph R. McCarthy and his supporters, public attention was focused on the need for developing security procedures which, though effective in eliminating any Communist or other totalitarian threat to our national security, would be fully consistent with our traditional concepts of justice.

Recognizing the need for a thorough and impartial investigation of the security question, our Federation recommended to the Congress establishment of a special Commission on Government Security to make a complete survey of the problem and to develop recommendations with regard to all aspects of the federal security program. In testimony before the Congressional Committees, which considered this proposal we stressed the urgent need for an effective security program, but also called the attention of Congress to the apparent lack of sensitivity of the present program to the personal rights of the individuals who have been charged with being security risks. The A. F. of L. spokesman also stressed the particular problems involved in developing fair and practicable security procedures in defense industries.

In line with our recommendations, Congress by joint resolution voted to establish a 12-member bipartisan commission to review the federal security program. It is important that this commission investigate every phase of the security program. Of particular concern to trade unions and their members are the procedures involved in the industrial security program under which individuals in private industry are screened for work requiring access to classified documents or materials.

The American Federation of Labor has consistently recognized the necessity for a program of this type but the present program has proved inadequate. In many cases, affiliated unions have found that the current procedures involve extensive delays and have worked special hardships. Representatives of organized labor should be included on any group sponsored by the new Commission on Government Security which investigates this complex problem.

(Legislation)—(1955, p. 142) The following objections interposed by the A. F. of L. to pending legislation, indicates definite policy on the subject:

The Butler bill (S. 681), authorizing the federal government to guard strategic defense facilities against individuals believed to be disposed to commit acts of sabotage, espionage, or other subversion, was again introduced in this session of Congress. This bill is the same as S. 3428 that passed last year by the Senate on which no action was taken in the House of Representatives.

The bill (S. 681) is open to a number of serious objections. The most important of these are as follows:

1. Lack of Adequate Review Procedure. The bill includes a provision that any individual denied access to a defense facility is entitled to receive a public hearing on the charges which have been made against him. However, no provision is made for any appeal from the findings resulting from the public hearing either through judicial review or by a system of appeals boards. In our opinion, it is essential that any government policy which deprives individuals of employment embody an appropriate, impartial appeals procedure. We believe that the best solution to this problem would be the establishment of tripartite appeals boards consisting of representatives of labor, management, and the public to which appeals could be made from the decision of the hearing tribunal. In any industrial security procedure, a tripartite appeals board is the only method to safeguard effectively the rights of persons concerned.

2. Lack of Adequate Standards and Definitions. The bill is woefully lacking in establishing proper definitions and standards to guide the administration of the program.

For example, the most critical language in the bill (Section 3a) states as follows:

"The President is authorized to institute such measures and issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to bar from access to any defense facility or facilities individuals as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe they may engage in sabotage, espionage, or other subversive acts."

The critical phrases in this language are "defense facility or facilities" and "reasonable ground." Section 3 (d) of the law does define the term "defense facility" but only to say that it "shall have the same meaning as it has under Title I of the Internal Security Act of 1950." This law in turn simply states that a defense facility should mean any "facility designated and proclaimed by the Secretary of Defense." No criteria or standards is included to guide the Secretary in preparing this list. The vagueness of the language is probably one reason why the Secretary of Defense has not yet complied with the direction in Section 5(b) of the Internal Security Act of 1950 to "designate and proclaim" a list of defense facilities.

With regard to the phrase "reasonable ground on which the entire basis for denial of access rests, the bill contains absolutely no guidance to those administering the program. Practically any minor defect of character could therefore become sufficient reason for depriving any individual of his employment. There is no indication, for example, whether grounds of "suitability are to be considered as well as grounds of "security". There is no indication whether the criteria in this program are to be as broad and far-reaching as the criteria now employed in the government's security program. It would be folly to approve legislation of this sort without adequate standards on such a crucial issue affecting basic rights of the individual.

3. Lack of Procedural Safeguards. The bill states in the broadest terms that "the President is authorized to institute such measures and issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary" to carry out the objective in the bill.

Under this grant of authority, it would be possible, for example, for the President or his agent to prescribe rules and regulations governing the barring of individuals in defense plants, giving the foremen in the plant or other supervisory officials the responsibility for judging whether a person shall be summarily barred. The law should establish clear safeguards against gross procedural abuses of this kind.

4. Denial of Access Without a Hearing. There is wide opportunity for grave abuse under the provision which allows the government to "bar summarily any individual from access to any defense facility." Even in extreme cases, it would be preferable to provide for some type of preliminary hearing in which the accused can at least be informed of the charges against him and given an opportunity to answer them before he can be barred from any defense facility.

5. Penalties Too Broadly Applied.

As the bill now reads, it is a felony to "violate any rule, regulation or order issued pursuant to the Act." Presumably, it is the purpose of this provision to insure compliance with a final order of disbarment. According to the language of the bill, however, it may be possible to apply this harsh penalty to non-compliance with any intermediary order or a minor procedural infraction of the regulations.

While we are in accordance with the objectives of this legislation, we were compelled to oppose this bill in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee because it failed to provide the necessary safeguards to protect individuals who may be affected by its provisions. The Committee did not take any action on the bill in this session.

We believe that sound public policy requires that before such legislation is approved, an impartial commission of outstanding public-spirited citizens review the current status of internal security legislation. By proceeding in this manner, the nation can both provide effectively against possible subversives and at the same time protect the individual liberties of its citizens.

Segregation in the Schools (see: Education and Training; Racial Discrimination)

Senators, Election of—(1950, pp. 203, 454) The E.C. reported on Res. 89 of the 1949 convention which, briefly, stated that history demonstrates that a minority of the members of the U.S. Senate has dictated the foreign policy of the United States for many years, and that this same minority has blocked participation by the United States in matters of world cooperation on many occasions. The resolution intimates that all senators should be elected at the same time in order that there might not be a lag in the true representation of the will of the people. The Executive Council, to which the resolution was referred, non-concurred in the resolution which would require a constitutional amendment. The 1950 convention approved the E.C. recommendation.

Seniority Rights

Whereas—As a result of diligent efforts on the part of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions the valuable principle of seniority has been pretty generally established in industry, and

Whereas—It appears that organized industry is making a concerted effort to eliminate and destroy the principles of true seniority by either refusing to include provision for seniority in collective bargaining agreements or by forcing numerous disputes over seniority into arbitration, therefore, be it

Resolved — That the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor make a study of this problem for the purpose of attempting to devise a more effective program to combat the efforts of organized industry to eliminate and destroy the principles of seniority as it is known to the labor movement.

Whereas—As a result of the arbitrary imposition of rigid physical standards and tests by industry, workers have been and are being deprived of their jobs without regard to their seniority rights, and

Whereas—In most cases the workers who are being arbitrarily discarded by industry are capable of performing the jobs required of them for many more years, and

Whereas—These workers have no recourse open to them due to the lack of sufficient protective clauses in the collective bargaining agreements, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the delegates to the American Federation of Labor Convention assembled in Los Angeles, California, go on record instructing the officers of the American Federation of Labor to study this problem with a view to obtaining remedial legislation, and be it further

Resolved—That the officers of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to refer this resolution to the legal staff of the American Federation of Labor for their study with a view to preparing protective clauses in negotiated agreements (which) should be made available to all unions affiliated with the A. F. of L.

Senn Case (Labor Disputes)—(1940, p. 331) After the employers of Wisconsin failed in their strategy of attack on the Norris-LaGuardia Act in defining "labor disputes" through the American Furniture Company Case and others, they tried a new line of attack in the Senn Case, a brief history of which was presented by the A. F. of L. General Counsel to the convention as follows:

Senn was a tile contractor. He employed only a journeyman tile layer and sometimes a helper. As soon as the depression started to lift a little the Tile Layers Union (which had suffered during the depression on account of its members leaving the union and setting themselves up as independent contractors) sought to unionize Senn. He was asked to sign a union contract. He was willing to do so if one clause in the contract was eliminated. That clause provided that the employer shall lay down the tools of the trade and not work in competition with his men. All other union tile contractors in the vicinity, of which there were many, had agreed to this rule. There was a reason for it. It arose out of the necessity of the situation. If the employer could work with his men he would be able to bid his own labor in at very low prices, even though he paid the union scale to his workers. In a small industry with few workers employed, this would give the employer who worked with his men a distinct advantage in bidding on contracts. Likewise he could work long hours, etc. The evidence showed that Senn, up to this time, had paid low wages—75c an hour instead of the union rate of $1.25. He worked his men long hours and did not pay overtime. They even worked on Sundays—all of which was contrary to the union rules.

Upon his refusal to sign a contract the union picketed his jobs. He sought an injunction. It was denied by the trial court. It was appealed to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, which likewise denied the injunction and held that the case involved a lawful labor dispute. It was thereupon appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The employers of Wisconsin banded together and retained able counsel to argue the case before the Supreme Court. He made a very dramatic plea. He declared the state Norris-LaGuardia Act and its definitions to be unconstitutional, and the picketing by a union to be illegal. In his argument before the court he referred to the marble friezes above the heads of the justices, the fine silken drapes and the fine furniture of the court room and stated, "All this has been produced by labor—the sons of toil." He contended forcefully that no law could be passed by Congress or by any state which would take away from any man his right to work with his hands.

The justices fired questions at counsel. The case was an important one. The time was extended from one hour to an hour and a half for both sides.

When it was my turn to respond to counsel for the employers I agreed with him that the Constitution prohibited the denial to any person of the right to work with his hands or with the tools of his trade. The justices wondered what the case was about, since I was in agreement with counsel for the employer. But I argued that counsel had only argued half the case. In fact, that was not the issue before the court. The question was not whether Senn had the right to work with the tools of the trade—I conceded he had that right. I conceded that he had the right to conduct a non-union shop; he had the right to work long hours; he had the right to employ non-union employees and pay them 75c an hour instead of $1.25 per hour, and that he and his employees had the right to work on Sundays and 12 hours a day. I conceded that the Constitution could not prevent him from doing all these things. But I asked, is there anything in the Constitution that prevents the union from telling the world that Senn is a non-union employer, that Senn workers with the tools of the trade in competition with his employees, that he works long hours, pays no overtime? I asked, is there anything in the Constitution which prohibits members of a union from carrying signs on their backs announcing to the world that Senn is unfair to organized labor, and in that announcement making a plea to the public not to patronize Senn but to patronize other employers as long as the public was left free to decide and choose whom it desired to patronize?

Realizing that this was a question of economics as much as it was of law, I hoped that the decision would be written by the best economist on the bench—Justice Brandeis. That hope was met and Justice Brandeis wrote the decision, and it is a clear, distinct, understanding decision—understanding of Labor's problems and Labor's rights. Justice Brandeis said:

"The unions concede that Senn, so long as he conducts a nonunion shop, has the right to work with his hands and tools. He may do so, as freely as he may work his employees longer hours and at lower wages than the union rules permit. He may bid for contracts at a low figure based upon low wages and long hours. But the unions contend that, since Senn's exercise of the right to do so is harmful to the interests of their members, they may seek by legal means to induce him to agree to unionize his shop and to refrain from exercising his right to work with his own hands. The judgment of the highest court of the state establishes that both the means employed and the end sought by the unions are legal under its law. The question for our determination is whether either the means or the end sought is forbidden by the Federal Constitution.

"Clearly—the means which the statute authorizes—picketing and publicity—are not prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. Members of a union might, without special statutory authorization by a state, make known the facts of a labor dispute, for freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution . . .

" . . . The sole purpose of the picketing was to acquaint the public with the facts and, by gaining its support, to induce Senn to unionize his shop. There was no effort to induce Senn to do an unlawful thing. There was no violence, no force was applied, no molestation or interference, no coercion. There was only the persuasion incident to publicity. As the Supreme Court of Wisconsin said:

"Each of the contestants is desirous of the advantage of doing the business in the community where he or they operate. He is not obliged to yield to the persuasion exercised upon him by respondents . . . The respondents do not question that it is appellant's right to run his own business and earn his living in any lawful manner which he chooses to adopt. What they are doing is asserting their rights under the Acts of the legislature for the purpose of enhancing their opportunity to acquire work for themselves and those whom they represent . . . The respondents' act of peaceful picketing is a lawful form of appeal to the public to turn its patronage from appellant to the concerns in which the welfare of the members of the unions is bound up.

' . . . It is true that disclosure of the facts of the labor dispute may be annoying to Senn even if the method and means employed in giving the publicity are inherently objectionable. But such annoyance, like that often suffered from publicity in other connections, is not an invasion of the liberty guaranteed by the Constitution.'

"Note, the great pronouncement that: 'Members of a union might, without special statutory authorization by a state, make known the facts of a labor dispute, for freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.'" . . .

Sheaffer Pen Company—(1953, pp. 403, 649) Res. 33:

Whereas—The Sheaffer Pen Company of Fort Madison has been procuring from Europe and other foreign countries men who have served their apprenticeship as tool and die makers, and

Whereas—The State Department of the Federal Government has issued the necessary visas or passports to enter this country, and

Whereas—These unfortunate persons are employed at a very low rate of pay not comparable with the rate of pay for the tool and die makers in this state, and

makers trade that this practice be prohibited as it breaks down conditions for this said trade but it also threatens all wage standards, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, condemn such action and practice and further that the proper officers of the American Federation of Labor communicate with the proper officials of the Federal Government condemning the issuance of these visas or passports and the bringing of the people into this country for exploitation, and be it further

Resolved—That the Congress enact legislation requiring employers of new immigrants in the skilled trades to pay the prevailing union wage.

Referred to the officers of the A. F. of L. to inquire into and take such action as warranted.

Sheep Shearers, Classification—(1951, pp. 298, 302, 509) Res. 60 and 67 both protested against classification of sheep shearers as agricultural labor in departmental regulations and federal laws as well as state laws.

Shipbuilding (American Loans for Foreign Opposed)—(1947, p. 663) Res. 133, which had previously been approved by the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders and Helpers, was introduced into the convention of the A. F. of L. as follows:

Whereas—It has come to our attention that federal tax monies have been loaned to foreign governments to finance shipbuilding programs for foreign account, which monies in turn are being used in such manner as to create competition between American workers and the workers of foreign nations, and

Whereas—This competition is adversely affecting the American shipyard workers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That formal protest be made to the proper authority of the United States Government because of the use of American dollars by foreign governments to create this unfair labor competition, and be it further Resolved—By this Sixty-sixth Convention of the American Federation of Labor that the intent and purpose of the foregoing resolution be concurred in by this convention.

Your committee is in full sympathy with the objective of this resolution, but is of the opinion that when this subject is taken up by the American Federation of Labor with the proper authorities of the United States Government, that there should be included in their presentation the subject of steel and nonferrous metals now being exported to other countries from the United States, which is paid for by lend-lease or governmental loans, or otherwise, at a time when several American industries cannot produce as they could if the necessary metals could be obtained.

(1953, pp. 449, 643) Res. 138 protested practice of giving contracts for shipbuilding and repair to shipyards of foreign governments with lower standards than American workers enjoy and contained the following resolves:

Resolved—That this Seventy-second Convention of the American Federation of Labor, convened in St. Louis, Missouri, again reaffirm its position on the need of a sustained, adequate Merchant Marine, and that a shipbuilding force be maintained sufficient to act as a nucleus to meet any emergency with which our nation may be faced, and that the shipbuilding and ship repair yards be kept in a state of activity, and be it further

Resolved—That all ships built, and all new ship construction and repair work performed for the United States Government and its agencies be carried out in United States shipyards and by United States workmen, and be it further

Resolved—That when legitimate bids have been submitted by United States shipbuilders, these bids be honored and that the possibility of bid peddling be eliminated, and be it further

Resolved—That the president of the American Federation of Labor join with the Executive Council of the Metal Trades Department in registering this request with the President of the United States, and make known by personal visit to him the necessity for maintaining a permanent merchant marine, sufficient to meet our needs for carrying our commerce and for use in connection with national defense if needed, also to advise him of the position of the Metal Trades Department and that of the American Federation of Labor in relation to obtaining bids from foreign shipyards.

Whereas—In two previous wars, the American nation was confronted with a serious lack of shipping with which to move troops and supplies to the various battle fronts, and

Whereas—Tremendous expansion of our shipbuilding industry became immediately necessary upon our entry into those wars; billions of dollars were expended in constructing shipbuilding facilities and training personnel to operate the yards, and

Whereas—After both World War I and World War II, these tremendously expensive shipbuilding facilities were in a large part abandoned and scrapped; the skills of many thousands of workers have been dissipated and scattered into other occupations, and

Whereas—Our national government is today spending the taxpayers' money in foreign lands for the construction of seagoing vessels of various kinds while our shipbuilding industry is virtually paralyzed from neglect and lack of business; the small number of shipyard workers are idle and invested capital is earning no return, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Seventy-second Convention of the American Federation of Labor express vigorous disapproval of the policies being followed by all agencies of government who are in any way responsible for the conditions set forth above, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention appeal to the Congress of the United States to adopt policies and provide appropriations to maintain a healthy shipbuilding industry in this nation, capable of being expanded both as to plants and personnel in the event of a national emergency, and be it further

Resolved—That copies of this resolution be sent to all Members of both Houses of Congress, to the President of the United States, all Cabinet members and other agencies of government charged with the responsibility of securing and maintaining seagoing vessels.

(1954, p. 412) Res. 110 called for greater use of California shipyards for construction of government ships; and called for a protest against foreign shipbuilding of American ships.

Ship Subsidies—(1948, p. 166) A. F. of L. favored proposed legislation providing a subsidy for the American Merchant Marine, which meant employment in shipyards. Opposition to the proposed legislation developed on the part of those who were fearful that approval of subsidies covering shipping would cause other carriers, such as railroads, bus and plane lines, to use it as a precedent for similar requests. Legislation failed of passage.

(P. 409) Convention unanimously adopted report of E.C. and recommended that the Council "intensify efforts in this direction in the future."

Signalmen, Railroad (Reaffiliation)—(1947, p. 159) The E.C. reported the return of this organization to affiliation with the A. F. of L. on October 6, 1946. The organization had been suspended because of a jurisdictional dispute between said brotherhood and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in 1928. It was pointed out that the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers had no objection to the signalmen becoming reaffiliated to the A. F. of L. and actually extended good wishes to the signalmen in their return to the Federation.

Skilled Workers, Shortage—(1935, pp. 53, 494) The A. F. of L. has felt much concern over a report given wide circulation in industrial centers. It is claimed by a number of employers and by an important employers' association that a shortage of skilled workers has developed in industry during the depression and is now beginning to be felt. This claim is accompanied with the suggestion that hours of work be lengthened to make up for the shortage, that immigration restrictions be relaxed, that employers engage less skilled employees (who can be had at lower rates) and train them for skilled work needed.

Knowing from our monthly trade union unemployment reports that there have been at all times during 1935 several hundred thousand skilled union mechanics available and eager for work, the A. F. of L. felt this matter should have thorough investigation. Our unemployment records show that in 1935, 325,000 skilled union craftsmen are unemployed, eager for work. With this huge reservoir of highly skilled craftsmen available and seeking employment, there can clearly be no true basis for the reported shortage of skilled workers.

It is significant also that the shortage is claimed to be chiefly in the metal working industries. This claim was given publicity through a pamphlet issued by the National Industrial Conference Board in June 1935. Since the above figures show that there is more unemployment and a greater proportion of skilled workers available for work in metal industries than in either the printing industries or the railroads, such a claim appears particularly illogical. No shortage of skilled mechanics is reported on railroads or in printing. It appears that the metal industries which have discriminated against trade unions for many years are now concentrating on this claimed shortage.

Because of this fact, a special survey has been made among international unions and local councils in the metal-working industries. The conference board claims a shortage of skilled metal trades workers among its member firms amounting to 1,193 craftsmen at the present time, with a possible shortage of 7,767 when plants return to normal production. By actual count well over 10,000 skilled union mechanics are available for work in the same crafts and approximately the same localities where a shortage is claimed. Clearly, conference board member firms have had an ample supply of skilled labor at hand, had they been willing to employ union mechanics.

Reports have come to us showing that, where claims of a skilled labor shortage have been traced to their source, they were proved to be either without foundation or due to discrimination against union members. The International Association of Machinists reports as follows:

On numerous occasions when requests were made of the NRA for an exemption from the maximum hours provision of the code, based on the claim that skilled mechanics, etc., were not available, we have sent this information to the locality making the request, advising our members to apply for positions and report to us. In almost every instance the members of our organization, when applying for positions with firms which claimed they were unable to secure skilled workers, were advised that no skilled men were needed.

The metal trades labor organizations brought out the following information in a hearing before General Johnson:

In the Port of New York employers claimed they could not secure skilled craftsmen in the shipbuilding industry. Our organization has canvassed the situation and had the names and addresses of more than 17,000 skilled mechanics in the various trades, all having extensive experience in the shipbuilding industry and when employers were asked what efforts they made to secure mechanics they stated they had applied to the Federal Reemployment Agency and the various agencies set up by the respective employer associations and that they had been unable to secure workmen of the type needed. They were asked if they had sought to secure skilled workers affiliated with the various labor organizations and the answer was "No." It was also developed that these same employers at this time were declining to meet duly authorized representatives of the Metal Trades Council in the Port of New York for the purpose of handling grievances and negotiating a working agreement.

Another case where a claimed shortage proved to be without foundation is cited by the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders:

Recently, the shipbuilders on the Atlantic Coast, working on government contracts, claimed that there was a shortage of skilled shipfitters and especially loftsmen. We at that time made a survey of the country and found that there were more unemployed of this classification than the total estimated possible employment as given by the shipbuilders.

A similar report comes from pattern makers in Minneapolis:

Twenty-five per cent of our members are unemployed and about 40 per cent of the non-union pattern makers are out of work or on work relief. Molders and machinists say that conditions in their trade are about the same. There has been some advertising for men in the metal trades but these ads seem to be a blind of some kind; very few have materialized into jobs.

And from pattern makers in Boston:

The Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation has recently discharged approximately 25 per cent of their journeymen pattern makers. This firm some time back reported to Washington a scarcity of pattern makers while at that very time they were refusing to accept applications from unemployed pattern makers.

Special reports were received from Metal Trades Councils in 10 cities, representing all sections of the country: East—Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Ilion, N. Y., New York City; South—Mobile; Central—Akron, Chicago, Milwaukee; West—San Francisco, Long Beach. They show the following significant facts: All councils report that there is no shortage of skilled workers. Instead, there is serious unemployment in most localities, varying from 10 to 75 per cent of the membership, the largest number reporting from 20 to 30 per cent unemployed. In all but three cities there is much discrimination against union members. Three cities report that all or nearly all employers discriminate against union members; one states that about half the employers discriminate and, in three others, there is discrimination in several large shops or intimidation through foremen on the job.

Thus it is clear that the claim of a shortage of skilled workers is being used to discriminate against trade unions and to avoid employing union mechanics.

Reports from these councils and from other sources indicate that a shortage of skilled workers is often claimed as an excuse for lengthening work-hours or in order to avoid paying the wage scale fixed by unions for competent mechanics. In Buffalo, hours are being lengthened since NRA became ineffective. The 10 Metal Trades Councils report that the wage set for mechanics who have the skill and training necessary to equip them as journeymen union craftsmen is from 10 to 50 per cent higher than the rate for which non-union men can be hired. Many employers hire men of less skill to avoid the wage standard for truly competent work. The International Molders Union makes the following statement of conditions in Michigan:

The companies will not pay the prevailing wages and most of them are attempting to employ skilled mechanics at the wage provided for common labor in the codes and, to make this worse, they allege that they are living up to the code when doing this.

The International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders has had the following experience with a company doing contract work:

Whenever the company secured a contract, they would spread the claim over the city that there was not enough skilled labor to man the job and insist on the right to employ laborers to cover the gap, although there were men skilled at the work standing at their gates who were refused employment.

One important difficulty met by employers could be solved by a better adjustment of work schedules. In times of prosperity, an actual shortage of skilled workers is often due to the employer's failure to provide steady work for his skilled employees. A man is wanted for a month or two in the busy season but the skilled mechanic cannot afford to be idle and takes steady work outside the trade rather than wait for these casual jobs. The pattern makers of Pittsburgh report:

The reason for any shortage of pattern makers in the Pittsburgh district, which happened once in the last 17 years, is that men who have worked at the trade have found it to fluctuate so much that it has been necessary for them to find something else to work at during the slow periods. The majority of these men are first-class mechanics. They have found that they needed a side line to follow when they do not have work at pattern making and when they are called by the association business manager for work they are not always in a position to leave on a minute's notice to accept the job at pattern making.

The Metal Trades Council of Ilion, N. Y., finds a similar situation:

When an industrial corporation desires to change the model of its products it dispenses with the services of the skilled and unskilled employees alike. Instead of retaining the skilled employees at least and taking advantage of the situation by repairing and readjusting machines for the new product the management waits until ready for the new machine to be put on the market. Then a call is issued to double the force of skilled mechanics, agreeing to give employment for only two or three months. The result is that these employees, because of their skill, have been able to obtain positions in lines of endeavor other than their trade. Even though these positions pay less per hour than their trade, they hesitate to return to their trade for the short period of time for which they will be employed. This is the actual state of affairs in Ilion at the present time and has been so in Middleton, Connecticut. Similar reports have been received from other cities.

Finally, it should be noted that an adequate employment service would assist in making contact between worker and job, as would also a greater use by employers of the trade union office as a source of skilled help. The following report from Ilion, New York, is revealing:

There are very few of the mechanics who will avail themselves of the services of the Federal Re-employment Bureau and for this reason: In a great many communities the Federal Reemployment Bureau is located in the same building with the welfare offices, sometimes using the same entrance, and a skilled mechanic does not care to be seen entering a welfare office. Indeed, in listing your name, it is practically the same as applying for relief. One is made to feel like a pauper.

To sum up: Our investigation indicates (1) that there is no shortage of skilled workers if employers are willing to employ union mechanics; (2) that the claimed shortage of skilled workers is due to discrimination against union members and is used as an excuse for lengthening hours or undercutting union rates of pay; (3) that instability of employment often forces skilled mechanics to seek work in other occupations; (4) that an adequate employment service would help to make contact between the employer seeking skilled men and the employee equipped to do the job.

Slave Labor (also see: Forced Labor)

(Boycott of)—(1950, pp. 51, 484) Res. 82:

Whereas—Irrefutable evidence has been assembled which substantiates the charge that the Soviet Union has imposed a system of slavery on helpless human beings to an extent unequalled in history and has, by its consistent refusal to permit the United Nations or any other impartial agency to investigate the charges, confirmed its truth, and

Whereas—This system of human slavery, which constitutes the most sinister threat to human dignity, freedom and peace everywhere in the world, has been extended by the Soviet Union to the countries which have disappeared behind the Iron Curtain, and is now the foundation of the economic system which prevails in the Soviet Union and its satellites, and

Whereas—The products of many millions of workers employed in slave labor camps in Iron Curtain Countries are not only permitted to enter the democratic countries where they compete with the products of free labor but are encouraged to do so under our present foreign trade policy which extends the benefit of reciprocal trade to countries which rely on slave labor, and

Whereas—The encouragement of such imports from slave labor countries not only threatens the economic standards established in our own country by the process of free collective bargaining but also serves to make us, unwittingly, an instrument for the perpetuation and extension of this system of slavery, since our patronage of the products of slave labor helps bolster the economies of the countries which have slave labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled that it condemns the trafficking in the products of slave labor, and be it further

Resolved—That the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor be authorized and empowered to consider and adopt ways and means by which a boycott of all products made by slave labor may be made effective.

Whereas—As a result of the 1947 A. F. of L. Convention adopting Resolution No. 1, on "The U.N. and Slave Labor," increasing worldwide attention was given to forced labor as a growing menace to human dignity, freedom, and well-being, and

Whereas—Through this A. F. of L. initiative and subsequent activities, the U.N. finally agreed to survey this pressing problem, and

Whereas—After years of consideration of this issue, the Ad Hoc Committee of the Economic and Social Council of the U.N. has published a highly informative report bearing out the indictment made by the A. F. of L. and the ICFTU of slave labor as an organic part of the economic system behind the Iron Curtain, and

Whereas—This report, though very valuable, is far from complete in that it does not cover vast areas with huge populations suffering severely from the spread of slave labor (Communist China), and

Whereas—Though slave labor continues to be a most dangerous threat to the working and living conditions won by organized labor through many years of bitter struggle, and

Whereas—With the publication of the aforementioned Ad Hoc Committee Report, the task of this body is completed and the U.N., therefore, no longer has any special agency for dealing with this pressing problem, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the convention call upon the United States Government to instruct the American delegation to the present (Eighth Regular) Session of the United Nations General Assembly to propose and solicit support for the establishment of a Permanent Committee of the General Assembly on Forced Labor which committee is to report annually on its findings and activities in respect to this issue.

Slavery Convention Reservation—

(1929, pp. 83, 244) The Slavery Convention signed at Geneva in 1926, contained a most glaring clause favoring slavery for "public purposes."

The president of the A. F. of L. entered protest to (the) chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. The clause objected to was as follows:

It is agreed that (1) Subject to the transitional provisions laid down in paragraph (2) below, compulsory or forced labor may only be exacted for public purposes.

The Finance Committee recommended and the Senate concurred in the reservation "that the Government of the United States adhere to the convention except as to the clause quoted." This was a most important reservation. The A. F. of L. has repeatedly declared against involuntary servitude of any nature.

Slogan for A. F. of L.—(1941, p. 616) Convention approved recommendation of the committee considering a resolution submitting a slogan for the A. F. of L.: "... the American Federation of Labor should not tie itself to any slogan ..."

Slum Clearance (also see: Low Rent Housing)

(1941, p. 656) Convention unanimously adopted a statement of A. F. of L. policy on the general subject of housing for workers. The following statement was included: The permanent program of low rent housing and slum clearance is Labor's program and must not be allowed to lapse during the emergency. Its value to the nation in defense and as a means of meeting the post-war housing problem is of foremost importance. Full priority ratings must be accorded to low-rent projects to make possible their uninterrupted construction.

(1941, pp. 288, 307, 308, 652) Res. 135, 164, 165. Several resolutions were submitted on the subject of the law-rent housing and slum clearance program, and the convention adopted the following:

... the American Federation of Labor, its Housing Committee, its local housing committees, and its affiliated organizations be directed to take all steps necessary to assure the continuation of the low-rent housing and slum clearance program of the USHA during the present emergency, and to secure from Congress additional authorization of loan funds for this purpose. . . .

Further, that the American Federation of Labor request the President of the United States to authorize the issuance of a blanket priority rating for the USHA-aided low-rent housing projects.

(1950, p. 214) In addition to the authorization of the large-scale public housing program, the Housing Act of 1949 also made possible for the first time in this country a nationwide attack on the twin problems of slum clearance and urban redevelopment. The law authorized $1 billion in loans and $500 million in capital grants over a five-year period to assist in carrying out local slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects. The loans were to be used to finance the cost of acquiring, clearing and preparing sites, while the grants were to help the communities to absorb the losses which represent the difference between the actual cost of the slum clearance operation and the value of the land for redevelopment purposes.

Because the slum clearance program was entirely new, it was getting under way even more slowly than public housing, but there was every evidence that it represented a very significant development in the life of our urban population. In general the same type of procedure as in public housing was being taken in each community where a slum clearance program was getting under way. By the late spring of 1950, 113 cities had applied for reservations for federal capital grants under the program and all but six of these had ready been approved by the federal agency. Interestingly enough, they included cities in every population group from large metropolitan areas to small towns. In addition to the 113 cities which had already taken formal steps, more than 250 other cities had indicated that they were interested in participating in this program.

The changes brought about by defense mobilization will bring the slum clearance program to a halt. Obviously, we cannot tear down existing dwellings, no matter how bad they are, unless they can be replaced as quickly as possible for new houses. However, planning for slum clearance and urban redevelopment, to be resumed whenever the international situation permits, should be continued during the coming period. This planning presents a particular challenge to local union groups. Involved in this program is more than a mere endorsement of a policy which would eradicate the unsightly and unhealthy slums which mar practically every American city. Very important problems arise in considering what use will be made of the land which becomes vacant after the slums are torn down.

It is essential that slum clearance be integrated with planning for the overall development of the community. If slum clearance is regarded as an end in itself, it may contribute nothing to, or even hinder, the solution of the housing shortage. It is important, therefore, that union members in each community take an active part in planning this program to make sure that the land which is eventually cleared of unsightly slums is used for the construction of decent housing for low and middle income families; otherwise families who are forced to move out of slum dwellings at that time will either have nowhere at all to go or will be forced to live in even worse housing conditions.

Almost as important as the question of how the cleared land is to be utilized is the question of how slum clearance can be used to help solve such important problems in urban living as traffic congestion, use of public transportation and public utilities, and lack of recreational educational and other community facilities. In each community union members should take the lead in seeing to it that planning of the slum clearance and urban redevelopment program is coordinated with intelligent long-time planning for community development.

Small Claims Court—(1937, p. 164) S. 1835 proposes to create a small claims court for the District of Columbia. Although it passed the Senate, it failed of passage in the House.

It provides that judges of the municipal court shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all cases in which the amount of the plaintiff's claim is not more than $50 exclusive of interest, attorneys fees, protest fees and costs. The court shall have authority to settle cases by the methods of arbitration and conciliation. The judges may also act as referees or arbitrators either alone or in conjunction with other persons.

The fee for commencing an action in the small claims court shall be not more than $1. This can be waived upon a sworn statement of the plaintiff or upon satisfactory evidence of his inability to pay such cost. The term "pauper" shall not be employed by the court.

Scores of organizations and individuals testified at Senate hearings in favor of the bill. After the bill passed the Senate, Senator Lonergan entered a motion to reconsider. This held the bill back for nearly two weeks, then at the request of a representative of the A. F. of L. Senator

King moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The bill went to the House, where Representative Palmisano, Chairman of the District of Columbia Committee, promised to report the bill favorably. The Speaker agreed to recognize a motion to consider the bill if the committee would submit a report. Chairman Palmisano, however, declined to report the bill. Every effort will be made in the next session to have the bill passed by the House.

(1938, pp. 161, 551) We reported to the 1937 Convention that a bill providing for a small claims court in the District of Columbia had passed the Senate but had failed in the House because the Chairman of the District of Columbia Committee refused to report the bill.

The bill was approved by the House in the last session of the 75th Congress and signed by the President March 5, 1938. The object of the law is to effect the speedy settlement of controversies in which the amount of the plaintiff's claim does not exceed $50 exclusive of interest, attorneys fees and costs. No judge, officer or other employee of the Municipal Court shall receive any fee or compensation in addition to his salary for services performed in acting as referee or arbitrator.

During the first month the law was in effect 1,344 cases were filed. The greatest number of suits, 381, were for amounts ranging from $10 to $20. Suits ranging from $1 to $10 total 268. More than 300 cases were filed by plaintiffs without the aid of an attorney and of these 262 were prepared by the clerk of the court. Most of the complainants had never been in a court of law before. The $1 fee was waived for 84 persons who were too poor to pay that amount to take their case into court.

Twenty-three judgments totaling $7,322.46 were entered, while the total amount of claims filed was $35,713.34.

Judge Nathan Cayton, who fought for two years for the creation of the court, declared the benefits gained for the complainants were sufficient evidence of the practicability of the Small Claims Court.

The A. F. of L. urges all central labor bodies and state federations of labor to do everything possible to create small claims courts in their localities.

Smith - Connally Bill (War Labor Disputes Act) — (1943, p. 519) The history and contents of the War Labor Disputes Act, also known as the Smith-Connally Bill, have been reported on by the Executive Council in some detail. Also, President Green caused a legal analysis to be made of it by our General Counsel, which was circulated widely soon after the passage of the bill. Therefore, your committee considers it unnecessary to discuss in detail the various provisions of this bill. Your committee does, however, desire to re-emphasize the absolute lack of need for this legislation. On the contrary, Labor's "no strike" pledge, which has contributed to the wonderful war production record of Labor, is emasculated by this Act, for under it strikes, stoppages and other interference with production are expressly authorized.

The Smith-Connally Bill was born of hatred and malice on the part of reactionary congressmen for labor. We are led to believe that some of these reactionary legislators were disappointed over labor's magnificent war production record and that they desired to pass legislation which might induce labor to violate its pledge and destroy this record. In spite of the invitation to labor to interfere with production, contained in the Smith-Connally Bill, the American Federation of Labor has reiterated its "no strike" pledge and has directed all of its affiliates to continue to comply therewith.

Your committee, however, condemns the Smith-Connally Act and those who voted for its passage on other grounds. The Act is an insult to millions of loyal American citizens for it imputes to them an intention to interfere with the war effort. The Act also reestablishes the abhorrent and discredited doctrine of common law conspiracy in labor disputes so prevalent during the years of government by injunction. By some of its provisions it seeks to impose involuntary servitude on American citizens.

Your committee recommends vigorous condemnation of the Smith-Connally Act. It calls upon all members of the American Federation of Labor to examine the record of congressmen who voted for this Bill and to repudiate those who voted for it.

Your committee recommends that the American Federation of Labor demand of Congress the immediate repeal of this outstanding insult to the workers of this nation.

Social Legislation (also see: Social Security)—(1925, p. 356) The activity of the trade union movement in support of some social legislation has consumed so much of its energies that many vital trade union legislative interests have received less attention than was essential for the wage earners' welfare and the protection of his basic rights. Therefore the A. F. of L. advises all affiliated International, Departmental, State and local bodies that while all necessary social legislation should receive adequate interest and support, that under no circumstances should interest in such legislation supersede the legitimate trade union purpose to exercise and apply the principles and policies of self-reliance and self-help which constitute one of the most valuable and vitalizing features of the American's rights to voluntary associations, so that the trade union movement through its activities will enable wage-earners to exercise a necessary control over their lives in industry through trade union organization. The spirit of the resolution appears to be intended to check a tendency on the part of local, city central and state affiliated branches, that threatens to become dangerous. We refer to the frequent and sometimes thoughtless proposals to secure the enactment of laws governing matters that should not be made the subject of legislative enactment, but should be dealt with entirely through trade regulations. It is not the purpose or intent of this resolution to interfere with the enactment of essential and necessary laws dealing with child labor, workmen's compensation, protection of women in employment, school laws, or such social legislation as is entirely outside of trade regulation, but from time to time we find organizations giving their support to proposals which if enacted into law, and these put into effect, would inevitably weaken the structure as well as the influence of the labor union. Not only this, but as expressed in the resolution, this tendency has the effect of interfering with and superseding the "legitimate trade union purpose to exercise and apply the principle and policy of self-reliance and self-help."

Social Security (also see: listings by work classifications: Old Age and Survivors Insurance; Old Age Assistance; Unemployment Compensation; Health Insurance; Workmen's Compensation; Railroad Retirement; Blind, Aid for).

(1924, pp. 53, 290) The Portland convention endorsed the principle of old age pensions and directed that an investigation be made by the Federation to promote federal and state legislation to provide protection for industrial workers no longer able to work at their accustomed occupations.

In considering the problem of federal legislation the constitutional difficulties at once appear as prohibitive barriers. In the states old age pension laws have been enacted for Arizona, Montana, Nevada and Pennsylvania.

In Arizona the law was declared unconstitutional because of a defect in the title and no attempt has since been made to reenact it.

In Montana and Nevada no attacks have as yet been made upon the constitutionality of the bill passed.

In Pennsylvania, however, the law was passed in the state legislature of 1923. A suit was instituted in the name of several tax paying private citizens attacking its constitutionality. The law was attacked on the ground that it violated Sections 7 and 18 of Article 3 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania as well as the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Section 18 of Article 3 of the state constitution provides as follows:

"No appropriations, except for pensions or gratuities for military services shall be made for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes, to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association."

In connection with this, the old age pension law provided for the appropriation of moneys to a commission which in turn parceled the money out to those entitled under the law to receive it.

Section 7, Article 3 of the state constitution provides in part as follows:

"The general assembly shall not pass any local or special law . . . granting to any corporation, association or individual any special privilege or immunity."

The decision declaring the Pennsylvania law unconstitutional considered only technicalities and did not pass upon the fundamental principle of the law.

No effort should be spared to defend these old age pension laws against attacks. The laws represent a struggle to protect wage earners against dependence in their old age. In addition to these state laws concerning workers in private industry pensions have been provided for employes of the federal government and for a number of state and municipal servants. It would be desirable at some opportune time to have a study made of the principles underlying these pension systems for the purpose of increasing the protection given to government employes.

Inasmuch as the legislation to provide old age pensions is likely to prove a very uncertain source of protection and as the enactment of necessary law would be expensive both as to time and money, we believe that a study ought first to be made of old age pensions as provided by companies and that results of this study should be considered in connection with insurance possibilities.

The old age pension in principle attempts to do the same thing as the policies insurance companies are writing for "assured" incomes. In essence, all forms of life insurance are a method of prolonging the income producing capacity of the individual—whether during old age or after death.

In addition some of the national and international organizations make provisions for old age benefits through their economic organization.

We, therefore, deem it advisable that the problem of old age pensions be made part of the larger problem of labor insurance upon which initial report is made to this convention. In order to give unity to our determination of policies it is necessary that we first decide upon the fundamental issue and make decisions upon related problems harmonize with our general plan of procedure.

It is evident that our trade unions must render increasing service to our membership to conform to our growing standards of industrial and social welfare, and the method of securing desired results must be given most careful and searching consideration in order that we establish agencies that will bring dependable and constructive results.

(1927, p. 39) Provision for old age is a problem which presents itself in many relations. Old age brings lessened capacity for work and finally total disability. Either the individual must have provisions that will make him economically independent at such a time or he is dependent upon relatives or others. Every humanitarian instinct demands that persons who have done faithful work should not be allowed to suffer in old age.

Those national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. which have made provisions to care for their aged and decrepit members deserve our hearty commendation. We heartily approve such a policy and we express the hope that it may be adopted by all national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. Furthermore, we recommend a comprehensive study of all plans of old age pensions, including the insurance plan, in order that suggestions and advice may be made available for the use of the officers and members of all organizations affiliated with the A. F. of L.

(1929, p. 257) On the subject of old age pensions the A. F. of L. declares: First—that laws be enacted requiring a pension commission for every county, “pension to be at least $300.00 annually” and that 65 be set as the age for applicants.

Second—That a model compulsory old-age pension bill be drafted by the Federation and recommended to state federations of labor and that an active campaign be inaugurated for the enactment of such laws in every state.

Third—That the general problem of old-age retirement for employees in private industry be given careful study and that an effort be made to secure the counsel and cooperation of sympathetic individuals and groups in an effort to work out constructive plans on this subject during the coming year.

(1930, pp. 115, 338) Agitation for the protection of those who are unable to take care of themselves after they have reached the retirement age, spread throughout the nation during the past year. The demand for old age security reached Congress and for the first time in the history of that body an extensive hearing was held at the request of the A. F. of L. on the question of old age pensions.

Experts from many organizations appeared and gave conclusive evidence that those who are unable to care for themselves after reaching old age should be protected. Already ten states and one territory have enacted old age pension laws but none of them is of such a practical character that the A. F. of L. can unequivocally endorse them as model laws. The states leave it to the counties to determine whether they shall pay the pension provided for in the Act and many of the counties take no action.

During the hearings before the Labor Committee of the House of Representatives a bill was considered that would give power to the Federal Government to aid those states that pass laws in the interest of the aged. This measure provides that the Federal Government appropriate certain amounts of money which would be available to the states in an amount equal to that appropriated by each state. This bill was introduced in the Senate and was discussed in the hearing. While no bill was prepared or other action taken the hearing brought forth the necessity for such legislation.

The A. F. of L. has considered most carefully all the laws that have been enacted. It has not endorsed any of the measures thus far proposed as a standard Act. We hope to draft a measure which will be practical, constructive and adequate.

of the states enjoying old age pension protection legislation is about 42,-000,000.

The Indiana legislature passed a bill but it was vetoed by the Governor. Connecticut, Oregon, Maine and Illinois created commissions to study the question. Colorado made its optional law mandatory and reduced the pensionable age from 70 to 65 years. Wisconsin also made its optional law mandatory. Pennsylvania recommended a constitutional amendment which would ultimately make possible the payment of pensions by the state and counties. The Delaware law provides that all pensions shall be paid by the state.

The law of Maryland was amended so as to make it possible for the City of Baltimore to begin the payment of pensions under the Act of 1927. Bills passed one branch of the legislature in Arizona, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Washington. The sentiment is greatly in favor of the enactment of these laws in these states when the next sessions of the respective legislatures convene.

In the five states enacting pension laws this year only West Virginia contains the optional feature. It permits the county or city authorities to pay pensions as they may elect.

The A. F. of L., however, believes that none of the old age pension laws is entirely satisfactory. It believes that the only way to pay such pensions is through a state administrative body. Furthermore, designating relief for the aged as "pensions" have caused many members of legislatures to oppose old age pension legislation. Some also object to the cost. The A. F. of L., which has made a study of the subject for several years, believes that such legislation should be classified as "old age securities." To that end it has prepared a bill providing for old age security with its administrative direction placed under the control of elected state officers selected by the legislatures. The cost of administration will be greatly reduced if these recommendations are adopted and old age security made mandatory.

(1932, pp. 64, 362) An old age security bill approved by the A. F. of L. was introduced in both houses of Congress.

(1933, pp. 110, 526) Twenty-five states now have old age security laws. Nineteen of these are mandatory and 6 are voluntary. Old age security bills were presented in 34 state legislatures that met in January.

An old age security bill for the District of Columbia was introduced in the 72d Congress and reintroduced in the 73d. Because of the unemployment situation and the thirst for economy the Board of Commissioners of the District opposed any consideration of such legislation at the present time. Therefore, no hearings were held in either the 72d Congress or the special session of the 73d.

Copies of the model old age security measure approved by the A. F. of L. were sent to all state federations of labor with the request that the officers have them introduced.

A federal old age security bill was introduced in both Houses in the two Congresses. It provided financial aid to states paying pensions to their aged who are in need. The committees to which they were referred favored the bills but no action was taken by either House.

While these trying years have forcefully demonstrated the need for security for those essentials upon which life itself depends, there has been comparatively little progress in establishing the means to provide security for the emergencies of living.

Wage earners want most of all security of income during their producing years and assured income for old age.

During the past year through state federations of labor and city central bodies the A. F. of L. has carried on an aggressive campaign in behalf of the old age pension legislation. Some progress has been made but not as much as the urgency of the situation requires or as the workers hope could be recorded.

Social justice legislation providing for the payment of pensions to superannuated workers was introduced in a number of states. In some instances where legislators could not be persuaded to vote favorably for this character of legislation, they did vote for the creation of commissions to study the subject and report at some future sessions of the state legislatures. In every instance where votes were taken, even though the measures were defeated, the workers have reason for encouragement because the number of votes cast could only be interpreted as an indication of the development of favorable public opinion in support of this legislation.

It is the purpose and intention to utilize every means at the command of the A. F. of L. to continue efforts to secure the enactment of old age pension laws in the different states.

We urge as a social obligation that adequate provisions be adopted so that every producing worker may be assured, after his productive years, of an adequate income, at least equal to the income earned at the time of retirement. By providing honorably for our citizens who have served us in their prime, we shall make social and economic adjustments necessary to the maintenance of business prosperity.

(1933, p. 526) The A. F. of L. requests that every serious effort possible be made to find ways and means to force the next session of the Congress of the U.S. to enact a compulsory old age pension.

(1934, pp. 86, 543) Twenty states are still lacking old age security laws. Every effort should be made in the coming sessions of the legislatures in January to urge passage of this legislation. Bills introduced in Congress failed of passage because the Budget Bureau objected on the ground that it was contrary to the president's economy policy. However, there is great sentiment in favor of this legislation as it has been found that poorhouses are more costly than pensions.

Further efforts will be made in the Seventy-fourth Congress to have an old age security law enacted for the District of Columbia. It would be a great financial saving to the District. Both Houses favorably reported bills in the last Congress. A filibuster prevented passage in the House.

(P. 117) Turning to the other end of the life span, we find that in October, 1933, nearly half a million persons over 65 years (477,230) were in receipt of emergency unemployment relief. This figure represents only a small proportion of the dependent aged. We have learned that relatively few of those who live beyond the producing period of life have adequate reserves to be self-supporting. A number of more or less inadequate provisions have been established for the older groups—military pensions, union old age benefits, industrial pensions, provide incomes for a portion; benevolent homes, church homes, union homes, poor houses, provide subsistence for others. Private charity and local poor relief help others. Organized society has begun to assume a social responsibility that will put provisions for the civilian aged on an honorable basis comparable with pensions for those who have given military service. The majority of those who serve society in a work capacity have even less opportunity to lay up reserves than those in the enlisted service.

The American Society for Social Security has estimated that 70 per cent of those over 65 years are dependent—receiving some type of relief compensation—a dependency that is twice that of any other group.

The dependency of the group here is evidence that society must make provision for old age. Society has obligation to make honorable provisions for those who have worked and served but have not been able to lay by for a period of disability from age.

Old age pension laws exist in 28 states. The A. F. of L. has long advocated compensation for those past 65 years of age. We believe efforts should be concentrated on securing nationwide legislation to provide adequately for this group in the direction already suggested by state enactment, often the result of trade union efforts.

In addition to unemployment there is still another grave interference with regular income—sickness, whether due to industrial or other conditions. We should consider unemployment due to this cause in preparing a program of economic security.

The problem of medical care should be separated from the financial problem of cash benefits to compensate for loss of earnings and should be considered in connection with adequate provisions for medical care for all of society.

(P. 598) Eleven resolutions favoring social insurance ranging from unemployment insurance to health insurance were referred to the resolutions committee, which made the following report (p. 602):

The substance of these eleven resolutions are concerned with the broad subject of social insurance ranging from unemployment insurance to the more recent discussions of health insurance. The methods that are recommended differ substantially. We shall discuss first the general principles involved and then the methods proposed for carrying this plan into effect.

The Cincinnati convention in 1932 by unanimous action placed the A. F. of L. on record in favor of compulsory employment insurance. Three years before, the Toronto convention gave an equally effective expression to the conviction on the part of this Federation that the time had arrived in American industry when it was in the interest of general welfare that provision should be made for old age pensions. Taken together with workmen's compensation this provides for the major hazards of industry. The experience of the passing months has confirmed your committee in the soundness of their declaration in favor of social insurance. Your committee therefore recommends concurrence with the intent of these several resolutions looking toward the endorsement of this proposal.

The method as proposed in these resolutions varies and in some cases is contradictory. The proposal, for example, in Resolution No. 10 for tax on labor saving machinery while of service in providing a brake on labor displacement would be wholly inadequate.

The proposal in Resolution No. 20 to secure action by the Congress of the U.S. presents difficult legal questions so far as individual states are concerned. We believe in Federal aid for such a program. We cannot concur in such a plan of national legislation.

Resolution No. 32 would separate and allocate insurance funds to each and every industry and give to Labor in each industry a "paramount voice" in its administration, while Resolution No. 91 unalterably opposes any plan of separation of insurance funds based on either companies or industries and demands a pooling of all insurance funds, State and Nation.

The plan of Resolution No. 38 to provide unlimited unemployment benefits is inconsistent with sound policies of social insurance, and is disapproved. A proposal to put the age of beneficiaries of old age pensions at 60 presents a problem in finance which while desirable as an objective is impractical at present.

The purpose of Resolution No. 76 to include maternity insurance to the list of plans for social insurance is consistent with this general philosophy and is approved. To suggest, however, that teachers who already enjoy a pension system should be included in such an insurance scheme seems to be unwise. It would be better to make such systems both sound and universal in application.

Resolution No. 101 is referred to only as the Lundeen Bill which the A. F. of L. has declined to approve heretofore, while Resolution 124 recommends House Bill 7598. While the simplicity of this later proposal may be appealing at first glance, nevertheless your committee non-concurs in the recommendation, though it agrees with that part of the resolution providing for the payment of relief on the basis of adequate living standards.

The proposal of Resolution No. 126 that there should be a "24-hour general strike on a national scale" the first week of January to focus attention on the necessity for passage of House Resolution 7598 is fantastic. It is as impossible of achievement as it is impractical as a method. We recommend non-concurrence in this resolution.

The proposal of Resolution 186 of the Executive Council Institute of Study of Health Insurance to provide for a better distribution of adequate medical services to wage earners is both sound and desirable. We recommend concurrence.

Your committee recommends the whole-hearted endorsement by this convention of the general proposals for social insurance in line with action which has already been taken by previous conventions; and of study of those other phases of social insurance upon which previous conventions have not already acted. We concur with those proposals for support of social insurance that have been set forth in the legislative program of the Federation and non-concur with methods that have been advanced which are at variance with this sound and established policy.

(1935, pp. 82, 493) The Social Security Act was approved by the President on August 14, 1935. The enactment of this law marks the beginning of an effort to eliminate for the wage earners and their families the major economic hazards of unemployment and old age dependence, as well as to safeguard the welfare of children and to provide for maternal and child health. It is also a first step toward economic stability, and more equitable distribution of the national income, the absence of which added to the suffering of the masses of our people during the depression.

While other industrial countries have long enjoyed the benefits of social security legislation, the federal government in America has broken new ground in undertaking this program. The new Act does not solve the entire problem of social security but it does provide a foundation for more comprehensive and adequate security legislation in the future. The basic principles and the extent of such future program are well indicated in the Act making it possible for the Nation to set upon its task of effectively promoting the welfare of wage earners under a sound plan, nation-wide in scope. In signing the Act, President Roosevelt said:

Today a hope of many years' standing is in large part fulfilled. The civilization of the past hundred years, with its startling industrial changes, has tended more and more to make life insecure. Young people have come to wonder what would be their lot when they came to old age. The man with a job has wondered how long the job would last.

This Social Security measure gives at least some protection to 30,000,000 of our citizens who will reap direct benefits through unemployment compensation, through old-age pensions and through increased services for the protection of children and the prevention of ill health.

We can never insure 100 per cent of the population against 100 per cent of the hazards and vicissitudes of life, but we have tried to frame a law which will give some measure of protection to the average citizen and to his family against the loss of a job and against poverty-ridden old age.

This law, too, represents a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete, a structure intended to lessen the force of possible future depressions, to act as a protection to future administrations of the government against the necessity of going deeply into debt to furnish relief to the needy, a law to flatten out the peaks and valleys of deflation and of inflation—in other words, a law that will take care of human needs and at the same time provide for the United States an economic structure of vastly greater soundness. . . .

If the Senate and the House of Representatives in their long and arduous session had done nothing more than pass this bill, the session would be regarded as historic for all time.

The entire program will be administered by a Social Security Board composed of three members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members of the Board are appointed for a term of six years and not more than two of them are to belong to the same political party.

The Board is constituted as an independent agency of the government and with it rests the final responsibility for the administration of the law. In addition, the Board has the responsibility of studying the various phases of security and making recommendations with regard to the most effective methods of bringing about economic security through social insurance and with regard to legislative and administrative policy concerning old-age pensions, unemployment compensation, accident compensation and related subjects.

(P. 493) This legislation provides insurance provisions which vitally affect a number of the benefits which have been provided for many years by international unions, including unemployment and old age pensions. It is evident that if these valuable developments of our trade union movement are to be adequately protected, that amendments to the present National Security Legislation will be required. In the matter of the proportionate share of contributions to be made by labor, by industry, and by the Government, extreme care must be exercised so that the burden of cost will not be placed upon labor.

For these and other reasons the E.C. stands instructed to carefully study those provisions of the legislation which vitally affect the workers' interests, and to introduce such legislation as may be necessary to amend the law so that it will serve the laudable purposes for which it is enacted, and provide for administration which will include adequate representation of labor.

(1936, p. 146) All states and the District of Columbia are now affected in some way by the provisions of the Social Security Act passed by the 74th Congress.

The states are participating in the benefits of the Social Security Act. With the exception of Title II which provides for old-age benefits under direct federal grant and Title VI under which allotments are made to the states for public health work, participation by any state in any Title of the Act or in any part thereof is contingent on the enactment of state legislation approved by the designated authority.

(1937, p. 138) Out of a total population of 123,091,000 in 1930, 6,500,000 persons were 65 years of age or over. The ratio of older persons to total population had been rising steadily since 1860, reaching 5.4 per cent in 1930. While the life span was lengthening, the birth rate was declining—a sharp decline beginning in 1920, and restriction of immigration emphasized this tendency. As a result the ratio of those over 65 years of age to the total population which increased from 2.7 per cent to 4.7 per cent between 1860 and 1920 (an increase of 74 per cent) is expected to rise to 11.3 per cent by 1980 (an increase of 140 per cent). Unless this steadily increasing group of persons over 65 is economically independent, Society will be confronted with a very serious problem. What are the chances that these 17,000,000 persons will be able to provide an old age income for themselves?

In this connection we should note the increasing difficulties older workers have in securing employment. Testimony as to the hiring policies unfavorable to employing workers over 40 or 45 years of age accumulates and to it have been added studies in Massachusetts, Maryland, California, Pennsylvania and New York. The evidence points to developing practices which fix the hiring age limits within the ages of 20 to 40. With this contraction of the years during which good income can be earned, chances for savings decline. Of those who are employed; 71 per cent, or 19 million families with incomes of $2,500 or less, could not possibly save enough to provide for old age. Even with development of collective bargaining it is not probable that the time is close at hand when all individuals can provide for later non-income earning years. It is obvious society must make provisions.

Under the Social Security Act there are two kinds of old age provisions: Old age assistance for the needy and Federal old age benefits.

(P. 143) Under the offer of exemption from paying nine-tenths of the Federal excise tax for unemployment compensation when payments are made to a state plan, 48 states, two territories and the District of Columbia have unemployment compensation laws, covering 21,000,000 workers. As the Social Security Board has practically no authority to require that state laws conform to prescribed standards, there are wide differences between the laws in the various states. The Board prepared two model bills, one based on the reserves fund principle, and the other on the state pooled fund principle which have served as guides in drafting state laws.

Under the pooled fund principle, all contributions go into a common fund which is available for benefits to all eligible applicants. By pooling the risks, all employees have a better chance to get compensation. Under the separate employers reserves principle, each firm's reserve is available for its employees only. The solvency of each account becomes more questionable and the security for employees more uncertain.

(P. 150) Wages are the base upon which social security revenues are collected and benefits are paid. Both employers and employees pay a percentage of wages into the old age benefit fund. Employers of 8 or more must pay another percentage of wages as Federal taxes if they are not paying the same amount into state employment compensation funds.

For purposes of unemployment compensation wages means all remuneration for employment, whether payable in money or something other than money.

For the purposes of old age benefit contributions, the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury defines wages as "all remuneration for employment including the cash value of all remuneration paid in any other medium than cash; except that such term shall not include more than $3,000 of the remuneration paid by a single employer during a calendar year. This means that if an individual works for several employers, each of whom pay him less than $3,000, the tax will be calculated upon the full amount paid by each employer even though the total received during the year amounts to more than $3,000.

Tips or gratuities paid directly to an employee by a customer of the employer and not in any way accounted for by the employee to the employer are not counted as wages under Federal ruling. Reimbursement for travel and other expenses which constitute payment for expenses actually incurred and accounted for to the employer are not included in wages. Other items included as wages are dismissal wage, traveling and other expenses in excess of reimbursement for actual expense accounted for to the employer.

Premiums on life insurance paid by employer covering the life of the employee constitute wages if the employer is not the beneficiary. However, premiums paid by an employer on policies of group life insurance covering the lives of his employees are not wages if the employee has no option to take the amount of the premiums instead of accepting insurance and has no equity in the policy.

Amounts deducted from the remuneration of an employee by an employer constitute wages paid to the employee at the time of such deductions. Payments by an employer into stock, bonus, pensions or profit sharing funds constitute wages if such payments inure to the exclusive benefit of the employee and may be drawn by the employee at any time or upon resignation or dismissal or if the contract of employment requires such payments as part of the compensation.

Bonuses, prizes and commissions constitute wages if paid by an employer to his employee as compensation for employment. Board, rent, housing, lodging and other remuneration not in cash may also constitute wages. The medium in which the remuneration is paid is immaterial. It may be something other than cash, such as goods, lodging, food and clothing. Payment of vacation allowance to an employee constitutes wages.

(P. 154) The adoption of the Social Security Act, with all its desirable and practical features, was secured through the influence and support of the A. F. of L. The constant earnest and sincere appeals of the executive officers of the A. F. of L., State Federations of Labor and City Central Bodies, local organizations, and the individual membership of organized labor, were centered upon members of Congress. The concentrated and unanimous demand made upon Congress for the enactment of this measure by the organized workers of the nation and their friends so influenced the members of Congress in favor of the measure as to make its enactment into law an assured fact.

The Social Security Act in its present form is far from perfect and for that reason should be amended so as to conform to the needs of the existing social and economic situation existing within the United States. For that reason the A. F. of L. makes the following specific recommendations:

First, that the Social Security Act be amended so as to provide coverage for agricultural workers, and that said coverage shall apply to all employees in work-shops, mills, mines and factories.

Second, that exemption of those engaged in legitimate strikes be stricken from the measure. It is the opinion that all who may be forced to engage in legitimate strikes should be covered by the provisions of the Social Security Act.

Third, that within five years after taxes to be used in financing the Social Security Act are ordered paid, that Old Age Pensions of not less than $30 per month be paid to those who come within the scope and provisions of the Act.

Fourth, that in the different states where employees are required through the imposition of a tax to contribute toward unemployment insurance, said tax provisions be repealed. We maintain that the entire cost for unemployment insurance should be borne by industry. Workers who are the victims of unemployment should not be required to contribute out of their net earnings into unemployment insurance funds.

(P. 451) The E.C. was directed to submit legislation in Congress providing for including cemetery workers in the Social Security Act.

(1938, pp. 140, 454) The administration of the Social Security Act now enters its fourth year. With the signing of this Act on August 15, 1935, a very complicated piece of administrative machinery went into effect. Its provisions were understood by very few persons and the implications of those provisions by still fewer. The Act made a wide variety of appropriations for groups without opportunity to earn regular incomes. Part of these appropriations are of the nature of relief and part of the nature of insurance. Those which come under the relief category are old age assistance for the needy; grants for dependent children, for maternal and child welfare; grants for aid to blind; those under the insurance category are unemployment compensation and old age benefits. In addition, grants for administrative expenses are made to the U.S. Public Health Service and the Office of Education and for state unemployment compensation.

Up to July 31, 1938, taxes collected under Title VIII (Old age benefits) totalled $737,526,539, paid by 38,265,000 employees and 1,757,000 employers. Benefit payments from the Old Age Reserve account amounted to $6,210,545. Interest on the Reserve totalled $17,674,043. The Reserve account stood at $1,136,463,498.

Under Title IX (unemployment compensation) on July 31, the states had deposited into the Unemployment Trust Fund $1,093,707,194 from which $227,945,000 had been withdrawn between February 1, 1936, and July 3, 1938. The balance of the fund was $883,763,099.

The enactment of the Social Security Act was undoubtedly one of the greatest social achievements in the history of this country. The provisions of the Act lessen the fear and insecurity of millions of families but they by no means usher in Utopia or undermine the initiative or self-dependence of workers. Establishment of provisions for social security as a public policy gives a foundation upon which to mold provisions providing the kind of security we want. Experience of three years indicates the need for a number of changes: first, separate the functions and services of an insurance nature from those providing public assistance, and placed under separate administration. The former, which involves rights of workers, should be under the Department of Labor. The latter should be included in our program for public welfare which should be a permanent service of the Federal Government. It is neither intelligent nor economical to leave relief to emergency planning, a regularly recurring and urgent need which we know no way to escape.

However, our plans for any one type of emergency that undermines social security must be coordinated with the whole social security program. Benefits for those without jobs must be determined with full knowledge of relief provisions and must be made in the light of such social security provisions as aid for the aged, the chronic invalids, those temporarily incapacitated by illness. Where pensions or relief exist for those in need due to constantly recurring causes, the problem of emergency relief becomes much more simple.

Labor believes that every person who leads a useful constructive life has a right to security after passing the prime of productive service. Old age with its accumulated wisdom and experience has an indispensable contribution to make to active generations and deserves the respect and consideration which can only follow economic independence. Labor, therefore, believes our goal should be incomes for all sixty years of age if income earning decline begins at that age and insurance for all at sixty-five.

At present we have two systems: old age pensions for the needy and benefits of an insurance nature for the self-supporting. The pension plan provides for Federal subsidies for state plans. The payments vary widely from state to state: in Alabama the average monthly payment was $10.17; in Arkansas, $9.12; in California, $32.30; in Kentucky, $9.36; in Mississippi, $4.74; in New York, $23.68; in Massachusetts, $27.78; in Utah, $25.37, etc. The total amount distributed to 1,686,209 persons in the month of May was $32,477,009.

Under the federal plan for old-age benefits of an insurance nature only lump sum payments are to be paid prior to 1942. That is, the equities of persons reaching 65 years of age or dying before 1942 will be in proportion to payment and not real insurance. According to existing plans contributions into the old age reserve are accumulating funds to pay future workers more adequate monthly payment.

In the meanwhile contributions are being paid into the Federal Old Age

Reserves which on July 31 totalled $737,526,539. This reserve is intended to increase for a number of years. Obviously it must have an effect upon our federal financial policies. Workers question the wisdom of contributions from their small earnings to forestall borrowing by the Federal Government.

We believe that monthly payments should begin immediately instead of putting upon workers of today the burden of providing for those of future generations.

We believe that the coverage of old age benefits should be widened to include all employed persons including the self-employed.

We believe exemptions from payment of taxes should be repealed with exception of services in the direct employ of the United States and state governments.

The use of a stamp system for collections would facilitate collections from isolated groups while the self-employed could include payments in income taxes.

During the past year the president of the A. F. of L. has urged the Collector of Internal Revenue to implement that portion of the bureau's regulations which requires: "At the time each payment of wages is made to an employee, his employer shall furnish a written statement to the employee showing the amount of employee's tax deducted from such wages." By specifying the form of such statement to be furnished employees the collector would require a statement that would serve as evidence of rights in Old Age Benefits.

Our president pointed out that in making such deductions for the Federal Government for the benefit of his employees, each employer was serving a function which is essentially fiduciary—that of a trustee. The Collector of Revenue has so far refused to act, claiming that what constitutes evidence of claims is to be determined by the Social Security Board. However, it is quite possible for two government agencies to agree upon a plan of procedure. We should also consider the practicability of authorizing the Social Security Board to collect its own taxes as is the general practice of these countries.

The Social Security Board is now ready to give every person registered for old age benefits a statement of his or her credits for the year 1937. Errors or inaccuracies can thus be checked. It is important that every worker keep his own records of employers for whom he worked and wages received so that he may be in a position to check his record when available. When the Collector of Internal Revenue requires employers to supply employees with receipts for all taxes deducted from wage payments, the requirement will facilitate checking the annual record which the Social Security Board will make available.

Beginning with January 1938, 22 states joined Wisconsin in the payment of benefits to qualified unemployed persons. Wisconsin has been paying since July, 1936. By January 1939 all of the states will be paying benefits except Illinois and Montana which will begin paying with July 1939.

Experience in those states that that have been paying unemployment benefits demonstrates need for immediate amendments of the basic law.

First: We must have a national system of compensation for loss of work—work insurance. The workers of this country are employed by industries organized nationally or dependent on markets organized nationally which in turn flow into world markets and commerce. The causes of unemployment are not within an industry or a locality, but are national and international in scope. Our plans for security of workers should, therefore, cover the largest area possible in order to assure equity through uniformity, simplicity and economical administration. A state boundary means nothing in business organization and employment. Workers must follow jobs and the administration of their rights should be just as flexible.

The A. F. of L. never approved or concurred in the principle of state tax credits with no control over state standards. By repealing provisions for tax credits for state tax payments the federal tax would become the source of revenue. Ninety per cent of the tax should go into unemployment reserves to be allocated to the states; 10 per cent into the general fund for administrative expenses. The unemployment provision of a federal law should be inserted in Title IX. Existing state administrations should become units in administrative machinery under federal law.

During the first half of 1938, unemployment compensation put $180,000,000 into the hands of the workers without jobs. Such an amount has obviously helped to sustain service industries and those producing consumer goods, but it falls into insignificance in comparison with payments of $1,532,984,000 for direct relief. Unemployment compensation is not intended to replace relief but when properly developed will protect many self-dependent persons from the humiliation of going on relief. During the past year our office has had many letters asking how workers could transfer from relief to benefit status where benefits awaited them but for which a three, four or five week waiting period must be weathered before checks arrived. Also checks could not be depended upon to arrive regularly as long as eligibility continued. The administrative machinery was too new and complicated. Many workers have stayed on relief jobs rather than make the change because benefits were lower than relief payments and less dependable. Some states arranged relief for workers serving a waiting period of two, three or four weeks and then waiting through the next week which was compensable and until such time as claims were allowed and check sent. Such relief arrangements were conditioned on signing a statement to repay out of benefits when received—thus drastically reducing the margins for living standards. This is in sharp contrast to English practice. England has a waiting period of one week which may be reduced to three days.

Workers everywhere say that unemployment compensation would be more satisfactory if checks could come on time and regularly thereafter. But due to complicated records and dependence upon these records even in those states where administration is best checks are sent from three weeks to three months after eligibility is established. This means that workers must live on savings or use capital investments, relief or charity. Unemployment compensation is intended to prevent this result—not to encourage or maintain it. Unemployment benefits are to provide security—not to undermine the results of industry and thrift before aid is available.

Under present law a worker's claims to benefits involve wage record keeping by the employer and requisite reporting with the social security number of the worker. Mistakes or omissions in any of the possible details by the employer or within the administrative machinery may result in delays or invalidation of claims. A less complicated law such as we recommend would eliminate some of the causes of delay.

On the other hand it is imperative that social security be kept out of partisan politics. The first step in this direction is civil service requirement for personnel including experts.

The meaning of any law develops through administration. In determining the eligibility of persons making claims for benefits administrators determine whether persons leave work voluntarily for a good cause; whether they were discharged for misconduct—that is, what constitutes misconduct; whether they failed to accept suitable work—that is, what is suitable work for each claimant; whether positions refused existed because of strike, lockout or other labor disputes, etc. These illustrations show how administrative decisions may concern union policies and principles. When decisions are unfair the claimant has the right of appeal.

Obviously the workers affected may not be in a position to realize the consequences of an unfair decision or may not be able to make presentation of case with arguments if they should make appeal. They are more concerned with finding some source of immediate income than with establishing sound principles for the administration of unemployment compensation. But all workers are affected by precedents established through such decision. Workers in other countries have found it desirable to establish a division in their national headquarters to serve unions and individuals concerned with getting favorable decisions and for the purpose of accumulating the necessary technical information to protect and advance the interests and rights of workers under social security.

The problem of service for wage earners in this field is much more important and complicated in this country than in most other countries because of the area and numbers covered, the difficulties of federal-state jurisdictions, and the differences between the laws of the various states and other jurisdictions. Only by some central clearing agency concentrating in this field and promoting exchange of information and experience can we develop any unity in policy and procedure with reference to social security issues. Even with simplification of law in this field a central service with a research agency is necessary for the protection of workers by the interpretation of social security legislation in the light of rights of workers.

(1939, pp. 118, 234) H.R. 6635 (Public No. 379), revamping important features of the Social Security Act, passed the House on June 10th, and the Senate on July 13th. The conference on disagreements between the House and Senate did not agree until August 4th, the day before adjournment. The conference report was then promptly ratified.

The principal point of disagreement was the Senate amendment which provided that the Federal Government shall pay two-thirds of old age assistance benefits up to the first $15 per month. The Senate finally receded on this point.

H.R. 6635, as enacted, maintains the 1% old age pension tax rate for employers and employees for the next three years. It provides that only the first $3,000 of an employee's annual salary may be taxed for unemployment compensation insurance. It advances the date for old age pension payments to January 1, 1940, and provides pensions for widows, orphans, etc., and grants more liberal benefits for those who reach the age of 65 in the early years of the system. It adds approximately a million persons to those covered by the Social Security law.

Finally, it provides that the Federal Government shall pay to the states on a 50-50 basis up to $20 per month for old age assistance. The present limit is $15.

(P. 432) The A. F. of L. hereby memorializes the President and Congress to enact the recommendation of the U.S. Social Security Administration regarding the proposed extension of old-age insurance to include agricultural workers into law.

(Amendments)

Numerous resolutions were introduced in the annual conventions of the A. F. of L. calling for wider coverage under OASI, and increasing benefits thereunder. The general policy of the A. F. of L. was to secure complete coverage of all workers under OASI who were not participating in separate pension plans, such as the fire fighters, government employees, etc., who requested specific exemption from social security. The A. F. of L. advocates a soundly financed OASI, and approves of increasing contributions thereto by both workers and employers as the need is indicated, with increased benefits to beneficiaries as may be possible under a financially safe OASI program.

(Labor's Program)

(1939, p. 196) Social Security is peculiarly Labor's program. We must be prepared to present and urge the interests of workers in every division of the program before it takes final shape as well as watching its operation and proposing needed amendments. In both national and state legislative sessions the American Federation of Labor must help defend the rights of workers against the anti-labor sentiment which has manifested itself in proposals designed to hamper unions and reduce the security already won.

(P. 631) Until benefits are payable under social security legislation it is hard to evaluate the measure. The Report of the Executive Council informs us that the Federal Government appropriated $714,700,000 for the fiscal year 1938-39 for purposes provided in the Social Security Act. The Executive Council also lists the following types of beneficiaries under the law: dependent aged, dependent children, the blind, those without jobs accustomed to be self-supporting, crippled children, as well as maternal and child health services and public health work. Obviously we have at least made a beginning to assuring some degree of security against emergencies. As the Executive Council points out, there is no provision for disability whether temporary or permanent except that afforded under state compensation laws for injury of an industrial origin.

An important administrative change follows from an amendment to the federal law adopted in the last session of Congress requiring that personnel receiving and spending federal funds must be on a civil service basis—chosen for merit, not for political reasons.

(Armed Forces, Rights of Workers)

(1940, p. 529) Convention unanimously adopted following program of needed legislation to protect the social security rights of workers while in the armed forces:

Resolved—That this convention of the American Federation of Labor urge upon the respective legislative bodies charged with the responsibility of making such provision the enactment of legislation along the following lines:

1. Securing to employees who have entered the military service of the United States the continuation without impairment of all benefit rights after their discharge from the service, as provided for in the Social Security Act and the State Unemployment Insurance laws;

2. Extending to all persons who, under the national defense program, have found employment in government enterprises, such as navy yards, arsenals, etc., the same rights to which they are now entitled under old age, survivors' and unemployment insurance systems;

3. Providing adequate protection to the dependents of those serving in the armed forces of the nation during such service and in the case of death occurring in the course of, or as a result of, such service;

4. Granting to soldiers who have been honorably discharged adequate support until such time as in the normal course of events they can re-establish themselves in civilian life.

Your committee recommends that this resolution be referred to the Executive Council for study and adequate action.

(Pp. 113-14, 563) Progress report prepared for convention on administration of Social Security Law commended. Attention was called, however, to the urgent need for broadening of the provisions of the law, and the importance of such amendments of the law to our nation as a whole.

In the face of the present world crisis it is even more necessary that we raise the standards of living and the degree of security enjoyed by the people of this country. Democracy can resist any attack if it successfully establishes the way of life its people prefer to any other. Opportunity for employment at fair wages, and social protection for those who are unable to work or are unemployed through no personal fault, are essentials of such a way of life. We must expand and improve the whole program of social security to deal fairly with all wage earners. In his statement reviewing the first five years, the chairman of the Social Security Board said: "There will be no retreat for social security as the result of the defense program." Labor endorses this statement and goes beyond it. As a part of the defense program there must be advance in the security of family standards which will reinforce and strengthen our nation in its complete defense against military and economic attacks on the American way of life.

(P. 563) Defense of our country demands that we strengthen the morale of wage earners and their families by fair treatment and protection against wage loss from all hazards beyond the workers' control.

This is a time in which social insurance should be extended to millions of workers now excluded, and broadened to cover hazards against which the worker has no safeguard.

(Pp. 353-56) Several resolutions directing the A. F. of L. to work for extension of the Social Security Act to certain groups were introduced into the convention and referred to the Committee on Resolutions. In lieu of the proposed resolutions, the convention adopted the following drafted by the committee:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor cause to be presented to the new 77th Congress of the United States a bill embodying the following principles:

1. Permissive legislation for the extension of social security coverage to state and local government employes not now participating in any existing annuity benefit or retirement system.

2. Providing exemptions for any employe of a state or of any political subdivision or instrumentality thereof who is a contributor to, or a participant in, any pension fund, relief fund, or retirement fund created by virtue of any legislative enactment of a state, by municipal charter or by ordinance of any political subdivision or instrumentality of a state, provided, however, that such exemption and exclusion shall terminate if such employe becomes separated from the public service, or if such pension fund ceases operation.

(P. 355) In addition to the above "Resolve" the convention also approved the following statement of policy presented by the Committee on Resolutions:

The Committee on Resolutions further recommends that the Committee on Legislation take action in conformity with this action so far as the public employes are concerned in Resolution 134.

Pursuant to a conference held on October 23, 1940, the representatives of organizations of government employes affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, submitted the following views:

The United States Civil Service Retirement law is the fruit of the labors of the organizations of government employes affiliated with the American Federation of Labor over the last 40 years. The Joint Conference on Retirement, which is composed entirely of organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has been recognized for more than 20 years as the official spokesman of the government employes on the subject of retirement.

The first U.S. Civil Service Retirement Law was enacted May 22, 1920, and became effective on August 1st of that year. It has been amended numerous times and several major improvements over the first law have been secured. The coverage of the law has been extended from time to time also. It now embraces all employes of the United States Government who are in the classified civil service (with certain specified exceptions of groups that are provided for in other retirement systems) and certain other specified groups who are not in the classified civil service.

The law provides also that any employes or groups of employes who are brought within the classified civil service, by legislative enactment or by Executive Order, shall be included within the purview of the USCS Retirement Law. There is also a provision that it may be extended by Executive Order, upon recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, to any employe or group in the civil service of the United States not included at the time of its passage.

The organizations of government employes affiliated with the American Federation of Labor believe that the extension of the Social Security Law to include any group of United States Government employees would be a serious menace to the future welfare of the U.S. Civil Service Retirement systems. There is now agitation to include some groups of government employees within the purview of the Social Security Act. The extension of the Act to those groups would serve as a precedent to include other groups and to equalize the benefits to the disadvantage of employees within the purview of the U.S. Civil Service Retirement system or other existing retirement systems.

In our desire to extend the benefits of old-age security to all government employees we call attention to the fact that the provisions of the U.S. Civil Service Retirement Law now permit of its extension to all such employees by Executive Order. However, if the authority to so extend it is not exercised such extension to all government employees should be made by legislation amending the U.S. Civil Service Retirement Law and not by extension of the coverage of the Social Security Law to government employees.

Submitted in behalf of the Joint Conference on Retirement, representing over 300,000 United States Government employees affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The A. F. of L. Committee on Social Security finds itself in agreement with the foregoing views.

In view of the foregoing agreements, your Committee on Resolutions recommends concurrence in the foregoing views as the expressions of the convention.

(Social Security Committee)

(1940, p. 129) In its regular report to the convention, the E.C. submitted comprehensive report on general subject of social security and outlined work of A. F. of L. Social Security Committee. In addition to reporting on preparation and publication of authorized booklet to assist wage earners to keep record of their earnings and other necessary information to determine their social security benefits, the A. F. of L. committee reported on its work toward extending coverage of the Social Security Act.

The Executive Council expects the Committee on Social Security to continue its study of the operation of the Act and to recommend additional amendments to broaden coverage and improve it in other ways as rapidly as it appears feasible to make the changes. We particularly recommend that the Committee on Social Security continue its study on problems of health and disability insurance, and methods of coordinating the various parts of our social insurance program into a system which functions efficiently to furnish a reasonable minimum of protection against all types of hazards which cut off earnings for individuals and families whose incomes are insufficient to permit them to achieve security individually. We expect our Social Security Committee to study the development of national defense plans and make such recommendations as are necessary to prevent any backward steps in the social program achieved and in prospect. The morale of the nation depends on fair treatment of the wage earners and their families. It must not be weakened by shortsighted neglect of a sound program of social insurance to supplement the even more important drive to provide jobs at reasonable wages for all persons who are seeking and able to work.

(P. 563) Defense of our country demands that we strengthen the morale of wage earners and their families by fair treatment and protection against wage loss from all hazards beyond the workers' control. This is a time in which social insurance should be extended to millions of workers now excluded, and broadened to cover hazards against which the worker now has no safeguard.

(Federal Grants for Industrial Hygiene Programs) (1941, pp. 369, 623)

A resolution was submitted to the convention that the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled recommends any necessary change in either administrative policy, or in the terms of the Social Security Act to the end that federal grants for industrial hygiene programs be made available to state labor departments which now carry on such activities or deserve to do so.

This resolution was referred to the Social Security Committee of the A. F. of L.

(Pp. 116, 625) A comprehensive report on the Federal Social Security program was presented to the convention by the Executive Council, and the following program was adopted:

The sharp changes and upheavals that characterize the present decade indicate how little permanence may be expected in material things or in personal relationships. We cannot count with confidence upon the following of any normal course of development or achieving the material or business ends we desire from a lifetime of work. Because we cannot count upon steady income from work or investments we look to some other sources for a measure of security against the emergencies that life now holds in increasing frequency. Our social security program has come to occupy a key position in the plans for millions of citizens of the United States. It is the provision for the emergencies of the present and future to which we can anchor with a feeling of definite security. Personal plans and efforts may fail us but as long as our government maintains, we shall not have to face emergencies barehanded.

Our system is yet very new and has not entirely rid itself of certain limiting provisions that represent the legislative compromises necessary for the inauguration of a new policy. Now that social security provisions and their administrative machinery have been integrated with the National Defense Administration, a still greater degree of national welfare depends upon extending the scope and raising the standards and range of benefits paid during emergencies which interfere with normal income earning.

Your committee recommends concurrence in the following amendments to the Social Security Act in this portion of the Executive Council's Report:

A single pooled fund out of which shall be paid all social security benefits.

Present old age and survivors insurance shall be extended to agricultural workers, domestic workers, lay employees of religious, educational and charitable institutions, with permissive provisions for coverage of state and municipal employees not protected by existing public retirement programs.

A sound national employment service decentralized for administrative functions.

A national system of unemployment compensation.

Benefits for both permanent and temporary disability with additional cash benefits for medical care and hospitalization for workers and their dependents.

Federal contributions to state provisions for the needy aged should be on a variable basis that would protect aged persons of poorer states against inadequate payment due to smaller wealth within their states.

Drastic and widespread changes in industry and policies and orders of the Federal Government have resulted in nationwide migrations of wage earners looking for work in a national labor market, unemployment in the post-war days will be as now a national problem for which national relief measures must be developed. Both the agency which seeks to find jobs for the unemployed and the money benefits for those for whom jobs cannot be found must be nationwide and uniform so that equitable treatment can be assured to all. Against future emergencies employers and workers should jointly contribute to this general fund which is to provide income for the workers' families when events beyond their control deny workers an opportunity to work—old age, premature death, temporary and permanent disability with additional payments to cover medical and hospital costs when needed.

We believe that the development of a comprehensive social security system and expansion of its coverage will provide a foundation for sustained national morale and at the same time create an investment in human conservation that will materially counterbalance inflationary tendencies. We are strengthened in our conviction that social security is a basic conservation measure by the action of Great Britain in enlarging and improving her social insurance program after months of warfare.

(1942, p. 166) Pursuant to avowed objectives, the A. F. of L. continued to press for desired amendments to the Social Security Law.

H.R. 7534, sponsored by the American Federation of Labor on September 9, 1942, proposes to enact into law amendments to the Social Security Act in accord with principles recommended by the Federation Convention; changes recommended by President Roosevelt to Congress and supported by conclusions reached as a result of studies of the Social Security Act. They are intended to strengthen the social security system financially, increase and extend the coverage of benefits, provide family benefits, nationalize the U.S. Employment Service and unemployment compensation, and raise standards of unemployment compensation. A summary of the changes follows:

The Federal Old Age and Survivors' Insurance and permanent disability insurance system is extended to include permanent disability benefits when disability is not due to work injury. Mothers' current insurance is created in the system, with benefits for wives under 60 responsible for care of eligible children. Raises the benefit amount of old age and disability and reduces the eligibility of women from 65 to 60.

Federal Old Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance is extended to agricultural and domestic workers, lay-employees of religious, educational and charitable organizations, fishermen in boats of less than 10 tons.

Sets up a national system of unemployment compensation and nationalizes the U.S. Employment Service to provide equal protection and service for all workers with a maximum 26 weeks' duration, with one week waiting period, and with weekly benefits ranging from a minimum of $5 to $16 for the worker, and additional allowances for dependents.

Provides maternity benefits for employed mothers. The same benefits are provided for temporary disability not due to industrial injury. Sets up a system of hospitalization benefits.

Provides a system of unemployment compensation allowances to be paid to soldiers upon termination of military service.

Contributions of employees to be increased by three per cent, thus equalizing contributions in 1949, both employers and employees contributing six per cent. All funds to be maintained in a Federal Social Insurance Trust Fund, to be held by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is the Managing Trustee for the Board of Trustees to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor and the Chairman of the Social Security Board.

(P. 607) In view of the importance and far-reaching effect of the proposed changes, and also in view of the fact that the bill does not meet with approval of all organizations affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, this committee recommends that the entire matter be referred to the Committee on Social Security of the American Federation of Labor with instructions that previous to the introduction of legislation to amend the Social Security Act, all organizations whose memberships may be affected, either beneficially or adversely, be consulted.

(P. 77) The inadequacy of the existing Social Security Law to meet the needs of both during the war and post-war periods was outlined by the E.C. in its report to the 1942 Convention. The report stated in part:

In normal times social security can meet the need, but in times of great emergencies such as we are passing through, there is grave apprehension lest our system may not be adequate for the load it will have to carry. At present employment demands are so large and so urgent that the number of those on the national work force in both military and civilian occupations is between 58 and 59 millions. As our manpower has been taken by the military forces, older men and women have been called to take their places and to fill new jobs. Each year that the war continues, the military will require more men, and more of our normal reserves will have to carry on civilian work. This means that a larger percentage of our population will be members of the work force and directly concerned with social security provisions, paying contributions into it and looking to it for benefits to tide over emergencies. The greater the number of people on war work, the greater will be the post-war readjustment and unemployment. It is of utmost importance that during this period of peak employment, we make ample provision to provide benefits for the transition to a peace-time economy. Not only is this course wise planning for wage earners, but it is equally a prudent and constructive policy for business and for the government. For business, an expansion and strengthening of the social security system now means the accumulation of reserves for meeting future obligations which would otherwise require post-war taxation, and will assure consumer buying power during emergencies. For government, it means larger reserves which when invested in federal bonds become available for current use, and by increasing current savings inflationary forces are proportionately decreased. For the workers, it means the provision of insurance as a right while there is time to accumulate reserves to assure payment of that insurance.

Obviously this is the crucial time for revising our social security system to enable it to meet needs of workers in a period when emergencies will be cataclysmic in sharpness and in scope. Now is the time to set up an adequate and coordinated system capable of meeting the problems of post-war transition and peace-time production.

(P. 519) A number of resolutions were considered calling for desired amendments to the social security law. The convention committee considered these in connection with the section of the Report of the Executive Council under the caption SOCIAL SECURITY. The following was unanimously adopted:

The Executive Council emphatically points out that now is the time to revise and expand our social security system so that it shall be adequate to the needs of the workers now and in the post-war emergencies. Wage earners have practically never been able to accumulate savings and investments to tide them over serious emergencies that interrupt wage earning. Workers look to current income to maintain customary standards of living. Social insurance is the one method by which workers can accumulate equities that will provide income to save them from dependency and doles. This period of peak employment and enforced deductions in civilian production is especially favorable for increasing our contributions to insurance that will provide us with future benefits.

The Federation proposed therefore a national social insurance system to provide income for those unable to work because of permanent physical disability, whether that disability be due to old age, or permanent physical disablement, or because of unemployment due to loss of employment or short-time sickness. Workers with a dependable income even when not large can face emergencies without fear of dependency. By pooling funds and pooling risks over the widest base, the largest benefits can be most surely provided.

Old age insurance has been developing satisfactorily. The Federation has recommended that coverage now be extended. Increased contributions should go into effect as provided in the Social Security Act.

In the field of unemployment compensation, the situation is most disturbing and chaotic. At a time when control over industry is centralized at the capitol but when war industries are expanding and civilian industries contracting, total employment is at a new high, rates for unemployment insurance have been reduced by tricky experience rating devices. Instead of accumulating funds to tide workers over the period of transition to peace-time, basic insurance principles are defied in order to grant favors to some employers. We are entering upon that war period when workers will be expected to shift readily from industry to industry and locality to locality and yet their equities in unemployment insurance have been tied to localities. Benefit amounts paid are too small and paid for too short periods under practically all the 51 laws. Too many workers have exhausted their benefit rights before they found jobs, and in emergency unemployment practically all would meet this fate unless benefits were extended as a relief measure.

Such a basic social justice right as the accumulation of equities in unemployment insurance should be uniform throughout the nation and underwritten by our Federal Government. The Federal Government which already assures wage earners old age and survivors insurance, the right to organize, basic minimum wage and maximum hours, financial assistance for housing, as well as the rights and privileges of citizenship, should round out its guarantees of basic social justice by equal and adequate unemployment and disability insurance to all wage earners.

In addition the Federal Government should make provisions for maintaining the old age insurance equities of workers now in the armed service and should finance unemployment benefits to be paid demobilized soldiers pending their hunt for jobs. This security should be administered by the Social Security Board.

We urge concurrence in the Executive Council report and recommendations as the first step in Labor's post-war planning and a provision necessary to assure purchasing power upon which business and recovery will depend.

We urge the Federation to initiate an educational campaign to acquaint organizations with the seriousness of the present situation and with remedial proposals.

It is our information that the President intends to submit recommendations on social security to Congress as soon as the tax bill is passed. We must be ready and informed to take advantage of that opportunity to secure the greatest possible social insurance and so protect wage earners against situations that have wrecked valuable and honorable men and women. We urge that legislation on this be made the paramount legislative objective in the coming year.

(1943, p. 8) In keynote speech to the convention the president of the A. F. of L. said:

"The great problems we face are twofold—domestic and foreign.

"In our own country after the war we will face the supreme challenge of making good the pledge to abolish fear of want in America. This is the first duty of industry, of Labor and of the government. It can be fulfilled by the launching of a vast peace-time production drive which will provide jobs for all and by the enactment of broad social security legislation which will provide economic insurance for the masses of the American people."

(1943, pp. 53, 80, 524-525) The convention directed that the Committee on Social Security work out with President Green a program for mobilizing labor action nationally in support of this measure as well as to provide the necessary assistance in presenting Labor's desire for this resolution.

(Pp. 80, 340) This section of the E.C. Report presented an analysis of a legislative proposal to amend the Social Security Law. . . . Convention requested that the E.C. make available to all members complete and current information regarding the social security system and all proposals for its modification.

(Pp. 309, 528) The convention referred to the Social Security Committee Resolution No. 125, recommending that the American Federation of Labor do all it can to amend the Social Security Act to read 60 years of age and also provide benefits equal to the American standard of living.

(1944, pp. 147, 596) The Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill which contained the legislative proposals of the Committee on Social Security and the president of the American Federation of Labor developed in accordance with approved policies of the Federation and introduced in the 78th Congress, has not been considered by either House of Congress. It has, however, served to stimulate extensive discussion and public education on these subjects of such vital interest to wage earners and their families.

With the convening of the 79th Congress there will be an opportunity to introduce legislation designed to meet the earlier objectives and to reflect the considered judgments derived from the experience with the legislation introduced in the last Congress. Your committee accordingly recommends that the Committee on Social Security work with the President of the American Federation of Labor in preparing and submitting to the Congress legislation which will provide a comprehensive system of contributory social insurance and social security designed to attain the following specific objectives:

- (1) A national system of unemployment insurance providing compensation in the event workers become unemployed through no fault of their own or from temporary disability on a uniform basis to all workers not otherwise covered who are employed by private employers, with provisions for inclusion on their own election by the self-employed and employees of the states, their instrumentalities and political subdivisions; such compensation to be a proportion of previous earnings with minimum benefits sufficient to prevent destitution and maximum limits with respect to duration and amount of benefit.

(2) Extension of the present system of Old Age and Survivors Insurance to provide annuities for old age and total disability and survivors insurance for all persons who are employed by private employers and with provision for inclusion, on their own election, by the self-employed and by the employees of the states, their instrumentalities and political subdivisions not otherwise covered. . . .

(3) The social security rights of men and women in military service should be protected without interference with any veterans' benefits to which they may be entitled.

(4) A national system of health insurance providing health services for all covered workers and members of their families.

(5) A unified public assistance program which will provide federal grants-in-aid to the states adjusted to the relative financial needs of the states in order to enable them to provide more equal assistance to all needy persons.

Your committee further recommends that pending the enactment of such legislation every effort be made within the various states to improve the present state unemployment compensation systems. The following specific proposals are recommended for submission to the state legislatures, 44 of which will convene during 1945.

(1) That the present limitations existing in some states on coverage by the number of employees employed in an establishment or by an employer be removed;

(2) That maximum unemployment benefit payments be increased to $25 per week.

(3) That the maximum period for which benefits can be paid to eligible workers be raised to 26 weeks.

(4) That the restrictive disqualification provisions which prevent workers who are involuntarily separated from their employment from drawing benefits be modified so as to remove the penal provisions from the state unemployment insurance systems and restore the traditional freedom of workers to change their employment.

We note with approval that the recommendations made to the 63rd Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor to the effect that a program for mobilizing Labor action nationally in support of the social security program of the Federation is now getting under way and that toward this end a person has been appointed by President Green to serve full time on the staff of the American Federation of Labor as Director of Social Insurance Activities.

We recommend for the favorable consideration of all national and international unions, state federations of labor, and city central bodies, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, that social security committees be appointed in each of these affiliated organizations for the purpose of assisting in the promotion of the social security program of the American Federation of Labor.

"An Epochal Year"—(1945, p. 14) As an essential supplement to efforts to provide maximum production and employment for all able to work and seeking employment, we should have adequate social insurance for emergencies which prevent income earning.

In an economy based on private ownership, income is essential to the maintenance of life itself. For the great majority of people who rely completely on current income anything that interferes with the earning of income is a major catastrophe. The common causes of such interruption are loss of job and physical incapacity due to acute illness, organic weakness or handicaps, accidents and old age. Social insurance is one of the forces in maintaining production at maximum levels. Workers' earned insurance rights, which are related to earnings, should not be confused with public assistance. Public assistance represents the responsibility of society for those who have not been able to establish insurance rights. Legislation providing social insurance can assure income during such emergencies and thus prevent irreparable damage to human beings through demoralization and warping of personality.

The American Federation of Labor believes we should build upon Old Age and Survivors' Insurance and add insurance for the other emergencies that interrupt income earning. Employers' and workers' contributions supplemented by funds from the Treasury when necessary would provide what in effect would be deferred wages—paid during the emergencies. Such benefits should be an assured right of workers of the nation.

Insurance should be paralleled by a national health program implemented by adequate medical facilities and services.

The long-time program of the Federation includes legislation along these lines:

To improve old age and survivors' insurance and extend its coverage to all workers; extend social insurance to provide income during other emergencies due to physical disability, and to make available adequate health facilities and services.

(1946, p. 215) The Executive Council recommended that efforts be continued to increase the coverage and benefits of the Social Security Act along the lines of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill.

(Pp. 146, 605) The principles embodied in the legislation introduced in the 79th Congress pursuant to the declaration of the 64th convention of the American Federation of Labor (the Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill—S. 1050—H.R. 3293) are reaffirmed. The goal and objective of the American Federation of Labor remain the development of a comprehensive national program of social security for all workers not otherwise covered by an existing program, built upon the solid foundation of contributory social insurance. Such a program must include:

1. A system of insurance providing benefits based on past earnings for the aged, the survivors of deceased workers, and the permanently disabled. These benefits must be sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living without reliance on public or private charity. The coverage of the present program needs to be extended to the remaining 40 per cent of workers not now protected and the age of retirement should be lowered by at least five years for men and ten years for women workers.

2. A national system of unemployment insurance providing benefits based on past earnings and with minimum benefits adequate to maintain for even low income workers a decent standard of living. All involuntarily unemployed workers, including those unemployed by reason of temporary disability, should be eligible. The administration of such program should be the responsibility of the U. S. Department of Labor.

3. The reestablishment within the U. S. Department of Labor of an adequate national employment service.

4. A national system of health insurance providing health services to all workers and members of their families. Such a system should be augmented by grants-in-aid to the States out of general revenues of the Federal Government for: (1) the construction of health facilities, (2) training of medical personnel, (3) medical research, (4) expansion of public health services, and (5) continuing and extending the present program of maternal and child health services.

5. A unified Public Assistance Program providing grants-in-aid to the States adjusted to the relative needs of the States in order to provide more equitable assistance to all needy persons.

Your Committee recommends that the Committee on Social Security work with the president of the American Federation of Labor in preparing and submitting to the 80th Congress legislation designed to meet the above stated needs and objectives. In the preparation of such legislation special care should be exercised to see that in the development of policies and in administration it provides for full participation of the representatives of the workers covered by the program.

The growing interest in and increasing public support for inclusive health insurance of the kind sponsored by the American Federation of Labor requires that special attention be given this phase of the program. The extensive hearings on the Federation's health insurance bill (S. 1606—H.R. 4730) resulted in a great increase in public understanding of the proposal. The need for some national action in this field is no longer denied by the opposition. The issue now is whether medical care should be extended as a charity and in accordance with public welfare concepts or whether it should be made universally available by an extension of the insurance principle. We reaffirm our unflinching support of the insurance principle.

Your Committee recommends that in addition to the safeguards written into the earlier health insurance proposals, such as those protecting the right of free choice of physician, the following provisions be included in any health insurance legislation: (1) a specific requirement that local agencies be given the maximum amount of control possible in the operation of the program, (2) provision for the continued operation of all such existing health programs that can provide suitable medical services such as those developed by labor organizations, by co-operatives, and by other voluntary groups, and (3) maximum participation in local administration of the program by both the medical profession and by those who represent the recipients of medical care.

The Hospital Survey and Construction Act passed by the 79th Congress requires the appointment of a Hospital Advisory Council in each State. Your Committee recommends that each State Federation of Labor be urged to take steps immediately to secure representation on these important State councils.

Pending the enactment of legislation establishing a comprehensive national social security program there is much that needs to be done within the States to improve the present unemployment compensation programs and the employment services. Your Committee recommends that the splendid efforts of the State Federations of Labor to amend their State laws in accordance with the four specific standards adopted by the 64th convention be continued. We recommend that in addition steps be taken in the States to provide the following: (1) to free the State employment services from policy control by the State unemployment compensation agencies, (2) benefits to workers whose unemployment is due to sickness or other disability. (This is especially pertinent to the ten States where funds can be made immediately available from employee contributions—only two of which now pay such benefits.)

The State Federations of Labor and members of our affiliated unions who serve on State unemployment compensation commissions or advisory boards can render invaluable assistance to the national program by demanding that their respective State administrators cease the lobbying activities against the social security program of the American Federation of Labor which they have been carrying on in the national capital either as individuals or through the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies.

We recommend for the favorable consideration of all national and international unions, state federations of labor, and city central bodies, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, that Social Security Committees be appointed in each of these affiliated organizations for the purpose of assisting in the promotion of the Social Security Program of the American Federation of Labor.

(1947, p. 656) Several resolutions were introduced into the convention providing for (1) extension of coverage to employees of non-profit organizations operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, including hospitals; (2) increasing benefits for the aged through larger Federal grants to the states; and (3) increasing contribution rates from both workers and employers in order to lower retirement age for insured under OASI. These resolutions were referred to the permanent Committee on Social Security, A. F. of L.

(P. 607) The committee of the convention which considered the report on social security of the E.C. submitted a detailed report and recommendations which constituted a program of social security activity for the ensuing year.

The American Federation of Labor is unalterably committed to the goal and objective of the establishment of a comprehensive program of social security providing adequate protection against the hazards of death, disability, dependent old age, unemployment and ill health for all workers and their dependents. We reaffirm our conviction that such security can and must be provided by the extension of the sound principles of contributory social insurance. While during the past twelve years some progress has been made in providing minimum protection against certain of the risks inherent in our industrial society, it is high time that our social security laws be revised and extended in view of the needs of those who work for their livelihood and in a manner consistent with the resources of the wealthiest and most powerful nation on earth.

Your committee has given careful study to the many resolutions dealing with the subject offered to this convention and has reviewed the entire subject which is of such vital concern, not only to our membership but to all who work for their livelihood.

Recommendations for action in the year ahead will be found under the titles of the several sections of the Social Security Act.

(Transfer from state to federal funds)—(p. 661) Res. 122 proposed that the A. F. of L. urge amendments . . . which will permit workers in private employment to transfer benefit credits and funds established under the Social Security Act to state retirement systems upon transfer of employment from private to state employment, and further

The American Federation of Labor urge amendments to state retirement systems which will permit workers in state employment to transfer benefit credits and funds established under state retirement systems upon transfer of employment from state to private employment.

The proposal was referred to the Committee on Social Security.

(P. 663) A concise social security program was presented to the convention through Res. 129, as follows:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled in San Francisco, California, on October 6, 1947, go on record favoring a full social security program:

An increase in old age benefits of at least 50 per cent;

Lowering of retirement age to 55;

A medical insurance program;

Unemployment benefits;

A hospital insurance program;

An increase in death benefits of at least 50 per cent. All of which would make for a more secure position in the way of life.

The convention referred the resolution to the Social Security Committee.

(Taxes)—(p. 265) It seems to us advisable that social security income and expenditures should be segregated from the remainder of the federal budget. A reexamination of the whole social security revenue policy is overdue. Certainly the combination of income, excise, and social security taxes on those in the low income groups raises serious doubt as to whether workers in such groups should be saddled with the increased costs involved in necessary expansion of our existing social security program. Appropriation of general revenue for the support of such expanded program should be made if a study points to its need.

(P. 664) Res. 134:

Whereas—Industry has made it almost impossible for a man or woman to secure employment after the age of 45, and

Whereas—A great number of persons now employed at ages between 45 and 60 will be discharged because of physical impairment, and

Whereas—The period of waiting to become eligible for social security benefits will be of great deprivation, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this sixty-sixth convention of the American Federation of Labor use its influence with Congress to raise the employes' and the employers' contribution to the social security fund to 2 per cent instead of the present one per cent of earnings up to $3,000 per annum.

Convention referred the resolution to the Committee on Social Security.

(P. 662) The convention unanimously adopted Res. 128 as follows:

Whereas—Most building construction workers during the year are employed by several contractors, and

Whereas—Each contractor is by law compelled to withhold 1 per cent social security on each worker up to $3,000, and

Whereas—Many workers pay double the maximum without a refund from the government unless through affidavits and applications such refunds are granted, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor make efforts to have the government refund all monies paid by workers over the maximum of $30, without making request for same just as they refund overpaid withholding tax.

(Extension to Puerto Rico)—(p. 628) The following resolution, No. 8, calling for an expression of endorsement for the sentiments of the Puerto Ricans in their aim to secure social security coverage for the Island, was unanimously adopted:

Whereas—Through legislation approved by Congress . . . Titles V and VI of the Social Security Act were extended to Puerto Rico which cover maternal and child health, child welfare services, services for crippled children and vocational rehabilitation and public health, and

Whereas—With the application of Titles V and VI over 75,000 persons have been receiving some kind of social assistance which averages $7.50 per month supposed to cover food, clothing, shelter and basic personal requirements, and

Whereas—Extension to Puerto Rico of Titles I, IV and X of the Social Security Act would enable the Island to give more adequate assistance to needy persons so as to help in raising living standards, and

Whereas—The Government of Puerto Rico has established the appropriate machinery to conform to the provisions of Titles I, IV and X of the Social Security Act, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Sixty-sixth Convention of the American Federation of Labor held at San Francisco echoing the urgent appeal of the people of Puerto Rico instruct the Executive Council to express to Congress and the President of the United States its sympathy toward the just demand of the Territory of Puerto Rico and to urge the immediate extension to the Island of Title I, IV and X of the Social Security Act. The Executive Council is directed also to ask the Social Security Board to carry out an investigation of social conditions in Puerto Rico and of the scope of the social legislation of the Island to determine to what extent and under what conditions the Social Security Act should be extended to Puerto Rico by the United States Congress.

Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill —(p. 662) The convention unanimously reaffirmed its previous endorsement of this bill.

(Program)—(1948, p. 451) The convention approved committee recommendations that legislation be sought to provide the following:

The 13 years of experience acquired since the adoption of the Social Security Act have proven the soundness and practicability of contributory social insurance as a means of providing against the risks of loss of income faced by all who toil for their livelihood. The rise in living standards and the drastic shrinking of the purchasing power of the dollar that have taken place in those years since 1935 have made the program obsolete.

It is not possible here to specify in detail all the elements of such a comprehensive program nor to lay down a blueprint of a legislative program. Sound principles governing a program of modernization have been outlined in declarations made by previous conventions of the American Federation of Labor.

Your committee recommends that the Committee on Social Security develop and have introduced at the earliest date possible after the convening of the 81st Congress, legislative proposals for a comprehensive social insurance program. The draft bill should provide for the following:

1. Old Age and Survivors Insurance

The coverage should be extended to include all wage earners and self-employed persons.

Benefits should be materially increased all along the line. The improved benefit formula should be made applicable to those presently eligible and to those newly brought under the system.

The protection given to the dependents of women and men should be equalized.

The test of retirement should be liberalized to permit eligible persons to retain at least part-time employment without jeopardizing benefit rights.

The contribution rate of both employers and employees should be increased at the time benefits are raised, with provision for a contribution from the general revenues of the government when justified to maintain the financial soundness of the system.

2. Permanent Disability.

Benefit provisions to include retraining and rehabilitation.

3. Temporary Disability.

A federal system of disability insurance for those temporarily incapacitated for illness not covered by workmen's compensation.

4. Health Insurance.

A comprehensive program to provide and meet the costs of medical care and service by the extension of social insurance should be established. Such program must preserve the individual rights of both patients and physicians. The program should include provision for an extensive program for the construction of hospitals and health centers, the training of medical personnel, and development of research.

Interim Program:

a. State Unemployment Compensation Programs.

Pending enactment of a national system of unemployment insurance and temporary disability insurance, much can be done immediately to meet the deficiencies of the present state unemployment compensation programs.

The Federal Government should also revise the system of financing both for administration and for benefits. For administration, a contingency fund should be set up to facilitate the budgeting of state agency requirements.

We favor federal standards which would prohibit the states from denying or cancelling earned benefit rights to claimants whose unemployment is a result of a quit for good cause or because it is not due to a cause "attributable to the employer." Pending adoption of such standards, the states should remove these and other stringent disqualification provisions.

Though there has been gradual improvement in benefit provisions of the state programs, the increase in living costs now makes it imperative that benefits be materially raised.

Under the amendments to the Social Security Act the states are now able to include temporary disability coverage under their unemployment compensation laws. In two or three states now having such provisions, dangerous precedents have been established. We advise our state federations of labor in considering such amendments to their unemployment compensation acts to exercise extreme care lest these harmful precedents become so entrenched as to jeopardize the development of sound insurance of this kind.

b. Aid to Children.

We believe that all children regardless of race, residence or family income have the right to whatever health and welfare services and medical care they need for wholesome growth and development and that it is the responsibility of the Federal Government to help the states and communities meet these requirements. We favor raising the amounts available for payments to the states to whatever sum is needed to meet the requirements of an adequate maternal and child welfare program. . . .

In connection with the subject of social insurance, your committee offers the following additional report:

Your committee is of the opinion that it would be well to have a thorough study made of the job classifications as they have been prepared under the Department of Labor, for the use of Federal Employment Offices.

Experience has indicated that many of these classifications are superfluous and because of their complexity, inefficient and confusing to both those directing the employment offices and labor seeking job opportunities.

When this survey has been made, your committee recommends that the officers of the American Federation of Labor make a report on the results obtained to the affiliated organizations, and take up with the Department of Labor the entire question of the type of classifications which should govern hereafter.

(Pp. 236, 458) Res. 13 called for a general broadening and liberalization of law as follows:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled at Cincinnati, Ohio, in November, 1948, urge the President of the United States to press to the limit his request that Congress act to broaden social security benefits so that our older citizens may live a more decent life, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention go on record favoring legislation to immediately effect the lowering of the retirement age under the Social Security Act from 65 to 55 years, and be it further

Resolved—That a minimum pension of $100 per month at age 55 be provided with pensions graduated from that figure upward, and be it further

Resolved—That beginning immediately contributions be required from both the employee and the employer of a sum from each of not to exceed three per cent of the employee's earnings.

(Extension to Non-Profit Organizations)—(pp. 237, 458) Res. 14:

Resolved—That this, the 67th Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record favoring the introduction of amendments to the Social Security Act to provide the benefits of the Act for employees of non-profit organizations operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, including hospitals, and all other workers not now covered by the Social Security Act.

Referred to Committee on Social Security.

(Amendments and Program)—(1949, p. 473) The following committee report was unanimously adopted:

This section of the Executive Council's Report includes specific recommendations for legislation designed to provide a comprehensive system of social insurance through which working people would be protected against the loss of wages through death, old age, physical disability, and involuntary unemployment and against the high and unpredictable costs of medical care and services. Your committee recommends the adoption of this section of the Council's Report as a guide to the development of a legislative program.

Since the Council's Report was prepared, we are happy to report that H.R. 6000 has passed the House. It is now before the Senate.

It is recommended that the American Federation of Labor Committee on Social Security be directed to prepare for the Legislative Committee such amendments to the bill as it passed the House as will more nearly bring the legislation in line with the policies set forth in the Executive Council's Report, and including the provisions set forth in connection with the various sections of the over-all program which follows:

I. Old Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance.

to cover the following points:

1. Lowering of retirement age to 60 years for women.
2. Extension of coverage to agricultural workers.
3. Liberalizing the eligibility requirements for permanent and total disability benefits.
4. Restoration of temporary disability insurance as provided in H.R. 2893.

It is further recommended that the Social Security Committee, in consultation with the appropriate officers of our affiliated unions whose members wish to preserve existing retirement plans covering employees of state and local governments, prepare and present to the Senate such changes in H.R. 6000 as may be found necessary to protect such interest without jeopardizing the protection to be provided for other workers.

II. Public Assistance.

In the main, our objectives in the field of public assistance are incorporated in Title III of H.R. 6000.

It is especially important that, in keeping with American tradition, we should continue to use and augment the services and aids of voluntary organizations, and we should supplement these with government funds and services to maintain and improve health and welfare, particularly of our children, through means which always recognize and uphold the dignity of the individual.

III. Unemployment Insurance.

There should be a unified national system of unemployment insurance and employment services.

Unemployment insurance should be liberalized by providing for:

1. Benefits representing 60 per cent of wage loss due to involuntary unemployment.
2. A uniform duration of benefits up to 26 weeks in a year.
3. Broad extension of coverage to groups now excluded, including persons employed in small firms and all other employees covered by Old Age and Survivors' Insurance.

All persons covered by the unemployment insurance program who are involuntarily unemployed and for whom no suitable work is available should be eligible after no more than one week waiting period for benefits—suitable work to be defined in terms of the worker's proved skill and earning ability.

Any disqualification should be limited to four weeks.

Pending the enactment of federal legislation in this field we recommend that the state federations of labor continue in their efforts to improve the state unemployment compensation programs, in line with these objectives. States should particularly be on guard against the recent tendencies to liberalize benefit and duration provisions at the cost of more restrictive eligibility standards and of lowering employer contribution rates.

The many unfairly restrictive provisions in state laws outlined in the Executive Council's Report should be removed.

Provision should be made for payment of benefits where unemployment is due to illness, provided through a single state fund, and state federations of labor are urged to be on guard against attempts to weaken the programs for temporary disability benefits by incorporation of "electing out" provisions.

IV. National Health Insurance.

The basic principles of the seven-point health program set forth which was developed last year, and which is incorporated in Senate Bill 1679 and H.R. 4312-4313 are recommended for continued approval.

Your committee notes that it now appears Congress may adopt certain portions of this program, such as extended federal aid for hospital construction, school health, and local health units. This is all to the good. However, we recommend that the American Federation of Labor continue to emphasize our long-standing position that the health problem of working people will not be adequately met except through a comprehensive and all-inclusive system of prepaid health insurance so that the economic barrier between patient and doctor is removed.

We observe with particular concern the methods of opposition to national health insurance to which the reactionary section of organized medicine has recently resorted. Your committee recommends that in all our educational and public informational programs, the unfair and pernicious nature of this propaganda be exposed.

Your committee finally recommends that the American Federation of Labor continue its firm opposition to any health legislation which proposes to provide medical care on a needs basis requiring the means test in any form.

(P. 36) Convention requested to favor immediate lowering of retirement age from 65 to 55; to raise the minimum retirement to $100, with upward graduations; and increase in contributions to the social security reserve from both employers and employees.

(P. 40) Res. 16 proposed amendments to the Social Security Act as follows:

1. Increasing the present 1% contribution up to 5% for both the employee and the worker, and the benefits increased in accordance to the increased contributions.

2. Include all workers under the Act, regardless of whether they are workers, state, county or city employees or whatever other category they may come under.

3. That the age for eligibility be lowered from 65 to 60 for both male and female workers.

4. That the minimum benefits under the Act be not less than $75 per month, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention instruct its Executive Council to exert every possible effort to assist in bringing about the enactment of these proposed amendments into the Social Security Act.

(Fire Fighters, Exclusion)—(p. 43) Continued exclusion of the fire fighters of the country from coverage under social security was requested through Res. 24. This is in accord with the established position of the fire fighters themselves.

(P. 44) Res. 27 proposed that the officers of the American Federation of Labor work for an amendment to the Social Security Act, whereby those workers penalized at the present time for having worked for a political subdivision of the government not covered by the Act, shall have credit allowed the same as though they had worked for a covered employer, and further

That all Congressmen and Senators be asked to work for such an amendment, as well as various state federations of labor organizations of other states.

(P. 46) Res. 33 called for lowering of retirement age under OASI to 60, with a minimum monthly benefit of $100, plus an additional $25 per month for retiree's wife on attaining age 55, with increases in benefits for dependents to meet a decent subsistence level.

(P. 317) Res. 99 called upon the A. F. of L. to reiterate its stand for a full social security program as follows:

An increase in the social security tax to 2½ cents each employer and employee.

An increase in death benefits of at least two hundred per cent (200%).

An increase in old-age benefits of at least two hundred per cent (200%).

Lowering of retirement age to 55.

A medical insurance program.

A hospital insurance program.

A substantial widow's pension upon death of the husband, until remarriage or death.

(Disability Benefits Called for)—(p. 344) Res. 122 called upon the A. F. of L. "to cause a study to be made and legislation introduced into the Congress for the purpose of providing benefits for dependency due to permanent and total disability or illness."

(1950, pp. 218, 454) The following committee report and recommendations were unanimously adopted:

The world-wide challenge to our free democratic institutions presented by Communist aggression calls for increased emphasis on programs to provide economic security for the working people of America. We can and must demonstrate to the world that within the framework of these institutions we can provide security against the hazards of old age, death, unemployment, disability and the unpredictable cost of medical care. Fifteen years of experience since the enactment of the first Social Security Act has confirmed our conviction that the principle of contributory social insurance which has been steadfastly adhered to by the American Federation of Labor, offers the soundest method of providing such security. We therefore at this time reaffirm our adherence to this proven principle.

We note with approval the significant progress in this field attained by the enactment of the social security amendments of 1950. However, much remains to be done to provide a system of social insurance sufficiently comprehensive in coverage and adequate in terms of benefits to remove the threat of insecurity from working people and their families. Accordingly we recommend the following program for the broadening and improvement of our social security system and urge that our entire membership as well as the officers and representatives of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations devote every effort to secure its adoption:

A. Disability Insurance:

1. Amend the Old-Age and Survivors Insurance title of the Social Security Act so as to provide benefits equal to retirement benefits to any person unable to earn his livelihood because of physical disability at any age. As an integral part of this program there should be provided a program of physical rehabilitation.

2. Provide benefits equal to unemployment benefits to all persons unemployed as a result of a temporary illness or disability not covered under state workmen's compensation laws. This can best be accomplished as a part of a single federal system of unemployment compensation. Under the present federal-state system it can be accomplished by separate state action, or better, by the adoption of an additional federal standard requiring each state to provide such protection. We reaffirm our position that disability insurance should be provided only through a single state fund and the introduction of private schemes in this field represents a departure from the basic principles of social insurance.

B. Old-Age and Survivors' Insurance:

1. Broaden coverage to include all farm wage earners and independent farm operators and other groups still without protection of this or other public programs.

2. Revise definition of employee suitable to social insurance purposes so as to remove artificial limitations of coverage.

3. Raise wage base for computing both contributions and benefits to $5,400 per year.

4. Restore increment factor in benefit formula to increase benefits for those with longer service.

C. Health Insurance:

1. Adopt in full the previously approved seven point program including a comprehensive system of pre-paid health insurance on the contributory principle.

2. Toward this end expand and intensify our program of information and education to combat the misleading propaganda campaign of the American Medical Association. For this purpose every means of information available should be used, including the facilities of the labor press and labor's radio program. We also urge that all possible assistance be given by the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations to the Committee for the Nation's Health so that its most useful work in acquainting the general public with the truth about this most important issue can be enlarged.

D. Unemployment Insurance:

1. Repeal the Knowland Amendment to the Social Security Act of 1950.

2. The critical international situation now requires again the mobilization and planned utilization of our manpower resources. As men and women are called on to work where their services are needed without regard to state lines and political boundaries a unified national system of unemployment compensation and public employment offices which can work effectively and cooperatively with labor unions becomes imperative. Pending the development of such a national system we urge the State Federations of Labor to employ every effort to amend their state unemployment compensation laws to correct the major deficiencies cited in the Executive Council report. The time to make these needed corrections in our unemployment insurance program is during a period of high employment and not wait until the nation is confronted with large scale unemployment.

(1951, p. 173) The Executive Council submitted a comprehensive report on developments in the broad field of Social Security and outlined a program for action in the following year.

(P. 531) The convention unanimously approved the report of its committee which considered the report under the Social Security Title, as follows:

Security against economic hazards, against privation and want, is indispensable in a free society. Effective exercise of community responsibility to safeguard the individual against the hazards of destitution and dependency due to unemployment, disability or old age becomes even more essential when the whole nation is subjected to the strain and stress of mobilization.

While we note with satisfaction the progress achieved during the past year, we are acutely aware of the dangerous shortcomings of our Social Security System and of the urgent need to overcome them. We are also keenly conscious of the intensified drive by the reactionary employers, conducted in concert with other selfish interests, to weaken the legal and administrative standards, as well as economic standards of Social Security.

It is up to us to meet this drive head-on. It is up to Organized Labor, locally, statewide and nationally, to assume the full leadership for rallying the whole community to the task of completing a sound and greatly strengthened structure of social security for all Americans. It is up to us in the American Federation of Labor to make sure that the fundamental principle of social security rights is not subverted to the notion of mere privileges. It is the duty of our Federation to make sure that those now left ineligible to the social security benefits to which they are entitled are brought within the coverage of the law. And it is Labor's special responsibility to see that the rights and benefits under our national social security system are fully responsive to the changing economic conditions and that they measure up to our future growth and future strength as a nation.

To this end, we recommend that the services and facilities of the office of the Director of Social Insurance Activities at the national headquarters of the American Federation of Labor be strengthened and expanded so that this office may serve as a clearing house of current information to all of our affiliates on developments in the Congress, in the several State legislatures and in the agencies administering the laws. We also recommend that a larger measure of Labor consultation and representation be sought in all agencies concerned with social security administration.

With regard to the specific phases of the program reported upon by the Executive Council, we offer the following comments and recommendations:

A. Old Age and Survivors Insurance.

Old age and survivors benefits are now received by four million persons. A sound, self-financed national insurance system is at least beginning to go into operation in the United States. The national old age and survivors insurance system needs to be strengthened and extended in many ways. We note as especially urgent the following action:

1. Provide benefits equal to retirement benefits to any person within the system, regardless of age, unable to earn a living because of physical disability.

2. Broaden coverage by including all persons now without protection for their old age, and by removing the artificial limitation now in effect by revising the present restrictive definition of "employee" in the Act.

3. Increase the wage base for computing both contributions and benefits to at least $6,000 per year.

4. Reinstate the provision for the increase in benefits in relation to each year of contributions to the insurance program.

5. To keep the effective operation of the social insurance system under constant review, initiate independent studies for the guidance of the Congress in improving the system and bringing it into harmony with changing economic conditions.

B. Public Assistance.

Constant pressures are being exerted to curtail public assistance services and to cut federal and state appropriations for public assistance programs. Labor must stand guard against the disruption and crippling of these essential services.

We must also stand firmly against the attempts in certain states and in the Congress for disclosure of information about recipients of public assistance, in defiance of the basic principle written into the law by the Congress. We especially commend the Federal Security Administrator for his courageous fight against the attempts of certain state officials to breach the law and exploit the dire needs of the poor.

C. Unemployment Insurance.

We wholeheartedly approve the recommendations made by the Executive Council in its report for the correction of far-reaching deficiencies in our unemployment insurance system. The time for revision and strengthening of the system is now, when high employment prevails. We urge every State Federation to lay groundwork in the ensuing year for comprehensive revision of state laws and for a renewed drive toward a national system of unemployment compensation.

We call again for the repeal of the Knowland Amendment of 1950. And, finally, we ask for the provision of benefits equal to unemployment benefits, to all persons unemployed as the result of temporary illness or disability not covered under state workmen's compensation laws, and call for federal standards to provide such protection in each state.

D. National Health Program.

We approve the recommendations contained in the Executive Council's report and call upon our entire membership and their friends to join in the drive for a comprehensive national health program. We regard a comprehensive contributory nation-wide system of pre-paid health insurance as an indispensable part of our American Social Security System. The richly financed campaign waged against the health insurance program by the American Medical Association has been widened to arouse public opposition to all progressive measures. Labor must be ready and able to meet this poisonous propaganda disseminated by the medical lobby. Outstanding work has been done by the Committee for the Nation's Health to acquaint the public with the true facts. We commend the committee for its distinguished service and ask our affiliates to give it increased support.

The proposal to provide for the beneficiaries of the old age and survivors insurance, free hospitalization up to sixty days a year, meets with our approval. Such hospitalization would be on an insurance basis, being financed by the contributions under the old age and survivors insurance system. We regard it as a sound and logical improvement in the system.

(1952, pp. 188, 443) The Executive Council Report contained a comprehensive report of developments in the field of Social Security. In turn the convention approved the E.C. Report and the recommendations and findings of the convention committee as follows:

Four fearful economic hazards confront every man and woman dependent on wages for livelihood in our modern industrial society. They are the hazards of old age, of unemployment, of ill health and of dependency due to other causes of inability to earn an income. The first three can and must be met through social insurance. The last hazard must be overcome through public assistance. The four programs designed to remove these hazards are the four pillars of the Social Security program on which rests the future welfare of American wage earners. To rear them up to the level of real need, to strengthen and to reinforce them, is the devoted purpose of the American Federation of Labor.

While gains have been made in the last 12 months, notably in improving the standards of old age and survivors insurance, our social security system has been under a heavy and unwarranted attack. Attempts to undermine both the principles and specific provisions of the program will not only continue, but will be undoubtedly intensified in the coming year. They should be met positively and aggressively. Labor is the major source of leadership in advancing the cause of social security. The broad support for its advancement must come from the ranks of organized labor. It is our responsibility in the American Federation of Labor to bring forth fully the resources, the experience and the skills of trade unionists in our national, state and local affiliates in a concerted drive for better social security.

To achieve this objective, we ask that the office of the Director of Social Insurance Activities be strengthened and provided with adequate staff so that it may serve as a clearing house of current information to all our affiliates on developments in the national and state legislation and in the administration of the social security laws.

We offer the following comments and recommendations with regard to the specific portions of the program dealt with in the Executive Council's Report:

1. The Hazard of Old Age.

While the improvements made in the old age and survivors insurance at the close of the last session of Congress are gratifying, they have fallen far short of the objectives we have set. We reiterate the recommendations made by the Seventieth Convention for the specific improvements in the system. The need for further liberalization of the benefit formula deserves special emphasis, as does the extension of coverage along the lines recommended by the Executive Council. We look for the realization of all of these objectives in the 83rd Congress. We ask that proposals be submitted early in the next session of Congress to provide for the extension of OASI benefits to cases of permanent and total disability prior to retirement.

Gains made through increased longevity should lead to greater utilization of productive skills of older workers. Our affiliates would do well to help assure greater employment opportunities for our senior members and to press for a more responsible and responsive attitude toward older workers by employers.

The proportion of persons over 65 in our population has made a dramatic increase over a relatively short period of years. With it has grown the responsibility of the whole community for adequate provision of retirement benefits sufficient for the older person's self-support. The existing benefits are grossly inadequate. Their buying power has been further reduced by inflation. As the result, and despite the recent minor improvements, the old age security program will become a token program, unless the urgently needed improvements are made without delay. Labor must insist on early action which would bring the old age and survivors insurance program in harmony with economic realities.

2. The Hazard of Unemployment.

Our unemployment insurance system has been badly mutilated in recent years by irresponsible application of merit rating and by the rising sway of employers over its operation. To an alarming extent it has also become a captive of the states and the state bureaucracy, too often subservient to employers' interests. The future of unemployment compensation is in grave jeopardy, unless quick and decisive steps are taken to assert public interest above that of private accommodation of business interests and to meet the multiplying problems of deteriorated benefits, diluted administrative standards and the distressing state of benefit financing.

Most state legislatures are meeting in the coming year. Timely action is essential to assure favorable consideration of proposals for the improvement of state laws. Our Federation should be prepared to assist the state federations in the development of their policies and legislative programs. We concur in the recommen-tions of the Executive Council and ask that all of our affiliates be alerted to help to the utmost in the decisive drive for the betterment of unemployment compensation in the coming year.

3. The Hazard of Ill Health.

Intensive studies, by the President's Commission and by other public and private agencies, have delved deeply during the past year into the problems of the nation's health. This research is needed, is welcome and will no doubt add to the public understanding of the health and medical services needed by the American people. But in no small measure study in the health field has become a form of escape from action. The deliberately false and malicious charge of "socialized medicine" hangs like a blinding fog in the way of progress toward a sound, flexible and thoroughly democratic objective of a national health insurance system, long advocated by the American Federation of Labor.

Pioneer achievements of our affiliates in San Francisco, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, St. Louis and other communities in the development of health centers and medical services under trade union sponsorship are blazing a new trail for Labor's leadership in this field. Equally important are these developments in that they provide a training ground for practical experience and technical development of trade union administrators for future and greatly expanded cooperative programs. These programs are prompted by the widespread and insistent need. The crux of the nation's health problem is that, for the average American worker and his family, adequate health services are beyond their financial reach. Too often the hazard of ill health becomes insuperable simply because the needed medical services are something that people could not afford.

America needs more doctors, more and better hospitals, more clinics, more health centers. Public action is necessary to help achieve all these objectives. But the overriding goal is the solution of the economic problem which stands between the patient and his cure. We will continue to devote our energies to the attainment of this goal.

Invaluable services rendered to us and to our affiliates in the past year by the Committee for the Nation's Health have greatly strengthened our work in this field and we ask our affiliates to give the committee their continued unstinting support.

4. Public Assistance.

Welfare services for those in need have been dwindling because of the failure to provide adequate appropriations for public assistance services at the federal and state levels. In constant dollars, we are spending per capita 55 per cent less on public welfare than we did 10 years ago. It is Labor's special responsibility to stand guard over the public welfare program against crippling cuts and to make sure that services to the needy are adequate and soundly administered. We heartily concur with the recommendation of the Executive Council that every effort be made to repeal the Jenner Amendment requiring disclosure of public relief rolls.

(1953, pp. 300, 639) A comprehensive report was submitted to the convention on the broad field of social security. The E.C. Report was unanimously approved, together with the report and recommendations of the convention committee:

The development of effective means of overcoming the hazards of ill health, unemployment, dependency and insecurity in old age, which are common to all wage earners, is and must continue to be a primary concern of the American Federation of Labor. These hazards are real and immediate. They cannot be removed by pious phrases and professions of sympathetic concern, unaccompanied by specific programs. They require positive remedial action. The American Federation of Labor must continue, as it has in the past, to take the lead in advocating and advancing such action.

The task of advancing to meet these needs is made doubly difficult today by the necessity of defending established programs against new and more vigorous attacks now being directed against them. With property and business interests gaining dominant influence in the shaping of public policy, enemies of social security have launched an all-out drive to undermine the structure of unemployment compensation, old age and survivors insurance, public assistance and other vital programs which have been built up through years of painstaking effort. Active campaigns to accomplish these objectives are now under way.

Our energies must now be divided between the positive task of advocating improvement and the negative, but urgent, task of defending what we have achieved in the past. This makes it more vitally important than ever before that all affiliated unions, their officers and members, lend their full and active support to the efforts of the American Federation of Labor in the social security field.

With respect to the specific areas covered in the Executive Council's Report, we submit the following observations and recommendations:

In the comprehensive review of developments in social security, the Executive Council's Report devotes special attention to each of the major areas embodied in this vital program. To each of these, your committee has given separate consideration in the light of the foregoing statement of objectives.

(1954, p. 581) The E.C. Report presented an accounting of developments in the whole area of social security and the convention approved its committee report on the subject. The following objectives were included in the approved report:

Your committee notes with favor the advancements in securing improvements in the old age and survivors title of the Social Security Act contained in the Social Security Amendments of 1954 reported on in this section of the Executive Council Report. The American Federation of Labor takes pride in the constructive role played in our organization in the development of this legislation and its enactment. We are particularly pleased that during the past year the threats to the basic principles of our contributory social security program with benefits based on past earnings and payable without the indignity of a needs test have been successfully ward off. While the increases in benefit payments provided by the new law are not spectacular they are substantial, and the fact that the increases are payable to present beneficiaries as well as to those becoming eligible in the future is of great significance to all who look to this system for protection against the loss of family income due to old age or death of the family breadwinner.

We are also pleased to note that the amendments extend the protection of this system to some 10 million additional people.

These important amendments were enacted with the support of both our national political parties. In so saying we do not mean to detract from the significance of the support given by the present majority party and we appreciate the active support of the Administration under the leadership of President Eisenhower, and the co-operation of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in developing and sponsoring this program which is of such vital interest not only to the wage earners who are members of unions affiliated with the A. F.

of L., but to all the people of our country who are dependent upon their earnings for their livelihood.

Beneficial as these improvements are they still fall short of attaining the goal of adequate protection to the family income. We call for the development of further expansion and improvement of the social security program by the enactment of legislation in the next session of Congress, designed to meet the following five objectives:

1. Protection against wage loss resulting from permanent and total disability. While the 1954 amendments represent a step in the right direction by protecting the rights of the disabled, that is not enough. A worker should become eligible for monthly benefit payments upon the determination of his physical disability and subject to his willingness to participate in rehabilitation efforts in all practicable cases.

There can be no question concerning the need for protection against the risk of physical disability among working people. Income loss resulting from permanent extended disability is a major economic hazard to which workers are exposed. The resulting economic hardship to the family is frequently even greater than that created by old age or death. The family must not only face the loss of the breadwinner's earnings, but must meet the costs of medical care. As a rule, savings and other personal resources are soon exhausted. The problem of the disabled younger worker is particularly difficult, since there are likely to be young children in the family and he has had no opportunity to acquire any significant savings. Social insurance provides the only practical and adequate method of preventing dependency from income loss resulting from this cause. The Federal Government is now operating programs providing such protection to employees of the railways and to the career government workers. The argument that our government cannot soundly administer such a program is proven false by its success in these fields.

2. Provision of a program for protection against temporary disability should be incorporated in the Federal Old Age and Survivors Insurance program. Since 1946 there has been a consistent effort to establish temporary disability programs by state enactment in conjunction with the state unemployment compensation programs. However, only four states in these eight years have enacted such legislation and these were the states having the special inducement resulting from the worker contribution provided in their state unemployment compensation programs. In the light of this record it now appears certain that the states will not move further to meet this important need and it is necessary that the Federal Government take action.

3. The benefit structure of the old age and survivors insurance program should be improved along the following four lines:

- a. There should be an increment to the primary benefit for workers who have been long-time participants in the program.
- b. The wage base should be raised to reflect increases in earnings levels since the start of the program.
- c. The average wage on which benefits are computed should be based on the best 10 years earnings record.
- d. Tips should be included in the computation of wages.

4. The age of eligibility for women should be lowered to 60 years. This should apply both to employed women who retire and to those who are dependents of retired workers, or widows of deceased workers.

5. There should be established an advisory group representative of management, Labor and the self-employed to review periodically the actuarial soundness of the system and make recommendations as to necessary changes in the contribution rates. In this connection the A. F. of L. reaffirms its readiness to support a contribution rate necessary to pay benefits adequate to the needs of survivors and retired workers. The working people are willing to pay their share of the cost of an adequate program.

(Pp. 372, 468) Res. No. 5:

Whereas—The Social Security Act now has been in existence for many years and has an accumulated surplus of many billion dollars, and

Whereas—The Act provides low retirement benefits, and only at the age of 65 years, and

Whereas—Payments under the Act are wholly inadequate to provide minimum requirements, and

Whereas—The average monthly payment at present is $36.00, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor reiterate its stand for a full social security program, including revisions of the Act as follows:

- (1) Lowering the age retirement to 60 years for men and 55 years for women.
- (2) Participation in payment and benefits of all who work for wages, as well as self-employed.
- (3) Providing benefit payments to those permanently incapacitated regardless of age.
- (4) Provision to increase immediately contributions of both employer and employee to three per cent each to keep the reserve solvent, and be it further

Resolved—That copies of this resolution be submitted to the proper committees in the Senate and the House of Representatives and to the President of the United States.

Referred to Committee on Social Security.

(1955, p. 220) In its annual report, the E.C. covered efforts to improve the coverage and administration of the social security program, outlining achievements and future objectives. Attention was called to the importance of including a disability provision, and the following improvements in OASI:

1. To maintain a truly wage-related benefit system consistent with our private enterprise economy the wage base should be raised from the present $4,200 to $7,800.

2. An increment of one-half of one per cent should be added to the primary benefit for each year a worker participates in and contributes to the system.

3. For each year in which a worker continues in active employment beyond the age of 65 his primary benefit should be increased by two per cent.

4. Benefits should be computed on the worker's 10 best consecutive years of covered employment.

5. Provision should be made for compensation in case of illness or temporary disability.

6. Age of benefit eligibility should be lowered to 60 for women.

7. An advisory group representative of employers, employees, and the self-employed should be established to advise the appropriate committees of Congress periodically on the soundness of the financing and the adequacy of benefits.

8. Remuneration received in the form of tips should be included as wages for social security purposes.

South, Awakening of the—(1929, p. 59) An outstanding labor development of the year is the awakening of the South. It came in a spontaneous revolt. For the past 30 years the A. F. of L. and the United Textile Workers have been trying to organize Southern textile workers. Some results of this work were shown in scattered organizations, but it was not until the stretch-out system lashed their sense of justice into action that they realized the need of unionism. Strikes in textile mills have not been uncommon, but this movement was different. It was general throughout the industry. Aggressive revolts occurred in Elizabethton, Tennessee, several cities in South Carolina, Georgia and North Carolina. The initiative to action came from the textile operatives. The Federation responded to their call for help by sending organizers to help direct efforts along constructive lines and by appeals for financial assistance from all unions.

Industrialization has progressed more slowly in the South than in most of the other sections of the United States. Unions had been generally formed in the printing and building trades and some other handicrafts. Such unions dealt largely with local companies and managements. With the industrialization of the South by textile, steel, tobacco, power, paper, furniture and other industries, has come the problem of dealing with large corporations, absentee capital, holding companies, mill villages, and related problems. Progress in power transmission has been followed by wider distribution of factories and has opened up factory employment to workers from agricultural and mountain districts. Thus the great majority of textile operatives in the South are persons not only with no union background but with no industrial experience or standards.

In a number of cases the company made an agreement with a committee of its employees. As these committees consisted mainly of leaders of new unions, the result was definite progress. These workers in the South are poor and they have suffered much by the recent strikes. It will take time to develop self-supporting unions. Responsibility of establishing higher wages and better conditions of employment must rest with national and international trade unions. The Federation can and has assisted with organizing literature, information, organizers, and suggestions. Upon national and international trade unions and local labor organizations must rest chief responsibility for sustained work.

It is a most opportune time for all organizations to strengthen their unions in the South. The development of unions simultaneously with further industrialization of the South, will assure sounder, better balanced progress. Permanent progress cannot be built up on low wages, long hours, and special concessions. The South has raw materials, American workers, power resources, and a need for more industries. But unless these industries are prepared to give a square deal to workers they are not only pillaging the resources of the South but are sowing the seeds of class conflict in most dangerous soil. The Southern worker will not meekly bear injustice when experience teaches him standards of justice.

We urge all organizations to include in their organizing plans for the coming year definite provisions for work in the South.

Organizing work in the South cannot stop until all industries are thoroughly organized.

(P. 266) The E.C. is directed to call a conference of national and international officials within 30 days for the purpose of devising a policy that will be acceptable to all interested parties in the proposed campaign of organization among southern workers regardless of craft or calling.

(P. 278) Statement by president of the A. F. of L.:

"North Carolina is developing into a great industrial state, and it is but natural that in this growth and development there would arise great economic, social and human problems.

It is impossible to settle these problems through the use of force, murder and the destruction of life. Men who love liberty and independence will fight and die for it, and every martyr is an inspiration to the others. And so, if there is to be peace and prosperity in the South, the rights of the workers must be recognized; their right to organize must be conceded, and there must be developed an understanding between all the forces of industries and the representatives of the public that will mean cooperation and efficiency.

"The A. F. of L. has endeavored most consistently to respond to this appeal from southern workers for help and assistance. I read yesterday into the records accounts of the millions of dollars in money that have been poured into the Southern States by the different organizations affiliated with the A. F. of L. Our organizers have gone there, our representatives have held meetings there, we have responded to every appeal that has ever been made upon the A. F. of L. And we have not gone in for the purpose of dictating to the southern people, for the purpose of dictating to industry. The charge that has been made, in the press and otherwise, that we are influenced by the employers of the North to use our organization for the purpose of inflicting injury on the employers of the South is baseless and untrue. We are not in the South trying to force trade unionism upon the workers we are not there trying to impose our philosophy upon the people of that section; but we are there because the South is awakening and because the workers themselves appeal to us to go there and help them.

"In their extremity, the victims of injustice and greed, now that industry is developing in the South, where can they turn except to the great organized labor movement of our land? Can they appeal to civic organizations? Can they appeal to chambers of commerce? Can they appeal to fraternal organizations? Can they appeal even to the political powers for justice and redress of wrong?

"The answer to each appeals would be, 'We have no authority,' or, 'We are not in sympathy with the appeal you make.' But when the appeal comes to the great heart of Labor and the men and women who toil, those who have gone through the sacrifice in defense of organization and for the right to organize, they find a response, and it is but natural that we should go to the place where these workers dwell, the victims of exploitation and greed, and in an unselfish manner give of our money our time and of our service to help them

"When the appeal came from Elizabethton I dispatched our representative there along with the representatives of other organizations. I instructed them to go there as quickly as possible and render all the assistance they could. You heard the story. Our representatives were kidnapped by those who classed themselves as respectable citizens, leaders in the church, bankers; not so-called racketeers or thugs, but those who paraded as Pharises—holier than thou.

"They took our representatives out and told them they were going to take them for a ride. In some places that statement strikes terror to the hearts of those who take a ride. Our representatives were terrorized; they did not know what it all meant; they suffered great mental anguish inflicted on them by those so-called representative citizens. When they came to me it so aroused my indignation that I said I would go there myself. I took the first train and went to Elizabethton. I addressed the people in that community and told them I considered the kidnapping of our representatives as a challenge to the A. F. of L. I said that, in so far as it lay within my power, I would endeavor to bring those guilty of that act to the bar of justice.

"We employed a firm of attorneys. We went before the grand jury in Elizabethton with all the evidence. We told the members of the grand jury and the court that a crime had been perpetrated upon peaceful citizens. The kidnappers were identified, they were named and pointed out. We were told by the grand jury that kidnapping in Tennessee was no crime unless the kidnappers demanded a ransom. In one case the grand jury did return an indictment for assault and battery against those who kidnapped the local man.

"When I returned from a council meeting in Florida I visited Savannah, Jacksonville, Atlanta and other sections of the South, addressing numerous meetings, delivering the message of Labor and appealing to the workers of the South to come with us.

"When the kidnapping occurred in Tennessee we prepared a resolution, and asked that it be introduced in the United States Senate, providing for an investigation of the terrible conditions that we knew existed in the southland. Senator Wheeler of Montana introduced the resolution and the Committee on Manufacture conducted a very extended hearing. We submitted evidence; we filled the record with incontrovertible evidence of the existence of intolerable conditions.

"I appeared before the Senate committee on behalf of Labor and there I told my story. Some of the Southern Senators objected. A majority report and a minority report were made. The majority report recommended that the Federal Trade Commission make an investigation of the entire textile situation throughout the country. The minority report, signed by Senator Wheeler, recommended that the Senate make the investigation. It was reported, it is on the calendar, it is there still while murder and exploitation go on in the southland. We told them the situation would get worse. We warned them that there was a dynamic situation in the South; that it was a matter of public concern, so much so that this great legislative arm of the Federal Government should, in the interest of human protection, go into the South, secure the facts and let the world know what the situation really is. We wanted the pitiless light of publicity turned on these terrible conditions in the southland.

"I have done all that was humanly possible to bring this investigation about. The other day when this tragedy took place at Marion, North Carolina, I wired Senator Wheeler calling his attention to the situation. I said that in the beginning we had represented that these things would occur, and again in the name of Labor I appealed to the Senate to adopt a resolution and start the investigation. The record shows that Senator Wheeler immediately acted: that he interposed during the tariff discussion to request that this resolution be considered, that he applied to the Senate to make the investigation. Senator Overman and Senator Simmons of North Carolina interposed their usual objections, and under the rules of the Senate the investigation could not be considered.

"There is just one more observation I should like to make, and that is this: That, after all, the salvation of the southern worker lies within himself. The southern workers themselves must be willing to make the fight and the sacrifice, if necessary, for trade unionism and for the right to organize. We cannot carry to them, individually and collectively, the cloak of trade unionism and theoretically place it upon their shoulders; it must be woven and made and fabricated by themselves.

"The spirit of organization must be there; they must be willing to come. And so I wish that they might understand that, while we are ready to help and to give, we cannot pour millions into the South without the South responding to our appeal themselves. They must be taught this lesson: that in the struggle and the strife they must rely largely upon their own resources, upon community help, upon the South itself. Their minds must be disabused of the fact that as soon as a strike occurs, figuratively speaking, the bread wagon of the North appears at the doors. We are willing to give, and to give until it hurts, to send our men there, to use the great moral and political influence of our movement to help them, but they, too, must make up their minds that the fight for themselves is their fight and that we will help to lead it.

"I think it appropriate to make this statement so that the southern worker may know that he can achieve his objective only along the same royal route pursued by the trade unions of the North—it must be along the highway of struggle, for the hosts of opposition are very great indeed."

South

Labor Chautauqua—(1926, p. 167) The workers of the South are showing a desire for organization under the banner of the A. F. of L. The men and women now organized believe the unorganized can be more speedily brought into the various national and international unions through the starting of a Labor Chautauqua. The E.C. is directed to call together representatives of all national and international unions for the purpose of discussing the benefits to the South of such a course and to devise ways and means to carry out the proposition.

Southern Organizing Campaign—(1930, pp. 83, 203)—In accord with the decision of the Toronto Convention of the A. F. of L., a general organizing campaign was launched in the Southern States last January. As the industrialization of these states has been much slower than that of other sections, only since recent years has there been an increase of factory workers so as to make the situation urgent. There are in the South numbers of families living in the mountains and in agricultural regions that have not been able to make satisfactory progress. These persons constitute a supply of potential cheap labor which has been held out as an inducement to industrialists to move South. In addition, communities and even states have offered special bonuses, such as tax exemptions, free cities, roads, etc. As a result, southern factories, founded on a cheap labor basis, were threatening to disorganize standards in the textile industry.

Unions of craftsmen, central labor unions, state federations of labor, constituted a good framework of organizations to which needed to be added unions of factory workers.

To cope with the situation, a concentrated drive for unionization was held necessary. All national and international organizations were asked to join in this movement under Federation leadership.

A preliminary conference was held in Washington, D. C., November 14, 1929, to formulate plans. This conference adopted the following report:

The social and industrial unrest manifested by the workers in the unorganized industries of the South can only be interpreted as an expression of a deep-seated desire to secure and enjoy higher wages, proper and humane conditions of employment and the exercise of economic, industrial and social freedom. The southern worker has long been regarded by employers of labor as docile and submissive, satisfied if he received small compensation and susceptible to exploitation. This appraisement of southern working people was very largely created through the invitations extended by so-called business and employers' organizations in the South to capital and industrialists outside the South to locate their mills and factories there. Many of the invitations thus extended emphasized the docility of southern workers, the opportunity to employ children, lack of legislation regulating the hours of employment of women in industry and the low wages which prevailed. These invitations could only be construed as a bid for outside capital to come South and exploit southern labor.

It is most extraordinary when groups of people residing in a section of our country invite capitalists to come into their respective communities and engage in the exploitation of their neighbors, their fellow-citizens and their unprotected labor. The natural and logical outcome of such representation is reflected in the construction of mill and industrial villages, employment of women and children at night, long hours of exacting service, the inauguration of cruel and inhuman 'stretch-out' systems and the domination, by the employers, of the religious, social and civic life of mill communities.

Evidently the mill and industrial owners and those who invited them to come south did not take into account the sociological and psychological change which was bound to follow the industrialization of the South, the erection of the mill and industrial villages and the mass association of the southern workers. Brought in touch with a new social and industrial order, the desire of southern workers for the enjoyment of higher living standards and for the possession of those attributes which are inseparably associated with a higher standard of living became quickened and intensified. They had been transferred from their isolated homes in the mountains and small communities into a new environment where mass association and collective interest had been substituted for individualism.

Discontent and dissatisfaction, aggravated by the imposition of the "stretch - out" system in many places, caused strikes and disorder in a number of mills and factories. The area affected by industrial disturbances reached from Tennessee to South Carolina. State troops were ordered out in Elizabethton, Tenn., in several communities in North Carolina and in some places in South Carolina. Tragedy and loss of life occurred at Marion, N. C., and other places. It can all be regarded as a phase of the age-long struggle between exploiters and the exploited, between oppressors and the oppressed, between owners of mills and factories and their employees.

The A. F. of L. very quickly realized the seriousness of the situation and immediately appealed to the Senate of the United States to institute an investigation of the textile industry in the south and to make the result of such investigation public. By request of the A. F. of L. a resolution was introduced in the U.S. Senate on April 29, 1929, providing for such investigation. Because of strong opposition from southern mill owners and some southern Senators, no action has, thus far, been taken. Since the introduction of the resolution men and women have been killed at Marion, N. C., and elsewhere. If the U.S. Senate had acted promptly and had undertaken the investigation requested by the A. F. of L. the tragedy at Marion and elsewhere might have been averted and constructive steps might have been taken to allay the unrest and discontent which prevailed.

Organized labor has been eager to be helpful in the distressing situation which developed in the South. We have been ready to do constructive work and to assist in the establishment of collective bargaining, cooperation and a collective relationship between employers and employees.

Naturally the southern workers, oppressed and exploited, have appealed to the A. F. of L. and to national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. for sympathy, assistance and support. They asked the organization having jurisdiction to organize them and to assist them in their hour of distress. The trade union movement would have been false to its ideals and to the humane principles upon which it has been built if it had failed to respond to their appeal.

We have answered their call. We have helped them materially and morally. We are interested in their welfare and their happiness. We are striving for human betterment. We are ready to assist them further in their struggle for the establishment of better homes, better living conditions, for the exercise of the right to organize into trade unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. and for a full and complete exercise of all their industrial, economic and political rights.

Organizations affiliated with the A. F. of L. have most generously contributed many millions of dollars to assist southern working men and women to organize and to carry on strikes which were inaugurated for the purpose of securing higher wages and improved conditions of employment, and to resist encroachments upon the right of wage earners to organize and to engage in the normal activities of trade unionism. In continuation of this policy this conference of national and international officers, called by authority and direction of the Toronto Convention of the A. F. of L., pledges its support, moral and material, to the southern workers in their efforts to organize into trade unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. and to secure higher wages, reasonable hours of work and proper conditions of employment. In conformity with this policy we recommend:

1. That we call upon the Senate of the U.S. to adopt the Wheeler resolution providing for an investigation of the textile industry in the South. We believe that through an investigation such as provided for by the Wheeler resolution the causes of industrial unrest and social discontent can be ascertained and all the facts regarding working conditions, wages and hours of employment in the textile industry can be made public. With this information available and widely circulated public opinion will demand that justice be accorded southern working men and women.

2. That all national and international unions pledge themselves to assign at least one organizer and as many additional organizers as possible to Southern States for the purpose of organizing those who come under their respective jurisdictions and for the purpose of giving special service to the United Textile Workers' organization. It is urged that national and international unions advise the President of the American Federation of Labor of organizers assigned to this campaign within 30 days and that the President of the American Federation of Labor arrange for a conference of such organizers at the earliest date thereafter.

Under the autonomous authority conferred upon national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. each organization may determine its own policy regarding the assignment of organizers. However, because of the unusual interest in organization displayed by the workers of the South we recommend that a plan of cooperation be developed by the President of the A. F. of L. so that organizers assigned by respective national and international unions may coordinate their efforts under the supervision of the President of the A. F. of L. To carry out this campaign efficiently and effectively it is further recommended that the President of the A. F. of L. appoint a committee to consist of not more than three persons to assist him in the direction of this campaign and that he be further authorized to develop an adequate educational and publicity campaign and consider the establishing of headquarters in some southern city, place to be named by him later and this work be carried on within the financial means available.

We call upon the state federations of labor and city central bodies of southern states to organize their forces, to put forth special efforts in cooperation with national and international unions under the supervision of the President of the A. F. of L. and to render all help possible in carrying forward the southern organization campaign.

4. That the officers of the A. F. of L. issue an appeal to the membership of organized labor for financial contributions to assist the United Textile Workers organization in its organizing campaign in the South and that the United Textile Workers' organization render a detailed and itemized report of moneys received and expended in this campaign to the secretary of the A. F. of L., who in turn is to furnish every affiliated national and international union with a copy of such an accounting.

5. That we call upon the responsible and legal authorities of North Carolina to bring to justice those who are responsible for the loss of human life in different towns and places throughout the state.

A conference of organizers at Charlotte, North Carolina, on January 6, 1930, reviewed the work to be done in the South and how this plan may be adapted to the needs of southern industry. Since much of the work has been done in the textile industry, the Naumkeag cooperative plan, in operation at the Naumkeag textile mills of Salem, Massachusetts, has been taken as an illustration.

A number of employers have expressed interest in union-management cooperation and willingness for their workers to join a trade union with these constructive ends in view. We feel that this emphasis on constructive trade unionism, and our offer to assist in securing cooperative agreements and establishing union-management cooperation, are an essential part of the southern campaign.

An important part of the work has also been to educate the workers in the principles and methods of union-management cooperation. By explaining industrial problems and showing how wage earners may improve their conditions through cooperative action, we are laying the foundations for constructive unionism. It is essential that workers be prepared to enter at once into constructive union activity.

Education in trade unionism must of necessity be continued over a period of time. Intensive campaigns have therefore been planned to start educational work in a number of different localities. Labor chautauquas with educational meetings and classes to develop an understanding of trade unionism among wage earners and other members of the community, have been held in Danville, Virginia, and Columbus, Georgia, and a series of educational campaigns is being systematically carried forward in other cities.

Special classes in public speaking have been particularly successful. Labor songs and plays dramatized the problems these workers are facing and helped to unite them in organization for betterment. Churches have been especially cooperative in this educational work.

Publicity plays a most important part in the campaign. The news we give to the press is essentially educational, keeping the constructive nature of the campaign constantly before the public mind and clarifying any issues which may arise during organizing activities. This educational work is essential in securing public understanding and sympathy.

The director of publicity has made contracts with newspapers and editors in different southern centers and keeps them constantly supplied with news of campaign progress. Publicity released from the Birmingham office has emphasized the fundamental human issues at stake in the organizing campaign and has been influential in keeping public attention centered on the basic human needs of workers to be met by trade union organization.

(1947, p. 172) The organizing drive in 14 southern states, started 14 months previous to 1947 convention, was reported on in detail. Difficulties were encountered through raiding tactics of C.I.O. which were concentrated in the South during the A. F. of L. organizing campaign. Despite the problems encountered, however, great progress was reported in new members gained, new locals established, etc. The report closed with the following statement: While we have not reached all our goals or achieved all our hopes, a start has been made toward full organization and results of this good foundation will continue to show in the months and years ahead. The effect of the union spirit, morale and organization interest of our southern membership has been incalculable in any concrete terms. We shall continue to get dividends from this attitude of confidence and pride in our American Federation of Labor heritage. We have been able to give practical organizing training and experience to hundreds of our trade unionists. All our organizations will know the benefit of this influence. The Southern Campaign has been good for the South and good for the American Federation of Labor. Its prestige factor in southern public life is everywhere apparent.

Your committee heartily concurs in this portion of the Executive Council's Report and wishes to commend the Executive Council for the extensive program of organization that has been carried on in the southern states. In spite of the disruptive tactics of the C.I.O., which were largely responsible for the enactment of unfavorable labor legislation in certain states, the A. F. of L. should now be able to consolidate and expand its gains in the south.

The Executive Council rightfully calls attention to the fact that their success in this campaign in the southern states was in great measure due to the continual cooperation of International Unions, State Federations of Labor and City Central Trades and Labor Bodies. Such unity and cooperation always brings results.

The passage of the Taft-Hartley Act makes it imperative that all agencies of the American Federation of Labor continue in complete harmony of action in all of our efforts to organize and advance the interests of labor.

Your committee on organization again urges that the Executive Council continue the intensive nation-wide campaign to organize the millions of unorganized workers throughout America with particular emphasis on the southern states, Canada, Alaska and Hawaii.

Your committee feels that the funds expended were well spent and that the Executive Council, the A. F. of L. regional representatives, and the organizers are to be congratulated upon the excellent results accomplished.

Soviet Russia (see: Anglo-Soviet Trade Union Council; Communism; Russia; International Labor Organization; China, etc.)

Spain (Franco-Spain) — (1952, pp. 122, 542) Because we are convinced that Communist totalitarianism and Russian aggression cannot be defeated by relying on any force which is itself only another form of totalitarian tyranny, have we continued with redoubled vigor our opposition to our government rendering military or economic aid to or even the slightest indirect moral support of the Franco dictatorship over Spain. An arrangement with this admirer and creature of the Nazi-Fascist Axis can only weaken the world democratic cause, distort its purpose, and discredit its flag. No democratic government should traffic with the Falangist dictatorship. It has nothing to offer us—except loss of worthy friends and moral prestige and compromising of principles.

It is in this spirit that we have also been working to help the democratic Spanish fighters for freedom and free trade unionists exiled from their homeland. We have likewise been aiding the imprisoned heroic Barcelona strikers and the underground fighters for free trade unionism and freedom in impoverished and oppressed Spain.

Speed Up System—(1925, p. 320) (1927, p. 295) In the postal service and other government establishments there have been instituted highly objectionable practices, under the guise of "efficiency systems," which are harmful to the workers physically and destructive of service morale, and therefore add materially to labor costs on government employment.

These "speeding up" practices assume various forms and methods, all directed toward mechanical standardization by plans of weighing or counting, or otherwise measuring output without regard to variations of work and other essential factors.

Experience has demonstrated in all lines of endeavor that any system of "speeding up" the workers beyond a reasonable standard is disastrous in its reactions upon both employer and employee.

The E.C. is directed to cooperate with the representatives of government employees and organizations whose members are subjected to these dehumanizing practices with a view of their elimination in the interest of the workers and the public service.

(1933, p. 474) The A. F. of L. is opposed to all so-called speed-up systems of whatsoever character, and it continues to insist upon the reduction of the work period and the extension of leisure time, and upon conditions that will give opportunity for continuity of employment at adequate wages for all workers as absolutely essential elements to national prosperity and well being.

(1946, pp. 195, 615) The E.C. reported success on the part of the A. F. of L. in preventing the adoption of legislation permitting the use of stop watches or other timekeeping devices in timing workmen employed by the Navy.

Spies, Labor—(see Oppressive Labor Practices)

Sprinkler Systems for Vessels — (1936, pp. 127, 462) One of the most needed and practical laws ever enacted by Congress was that providing for equipping all passenger vessels having stateroom accommodations for 50 or more passengers with automatic sprinkler systems.

This bill passed the Senate July 29, 1935, but it was not until June 15, 1936, that the House approved the measure. These sprinkler systems must protect all enclosed portions of such vessels accessible to passengers or crews.

While this legislation has been sought for several years, it was not brought home to the members of Congress until the Morro Castle burned at sea. The fact that a sprinkler system would have saved every life on that boat awakened the members of Congress to the necessity for the passage of S. 2127, which was immediately approved by the President.

The E.C. believes the enforcement of this Act will save many lives. Representatives of the A. F. of L. were credited with securing the enactment of the legislation with the assistance of Speaker Bankhead.

The United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters of the U.S. and Canada originated the campaign for this legislation.

St. John Cathedral Memorial — (1925, p. 280) The aim of the construction of this cathedral is to make it a house of worship for all peoples and Labor desires to place a suitable and fitting memorial to the labor movement of America, in order to forever silence the charge that Labor is selfish, biased and a non-communal organization

We request that the international organizations call attention to the importance of the work, cooperate with the committee to construct this great edifice and to urge their international organizations to assist wherever they can to place a suitable and fitting memorial to Labor in this national cathedral.

The American labor movement seeks to join hands with all forces of good will in the community. The organized church movement has already demonstrated their interest in the cause of Labor. It is therefore appropriate that we should reciprocate that spirit of cooperation.

Standards, Living (also see: Spec. Statement Under Hours—Government Employees; Wages; Hours; Housing; Walsh-Healy)

(1940, pp. 100, 553) The importance of elevating standards of living for all families up to an accepted American level was emphasized in the Report of the Executive Council to the convention. In approving the E.C. Report, the convention adopted the following:

Certainly $1 per hour for 40 hours a week is not an extravagant standard and that standard is the least that will maintain a health and efficiency standard for a family of five. Yet only 15 per cent of all wage earners' families could maintain that standard in 1935-6. As the Executive Council points out this situation remains materially unchanged.

Your committee wishes to emphasize the fact that only increased business activity will enable us to raise living standards for more families to a health and efficiency level with the maintenance of existing work and pay standards. In addition to defense production there must be expansion of consumer and capital goods industries.

(In Defense Production)—(pp. 95-97, 553) Convention adopted following report of committee which considered portion of E.C. Report under above caption:

Our plans and efforts to defend democracy must be based on the concept that democracy is a way of life for all of our people including the workers as well as those devoted to other interests.

Our first concern in our program for expanded production is to absorb into our work program our army of unemployed. Although we have added our defense production controlled by the Federal Government, to production to serve the normal needs of our nation, we still have a reserve of over eight millions of persons without jobs.

The major and controlling fact in relation to war and defense programs is that there must be a total plan covering all groups in the nation. In planning defense for the United States we have three major groups: enlisted persons operating our defense agencies, those engaged in defense production, and those carrying on the normal activities in our country. This section of the Executive Council's Report is concerned with the second and third groups.

The major and controlling fact with regard to plans for workers employed on defense work and standards of living for them and all other citizens lies in our capacity to produce. In the United States we have achieved the highest productivity per worker in the world, and have geared our labor and living standards accordingly. Highly mechanized tools geared to mechanical power, have made it possible for fewer workers to turn out a greatly increased production — output per worker has increased 25 per cent since 1935. As the report points out, in the past decade output of mines and factories increased six per cent while the work week was cut 10 hours and the work force cut by 800,000.

If we maintain our consumer industries at levels that will at least maintain established standards of living for those in both normal and defense production within the coming year, millions of additional workers will be employed in defense and consumer goods production.

To maintain our purchasing power, the real wage must be maintained. As prices increase, wages must likewise increase, or Labor suffers a reduction in its income. In addition, to maintain a sound economic balance, wages must increase with corresponding increased productivity.

(Wartime)—(1942, p. 120) The importance of raising workers to an adequate living standard now must not be underestimated. If this country is to return to private enterprise after the war, workers must have adequate reserves of buying power, stored up in war bonds, so that their war savings may provide a market for private industry.

The budget of the Heller Committee, University of California, is generally recognized as representing an adequate living standard for a wage earner's family of four. The Heller Committee wartime budget stands, in round figures, at approximately $2,500 per year when adjusted for the United States average at June, 1942, prices. This budget takes into account a reduction of slightly over $275 a year in the goods a worker's family can buy, owing to stoppage of production on certain items. Purchases of automobiles, tires, and durable consumer goods have been properly eliminated, and account taken of great reduction in automobile mileage. This $275 which cannot be spent for goods is counted as available for investment in war bonds and for payment of increased social security taxes to make possible a program of increased social security benefits.

This expresses in figures the constructive view of workers' living standards in wartime. A fully adequate living standard should be provided and money which cannot be spent for goods should be invested in war bonds and social security taxes, to provide for emergencies and for reserves to be spent after the war.

The bare subsistence living standard for a worker's family of four, as shown by the WPA budget, priced quarterly by the Labor Department, stood at $1,578 in June, 1942, average for 33 cities.

(1951, p. 206) This is a time when increased taxes will cut away workers' living standards. We shall not be able to regain our present level of living until 1953, or later, when consumer production can resume. This sacrifice we make as the price of our freedom. We shall make it willingly. We insist however that other groups of citizens make equal sacrifices.

As we look to the future the following facts stand out:

Employers are increasing their incomes because of the large increase in their sales volume. The OPS price stabilization formulas protect their profit margins. Corporation income taxes are not designed to take away all the additional profit that will flow into corporation coffers due to the defense program.

Workers must secure their rightful share in the increased income of their companies and industries. We urge that Wage Stabilization Board policies permit this, and include in their formula an allowance for workers' share in progress where it can be negotiated without raising prices. It is significant that since Korea the incomes of different groups (before taxes) have increased as follows: wages and salaried workers, 20%; unincorporated business, 16%; farmers 35%; corporations, 45%. (Figures compare the first half of 1950 with the first half of 1951.)

A proper share for workers is important not only as a matter of justice, but also because our country's economic future demands it. Workers need to develop large reserves of buying power which they can lay aside in savings against the time when defense production eventually slackens and flow of consumer goods increases again. Our country will then depend on workers' buying to keep industry busy and workers at work, just as it did after World War II. Without a large reserve of buying power, we would be threatened with business recession and unemployment when our country's military strength is built up and defense production declines to the level necessary to maintain it.

Stark, Louis, Tribute to Memory of—(1954, p. 515) The convention unanimously approved the following tribute to the memory of Louis Stark veteran newspaper writer:

Louis Stark

We have spoken of our gains; we would pause now to speak of a great loss.

Last May, Louis Stark died. We have lost a great friend.

His vast knowledge, his profound wisdom, his sensitive appreciation of the meaning of events, his skillful and precisely accurate reporting of news made him a great reporter, the dean of Labor reporters.

But Louis Stark was more than that. He was a leader of men. Soft spoken, modest, gentle and kind, he was a fearless champion of all that is right and good. He did not seek popularity but he earned the respect and friendship of men of good will in all walks of life. He did not seek fame, but the excellence of his work brought him fame.

He knew the labor movement well. He knew hundreds of the delegates here personally and intimately. He shared their hopes to serve the public good. He shared their secrets and never betrayed one.

He has set a standard in reporting which all good newsmen may seek to achieve. He has left us a heritage—a proof that integrity, courage and kindness do repay the men to whom these virtues belong.

We mourn his loss.

State, County and Municipal Employees, Extension of Social Security—(1949, p. 35) Res. 1 called for an extension of the Social Security Act to workers who have been and are still working for various political subdivisions not covered by social security whereby such employees shall have credit allowed the same as though they had worked for covered employment.

State Departments of Labor—(1936, p. 140) The state federations of labor have played an active part during 1935-36 in the establishment of independent labor departments in a number of states where such departments have either been non-existent or have been combined with departments for agriculture, commerce, and industry. Bills creating labor departments have been passed in Alabama, Kentucky, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Rhode Island. Strong labor departments furnish an important source of protection both for organized and unorganized workers, for men, women and children. In every state, experience has shown the need of a basic department headed by an officer whose chief duty it is to investigate problems of working people and to enforce the safeguards provided by the labor laws of the state. Without statutory powers, even a well-intentioned labor commissioner cannot enforce existing laws or build up a case for future legislation. Upon the inspection staff of the labor department depends to a large extent the safety of the man or woman operating a dangerous machine. The inspector's insistence upon the installation of an adequate ventilation and exhaust system will prevent new cases of lead, benzol, or chromium poisoning, and the use of wet instead of dry drilling in quarries and tunnels will help protect the worker from silicosis. It is most encouraging to note the progress that has been made. The E.C. urges that efforts be continued in the remaining states to set up labor departments adequately staffed, financed, and equipped with full power to administer the labor laws and to make rules and regulations supplementing the laws.

(P. 692) It is very encouraging to note by this report that five states have passed bills creating departments of labor and that considerable interest is manifested in securing adequate labor legislation to protect the health of workers in industry from occupational diseases.

We therefore urge that each international union make a survey to determine which of its local unions are not availing themselves of the opportunity to join with their fellow workers in state federations of labor and city central bodies for the purpose of protecting the interests of organized labor as represented through the A. F. of L., to the end that the city central bodies and state federations of labor shall be better able to perform the functions that have been duly delegated to them as a part of the A. F. of L., and particularly to place state federations of labor and city central bodies in a position to more ably assist the American Federation of Labor in furthering legislation placed before the national Congress.

We urge particularly that all state federations of labor undertake the passage of state legislation in conformity with the national Social Security Law; legislation to provide a state law modeled after the Wagner-Connery Labor Dispute Act; and amendments to their compensation laws to include full compensation for occupational diseases, and we urge that such latter program be prepared in such a way as to protect the interests of those who have already become victims of occupational diseases.

(1937, pp. 177, 311) Four additional states — Arkansas, Florida, Georgia and Indiana—have this year set up branches of state government devoted to the protection of wage earners.

A single department responsible for the administration of the various laws and programs and equipped with the necessary power and authority is recognized as essential to promote intelligently the welfare of the workers. The inspection division of such a department can insist upon the installation of proper ventilating and exhaust systems and safe working conditions, so that the workers' health will not be destroyed.

The E.C. urges that efforts be continued in the remaining states to set up state labor departments, adequately staffed, financed, and equipped with full power to administer labor laws and to make rules and regulations supplementing these laws.

(1938, p. 173) Effective labor legislation cannot progress any faster than the process of building up an agency to administer the laws passed. In recent years a number of states where agencies administering labor laws were weak, scattered, or non-existent have adopted legislation consolidating and strengthening scattered bureaus and creating state labor departments. A number of states that have in recent years established labor departments have followed up that step by revising and enlarging their labor laws. All of the nine states meeting this year, except Mississippi, already have established labor departments. In Mississippi a bill passed one house with organized labor backing, but was defeated in the Senate. Louisiana this year added new powers and duties relating to boiler inspection, regulation of private employment agencies, minimum wage, and apprenticeship.

Alabama and in the Territory of Hawaii. While these two laws lodge rule-making power in regard to safety and health in the labor department, where it belongs, Idaho and Montana, give similar authorization to the Department of Public Welfare and the State Board of Health, respectively, where, experience in other states indicates, it will probably lie dormant and inactive so far as occupational and industrial hazards are concerned.

Two state labor commissioners—Indiana and New Hampshire—were given power to take wage claim assignments for collection, bringing the number of state departments that can effectively assist wage earners in collecting their back wages to 15.

Four new states adopted apprenticeship laws, making 12 states that empower the state departments of labor to promote and supervise sound programs of apprentice training in cooperation with local labor and employer organizations.

(Relations with)—(1939, pp. 157, 385) The convention considered the E.C. Report outlining major state legislative objectives and enactments and adopted the following recommendation:

In that portion of the Executive Council's Report captioned, "State Labor Relations," your committee recommends that more support be given to the legislative committees of state federations of labor, with a view to more aggressive action being taken in defeating these restrictive bills, and further recommends that the American Federation of Labor issue a pamphlet to all national and international unions, state federations of labor, central labor unions and federal unions, calling to their attention the anti-labor legislation that has been presented or enacted, asking national and international unions that these pamphlets be reproduced in their official publications so that all workers may be fully advised, and have full knowledge of this trend in legislation.

(State Secretaries of Labor, Selection from Organized Labor)—(1942, p. 644) Particular attention is called to the action of the State of Illinois in appointing a coal merchant as head of the state department of labor. This is a dangerous precedent and the governor's action is strictly condemned. The head of such a department should be selected from the ranks of organized labor and the department should not be used as a political football.

State Federations of Labor—(1928, pp. 65, 194) The next wider unit of cooperation on general labor interests is the state federation of labor which is concerned with statewide interests of Labor. These interests are broadly legislation, education and organization, as state problems.

The strength of the state federation depends upon the degree of cooperation between unions as represented by affiliation to the state federations. For influence in guiding developments as well as for protection it is of fundamental importance that cooperation shall be 100 per cent.

The state federation cannot, of course, do direct organization work. Its function is to watch the problem and to be able to point out where effective work can be done and to stimulate local interest and endeavor. It has the advantage of emphasizing and focusing attention on an essential problem.

The state legislative and political program is, of course, developed by the state federation of labor, guided by the policies and decisions of the A. F. of L. State federations safeguard the lives and well being of wage earners as their part in promoting the general welfare. Fundamental for the first objective is compensation legislation. In addition to having a law on the legislative records, it is necessary for all workers to know that they have a right to compensation and how to go about getting it. To put this information in the simplest form and widely distributed is among the most valuable services a state federation could perform and would constitute a very favorable introduction to many non-unionists. Payments for injuries and disabilities is but one phase of this responsibility.

The report of the American Engineering Council on Safety and Production shows that the number of accidents that happen per individual have increased in number and in severity. Important as mechanical prevention is, of still greater effectiveness is safety as a personal habit. The key to safe habits is education—education in safe habits as a general practice and safe work habits as a part of all vocational, industrial and engineering training.

The greatest medium for the promotion of human well being is wide educational opportunities. The state federation has an essential part in improving the public school system and the university of the state. Labor should be represented in the state executive educational agency and in the board of directors of the state university so that Labor's views and needs may be presented to those responsible for central planning.

(1931, p. 65) Reports show that state federations of labor perform an indispensable service in organizing work. The nature of union organization makes the state federation logically the link between the A. F. of L. and local groups for statewide undertakings. In the past year some state federations stimulated organizing work, helping local groups to form organizing programs, keeping in touch with the work to give assistance in every possible way. Several methods were used. In Washington and in Wisconsin, a conference of local officers was called to plan the campaign. General policies were mapped out and arrangements made to start local campaigns. The interest thus stimulated was carried back to local groups, together with a practical work program.

(1935, p. 448) The A. F. of L. desires to direct attention to the need for continued activity on the part of the state federations and city central bodies to secure state legislation concurrent with federal legislation passed in recent years to bring to workers employed in strictly intrastate industries the protection obtained for those engaged in interstate commerce by the passage of federal legislation. We have in mind concurrent legislation covering the abuse of the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes, old age pensions, anti-prison labor, uniform child labor legislation, strengthening of workmen's compensation laws, state acts modeled after the Wagner-Connery Bill and approval of the child labor amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and to keep abreast with such further social and labor legislation as may be enacted by the Federal Congress.

We recognize the very valuable services rendered by state federations and city central bodies, not only in the furthering of state legislation affecting Labor, but the splendid support rendered to the A. F. of L. in its legislative program before Congress, and to that end recommend that this convention call upon all national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. to urge their local unions to affiliate with and support state federations of labor and city central bodies.

(1941, pp. 158, 262,, 395, 530) The convention decided that all national and international unions urge their locals to affiliate with state federations of labor—and further that the Executive Council direct the Director of organization to instruct all organizers of the A. F. of L. to see that affiliation with each branch of the American Federation of Labor in the state is accomplished at the time federal labor and local unions are chartered.

The Executive Council was directed to take into consideration the feasibility of calling into a conference the officers of the state federations of labor, and to the end that uniformity may be developed in the carrying out of such legislative program as the convention may adopt.

(1942, p. 644) It is noted that there is a lack of affiliation of some of the local unions to the state federations of labor. This is particularly true of the railroad locals. We again urge all locals to affiliate at the earliest date with state federations of labor. They are doing splendid work in the legislative field in the various states and also in national legislation and they are very helpful to all branches of organized labor and deserve support of all local unions.

Your committee in conclusion repeats the recommendation made last year to the Executive Council—"that in the promulgation of the legislative program of the Federation they take into consideration the feasibility of calling into a conference the officers of the state federations of labor, to the end that uniformity may be developed in the carrying out of such legislative programs as the convention may adopt.

Whereas—The growth and strength of state federations of labor and central labor unions are of utmost importance to each and every member of the American Federation of Labor, and

Whereas—Many locals are not affiliated with either or both bodies, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention go on record as favoring affiliation of all locals with both the state federation and the central labor unions within their respective districts, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention of the American Federation of Labor recommends that all locals must affiliate with both the state and central bodies, amending such articles of the constitution and by-laws as may be required to make such affiliation mandatory rather than optional.

(P. 304) Referred to the E.C. for further study.

Whereas—Now, as never before labor leaders write and talk solidarity, and we should be together and present a unified front, but nothing seems to materialize, and

Whereas—National and international unions through their officers and conventions consider questions of business in connection with their trade, craft, or own affairs, such as raising dues and assessments, and

Whereas—This question of a united front is most important and vital to all in the labor movement, and

Whereas—One of the most important links in this organization of the American Federation of Labor are the state federations, and

Whereas—The state federations do not receive the union cooperation from many lodges and locals in the states, regardless of them being asked to do so by their national and international officers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That we call upon the American Federation of Labor to ask the national and international unions to assess their membership an additional five (5) cents per month, paying same to the American Federation of Labor, and the American Federation of Labor, in turn, pay the pro rata to each state federation according to the membership therein; this will bring about full cooperation and supply to many of these starved state federations a working capital to do the things that needs to be done for the good of the labor movement.

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor and its affiliated international unions are urged to help the state federations of labor carry out a political education program effectively by mandating the respective local unions who are still unaffiliated with their respective federations to do so at once, and thus solidify our ranks and enable us to make effective gains particularly in the field of national and state legislation, and

Whereas—We deem it of the utmost importance to the wage earners of America that the A. F. of L. be in a strong position, through its state federations of labor, to implement thoroughly its political education program, elect its friends to public office, and defeat Labor's foes in Congress as well as in the various state legislatures, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor at its annual Convention in New York City in September 1952, take necessary steps to bring home to its affiliated international unions the need for their local affiliates to be members of the federations of labor in their respective states, and be it further

Resolved—That we impress upon the various international unions the fact that all A. F. of L. affiliates should be part of their federation and bear their fair share of the financial and moral obligation of promoting the objectives of organized labor, the protection of its membership, and in particular, the successful implementation of its political education program.

(P. 499) Your committee recommends the adoption of this resolution, with the inclusion of central labor unions.

There is usually in a city where there is a large membership of the American Federation of Labor duly chartered a central body which is the coordinating body for that particular locality, and at all times ready to give assistance to aid affiliated locals of the international unions and federal labor unions, in view of the many local activities in which a central body is required to participate, including the many local and civic bodies.

Your committee wishes to stress this point, that at one time there was only one central body and that was chartered by the American Federation of Labor. Today we have the competition of a dual organization in many of our cities and our local unions are not free from the methods used by said dual organizations. However, when difficulties arise and our local unions are affected, they then turn to whatever agency of the American Federation of Labor there is in their community for the protection of their interests. The ability to carry out this work depends in a large degree upon affiliations of the local unions in the various central bodies.

With the activities carried out daily by the central bodies and their various contacts with local activity their meetings are held monthly and semi-monthly where the delegates assemble, make their reports and request whatever help they may be in need of on behalf of their local unions.

We may add further that the central bodies cooperate with the various legislative committees in preparing the program to be presented to their legislative bodies. Their functions also are to be on the lookout for legislation that is detrimental to the best interests of the workers. Therefore, the local unions who are not in affiliation share in the benefits put forth by the local central body at the expense of those local unions which are affiliated and attend the meetings of the central bodies and work for the interests of organized labor.

Further activities are those of visiting and meeting personally with the political parties to request their help to vote in favor of our legislative program, and also to defeat measures that are not in the best interest of organized labor. During the past year the American Federation of Labor has been confronted with the introduction of anti-labor legislation in many cities and states. Therefore, the central bodies, through their activities put forth by Labor's League for Political Education, promoted a campaign of registration with this slogan: "Register or you cannot vote."

The inauguration of this campaign of education among our local unions resulted in not alone having the head of the family register, but all members who were eligible to vote, then continuing to organize its committees, prepare for the defeat on election day of those members who voted for the Taft-Hartley Law and to elect friends of Labor who would vote for the repeal of this measure. We can report that we believe that work of Labor's League for Political Education has proved successful and should be continued among the workers of the American Federation of Labor.

Your committee, being mindful of the anti-labor legislation that may be introduced in the various cities and states, feels that the central bodies and Labor's League for Political Education can be a strong factor in bringing about the defeat of this legislation.

May we therefore recommend that the American Federation of Labor forward a communication to all national and international unions to request that they urge their local unions in the various localities to affiliate with the central bodies and state federations of labor, also to the federal labor unions to the end that strong central bodies and state federations of labor may work for the help of all trade unionists.

State Labor Conferences — (1950, pp. 200, 454) The E.C. reported that the A. F. of L. had cooperated with the 16th State Labor Conference held in Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the U.S. Department of Labor, in all matters of moment to organized labor in the respective states.

(P. 454) The committee report to the convention on this subject was unanimously approved as follows:

The practice of conferences between the U.S. Department of Labor and representatives of state commissioners of labor, and state federations of labor, are an excellent method of sharing information and experience. We suggest that these gatherings would gain in effectiveness and in stimulating exchange of views if they were strictly informative and did not venture into policy determination which is a function of the labor movement.

"State Labor News" Denounced — (1953, pp. 493, 657) Res. 149 called attention to the anti-labor campaign being conducted through a publication titled State Labor News (Columbus, Ohio) and contained the following provisions:

Resolved—By the 72nd Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, convened at St. Louis, Mo., that we hereby go on record calling upon the officers and Executive Council of the A. F. of L. to launch an investigation into the anti-labor campaign of the State Labor News and its sponsors, in cooperation with the International Labor Press of America, to the end that these enemies of Labor may be exposed, and the rank and file of the labor movement as well as the general public be warned of the sinister motives of that publication.

State Labor Relations Bills—(1937, pp. 178, 311) The A. F. of L. this year drafted and circulated to its constituent bodies a bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employer and employee by creating state labor commissions, defining unfair labor practices, etc., and also a bill to prohibit labor espionage and regulate private detectives and armed guards. The former was based on the Wagner Act, but went into more detail than the federal statute in defining unfair labor practices of employers and the procedure for holding elections. This bill, or bills very similar to it, was introduced in 19 states and enacted in five: Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Utah, and Wisconsin.

The measure prohibiting espionage and regulating private detective agencies was introduced in a number of states including Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania, but was not so successful. The New York bill passed the senate only. The Pennsylvania bill made no progress. The Illinois measure was enacted in a very much altered form.

Pennsylvania enacted a series of measures dealing with various phases of industrial relations: A State Labor Relations Act, an Act setting up additional machinery in the state labor department for the mediation, conciliation, and voluntary arbitration of labor disputes; a new anti-injunction law, and a law limiting the number of deputy sheriffs that may be deputized and providing a procedure to be observed in making appointments. This Act, if adopted in other states and well enforced, would put an end to the practice of donations of arms, tear gas, and munitions by industrial companies for the purpose of breaking strikes. It would prevent the swearing in of unlimited number of deputy sheriffs, recruited from criminal elements.

The new anti-injunction law differs from the earlier statute in Pennsylvania and from the laws in other states, in that its language is more specific, the list of actions which may not be enjoined is more inclusive, and proof is required, without the aid of presumptions of law or fact, that the acts to be enjoined were actually performed, authorized, or ratified by the persons named in the injunction. It is furthermore stipulated that an injunction shall not be issued to an employer who is employing strikebreakers, nor to one who has failed to comply with all obligations imposed by law, and made every effort to settle the dispute by negotiation or with the aid of governmental machinery.

Since Pennsylvania has, at the same time, set up some important new governmental machinery to aid in the settlement of disputes and the negotiation of agreements, this law should help to increase the effectiveness of both the state and federal labor relations boards, and the new mediation facilities of the Department of Labor and Industry. And all of these institutions taken together should prove of great assistance to the labor organizations of the state in winning recognition and improved standards of wages, hours, and working conditions.

(1938, p. 171) While no further enactments of state labor relations bills are to be recorded this year, New York passed a law which considerably tightens the state's regulation of private detectives and detective agencies, and attempts to restrict their espionage, strike-breaking and union-smashing activities. The required surety bond has been raised to $10,000, and persons injured by an action which violates the law are permitted to bring suit against either principal or employer. Specific acts which are forbidden include: inciting to strike, inciting to do unlawful acts, interfering with peaceful picketing during a strike, interfering with the exercise of the employees' right to join or to assist a labor organization, interfering with collective bargaining, procuring reports on lawful union activities, circulating lists of union members, recruiting advertising for, or furnishing armed guards or strike-breakers, and tear gas or munitions. The business of detective agency may not be combined with that of employment agency. All detectives and detective agencies are required to hold licenses from the department of state, which must be renewed biennially and may be revoked after a hearing. The industrial commissioner is given the right to inspect all applications and records connected with the administration of the law. The names of licensed detective agencies are to be published annually, and lists of applicants for license, licenses issued, and licenses revoked are to be posted weekly in the office of the department of state.

In Kentucky the appointment of deputy sheriffs has been regulated by two laws, one setting up certain personnel qualifications, and the other prohibiting compensation by private parties. These regulations are not as stringent as those adopted last year in Pennsylvania. Rhode Island has prohibited the use of tear gas in labor disputes by any individual, firm, or corporation.

(1939, p. 157) Connecticut this year enacted an anti-injunction law modeled on the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and New Mexico passed a more limited type of restriction requiring the hearing of witnesses in open court and certain findings of fact before the issuance of temporary or permanent injunctions. In most states, however, efforts were centered on defeating restrictive bills; some of the worst proposals were considerably modified before passage, notably in Michigan and Minnesota. While the total number of restrictive bills introduced in 1939 was actually no greater than two years ago, the bills were more aggressively pushed and a number passed or came near passage. Oregon led off with the adoption of an anti-picketing statute by popular referendum in November, 1938. At the same time two measures were defeated in neighboring states, California and Washington. The A. F. of L. joined with the state federation of labor in bringing suit for a declaratory judgment to have the Oregon law ruled unconstitutional. Although the decision rendered upholds the law, it does at least in some measure clarify the rights of disputants in labor disputes. An appeal has been taken to the higher court in an effort to have the law set aside altogether.

An anti-picketing bill was passed by both houses in Idaho, but vetoed, upon the demand of Labor, by the governor.

Restrictions on picketing, boycotting, and persuasion of non-unionists in connection with labor disputes and organizing campaigns are contained in the new State Labor Relations Acts of Minnesota and Michigan, in the amended Act of Pennsylvania, and in the new Wisconsin Act that was substituted for the 1937 Little Wagner Act. These restrictions are generally couched in such elastic and ambiguous terms as to leave the boundaries of permissible action extremely uncertain. Therein lies, perhaps, their chief nuisance value. Ample new grounds are opened up for the issuance of injunctions, even in states like Wisconsin and Pennsylvania where this abuse of judicial power had been curbed; and in some cases union members and sympathizers may run the additional risks of damage suits and criminal prosecutions. In Wisconsin a three-fourths vote is now required to enter into a closed shop contract, instead of a simple majority. The checkoff of union dues must be individually authorized by a secret majority vote.

The Minnesota and Michigan laws require notification of intention to strike, lockout, or change agreements, and allow a fixed period for mediation and negotiation before a strike may be called. The 1939 State Labor Relations Acts as a whole contain so many uncertain and dangerous features that the net result may be counted unfavorable. As individual cases arise under these laws they should be most carefully watched and handled lest a new series of court decisions fasten again upon the labor movement many of the outworn and castoff decisions of the old common law.

St. Lawrence Seaway Project — (1940, p. 492) A proposal to construct the St. Lawrence Deep Seaway as a part of the defense program of the nation was presented to the convention and referred to the Executive Council. The resolution provided that the American Federation of Labor and affiliated organizations be requested to support this movement to obtain the water rights needed by the United States and to construct the same as a self-liquidating project to be paid for out of tolls and power sales, and to be maintained on a cost of operation basis and with equitable rights to both Canada and the United States.

(1941, pp. 99, 602) The Executive Council reported that its opposition to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterways Project is based on the fact that projects within the United States States should be given prior consideration.

The convention instructed the Executive Council to give further study to the St. Lawrence Waterway Project and to consult with labor organizations who are concerned.

(1950, p. 21) Res. 7 presented additional arguments favoring construction of St. Lawrence Seaway and called upon the A. F. of L. to actively support legislation that will bring about immediate construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project.

(P. 28) Res. 22 called upon A. F. of L. to go on record for and to actively support legislation that will bring about the immediate construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project.

(P. 469) The subject embraced in these two resolutions has been considered at previous conventions and by the Executive Council, and the St. Lawrence Seaway has been disapproved by both bodies on all occasions.

Representations have been made by the introducers of these resolutions that new and important developments are in the making which warrant inquiry and further consideration and which in the judgment of the introducers of the resolution warrant a change of attitude.

Because of representations of new and important developments referred to it is recommended these resolutions be referred to the Executive Council for inquiry into these alleged new developments and that opportunity be accorded to all affiliated unions interested and concerned of presenting their respective points of view before, either by communication or reference, final disposition is made of these resolutions by the Executive Council.

(1951, p. 116) Res. 37 and 38: The Executive Council reported continued opposition to the proposed St. Lawrence Seaway. A brief but comprehensive report on efforts made to secure enactment of such legislation was presented by the E.C.

Res. 37 and 38 requested the A. F. of L. to change its original position and to support the project. However, the convention refused to reverse position of the E.C. and rejected the resolutions.

(1952, pp. 256, 453) The Executive Council reports on the proposal made in the last session of Congress for construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Our National Legislative Committee, carrying out previous convention action, testified against this proposal which was not adopted.

(1953, pp. 176, 636) The E.C. reported continued opposition to the development of the proposed St. Lawrence Waterway. The convention approved action taken by the council.

(1954, pp. 121, 543) The E.C. reported the final enactment of legislation authorizing construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway despite A. F. of L. opposition. The convention adopted its committee report and recommendation that "Our Federation should watch closely the development of this project to assure that the interests and welfare of American workers are fully protected."

Statistical and Information Service—(1929, p. 101) On the request of affiliated organizations, we have made a few special studies of wages and hours. We have also made special studies by request of member organizations on development of hours and wages. Two of these, "A Scientific Basis for Shorter Hours of Work," and a "Comparison of Wages North and South" are available for general distribution.

The Federation hopes to supply information and to respond to special requests of unions. Washington is the center for much labor and economic information collected by governmental bureaus and private agencies. To make this information of service to unions, practically all of it must be adapted to our specific problems.

It is equally the Federation's responsibility to keep these various agencies advised as to Labor's needs and points of view. Research, like other undertakings, must rest upon a balanced understanding of all factors involved. Probably the chief reason why Labor has not benefited more through government fact-finding is because we have not been more insistent in pointing out inadequacies and shortcomings of labor statistics. Following the interest and concern the Federation has shown in recent months for getting labor information from the statistical material of the Census Bureau, the Secretary of Commerce appointed representatives of the Federation on the advisory committees on manufactures and distribution and on unemployment. These committees made recommendations as to questions to be included in questionnaires to be used in the coming census.

Statistical Standards (Division of) (Labor Advisory Committee to)—(1947, p. 278) This Division of the U.S. Bureau of the Budget is responsible for coordinating the entire research and statistical work of the Federal Government. Research programs of all federal departments and other agencies are reviewed by it to make sure that adequate and accurate statistical information is secured and that duplication of effort is avoided.

The Division of Statistical Standards has made consistent efforts to see that different groups using statistics, such as business, farmers, Labor, are securing the information they require. Since an advisory committee of business men had already been set up to work with the Division, its program of cooperation with representative organizations required the creation of a labor advisory committee. Such a committee was set up at the request of the division early in 1945, consisting of research representatives from the American Federation of Labor, the Railway Labor Executives Association and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The opportunity to represent Labor's informational needs before this top government statistical agency has been of value. By meeting at intervals of about three months, the Labor Advisory Committee to the Division of Statistical Standards has kept constantly in touch with the whole program of statistical research of the Federal Government, has discussed proposals for new work and urged changes which will result in giving labor information not previously available. Our committee has found government representatives most cooperative and ready to work with us. They are charged with developing a fully rounded program of accurate economic measurements which will enable all groups to watch and understand economic developments. They look upon the cooperation of those who use statistics, both business and Labor, as essential in accomplishing this purpose.

Progress of the Labor Advisory Committee's work has brought first expansion, then specialization. Starting with a small committee of six labor representatives (two from each national labor organization), our meetings with government representatives expanded during 1945 and 1946 so that research directors of all national and international unions had an opportunity to join in them and become familiar with the statistical work of the Federal Government on which all unions depend for essential information.

During 1947 technical subcommittees were set up on different phases of the work, such as wages and income, employment, health and welfare plans, industrial relations, productivity, international statistics, and other subjects. This subdivision and specialization has made it possible for labor research representatives to work with government bureaus on the technical details of statistical work and thus make sure that questionnaires and tabulations will be so planned as to give us the information we need.

A special group has been set up to work with the Bureau of Labor Statistics since the major part of our statistical information comes from this bureau. Work of the subcommittees has been coordinated, so that each subcommittee deals with all government agencies doing research work in its subject. The employment subcommittee, for instance, meets with representatives from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Census Bureau or any other agency dealing with information on employment.

To improve statistics on productivity a special conference was called in October, 1946, bringing together representatives of business, Labor, universities, research agencies, and government. Two days of discussion brought out technical suggestions and aroused interest in this subject so important to unions and management. The Federation has secured cooperation of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in a plan for joint Labor-Management measurement of productivity in individual plants with the assistance of technicians from the bureau.

The Legislative Committee of the Federation has placed before Congress urgent requests for appropriations to provide adequate statistical work. With this year's budget cuts, many important programs were seriously curtailed, but the legislative department has been successful in getting a few serious cuts restored, at least in part.

Status of Workers—(1928, p. 37) What standing wage earners have in the world of industry, is the first concern of the trade union. The problem is two-fold: the achievement of economic status, and legal status.

Economic status comes through what we are accustomed to call "recognition of the union." This means that the right of workers to join the union is recognized and the union is accepted as the regular method through which matters of joint relations are determined. An individual worker can have no real standing in a modern highly organized industry, but workers organized in a union can have that intelligent part in the industry that constitutes real partnership in the work. The union makes possible representative conferences with management for collective bargaining or decision upon the terms and conditions of work. The existence of a joint agreement, mutually satisfactory to the organized groups concerned, together with provisions for the adjustment of grievances, sets up the agencies for justice to wage earners that assure confidence in a square deal.

Through the collective agreement the workers have a recognized function in industry that makes them definitely an organized unit of the industry as a going concern. The only way that this definite economic status may be achieved is through the trade union. This is a vital objection that workers make against the substitution of employee representation plans for employees known as company unions. Such plans come from management while the union is the agency of the workers that enables them to have representation and functions.

Trade unions have been building up the practice of collective bargaining during the past four decades. The results have been substantial benefits both to workers and to industry; wages have increased and hours of work decreased, thus providing opportunities for better life. In addition to the service which the union renders by effective collective bargaining are union benefits which add measurably to the workers' status of members of economic society.

(Pp. 50, 237) At no time in its history has the trade union had greater influence in industrial circles. The constructive policies which we advocate and follow challenge the attention and respect of employers in this country and abroad. The trade union rests its claim to recognition upon its capacity to do the things that are good for industry and for human beings. It is a stabilizing unifying agency responsible for keeping Labor's progress abreast of that of other groups. It is not our purpose to usurp the functions of other groups or to establish domination over them, but to further uniform progress for all. We believe that progress comes from using and improving what we have, hence we have no revolutionary purpose to overthrow the present social system to establish a group control. Our purpose then is exactly the same as that of other intelligent progressive persons. The union, therefore, is an agency which employers may turn to for cooperation for mutual benefit. Steadfastly trade unions have insisted that high wages, regular work and that prevention of waste of human work capacity were necessary to both social and industrial progress. Wherever these standards have been established they constitute proof of the correctness of our contentions, and some of our contentions have become accepted business policy. Our employers are gratified that America is a high wage country of the world and that high wages mean increased ability to buy things produced. Steadily increased production can be sustained only with increasing capacity to buy.

Because American labor policies are constructive and beneficial they set standards that definitely influence the thinking and decisions of all employers and employees. In times of crisis industrial leaders are quick to realize that the constructive ideals of Labor are a tremendous asset. While not all are so ready to acknowledge that these ideals are an equal industrial asset when conditions are normal, those who look to the trade union movement for leadership are increasing. Leading opinion-making agencies realize that discussion of labor problems must be upon a plane of intelligence and presentation of fact.

Steel Formula, Little (see: War Labor Board)

Steel Workers Organization—(1924, p. 149) A. F. of L. Convention voted to give support and encouragement to the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers to thoroughly organize the steel industry. A request of the steel workers that the craft unions relinquish jurisdiction was refused as it would interfere with the autonomy rights of organizations affiliated with the A. F. of L.

Stevenson and Sparkman Endorsed—(1952, pp. 61, 520) Democratic candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency of the United States were unanimously endorsed by the Convention of the A. F. of L.

Stock Dividends and Employee Ownership—(1926, p. 341) Modern industrial development has gone forward so rapidly that even the closest observers are unable to keep fully abreast of it. In some aspects this development has taken the form of financing on a basis that is leading to a point where no one may say exactly what will happen. Able men have pointed out the extreme danger that lies in the direction along which our business affairs are now traveling. Before this new era dawned, the business world was familiar with the device known as the stock dividend. Originally, this was resorted to for the legitimate purpose of permanently fixing in the capital employed the accretion accumulated and held as surplus. Any such stock dividend was accepted as notice to all, and sundry, that the business had been profitable beyond the sum needed for defraying reasonable dividends, and the excess earnings had been employed in the work of carrying on the enterprise, to the end that even greater dividends might be declared and a large surplus accumulated. This was also a notice that the wage rate in any such enterprise might be advanced without jeopardizing the success of the undertaking.

Since the dawn of the post war era we have known such manipulation of enterprise as makes the high finance of the earlier part of the century appear like an innocent amusement of amateurs. One of the most elastic and readily controlled agencies for this form of jugglery is the stock issue of "no par value." It means exactly what it says, that the purchaser of that stock buys nothing. He pays his money for the prospect of accumulating dividends at whatever rate a board of directors may determine. Through the issue of non-voting stock, or the central control device, the purchaser of stock has no voice whatever in the management or direction of the affairs of the concern to which he has turned over his money. The danger residing in such a practice is so apparent that only the most reckless of investors or the most gullible will resort to the purchase of such stock for the employment of their savings.

Another dangerous practice is that form of stock issue which is commonly referred to as "employee ownership." Thousands of employees of the various great manufacturing or transportation concerns of the country have invested large portions of their savings in these concerns, lured on by specious and attractive promises from stock promoters or from the management.

The A. F. of L. would not in the remotest sense discredit thrift among the workers of America, nor discourage any ambitious worker from trying to make himself secure against possible want in the future, but we would urge that all give careful consideration to the subject that is so tremendously important to them.

When it is possible for a man of standing to publish in one of the most conservative American magazines the names of one after another of great corporations whose financial statements to the public and to their stockholders are inaccurate, misleading and in some cases contain downright untruths, it is time for the ordinary mortal to "Stop, Look and Listen."

The A. F. of L. also wishes to call attention to a practice that is prevalent and which exemplifies one of the most unsound and dangerous contrivances known to high finance. We refer to the capitalization of prospective earnings. Under this process it is the common practice for financial buccaneers to secure control of a prosperous business and then through the process of reorganization or reincorporation to increase the capital stock by two or three times the original sum, basing this increase on the earning capacity of the plant and the anticipation of future sales of its product. This is such an extreme form of speculation that it amounts in the end to downright gambling, presenting to the stock purchaser only the prospect of winning a return on his investment in the event that the anticipated increased sales of output be realized. Such stock issues are dependent for value entirely upon the ability of the manipulating group to maintain the enterprise at its full productive capacity. In the event of any diminution or cessation of purchases by the public the payment of dividends must cease or be provided for from a surplus which has been created through the accumulation of excessive profits. When such adversity overtakes one of these companies the device most swiftly applied to preserve the shrinking surplus is that of reduction in wages. At the same time the investor will note the decrease in the quoted price of his shares in the stock list and may easily compute for himself the extent of the loss he is incurring through having "taken a chance" in the game that is being played by the financial capitalists of the day.

The A. F. of L. would urge, therefore, that all workers wherever situated proceed in their purchases of corporation shares with the same caution and prudence that they would exercise in other investments.

Stockholm Peace Petition — (1950, p. 27) Res. 19 and 87:

Whereas — The Stockholm Peace Offensive through the mass signing of petitions, while the mailed fist of Northern Korea, sponsored by Soviet Russia, was striking at the heart of South Korea, the only government recognized by the United Nations in Korea, must be branded as a colossal hoax and fraud perpetrated upon peoples, everywhere, hungry for peace, and

Whereas — The Stockholm Peace camouflage stresses the banning of atomic bombs, which Russia probably does not now have in as large piles as the United States but is silent on aggression against peaceful countries like South Korea, and

Whereas — Undoubtedly millions of well-meaning but misguided people in the Western democracies, Asia and Africa have and still are signing the petitions, reports indicating that 50 township councils in Quebec, Canada, have signed them and the powerful National Union of Railwaymen of Great Britain adopted a similar resolution virtually unanimously, which shows that people will follow a phony peace rather than none at all because of the fear of war and hope for peace, therefore, be it

Resolved — That the 69th Convention of the American Federation of Labor assembled in Houston, Texas, September, 1950, go on record as advocating and proposing a peace crusade, sponsored by the American Federation of Labor, the C.I.O. and non-Communist civic, women's, youth, business, educational, church, and even children, Republicans, Democratic and Socialist groups, which will constitute a positive mass educational program for peace in which the "little man" can be enlisted to take an active part in backing the action of the USA and UN in sending armed forces into Korea to drive North Korea behind the 38th Parallel, as well as to support the fight of the Western democracies for peace all over the world and thereby take the ball for world peace out of the hands of Soviet Russia which will be a powerful weapon in the cold war against Russian Communism.

Whereas—The "Stockholm Peace Petition" was inaugurated by the agents of the international Communist conspiracy, and

Whereas—It is merely a trick and device to cause confusion in every state and county where the Communists have been unsuccessful either by outright aggression or by intimidation to gain control, and

Whereas—World Communism constitutes the greatest military threat the world has ever known, and

Whereas—The Stockholm Peace Petition has been created and used to mislead innocent people who have a sincere desire for peace, to the end that there may be discord and friction amongst democratic people the world over, and

Whereas—We recognize this false trick and device for what it is, therefore, be it

Resolved—By the 69th Convention of the American Federation of Labor that we hereby condemn and reject the Stockholm Peace Petition as a complete fraud, intended to weaken the democratic nations and not to establish peace, and we urge all loyal and devoted Americans not only to reject this phony peace petition but to stand up as men and women and speak up against it, and be it further

Resolved—That every effort be made to overcome the vicious propaganda of the international Communist conspiracy and that Congress and the National Administration be urged to increase the funds allotted to the "Voice of America" so that its effective fight against the vicious propaganda of the Kremlin agents the world over may be successfully overcome

(P. 472) These two resolutions deal with the exposure and condemnation of the Stockholm Peace Petition being promoted and circulated by various agencies of Soviet Russia and her satellites and agencies throughout the world and designed to confuse and mislead well meaning peoples throughout the free nations of the world.

Your committee concurs in the suggestion of an effective campaign of merciless exposure of these fraudulent petitions, indeed we commend the officers of the Federation, its representatives and the Free Trade Union Committee for splendid efforts made in that direction.

In considering the suggestion of a united labor and all-inclusive crusade and council by the A. F. of L., your committee is of the opinion that since this petition is receiving worldwide distribution, to meet the issue presented fully, adequately and effectually, there must be coordination among all the free labor movements of the world and steps are being taken to have the ICFTU proceed accordingly.

It is therefore recommended these resolutions be referred for further consideration to the Free Trade Union Committee.

Stowaways—(1940, pp. 91, 408) Prior to enactment of H.R. 9492 (Public 601, 1940) there was no penalty provided for stealing a ride on a vessel within the jurisdiction of the U.S. Under the law as enacted stowaways will be subject to a fine up to $500 or imprisonment up to one year, or both. Similar penalties are provided against those who aid, abet or assist a stowaway. Penalties for such acts was thought to discourage aliens from stowing away for trips to the U.S. Legislation supported by A. F. of L.

Street Cars, One-Man—(1936, p. 611) In view of the fact that the workers constitute the great body of street car and bus riders, not only in Washington but in every American city, the Capital Transit Company and other transportation companies are advised that the A. F. of L. has gone on record as opposed in principle to the dangerous and unwise policy of using only one man instead of two in the operation of street cars and buses through our crowded streets.

Strikes, "No Strike Pledge" (also see: War Production)

Strikes, Interstate Commerce and— (1927, p. 87) Where an association comprises all the merchant vessels of American registry engaged in interstate and foreign commerce among the ports of the Pacific Coast and of foreign countries, entered into a combination to control the employment of all seamen upon such vessels, the Supreme Court, in the case of Anderson vs. Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast, has held that ships and those who operate them are instrumentalities of commerce and within the commerce laws, and the actions complained of in the case constitute a violation of the Anti-Trust Act.

In Lewis et al. vs. Red Jacket Coal and Coke Company, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, said that when trade unions turn aside from their normal and legitimate objects and purposes and engage in an actual combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, they are accountable therefore in the same manner as other organizations.

A conspiracy was held to violate the statute where there exists an intent to restrain interstate trade and commerce and a scheme appropriate for that purpose, even though it did not act directly upon the instrumentalities of commerce. Referring to the case of the U.S. vs. Brims, and quoting it with approval, the court held that the conspiracy established by the testimony in this case was one in restraint of interstate trade and commerce in violation of the Sherman Act. It did express the opinion, however, that the United Mine Workers of America did not constitute, of itself, an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade and commerce because it embraced a large percentage of the mine workers of this country or because its purpose is to extend its membership so as to embrace all of the workers in the mines of the continent.

Strike, Right to—(1927, p. 86) The United States Supreme Court, in deciding the case of Dorsey vs. Kansas, held that the right to carry on business has value and to interfere with that right without just cause is unlawful. Dorsey was convicted of calling a strike in violation of the Kansas Industrial Relations Act, the strike being called to collect a claim for back pay. According to the court, this strike was unlawful because of its purpose, and to attempt to enforce such a claim was held to be clearly coercion. The court also held that the Kansas Legislature may make such action punishable criminally and that neither the common law nor the 14th Amendment conferred the absolute right to strike. (Later the Supreme Court declared the Kansas Industrial Labor Act unconstitutional.)

The Open Port Law of Texas was enacted for the purpose of outlawing strikes. Under its provisions it was made a felony for one to assault another or threaten another who was engaged in the work of loading or unloading or transporting any commerce within the state. Written communications to such a person, or the members of his family, for the purpose of having such employee desist from this work would constitute intimidation. The Act wholly omitted any reference to the purpose, intent or knowledge of the person penalized for making the assault. The law of Texas formerly made the use of physical violence without circumstances of aggravation, merely simple assault, punishable only by fine. By the Open Port Law such actions were made felonies and punishable by imprisonment. The Supreme Court of Texas, in the case of Ratliffe vs. Texas, held that the general law was not changed by the passage of the Open Port Act and that the latter was a violation of the 14th Amendment, was class legislation and, in some necessary parts, was unintelligible.

In Cleveland, contracts were in existence between all the crafts in the building trades industry except that of the painters. The parties to the contracts agreed that they would be governed and bound by the contract. The contract provided there would be no strikes or lockouts pending a decision of arbitrators, but it was understood that union men should not be compelled to work with nonunion men in the same trade or on the same building. Later, nonunion glaziers were employed and the workmen in the other crafts quit their employment, whereupon the company having the general contract obtained an order requiring the officers of the unions to rescind the strike order and these officers were also enjoined from doing anything to influence the men not to go back to work. In Lundoff-Bicknell Company vs. Smith, the Court of Appeals of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, held that the men had a right to strike but for their contracts and that the only wrongful act done by them was to violate their contracts by collectively quitting. It further held that the contracts to which the Bicknell Company was not a party cannot be enforced by it nor can it maintain a suit against those who induced the men to violate their contracts.

(P. 307) The U.S. Supreme Court has recently held in the case of Bedford Cut Stone Co. et al. vs. Journeymen Stonecutters' Association, et al., that it is a conspiracy in restraint of trade for union workmen to refuse to work on material which has been partially prepared by nonunion workmen.

There is now pending in the U.S. District Court at Chicago, a suit in which the Western Union Telegraph Company has procured a temporary injunction restraining members of several building trade unions from quitting work when nonunion electricians in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company come to work on the same job.

In numerous other decisions of the federal courts the right of union workmen to go on strike has been limited or denied.

The right of workmen to quit work for any reason is guaranteed by the Constitution of the U.S., and is the only effective means which Labor has for resisting oppression and for making economic progress.

The A. F. of L. protests against this tendency of the federal courts to deprive workmen of their right to quit work for any reason they see fit, as being an invasion of the constitutional right of all men to freedom from involuntary servitude.

Strikebreakers Transportation—(1924, p. 71) A bill was introduced in Congress to regulate the transportation of labor to any point where labor disturbance or strike is in progress. The bill provides a penalty for transporting workers from one state to another for the purpose of replacing men who are on strike unless such men are notified of the conditions under which they are required to work and of the fact that there is a strike or lockout at the point where they are expected to work. It was referred to the Committee on Labor. Hearings were held and representatives of the American Federation of Labor and of other labor organizations appeared in favor of the bill. It was favorably reported to the House by the committee and will come up in the next session.

(1925, p. 55) A bill introduced in Congress provided a penalty against employers of labor or their agents or private employment agencies to induce men to go from state to state on the promise of employment unless they informed the applicants there was a strike at the point where they were to be employed.

It was reported favorably by the Committee on Labor but failed to come to a vote because of the objection to its consideration on a day when unanimous consent was required.

(1936, p. 130) Congress in passing S. 2039 did more to prevent disturbances in labor disputes than could be accomplished in any other way. The law provides that whoever shall knowingly transport, or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce, any person with intent to employ such person to obstruct or interfere with the right of peaceful picketing during any labor controversy affecting wages, hours, or conditions of labor, or the right of organization for the purpose of collective bargaining, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both in the discretion of the court.

According to the evidence submitted to the Committees on the Judiciary of both Houses, strike-breaking agencies have been the cause of riots and the deaths of many strikers. It appears that wherever there is peaceful picketing the scene changes when spies and thugs arrive on the scene.

According to the report of the Committee on Education and Labor to the Senate these organizations sometimes drum up business by fomenting industrial disorder where none exists in order to secure a contract to suppress it. Disputes can be settled, the report states, more amicably without the injection of professional thugs from the outside in an unfortunate situation.

(1937, pp. 171, 319) Because the Byrnes Act which prohibited the transportation of persons in interstate commerce for the purpose of interfering with peaceful picketing was misunderstood, a new bill was introduced in the 75th Congress. It provided:

That (a) it shall be unlawful to transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any person who is employed or is to be employed for the purpose of obstructing or interfering by force or threats with (1) peaceful picketing by employees during any labor controversy affecting wages, hours, or conditions of labor; or (2) the exercise by employees of any of the rights of self-organization, collective bargaining, or other concerted activities for mutual aid or protection.

Violators of the law, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years or both.

The bill passed the Senate August 14 but no action was taken by the House.

(1938, pp. 162, 551) Public No. 779 prohibits the transportation of certain persons in interstate or foreign commerce during labor controversies. The law is intended to clarify the provisions of the Act of June 24, 1936, prohibiting the transportation of strike breakers in interstate commerce.

The law makes it clear that interference with peaceful picketing and interference with the exercise by employees of any of the rights of self-organization or collective bargaining are both included. The old law was not clear on this point.

The new law provides that any person who transports or causes to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any person who is employed or is to be employed for the purpose of obstructing or interfering by force or threats with (1) peaceful picketing by employees during any labor controversy affecting wages, hours, or conditions of labor; or (2) the exercise by employees of any of the rights of self-organization, collective bargaining, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years or both.

Subcontractors—(1938, pp. 163, 543) H.R. 146, to require contractors on public-building projects to name their subcontractors, passed both Houses, but was given a "pocket veto" by the President.

The objective of the proposed legislation was to eliminate or curtail a vicious practice variously known as "bid shopping" or "bid peddling" in connection with government contracts.

It is the practice of a general contractor in making up his successful bid to utilize figures submitted by several subcontractors in each phase of the contract, such as foundation, plumbing, electrical fixtures, etc. The contractor would use the lowest bids of the subcontractors in obtaining the contract. The contractor then informs the other subcontractors who bid on the various phases of the work that he will give them the subcontract if they are willing to shave the low figure presented.

According to a report made by the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee the cut-throat competition between the several concerns makes the cost of the work much lower to the general contractor than he figures in his bid, the difference being additional profit. It was found by the committee that these conditions often brought about the failure of the subcontractor.

The bill will be reintroduced in the next session of Congress as it is of great importance to the building trades workmen that the bill become a law.

Subsidies to Business Protested—(1952, p. 38) Res. 48:

Whereas—Plants are moving from New York State stimulated by promises of cheap labor and free, or no, taxation for many years at the expense of the taxpayer, who is also a worker, and

Whereas—Large profits from such out-of-town enterprises are made in New York State, and

Whereas—Organized labor is not opposed to the freedom of movement of business enterprises nor to the industrialization of new areas, but rather to the exploitation of workers and of taxpayers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention call upon Congress and the state legislatures to enact legislation outlawing the direct and indirect subsidization of municipalities of business enterprises which subsidization works to exploit workers and taxpayers.

(P. 467) Convention approved the resolution "in spirit and substance" and referred the matter to the officers of the A. F. of L. "to find methods that will discourage and stop this practice."

Subversive Activities Control Board—(1949, p. 212) The Executive Council pointed out the traditional opposition of the A. F. of L. to Communism, Fascism and other un-American ideologies; that A. F. of L. affiliates had repeatedly been warned against such organizations and insisted that our affiliates deny admission to Communists. It was explained in the report, however, that the A. F. of L. felt impelled to oppose proposed legislation known as S. 1194 for the following reasons:

S. 1194 sets up a subversive activities control board of three with extraordinary powers over minority political parties and voluntary organizations of citizens. The board is permitted to designate political parties or voluntary organizations as Communists or Communist-front organizations. If the bill becomes law, such political organizations must register with the Attorney General and disclose the names of their membership and the Communist-front organizations must register and name their officers publicly. All material sent out by them, by air or ordinary mail, must be designated as coming from a "Commy" source. Members of these political organizations could not hold non-elective federal positions or secure passports. While the board would not have the authority to outlaw organizations as designated by the board, such organizations so designated would be terribly hampered. The bill would permit the setting of precedents which might result disastrously to labor organizations themselves and for these reasons, as above stated, we opposed it.

(P. 464) The difficulty of enacting legislative protection against the activities of the Communist Party and their agents lies in defining such acts and providing penalties without also restricting the rights and liberty of free citizens. The most effective action and defense against these subversive groups and persons lie with voluntary organization. Each organization has the responsibility of keeping its own membership free of these subversive agents of foreign governments and its prestige unembarrassed by those who work to destroy the freedom of democracy. Each organization must keep its membership informed on Communist tactics, Communist Party undertakings, and Communist-front organizations. With dependable information free citizens can protect themselves. We have a right to expect equally great care on the part of the government in selecting personnel and enforcing immigration and passport law.

Sugar Industry—(1936, p. 133) S. 4413 was a bill to protect the welfare of domestic producers and processors of sugar beets and sugar cane, and domestic consumers of sugar. Section 202 provided for grants to tenants, adherent planters and share croppers under certain conditions. Section 203 fixes the hours at which children shall be worked. As it is of great importance, that part of the section referred to is herewith quoted:

Sec. 203. The payment authorized by section 202 may be conditioned upon . . . the producer not employing, or suffering or permitting the employment, by any other person, directly or indirectly, in the production, cultivation, or harvesting of sugar beets or sugar cane on his farm, of any child under the age of fourteen years, except a member of his own immediate family, whether for gain to such child or any other person, and the producer not employing or permitting such employment of a child between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, inclusive, except a member of his immediate family, for a longer period than eight hours each day, except students enrolled in vocational and agricultural classes in the public schools, where the directed and supervised practice work on sugar cane plantations or sugar beet farms is done with and under the direction of vocational agricultural teachers employed by the State or any political subdivision thereof (the word "State" being inclusive of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands); (c) the payment of minimum wages by producers to workers, the number of working hours, and, where necessary, the time and method of payment of wages, in connection with the production, cultivation, or harvesting of sugar beets or sugar cane; (d) the submission to the Secretary of Labor of any labor dispute involving the producer in connection with the production, cultivation, or harvesting of sugar beets or sugar cane, when any such dispute has been presented to the Secretary by the producer, or any other person and, after the Secretary has determined to adjudicate such dispute, the abiding by the decision of the Secretary with respect to such labor dispute; (e) the producer not reducing the number or area of sharecroppers, adherent planters, or tenants.

Objection has been raised to that portion of the section italicized. Another fault found with the section is that no limit is fixed to the age of a child who is a member of the producer's own immediate family.

(1938, p. 431) The A. F. of L. records its allegiance to the many workers in the sugar beet industry, and expresses the hope to the government officials charged with the administration of the Sugar Act of 1937, that this Act be administered, as was clearly intended by Congress at the time of its passage, in such a way as to maintain the American sugar industry and thereby protect the welfare of the many workers dependent upon it for a livelihood.

(1939, p. 449) The A. F. of L. as evidence of its allegiance to the many workers in the beet sugar industry of the United States, hereby pledges assistance and help in securing the legislation, and the proper administration of such legislation, as is necessary to maintain the domestic sugar industry and to protect the livelihood and prosperity of the workers engaged therein.

(Child Labor)—(1940, pp. 83-84, 408) In considering report of E.C. on subject of legislation proposed to permit payments of subsidies to certain sugar producers who had unknowingly violated child labor provisions of Sugar Act of 1930, convention directed continuance of efforts of A. F. of L. to abolish child labor in industry.

(Surplus Disposal) (Puerto Rico)—(1949, pp. 337, 497) The sale of surplus Puerto Rican sugar through the channels of the Marshall Plan Organization or through some plan fixed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was proposed in Res. 106. An amendment to the Sugar Act of 1948 was requested. The original resolution was amended and approved with the following "resolves":

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled in the City of St. Paul, Minn.:

1. That in view of the prevailing economic conditions of the Island of Puerto Rico, it vigorously and earnestly urges from the U.S. Department of Agriculture and from the Marshall Plan Organization that steps be taken so that the American Territory of Puerto Rico could find the way to sell its surplus production of sugar through the channels of said Marshall Plan Organization or through those that could be appropriately fixed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

2. That the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. be instructed to order a thorough study of the Sugar Act of 1948 in order to recommend to the U.S. Congress the corresponding amendment to said Act to protect not only the domestic area of Puerto Rico but thousands and thousands of workers employed in the sugar industry in the United States.

(Investigation)—(1951, p. 290) Res. 42 directed attention to the problems of the domestic sugar industry and called upon the A. F. of L. to convene a conference of representatives of all the labor organizations concerned for the purpose of instituting an investigation of the Sugar Act of 1948, and to prepare a program to be submitted to the Executive Council.

(P. 562) Convention expressed sympathy with the resolution and referred it to the officers of the Federation for such consideration and action as seems warranted in order to be helpful to the employees in the sugar producing areas.

These proposals were inspired by southern cane growers and the beet sugar producers of the West. It is claimed that the present quotas are too low and that the proposed adjustments are necessary in order to maintain a stabilized economy in the American sugar industry. Under these proposals, the increase in mainland quotas would be charged against the Cuban quota. This would mean a reduction of approximately 300,000 tons in the Cuban quota. Such action, it is indicated, would cause a serious unemployment problem in Cuba.

The American Federation of Labor has a special interest in this legislation because members of unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. work for both the beet sugar and cane sugar industries in this country. In addition, the A. F. of L. has developed fraternal bonds of friendship with the workers in the sugar fields of Cuba, the Philippines, and other Latin American countries.

(P. 130) Many interests have to be considered when sugar legislation is being worked out. The best way to get the job done is to work for equity and fairness with full consideration for all interests. . . .

We believe that considerations of equity suggest that all producers should share proportionately in the increase in sugar consumption that will naturally develop during the coming years with the growth of U.S. population. As a matter of principle, we believe that both domestic and foreign producers should share in this increase.

Suspension of National and International Unions (Forming Dual Organizations)—(1940, pp. 59, 446) The convention carefully considered and debated the recommendation of the Executive Council relative to the power of the E.C. to suspend national and international unions who conspire to create organizations dual to the A. F. of L. The following recommendation of the convention Committee on Laws was finally adopted and became the policy of the Federation in such cases:

The American Federation of Labor is definitely committed to the preservation as well as the practice of democracy. Our great organization seeks to apply the principles of democracy in a broad and comprehensive way in the administration of its affairs. We firmly believe in majority rule in the formulation and execution of administrative and organizational policies in accordance with democratic rules and procedure. We maintain that the membership of the American Federation of Labor shall formulate its policies, control and administer its affairs and determine its course through majority decisions arrived at in thorough democratic fashion at annual conventions of the American Federation of Labor.

In conformity with this principle, the Executive Council recommends to the 60th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor that a national or international union chartered by and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor can be suspended from membership in the American Federation of Labor only by a majority vote of the duly accredited delegates in attendance at any session of a convention; except in cases where two or more national and international unions unite and conspire to create and launch an organization for any purpose dual to the American Federation of Labor. In that event, if two or more organizations conspire to create or form a movement dual to the American Federation of Labor, charges may be legally and properly filed against said organizations, a hearing held upon said charges, and if found guilty, said organizations may be suspended from affiliation with the American Federation of Labor by the Executive Council, subject to appeal to the next annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, as provided for by the laws of the American Federation of Labor.

The foregoing subject matter submitted by the Executive Council dealing with the democratic principles and procedure of the Federation, in the formulation of policy to control its affairs by majority vote, as well as practice to be observed in the suspension of national and international unions, received lengthy and careful consideration by your committee which, after due deliberation recommends concurrence in the proposal as submitted to the effect—that a national or international union chartered by and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor can be suspended from membership in the American Federation of Labor only by a majority vote of the duly accredited delegates in attendance at any session of a convention; except in cases where two or more national or international unions unite and conspire to create and launch an organization for any purpose dual to the American Federation of Labor. In that event, if two or more organizations conspire to create and form a dual movement to the American Federation of Labor, charges may be legally and properly filed against said organizations, a hearing held upon said charges, and if found guilty, said organizations may be suspended from affiliation with the American Federation of Labor by the Executive Council, subject to appeal to the next annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, as provided for by the laws of the American Federation of Labor.

We further recommend that the secretary-treasurer with approval of the Executive Council be empowered to make the necessary insertions and amendments in the constitution to make these proposals effective.

Taft-Hartley Act (also see: Anti-Labor Legislation; Anti-Communist Affidavits)—(1947, pp. 241, 587) Under the title "Anti-Labor Legislation" the E.C. reported on the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Law as follows:

In January, the new Congress was deluged with a flood of anti-labor bills upon which protracted hearings were held in both the House and Senate. During the time the House Committee was engaged in hearings, it had attorneys engaged in drafting legislation which was introduced and known as the Hartley Bill, H.R. 3020. While on the Senate side, an anti-labor bill was reported from the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, introduced by Senator Taft, carrying the number of S. 1126.

Sponsors of these bills claimed that the Congress had received a mandate in the November, 1946, election to enact them. Facts are that the bills are the culmination of a protracted campaign covering years by anti-labor House and Senate members and by unfriendly newspapers and radio commentators.

A committee appeared before the Congressional Committees and stated our opposition, but the Hartley Bill, H.R. 3020, was enacted after considerable modification because of the Senate's action in passing the Taft Bill. (Public Law 101.)

Every effort was made to defeat this legislation with the support of our national and international affiliates, our departments, our state federations of labor, our city central bodies, and our directly affiliated federal locals. Thirty-two state federations of labor and 43 central labor unions sent their officers and representatives to Washington to aid in the fight against the bill, at their own expense, as did many national and international unions and all of the railroad brotherhoods.

Title IV of the Taft-Hartley Labor Act creates a joint committee to be appointed from among the members of the House and Senate Committees who drafted, reported, and passed the Act, to make an exhaustive investigation of industrial relations . . . Thus those who are principally responsible for the legislation are to investigate and report its results.

They have announced that their studies, in brief, will be along the following lines:

1. The history of labor relations in 20 selected firms.
2. Industry-wide bargaining.
3. Welfare funds.
4. The operation of the new law, with a view to recommending any needed changes.
5. Constitutions and internal organization of unions.

An analysis of the bill and a detailed legal report upon it is made elsewhere in this report, but the law is very unfair and so complicated that court decisions will be necessary before anyone knows what it really means.

(P. 587) The report of the convention committee was unanimously adopted, containing the following statement:

. . . Suffice it to say that the law attempts by every open and subtle means to destroy every right organized labor has gained over the years. The union security principle has been repudiated, the right to strike and picket has been severely curtailed, the principle of mutual aid has been denied, the era of "government by injunction" has been revived, and protection of the right to organize has been deliberately weakened. As if that were not enough, the framers of the Act have deliberately sought to discourage and sabotage collective bargaining itself in entire reversal of the principles and philosophy underlying the Wagner Act of 1935. The American Federation of Labor has pledged its every resource to obtain the repeal of this iniquitous law through defeat at the polls of every Congressman who, by voting for this outrageous legislation, has sought to weaken if not destroy the labor movement.

In connection with this portion of the Executive Council's Report, your committee includes Resolution No. 34:

Whereas—Many Republicans, along with the Southern Poll Tax Democrats in the Congress of the United States, have intensified their drive to adopt vicious anti-labor legislation, and

Whereas—This drive is supposedly designed to give the worker his "bill of rights" or to "equalize the responsibility of both Labor and management," but its true aim is to destroy the organized labor movement and establish the open shop, and

Whereas—These bills are being developed and pushed by the National Association of Manufacturers at the cost of millions of dollars which should rightfully be given to their employees in the form of wage increases, therefore, be it

Resolved—That every member of the American Federation of Labor be urged to mobilize with other members of organized labor to resist with all their might this onslaught against the working people in our country, and that we go on record as determined to fight every anti-labor law already passed, to eliminate these laws from the statute books.

(P. 405) A strong moving desire on the part of working men and women for the realization of higher standards of living has served to establish and stimulate the growth and expansion of labor unions. The progress and development of labor unions have run parallel to the steady ever increasing demand of the workers for higher wages, improved conditions of employment, security and social justice.

Time and experience have shown that the labor union is the instrumentality which served to promote the economic, social and industrial welfare of the workers everywhere. Even non-union workers have been the beneficiaries of the gains made by the organized labor movement.

The organization of working men and women means the mobilization of their economic strength so that they may substitute collective action for individual action. The material, educational, and cultural well being of all classes of people depend upon an adequate financial income. To workers that means wages, high enough to enable them to maintain themselves in decency and comfort and to establish a standard of living commensurate with the requirements of American citizenship.

This is a noble objective. It squares with the American way of life. Workers everywhere should be encouraged, not hampered or hindered, in their efforts to realize such a high and lofty purpose. Such an economic and social order would serve to perpetuate our free democratic form of government, to prevent the spread of Communism, or the acceptance of any totalitarian philosophy and to serve as a guarantee of the preservation of our free enterprise system.

Apparently the authors and supporters of the Taft-Hartley anti-labor law ignored all these facts. Their actions must be interpreted as meaning that strong serviceable labor unions must not be permitted to exist within our economic and social life, that only weak and impotent labor unions shall be allowed to survive and that Labor may have the shadow of a labor movement but not the substance.

This fact is reflected in every word, line, sentence and paragraph of the notorious Taft-Hartley Law. It seeks to weaken, render impotent and destroy labor unions. It does so by striking a vital blow at free collective bargaining and substitute a process of government domination over employer-employee relationships. The negotiation of closed shop agreements are forbidden and the regulations, limitations and prescribed methods which must be followed regarding union membership are all designed to make it impossible for labor unions to live and function effectively.

In addition to the classification of Unfair Labor Practices in this Act, some stated and others vague, which employers charge against labor unions, the Act provides that damage suits may be instituted for alleged violation of contracts, and there is re-established the abhorrent principle and practice of government by injunction. The purpose of those who supported the Taft-Hartley Act to effectively destroy labor unions, is made crystal clear in this provision of it.

The revision and reconstruction of the National Labor Relations Board has created confusion and uncertainty. Its real meaning will never be clearly understood until it has been defined by the courts. Employers and employees will vehemently differ as to the real meaning of the provisions of the revised and newly created National Labor Relations Board. All of this will serve to promote strife between employers and employees—the expenditure of large sums of money in court proceedings and woeful lack of cooperation between management and Labor. President Truman emphasized this fact in his veto message when he stated:

I find that the National Labor Relations Act would be converted from an instrument with the major purpose of protecting the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively into a maze of pitfalls and complex procedures. As a result of these complexities employers and workers would find new barriers to mutual understanding.

The bill time and again would remove the settlement of differences from the bargaining table to courts of law. Instead of learning to live together, employers and unions are invited to engage in costly, time-consuming litigation, inevitably embittering both parties.

Here the President set forth in simple language the evils of the new National Labor Relations Board and the great disservice to human relations in industry which is bound to follow the enforcement of said amended National Labor Relations Act. Because the amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, as set forth in the Taft-Hartley Bill, are susceptible of varied interpretations and are confusing to the highest degree, we would prefer no National Labor Relations Board than the National Labor Relations Board with its administrative authority as set forth in the Taft-Hartley Law.

The Taft-Hartley Law is filled with "Thou Shall Nots" and "Thou Must" to the officers and members of labor unions. The supporters of the Taft-Hartley Law virtually declare "Labor Unions in the United States must be made weak and ineffective. Their ability to serve working people, to preserve economic freedom and to establish higher standards of living for the wage earners of the nation must be limited and defined."

The provision of the Taft-Hartley Bill which provides that it shall be unlawful for any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with the election of members of Congress, strikes a vital blow at freedom of speech and freedom of press. This section must be interpreted as meaning that the supporters of the Taft-Hartley Bill sought to make it a crime for Labor to exercise the right of freedom of the press and freedom of speech in order to prevent them from being re-elected to Congress.

The vicious feature of this section is reflected in the fact that it provides any officer of a labor organization or any labor organization which exercises the right of freedom of speech or freedom of the press in opposing a Member of Congress who voted for the Taft-Hartley Bill for re-election, shall be guilty of a criminal offense punishable by a fine or imprisonment, or both. Here in this section is reflected the hatred of Members of Congress toward labor unions and their fixed bitter determination to destroy them if possible.

The National Association of Manufacturers and other employer organizations may function and serve their respective membership without any substantial interference on the part of government. They are practically free from legislative restraints and limitations. The attorneys who serve the National Association of Manufacturers and who prepared and wrote the Taft-Hartley Bill saw to it that their clients were exempt from many of the provisions of the Act to which unions and their members are subjected.

strife-provoking Act. It should be properly classified as such. It will serve to prevent the workers from agreeing to incorporate a no-strike pledge in written contracts. It means the end of sound Labor-management relations and the substitution therefor of distrust, suspicion, and class hatred.

And now, we the representatives of 7,500,000 members of the American Federation of Labor, after giving solemn consideration to all the facts herein stated, the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and its legal analysis prepared by the Legal Department of the American Federation of Labor, herewith declare that the following shall be our pledge and uncompromising purpose.

1. Because we believe many of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Bill are unconstitutional, we will challenge the validity of said sections in the courts. In doing so, we shall avail ourselves of the opportunity to appeal in accordance with court procedure to the Supreme Court of the United States. We shall exhaust every legal recourse at our command in the efforts we put forth to test the validity of this Act.

2. The repeal of this notorious legislation shall be our fixed objective. We shall never be reconciled to the acceptance of this legislation. We shall oppose it—fight it at every step and every opportunity—until we succeed in our efforts to bring about its repeal. Our action in this respect will be based upon the fact that we regard the Taft-Hartley Bill as a slave measure, un-American, vicious and destructive of Labor's constitutional rights.

3. We will organize, unite and concentrate our efforts toward bringing about the defeat of every member of Congress for reelection who voted in favor a final enactment of the Taft-Hartley Bill.

4. To protect our organizations against possible suits for damages and other vexatious and destructive litigation under this law, it is recommended that no-strike provisions be omitted from all future agreements, written or oral.

5. In order that the workers of the nation may be accorded a full and complete opportunity to vote in national elections, we recommend that our organizations set aside this day as a holiday to be devoted solely to election purposes.

6. We recommend that the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor give full and complete consideration to the declarations of this conference and in addition, prepare for the consideration of the next Convention of the American Federation of Labor a program giving full effect to these purposes.

(Pp. 583, 587) In addition to the report of the E.C. on this subject, five resolutions were presented to the convention for consideration. The resolutions were referred to the appropriate committee which reported on them, together with the section of the E.C. report jointly. The report and action of the convention follow:

Your committee in studying this portion of the Executive Council's report, finds that the council has presented a most effective summary of the valid reasons for our objection to a law which was evidently intended to weaken collective bargaining, handicap the work of organizing the unorganized, and then make it more difficult to establish and maintain satisfactory relations with their employers.

In view of the comprehensive character of the Executive Council's report, your committee believes it unnecessary to attempt any additional presentation, and therefore recommends full approval of the declarations and recommendations adopted by the Conference of National and International Unions held July 9, 1947, in Washington, D. C., upon the call of the American Federation of Labor.

In connection with this portion of the Executive Council's report, your committee has considered Resolutions Nos. 7, 40, 44, 56, 59, which we recommend be referred to the Executive Council.

(Publicity Campaign)—(1947, p. 260) The Executive Council at its meeting held in April decided to supplement the work being done by our legislative representatives in Washington against the enactment of anti-labor legislation by conducting a nationwide publicity campaign acquainting the general public with the vicious anti-democratic character of the Taft-Hartley Bill.

At the time of the council meeting the Hartley bill had already passed the House of Representatives by a large majority and the Senate bill sponsored by Senator Taft had been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Labor and Education.

The council authorized the levying of a voluntary assessment of fifteen cents (15c) a member to conduct an intensive radio and newspaper campaign against this legislation. A committee was appointed by the council which was authorized to give full effect to the purpose of the council in publicizing the dangers inherent to the nation as a whole in the Taft and Hartley bills.

On April 22nd the Executive Council wired the various affiliates of the A. F. of L. informing them of the council action and requesting their support through the medium of the voluntary assessment referred to above. The response to this appeal of the A. F. of L. was immediate and gratifying. Within 48 hours more than $300,000 was raised through this assessment. Approximately $1,000,000 was contributed during the entire campaign.

On Monday, April 28th, President Green at the suggestion of the committee called a meeting of a number of representatives of the A. F. of L. who represent unions in the theatrical, radio and amusement field. At that meeting arrangements were made for an extensive radio campaign. In addition, the publicity director was authorized to secure additional help and to arrange for the publication of newspaper advertisements in the leading newspapers of the country to present the A. F. of L. position in regard to this legislation.

The newspaper campaign started Monday, May 5, with a full page ad appearing in 212 newspapers in the leading cities of the country, and following it up with seven five-column ads, special ads and a final appeal for Senate support of a veto when the bill was on the President's desk.

That this advertising campaign was effective was attested by the huge volume of mail it elicited and by the widespread comment it evoked.

Nevertheless, it goes without saying that the advertising could have achieved far greater results if there had been more time to prepare the material and chart its distribution. Careful advance planning is essential to obtaining the best results from advertising. This fact should be given due consideration in any future public relations program formulated by the A. F. of L.

In the radio field an Entertainment Unions Committee was formed of the representatives of the A. F. of L. unions in the amusement business. This committee was given authority to prepare and supervise an extensive radio campaign. . . .

Beginning with the week of June 5 an A. F. of L. program was broadcast every week-day afternoon for a period of seven weeks. This program featured the outstanding stars in the theatrical and radio fields and covered a total of 239 stations over the ABC coast-to-coast network.

In addition, there was a fifteen-minute program featuring various prominent people in political, industrial and religious life of the nation which appeared every Tuesday night from May 13 to June 10 and covered 229 stations.

The participating unions, including the Actors Equity Association, the American Federation of Musicians, the American Federation of Radio Artists, the Screen Actors Guild, the American Guild of Musical Artists, the Chorus Equity Association, the American Guild of Variety Artists, the Radio Directors Guild and the Association of Theatrical Press Agents and Managers. The Radio Writers Guild of the Authors League of America, although an independent guild, also cooperated and participated in the activities of the Entertainment Unions Committee.

Further, a one-half hour program every Thursday night for a period of six weeks covered 229 stations and presented the top artists in the amusement field. Included on this program were America's outstanding actors and actresses and the very finest bands and orchestras that Hollywood had to offer.

Every Sunday afternoon during this period over 406 stations of the Mutual network there was another half-hour program which was a rebroadcast of the Thursday night program mentioned above.

The results of this campaign and its effect on public opinion were highly gratifying. While the Taft-Hartley Bill was eventually enacted into law we feel sure from the flood of mail received by the President and by the members of Congress that public opinion was against this bill.

The newspaper and radio programs of the A. F. of L. served a tremendously useful purpose and pointed to the future possibilities for Labor in this particular field.

Res. 3 called upon the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, Railroad Brotherhoods, The United Mine Workers, The International Association of Machinists and other independent unions to convene a National Emergency Congress in Washington for the purpose of working out joint plans to combat anti-union injunctions and all other attacks by the present National Labor Relations Board as well as a concerted campaign for the repeal of this vicious legislation.

(P. 522) Res. 3, 23, 26, 38, 87, 107 referred to officers of A. F. of L. "for such consideration and disposition as time and circumstances deem best."

(P. 238) Res. 23:

Whereas—The past year has clearly established that the Taft-Hartley Act is in fact an instrument to disrupt and destroy long-established union conditions, and

Whereas—The National Labor Relations Board . . . has been converted into an agency for anti-union employer organizations, and

Whereas—Government injunctions in labor disputes have been issued against American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations and independent unions, with the sole purpose of destroying historic collective bargaining rights of labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Railroad Brotherhoods, the United Mine Workers, the International Association of Machinists and other independent unions convene a national emergency Congress in Washington for the purpose of working out joint plans to combat anti-union injunctions and all other attacks by the present National Labor Relations Board, as well as a concerted campaign for the repeal of the vicious law itself.

(P. 322) Res. 107 proposed that a conference be convened of all labor groups (unaffiliated as well as A. F. of L. and independent) for the purpose of working out plans for combating anti-union injunctions and other attacks by the NLRB, as well as a concerted campaign for the repeal of all anti-labor laws.

(Union Elections)—(P. 240) Res. 26 called upon the A. F. of L. "to demand the repeal of the requirements for union shop elections in the Taft-Hartley Law and that the next Congress be made cognizant of this demand at the earliest possible opportunity".

(Clearing House Proposed)—(p. 244) Res. 38:

Whereas—Many legal actions are already pending under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Law, and it is apparent that many more such actions will be instituted by or against labor organizations, and

Whereas—The outcome of these suits will create legal precedents which will be binding not only on the particular litigants but on other labor unions as well, and

Whereas—It is therefore in the interests of the organized labor movement that legal actions under the Taft-Hartley Law be considered in the light of their impact on the labor movement as well as on the particular litigants, and should be carried on in the light of the effect and possible outcome of such legal actions on unions other than the litigants, and

Whereas—Under these circumstances, it is also desirable that unions and their legal counsel be kept fully informed concerning the litigation in which other trade unions are involved, and

Whereas—These objectives can best be obtained by the coordination of labor litigation under the law, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention of the American Federation of Labor instructs the Executive Council to canvass the possibilities of setting up a central legal clearing house which shall be kept informed by American Federation of Labor unions of all pending litigation under the Taft-Hartley Law and which in turn shall, from time to time, inform the unions of the nature, character, and significance of pending litigation under the law.

(P. 514) The following special report of the convention Committee on Resolutions, was unanimously adopted:

The American people have spoken. The mandate of a free people, in a free election, has been recorded. The verdict of the ballot box is clear, concise, and convincing.

The major issue of the 1948 presidential campaign was the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. It was submitted to the electorate in one of the greatest series of debates in American political history. What is most significant is that these history-making debates were carried on, not only in the campaign tours of the presidential aspirants, but in every state and city of our land by thousands of speakers. Many of these were candidates for public office, and countless others, including trade union representatives, sought no office but realized what was at stake, and were determined to keep this issue close to the grass roots of our republic.

The Taft-Hartley Act amended the Clayton amendments to the Anti-Trust Law, in a manner which eliminated the labor rights which had been established.

The Taft-Hartley Act amended the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-injunction Act by making it mandatory that the board in control of the NLRB in certain cases, go to the Federal Court to secure injunctions against labor. It also provided that in other types of cases, the board could use discretionary authority in applying for injunctions.

Before the enactment of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, employers seeking injunctions in connection with labor disputes, employed their own attorneys. Under the Taft-Hartley Act the Federal Government, the tax-payers, met the cost.

The Taft-Hartley Act contains many provisions making collective bargaining more difficult. It made it impossible for trade unions to secure union shop provisions in a collective bargaining agreement, until an election of the employees had been held.

The Taft-Hartley Act places exclusive authority in the Chief Counsel of the NLRB, in the determination of all that should be done in a large majority of labor cases.

The Taft-Hartley Act was so drawn that many chains were forged which would not be used, except by a national administration determined to shackle labor hand and foot, or when an industrial collapse threw hundreds of thousands out of employment.

There was in the Act definite unfriendliness to organized labor. It was injurious to employers who believed in maintaining contractual relations with employes through collective bargaining.

It did not give prime consideration to public welfare. It did not safeguard labor's rights. The Act was a definite piece of class legislation, and for that reason it was intolerable to fair-thinking men, whether in industry or labor. Its operation was rigidly driving a wedge between fair-minded and thoughtful employers and their organized employes.

This issue on the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, having been taken to the people for their decision, and having been decided in the affirmative, places the question squarely upon the elected representatives of the Congress of the United States. Will they now carry out the will of the majority of the people as expressed at the polls?

While 9 Senators and 57 Representatives—Republicans and Democrats alike, who voted for the Act were defeated for re-election, not a single member of Congress who voted to sustain the presidential veto of the Act, failed to be re-elected.

The action of the voters made it clear that they were convinced that the Act was conceived in a narrow spirit of retaliation, and passed in a mood of defiance. It must not remain on the statute books to provide disturbance for open-handed and well-considered effort of reasonable men within the labor movement, to provide for cooperation with management, and establish a more orderly basis for industrial relations in our country.

In the British House of Commons, often described as the "mother of parliaments," when a government or an administration is defeated in a majority vote of confidence, it resigns and a new government is formed.

American politics provide for no such prompt retirement of a government defeated at the polls, but the spirit of true parliamentary government should prevail in our land.

Members of Congress who voted for the Act, and voted to over-ride the presidential veto, would do well to consider the temper of time, and the clear mandate of the people in November, 1948. In true American spirit these Congressmen and Senators should now accept the will of the majority by repealing the obnoxious Taft-Hartley Act, and re-establishing the Wagner Act with such further Congressional action as is necessary to completely restore the labor guarantees of the Clayton amendments to the Anti-trust Act, and all of the provisions of the original Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act.

There must however, be no hiatus between the repeal of the Taft-Hartley

Act and the re-enactment of the Wagner Act. The public welfare, as well as that of management and labor, is paramount. The economic health, safety, and welfare of the nation must not again be placed in jeopardy by the irresponsible action of anyone.

Your committee believes that this is not the time for recrimination, political or otherwise. The critical conditions in the world require that we be united as a people, and increase our strength as a nation. We need to close our ranks, to build for a better future upon the basis of cooperation. Between management and labor there must be mutual respect and acceptance by both, of their responsibilities to the public.

While we are unyielding in our fixed determination to secure the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and the full restoration of the Wagner Labor Relations Act, and other Acts hereinbefore referred to, as American citizens we are as deeply conscious of our responsibility to the general public as we are to our membership. After the Wagner Labor Relations Act is restored, we will be ready to consider any amendments that may be desirable to improve this Act and to strengthen collective bargaining procedures.

We realize that any activity on the part of management, or on the part of labor, which fails to secure a generous measure of public approval and support, will be used as a reason for the enactment of repressive Federal and State legislation. In taking this position we are conscious of the fact that for every right we enjoy, there exists a corresponding responsibility, and it is with this consciousness that we prepare ourselves for the repeal of the most obnoxious and unsound labor measure which has ever been enacted by Congress.

Whereas—The Taft-Hartley Act and the Labor Relations Act of the 80th Congress in 1947 has weakened and partly destroyed the functions of the Department of Labor and its services to both management and Labor, and

Whereas—There has been widespread disorder and dissatisfaction throughout the land since the enactment of these Acts, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled demand the repeal of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, the reenactment of the Wagner Labor Relations Act; the passage of the amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act as proposed in Committee Print of January 20, 1949, House Committee on Education and Labor, and in S. 563; and the return of the Conciliation Service and all other Federal agencies which deal with labor to the United States Department of Labor.

(Pp. 339, 497) Res. 109:

Whereas—The struggle of organized workers for the protection of their fundamental rights has been marked by the most determined opposition of reactionary elements, and

Whereas—The recognition of the right to freely organize and to collectively bargain for workers was finally realized in the enactment of the Wagner Act, which appropriately enough was called Labor's Magna Charta, and

Whereas—The reactionary elements which dominated the 80th Congress and which represented a combination of Tory Republicans and Dixiecrat Democrats dealt a severe blow to all labor, organized and unorganized, by enacting the infamous Taft-Hartley Act, and

Whereas—The voters of our country expressed their collective indignation against this infamous law by successfully electing Harry S. Truman as President upon his pledge to repeal this infamous Taft-Hartley Act, and

Whereas—The present 81st Congress has shown an utter disregard for the expressed will of the people, therefore, be it

Resolved—By the 68th Convention of the American Federation of Labor that we demand the forthwith and immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act, in the manner recommended by President Truman in his message to the 81st Congress.

(P. 463) Last November, as we met in annual convention in Cincinnati we declared: "The American people have spoken. The mandates of a free people, in a free election, has been recorded. The verdict of the ballot box is clear, concise and convincing."

We had reason to be elated. We had reason to believe that members of Congress who voted for the Act would do well to consider the temper of the nation and accept the will of the majority by repealing this obnoxious, vindictive, anti-labor legislation.

Regrettably, our expectations have not been fulfilled. The popular verdict of the electorate of 1948 has been distorted and trampled upon. By a resort to adroit maneuvering, double-dealing and brazen horse-trading on the part of the die-hard reactionaries in both Houses of Congress the Taft-Hartley Act is still on the statute books of the land, hobbling and obstructing collective bargaining, legitimate union activities and normal labor-management relations.

A brief resume of the deadening effect of the Taft-Hartley Law on labor bargaining power and its status vis-a-vis industry, should suffice to convince every unbiased observer of the indefensible partiality of its sponsors and supporters.

Since the Taft-Hartley Law went into effect, late in August, 1947, through July 1949, a total of 56 court injunctions have been sought under that Act, 54 against labor unions and only 2 against employers. The threat of injunctions, however, in countless of unreported cases has proven an even more effective anti-union weapon.

The broad prohibitions in the Act against "secondary boycotts" have continued to prevent many heretofore legitimate and peaceful efforts by labor organizations to lend assistance to a sister organization.

The closed-shop agreement with the protection and security which accompany such contracts, is rapidly becoming a thing of the past with the expiration of numerous contracts entered into prior to August 1947.

So-called "mass-picketing" has been declared illegal without an attempt to prescribe just what number of pickets may or may not constitute mass picketing.

Finally, the "free speech" provision of the Act has well served employers and their hostile intentions during the course of organizing campaigns or immediately preceding plant elections in villifying or discrediting trade unions.

The Cincinnati convention, fresh from a victorious nation-wide referendum on the Taft-Hartley Act, authorized the Executive Council to proceed at once in having that Act repealed by Congress and as the American voters had decreed at the ballot box. The Executive Council placed Taft-Hartley repeal on the top of its agenda at the very outset of the 81st Congress. A National Legislative Council was created. All national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. were at once drawn into an over-all campaign.

It soon became evident however that organized labor was facing heavy odds in its drive for Taft-Hartley repeal. The arithmetic of the situation was confronting us with the cold fact that there were still in Congress 54 Senators and 225 House members who voted the Taft-Hartley bill into law in 1947. We redoubled our efforts summoning and receiving aid from every organizational reservoir we could reach. But by March of this year, it became clear that repeal at this session, at least, without crippling amendments was only a remote possibility.

The pro-Taft-Hartley alliance held fast. We lost the first engagement for Taft-Hartley repeal. We lost it also because men in Congress who, though belonging to the party which carried the last election on a program which included Taft-Hartley repeal, joined hands with the arch-enemies of labor in both houses of Congress, mocking party loyalty, frustrating temporarily the Administration they sometime call their own—for strictly patronage purposes and flouting to the winds the expressed will of the people.

We rest confident, nevertheless, that the torrent of abuse loosed upon the labor movement by the turncoat politicians and their press and radio allies in an effort to prove that the 1948 election carried no mandate for Taft-Hartley repeal, has not succeeded in selling this legal monstrosity to the American people.

We are looking ahead. The next immediate battlefield is the Congressional campaign of 1950. If the 81st Congress persists in its refusal to act affirmatively, we are prepared again to take our appeal to the people of this country and to make Taft-Hartley repeal the paramount issue of the 1950 Congressional election campaign. Though defeated in our first attempt because our adversaries had a few more votes in Congress than we, it is our determination to redouble our efforts in wiping out this majority and elect to Congress men who will heed and carry out the will of the people.

Borrowing a phrase from President Truman's message to this convention—"Taft-Hartley repeal is America's unfinished business now—not the business alone of the labor movement but that of every fair minded citizen of our land."

With magnificent cooperation manifested on the part of each and every division of our great American Federation of Labor—both spiritual and material—throughout the first stages of this campaign, we are confident that we shall enter the next stage of this battle for Taft-Hartley repeal better armed, stronger prepared, and with assurance of success and victory in the cause for the Rights of the Workers of our Land.

(1950, pp. 50, 484) Res. 80 reaffirmed previous position of A. F. of L. with regard to the inroads being made by the forces of reaction and totalitarianism and called for continued efforts to secure repeal of Taft-Hartley.

(Pp. 53, 484) Res. 88 demanded immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act.

(P. 61) The Introduction to the E.C. Report stated: We grow increasingly restive under the Taft-Hartley Act and of the continued failure of Congress to give us relief from provisions of a law which prevents unions from performing normal and necessary functions and imposes provisions which the administrators cannot apply. The Taft-Hartley law is repressive not constructive and enervating.

Resolution No. 109, adopted unanimously at the St. Paul Convention, provided as follows:

* * * that we demand the forthwith and immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the enactment of the Wagner Act, in the manner recommended by President Truman in his message to the 81st Congress.

It was evident in the beginning of the second session of the Congress that the general complexion of the membership remained substantially unchanged from that of the first session of the 81st Congress. For this reason it was deemed advisable to take no further steps for the present toward complete repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. In addition, the Chairman of both the Labor Committees agreed that there would be no further activity during 1950, looking toward possible repeal, but would wait until a Congress had been elected which would include a sufficient number of members, both House and Senate, who would be more friendly to the program of the President for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and of the program of the American Federation of Labor in this respect.

During the second session, hearings were held on S. 2196, a bill to legalize maritime hiring halls. This bill was reported by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare with Senators Taft, Smith (N. J.) and Donnell submitting their individual views.

A number of our International Unions enthusiastically supported S. 2196 and for this reason we interposed no objection to the bill. Our Convention position continued to be our guide on this legislation and on any other legislation which might be construed to constitute repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act piecemeal rather than in its entirety.

Our position on Reorganization Plan No. 12 likewise was taken with special regard to the expressions voiced at the St. Paul Convention.

(Building Trades) (1951, p. 123)—The E.C. had agreed to support efforts of the Building and Construction Trades Department to secure exemption from certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley Law.

(P. 528) Convention approved action of the Executive Council and expressed the "hope that this effort will aid in full repeal of the law."

(1952, p. 157) A comprehensive survey of developments under Taft-Hartley was included in the Report of the E.C. In the introduction to this section the E.C. made the following statement:

With every year of its operation, Labor's criticism of the Taft-Hartley law, made at the time of its consideration by Congress, received further confirmation. The law has proved to be not only unfair and inequitable to workers while favoring employers, not only a threat to the economic security and welfare of Labor, but also a dismal failure as a means for settlement of labor-management disputes.

New decisions of the courts and of the National Labor Relations Board have shown unmistakably that the Taft-Hartley Act puts a powerful weapon in the hands of anti-Labor employers while it seriously handicaps unions in carrying on legitimate time-tested activities essential to the welfare of their own members and, indeed, of all workers. The whole atmosphere surrounding the Taft-Hartley Act places trade unions under a cloud of suspicion and relegates workers to a status of inferior citizens.

(P. 402) The convention approved the report of its committee which considered this subject as follows:

Concrete evidence is provided by the Executive Council of the way in which recent actions by the courts and the National Labor Relations Board have abridged the rights of workers, imposed ruinous financial burdens upon unions, and have invaded the workers' freedom of association and the right of collective bargaining.

Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act is a clear and urgent necessity, not only for the preservation of the rights of Labor, but also for the maintenance of sound labor-management relations and of industrial peace. Board procedures and court decisions which today are a burden and a threat to organized labor may tomorrow become the source of the destruction of the labor movement itself if unemployment should become widespread with workers competing for jobs.

Before the 83rd Congress convenes, labor must have ready factual evidence bringing out specifically the injustices, inequities and dangers of the Taft-Hartley Act. This should become the basis for our legislative program in the next Congress whereby the obnoxious, dangerous and unjust provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 could be removed and proposals for sound and equitable enactments could be placed before Congress.

We realize divergent views are entertained by some of our affiliates as how best to meet the emergencies and exigencies experienced under the Taft-Hartley Law and of future difficulties to be experienced. Then, too, differences exist regarding provisions that should replace those of this restrictive law. All are in agreement that unity of approach as well as in spirit are essential to success.

To this end, the Building Trades Department proposed and the Executive Council approved the appointment of a Special Committee representative of every segment of our affiliates as to trades and callings, assigned to make a comprehensive study of experiences had and dangers anticipated, compile and consolidate this knowledge and information, devise and prepare a constructive, fair, and equitable legislative proposal for Congressional consideration and enactment after having received approval by the Executive Council—and to formulate a program to secure the early enactment of such Congressional proposal into law.

We are, indeed, indebted to the Building Trades Department for the submission of this proposal to the officers of the Executive Council for their immediate, responsive and full compliance, and we look with confidence to the cooperation and support of all our affiliated unions in the furtherance of this study and in their support of the program to be outlined to bring about an early, fair, and equitable law.

(1953, pp. 116, 616) The Executive Council reported in detail on A. F. of L. projected amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. The convention committee which considered this subject, submitted a report and recommendations which were unanimously adopted as follows:

Of overwhelming concern to labor and of deep significance to the national welfare is the struggle to revise and rectify the viciously one-sided anti-labor provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, known as the Taft-Hartley Law.

The American Federation of Labor approached the problem of presenting its case for revision and correction of the Taft-Hartley law with a sense of grave public responsibility. We were deeply conscious of the fact that the unfairness and inequities of this statute as applied thus far, have reflected only a fraction of the punitive and destructive intent of the Taft-Hartley law. The full brunt of its restrictive and union-breaking provisions will not be felt until substantial unemployment drives desperate men into willingness to accept jobs on substandard terms and gives anti-union employers strategic advantage for attack on unions.

It was our purpose to present to the incoming 83rd Congress our case for making the labor law of the land just and equitable, on the firm basis of factual evidence and of the best judgment of all of our affiliates. Accordingly, the special committee designated by the 71st Convention, undertook a questionnaire survey to enable all of our national and international unions to supply factual experience in the operation of the Taft-Hartley law and to submit their recommendations regarding the most urgently needed changes. The special committee completed a detailed analysis of the evidence and recommendations received and submitted a comprehensive report to the Executive Council last February.

Having agreed upon the broad terms in which the American Federation of Labor's presentation to Congress should be framed, the Executive Council charged President Meany with the responsibility of formulating the detailed A. F. of L. case and of presenting it to Congress, making provision for a 5-member strategy committee to assist President Meany in the development of plans to secure action on the Taft-Hartley amendments.

President Meany deserves a wholehearted tribute from the entire American Federation of Labor for his forceful and brilliant testimony before the Labor Committee of the House and the Senate and for the statesmanlike manner in which he handled the A. F. of L.'s proposals.

We are gratified that the Executive Council incorporated in its report to this Convention the full text of President Meany's recommendations on behalf of the A. F. of L. for the amendment of the Taft-Hartley law. This document details the A. F. of L.'s recommendations and the reasons on which they are based. It also underlines the great complexity of the problems involved in the Taft-Hartley revision and their importance to labor and to the public generally. We recommend the text of this presentation to our members for careful study.

Despite extensive hearings no action on the revision of the Taft-Hartley law was obtained in either house in the first session of the 83rd Congress.

As we all know, General Eisenhower both pledged as a candidate in his address to the A. F. of L. Convention in 1952 and advocated as the President of the United States in his State of the Union message to Congress, changes in the Taft-Hartley law which would eliminate its "union-busting" and anti-labor features. Despite these pledges and the constitutional prerogative of the President of the United States to recommend legislation to Congress, no such recommendations were ever submitted by the Chief Executive for Congressional consideration. We can only express the hope that when the second session of this Congress convenes, President Eisenhower will transmit legislative recommendations reflecting his initially declared purpose and making good on his pledge to the American people.

In this connection your Committee desires to make it clear that the controversial 19 proposed amendments which were divulged to certain newspapers by the White House, but never given official approval or transmitted to Congress, do not meet the objectives of the labor movement and have no A. F. of L. sanction or approval. Whatever their origin, we can regard their substance only as a first step in the right direction, but by no means as the attainment of the needed revisions we are seeking.

The burden of securing favorable action on our proposals in the next session of Congress rests on organized labor. Our whole movement must back our officers to the hilt with unstinted support of their efforts to correct the Taft-Hartley law.

We commend President Meany for carrying the burden of this difficult assignment with forthrightness and distinction.

We ask that the Executive Council extend the services of the five-member strategy committee on Taft-Hartley Amendments to continue to assist the President of the American Federation of Labor in further efforts to secure desired action to amend the Taft-Hartley law.

(1954, pp. 89, 535) The section of the E.C. Report covering the Taft-Hartley Law was acted upon by the convention as follows:

In reviewing the report of the Executive Council on the Taft-Hartley Act, your Committee believes that it would be desirable to consider briefly the history of legislative efforts to give once more to the public and to wage earners and employers a fair labor law.

For seven years the Taft-Hartley Act has been the law of the land. Despite the repeated and excellent presentations made by the American Federation of Labor to the Congress showing the basic unfairness of the statute, only one minor amendment has been enacted into law. This amendment repealed an unnecessary and costly requirement for union shop authorization elections but left untouched the areas of deepest controversy under the Act.

In 1949, when an effort to correct these areas ended in failure, even the late Senator Taft recognized a great many shortcomings in the statute and proposed to change at least some of them. In 1954, the Smith Bill (S. 2650), referred to by the Report of the Executive Council as "so objectionable that it was necessary for us to oppose it in its entirety," contained few of the 1949 proposals of Senator Taft and would have added to the Act other features conferring upon each State new authority to meddle in its own way with union activities in industries covered uniformly by the Federal law.

The Smith Bill (S. 2650) came as a great disappointment, not only because it fell so far short of other prior Republican proposals, but also because it ran directly contrary to the solemn campaign commitments of President Eisenhower to this convention in 1952 when the President was appealing to the American people for their support in the election. It is fitting to quote here the words of President Eisenhower:

"I believe your own Executive Council has stated that it was prepared to take what it called a 'realistic' view of amendments to the law. And that is my position too. I give it to you simply and clearly. I am not in favor of repealing but amending the law.

"I will not support any amendments which weaken the rights of working men and women. In seeking desirable amendments I will ask the advice and suggestions of all groups—public, management and labor. * * * In my own mind, I have complete confidence that this job of amending the law can be worked out so that no fair minded member of your group will consider the results unreasonable. * * *

"I have talked about the Taft-Hartley Act with both labor and industry people. I know the law might be used to break unions. That must be changed. America wants no law licensing union busting."

Encouraged by the stand taken by President Eisenhower, the American Federation of Labor presented to Congressional Committees in 1953 its views on revision of the Taft-Hartley Act. President George Meany then declared:

"The present Congress of the United States has embarked upon an extensive review of the Labor-Management Relations Law on the statute books. It is reasonable to expect that the study given to the operation of the existing national labor law by this committee and by its sister-committee on the House side, will result in recommendations for a substantial revision of the Taft-Hartley law.

"I appear before this committee on behalf of the American Federation of Labor to urge the enactment of substantial changes in the present statute. I believe I can demonstrate to the committee, or to any group of reasonable and judicious men, that in many respects the present law is not a good law. Evidence is plentiful that, in many of its provisions, the present law is unjust and wrong headed, in addition to being tremendously cumbersome, not conducive to good and peaceful industrial relations and just plain ineffective."

President Meany then analyzed the five titles, 46 major provisions, 102 basic subsections and numerous additional specific provisions of the law. He presented 40 specific proposals for revision. This analysis and these proposals are presented in detail in the 1953 Executive Council Report and the proceedings of the 1953 Convention. They are as valid today as they were then.

The course of events following these Congressional hearings is now a familiar story to the delegates to this Convention. In the late summer of 1953, after months of extensive review and detailed negotiations between the White House and the Congressional leaders, President Eisenhower repudiated even the modest 19 points for revision of the Taft-Hartley Act to which administration officials had obtained the consent of former Secretary of Labor Martin P. Durkin and which the President promised Mr. Durkin to support.

This event and the inevitable resignation of Mr. Durkin produced the Smith Bill as a logical course of legislative action consistent with a policy of appeasing and pleasing the right wing of the Republican Party and of ignoring the welfare of American working men and women.

The Smith Bill, which fortunately failed of passage, has not, however, been the final example of the radical disparity between campaign promises and Administration policy hostile to workers' rights. Two other trends must be clearly presented to the delegates to this Convention and to the public.

Not content merely with retaining the Taft-Hartley Act and strengthening by legislation its restrictive effect upon workers, the Administration has embarked upon a further policy of carrying out this very objective by changing the law without going to Congress. This is being done through the decisions of the newly appointed Republican majority on the National Labor Relations Board.

Since the newly reconstituted Board began operating effectively in December of 1953, it has been deliberately reexamining, case by case, the entire structure of Board interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act and of its predecessor, the Wagner Act, of which the Taft-Hartley Act is, for the most part, an extension and amendment. Even in the short period that this process has been in operation, the results have been alarming. Time-tested applications of the law developed during 15 years of experience in safeguarding the rights of workers to choose their own unions and acts for their mutual protection have been abandoned. Instead, the Board has devised new policies which can only give further aid and assistance to management in resisting the organizing efforts of workers, in frustrating their effectiveness at the bargaining table and in impairing their ability to act in concert for protection or attainment of their legitimate rights and objectives.

This process is still going on. Daily it is producing new decisions and new law, apparently with the acquiescence and approval of the Administration and certainly with the blessing and gratitude of politically effective segments of our national business community, marshaled by the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

1. "Free Speech" in Elections.

The Board has changed its rule so as to permit veiled threats by employers in representation elections such as "If the union wins the election, we will be forced to move the plant." This type of statement is now held to be protected by the Taft-Hartley Act even though the provisions of the law do not say so. In ruling this way the Board has carried out an amendment contained in the Smith Bill (S. 2650) even though Congress failed to pass the amendment.

2. The Captive Audience.

The Board has now ruled that generally employers are free to force workers to listen to anti-union tirades on company time and property without giving the union an equal chance to reply.

3. Lockouts.

The Board has now ruled for the first time in history that a mere strike threat can justify a lockout shutting down the job and depriving union members of employment.

4. Strikes During the Contract.

The Board has now indicated that a strike during the contract term, to enforce wage demands under a wage reopening clause, is outlawed by the Taft-Hartley Act. This ruling automatically writes a "no strike clause" into the contract even where the parties reserve the right to strike.

5. Narrowing Board Jurisdiction.

During the past year the Board has drastically limited the types of cases it will consider. The result is to deprive millions of workers of any protection of their rights to organize and bargain collectively, even though these workers are entitled to protection under the Federal law. These are the rights guaranteed by the original Wagner Act.

Now losing their protection are workers in retail stores, power stations, TV and radio stations, daily and weekly newspapers, utilities, defense plants, service companies, and in every type of small business covered by the Federal law.

6. No Relief for the Construction Industry.

Even though the Board has deprived millions of workers of their "Wagner Act" rights, it refuses to use the same authority to grant relief to the construction industry. This authority was used in effect to exempt the construction industry from the Wagner Act before the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted and could still be used for this purpose today.

Furthermore, the declared policy of the Eisenhower administration has been to favor and foster the rights of the state to the detriment of recognized Federal power and authority. There is nothing new in this idea. It has been given new emphasis, however, as a guiding rule of government in broad fields, with resulting detriment to the welfare of wage earners and to the public interest. Of immediate concern is the use of this policy to encourage states to regulate legitimate union action on a more severe basis than that provided for interstate industries under Federal law. This is especially true respecting state "Right to Work Laws."

The Taft-Hartley Act established a uniform Federal rule permitting the "30-day union shop" in industries affecting interstate commerce. It then gave permission to the States, under Section 14(b) of the Act, to apply any more restrictive state legislation prohibiting insistence upon membership or non-membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment. President Meany, in his testimony before Congressional Committees, referred to above, pointed out the inconsistency, hypocrisy, and the disrupting effects of this provision. He asked for its repeal.

Section 14(b) has not been repealed. It has been perpetuated. The key provision of the original Eisenhower legislative program for amending the Taft-Hartley Act contained in the "19 points" was the repeal of Section 14(b). After this program was repudiated, the Smith Bill (S. 2650) carefully left the section untouched. Since this bill was the Administration's most recent program for revision of the Act, it is reasonable to assume that the conscious policy of the Administration is to preserve Section 14(b).

This trend has not been limited to Section 14(b) and State "right to work" laws. It has covered the entire area of Federal-State action in the field of labor relations.

The trend has not stopped with the Smith Bill. It has found even more extreme expression in the NAM-sponsored Goldwater amendment to the Smith Bill which would have given to the States blanket authority over all areas of labor relations covered by the Federal law. As examples of the lengths to which this proposal would have gone, Senator Goldwater admitted, in questioning on the floor of the Senate, that his amendment would permit the states (1) to "pass a law forbidding collective bargaining in manufacturing," (2) to require "compulsory arbitration in all disputes as a substitute for collective bargaining" and (3) to require "union membership by 95 per cent of the employees eligible for membership in the union, before it would be recognized."

Thus the record of the past seven years is a chronicle of frustration and defeat for working men and women of America in their efforts to convince our Government of the justice and fairness of their position against the Taft-Hartley Act and against the forces which have created and perpetuated that law. Ultimate success seems only to lie in defeating at the polls those who oppose justice and fairness and in electing to public office at every level men and women who will listen to truth and reason and will act with courage unfettered by selfishness or bias.

Meanwhile, as the full meaning and harmful effects of the Taft-Hartley Act become more clear each day and each year, we must continue with vigor to press for very substantial amendments to that law with confident hope of success and with faith in the justice of our cause.

Tampa Flogging Cases—(1939, p. 636) On November 30th, 1935, in Tampa, Florida, there was a kidnapping, flogging, tarring and feathering of Joseph A. Shoemaker, Eugene F. Poulnot and Dr. S. J. Rogers, which resulted in the tragic death of Joseph A. Shoemaker. The only crime of the above victims was their consistent efforts to aid and assist their fellow workingmen in improving their living conditions. Through the efforts of the A. F. of L., other interested organizations and prominent individuals the public was thoroughly aroused which resulted in an investigation leading to the indictment of eleven men, including the Tampa Chief of Police, six other policemen, and several Klansmen from Orlando, Florida.

The first trial held, for the kidnapping of Poulnot, resulted in conviction of five of the defendants and sentences of four years each at hard labor, although these convicted men are now free on moderate bail pending decision on an appeal to the Florida Supreme Court.

Several of the indicted men have not yet had to stand trial on the charges against them and the most serious charges of murder have not been set for date although the crimes happened almost a year ago.

The A. F. of L. goes on record as urging prompt and vigorous prosecution of the balance of these cases to the end that full justice may be obtained and that such action shall serve as a warning to all terrorist groups intent on destroying our fundamental American liberties.

Tariff (also see: Listing by Subjects Concerned, i.e., Fishing, Pulp, etc.)

(Philippine Imports)—(1924, p. 57) Immediately upon adjournment of the convention of the A. F. of L., held in Portland, Oreg, the E.C. considered and acted upon Resolution No. 84, approved by that convention. This resolution set forth the complaint that by reason of lower standards of working conditions and payment for services rendered by the wage earners in the Philippine Islands, many of the products of Oriental and other sorts of lower paid labor were being imported duty free and in direct competition with products of the workers in the U.S. It likewise contained the recommendation and instruction that the E.C. should appoint a special committee to visit the Philippine Islands and report on conditions against which complaint was made.

Thoughtful consideration of the resolution led the E.C. to reach the conclusion that for the time being at least it was inadvisable and undesirable to send a special committee to the Philippine Islands especially in view of the fact that other methods might be invoked before such a comprehensive undertaking should be entered into. Consequently, the E.C. directed an inquiry to be made of this subject by the organizations directly and primarily interested.

As a result of this inquiry a conference was called for the purpose herein indicated and as outlined in the resolution.

This conference was called on February 11, 1924, at a time when the E.C. was meeting, thus making it possible for the E.C. to render such further assistance as the conference might determine. . . .

Upon the recommendation of this conference and after further consideration of the entire subject matter, the E.C. adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved—That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby respectfully and earnestly urged to amend the import laws, insofar as they relate to the importation of manufactured products, from the Philippine Islands, to the effect that all manufactured products from the Islands shall be subject to the same import duty provided for and collected from all foreign countries.

Resolved—That we respectfully petition and urge the Congress of the United States to forthwith grant the earnest prayer and petitions of the Filipinos—the right to exercise in full, liberty, freedom and self-government.

Representatives of the A. F. of L. appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs and urged the adoption of the resolution for Philippine independence. No action has been taken by Congress up to the present time.

(1925, p. 312) Inasmuch as the A. F. of L. has accorded to individual organizations the free determination of attitude on the tariff question within their own industries the E.C. is authorized to render such aid to organizations which are concerned in tariff legislation for their individual industries as seems best to the E.C. It is to be understood that in so responding the A. F. of L. is not to be committed to any question of principle relating to general tariff legislation.

(1931, p. 303) It shall be the practice of the A. F. of L. when tariff legislation is being considered by Congress, to cooperate with national and international unions interested in any particular schedule, to have those who are seeking to secure changes in tariff for their industry subjected to questioning which will make public the rates of wages paid to their employees, the hours of labor they are compelled to work, whether they believe in the right of wage earners to organize for self-protection; whether there are trade unions among their employees with whose representatives they are accustomed to discuss terms of employment and conditions of labor, and whether this is by means of collective action, without interference, influence or coercion exercised by either party over the other, or designation of representatives by the other.

(1939, p. 430) European countries, because of low wages, depreciated currency, and subsidized industries, are able to dump commodities into the U.S. at prices below the cost of production here.

If the Anti-Dumping Act of 1921 were strengthened by the enactment into law of H.R. 7312, it would prove of immeasurable benefit to American wage earners, not only to those employed in non-dutiable industries, like pulp and newsprint paper, but also to all the workers employed in industries that have to meet what is tantamount to subsidized competition from European countries.

The E.C. is directed to urge upon Congress the enactment of this legislation.

(P. 431) The A. F. of L. recommends that legislative action be taken to protect the wood pulp industry from foreign competition.

(1949, p. 64) Protest against the practice of some American employers in establishing duplicate facilities in Europe in order to produce cheaper goods for the American market in competition with American labor, was called for in Res. 78, which requested that the A. F. of L. foster legislation preventing a lowering of tariff which would result in an unfair competitive advantage for European products.

(P. 485) In lieu of Res. 25 (Buy American) and Res. 78, the convention adopted the following committee recommendations:

Your committee has considered these resolutions as related to a common objective and expression of a growing unrest. Your committee is of the opinion that the situation presented and apprehensions manifested are not to be viewed lightly or to be disregarded. Neither do we believe that it presents cause for undue alarm and holds that final conclusions should be drawn on matters of such grave international importance only after having first inquired into all elements and factors affecting international relations and world trade.

Your committee therefore recommends that the president of the Federation cause an inquiry to be made into all trends and factors affecting international and world trade as well as relationships particularly with reference to ultimate consequences upon our domestic employment opportunities and trade conditions. It is also recommended that affiliated organizations most directly affected by any change or disturbance in our international and foreign trade be observant of future developments due to possible foreign competition and the resultant effects upon the employment situation and opportunities of their respective trades and callings to the end that appropriate measures may be considered to safeguard the employment and trade opportunities of their people. In the interim it is recommended that members and friends of organized labor favor the purchase of commodities bearing the union label and patronize union shop card establishments and as well union button services.

(Protest Against Foreign Competition)—(1950, p. 20) Res. 4 called attention to the increasing importance of demanding union label goods and services, and protested against the influx of foreign made goods from European and Asiatic countries whose low cost of production is a serious threat to the wage rates established by the A. F. of L.

(P. 24) Res. 11 and 12 contained numerous reasons for pressing Congress for protective tariff legislation and concluded with the following:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, while fully recognizing the many economic benefits of a healthy foreign trade, declare its disapproval of such competitive imports as derive their competitive advantage from low wages prevailing abroad, unless this unfair advantage is appropriately offset or guarded against to assure competitive parity; that the undermining of labor standards through wage competition on an international scale cannot be accepted as a legitimate form of economic improvement; that it is not necessary, as a condition of selling successfully in the United States, to offer goods at prices that substantially undercut the market; that the most healthy and voluminous trade can be built around fair competitive methods rather than seeking to base it upon price advantages that threaten loss of employment and reduction in wages; and finally that the American Federation of Labor express its concern over further tariff reductions that will expose our workers to unfair competition from foreign wages and thus undermine the wage standards built up in this country over the years.

(P. 375) Res. 126:

Whereas—New and drastic reductions in the United States import duties on wines, fresh grapes and raisins are proposed in negotiations to be conducted with foreign countries at Torquay, England, beginning on September 28th, and

Whereas—500,000 Americans in wine wholesaling and retailing, and in the transportation, printing, lithography, glass, closure, packaging, advertising, winery equipment and farm equipment industries derive all or part of their income from supplying or serving the grape and wine industry, in addition to the 158,000 American farm families which grow grapes for wine, and

Whereas—The loss of adequate tariff protection would admit large volumes of the products of cheap foreign labor and would displace grapes, raisins and wines from their home markets, thereby throwing many American workers out of employment and injuring the economy of many United States communities, and

Whereas—The grape and wine industry and the many industries which serve and supply it already have been grievously injured by previous cuts in the tariffs on foreign wines and by the repeated devaluations of foreign currencies, and

Whereas—Such countries as Spain and Portugal, which are not even parties to the tariff negotiations, would be the principal beneficiaries of any reductions in the wine tariffs, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor goes on record as opposing any reductions in present tariffs on grapes, raisins and wines and as recommending restoration of adequate tariff protection for these products grown and distributed by American labor, and be it further

Resolved—That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, the United States Tariff Commission, the United States Department of Agriculture, the United States Department of State, the United States Department of Labor, and members of the Congress of the United States.

(P. 459) Resolutions 4, 11, 12 and 126 all deal with the subject of unfair foreign competition, calling for greater use of the union label, shop card and button, disapproving competitive disadvantage from low wage areas, seeking competitive parity and assurance against still further reductions in import duties.

Your committee is in accord with and approves the principles involved and the objectives sought in these several resolutions. We fully recognize the many economic benefits of a healthy foreign trade. World economic stability cannot be regained without a large volume of sound international trade.

However we must not forget that competitive imports that derive their market advantage from low wages prevailing in other countries are a constant threat to our labor standards, unless this unfair advantage is offset or guarded against to assure competitive parity.

We cannot accept international wage competition as a method of economic improvement since such competition, wherever it occurs, inevitably undermines the higher of the competing standards. International trade like domestic trade can be expanded most soundly on the basis of fair competition.

Our import duties should prevent low-wage rivalry from abroad as our state and national minimum wage laws seek to avoid such rivalry at home, to the end that our labor standards may be maintained and further improved.

(1951, pp. 307, 549) Res. 83 called attention to the problems posed by unfair competition of foreign made products as follows:

Whereas—It never was the intention of the reciprocal trade treaty policy of the Federal Government to permit foreign made products to be imported in this country under circumstances that will result in complete ruination of competitive American industry, and

Whereas—Such situation is in fact developing in the motorcycle industry as shown by the following facts: England is shipping into this country motorcycles which sell for an average of 25 to 30% less than comparable American made products; this price differential results in part from the fact that the average wage rate in the automotive industry in England is 58c an hour, while the average wage rate in motorcycle manufacturing in this country for workers who are members of the International Union, United Automobile Workers of America, A. F. of L., is $1.84 per hour, plus generally superior working conditions and social benefits, this price differential is also due in part to the devaluation of the value of the English pound by approximately 30%; such price differential has resulted in the loss of 25% of sales of one company, Harley-Davidson Motorcycle Company of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, during the current manufacturing season, which loss of sales is directly accounted for by the sales made in this country of the English-made motorcycle and such loss of sales has also resulted in the loss of jobs by 1400 American working men and women at the Harley-Davidson Company, and

Whereas—In addition to the unfair competitive advantage enjoyed by the imported English-made motorcycles, the British Empire has made it impossible for American manufacturers to sell their products in the British Empire with the result that while such British-made product is freely sold here to the ruination of the American workingman, American made products of the same type are excluded from the British market, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor assembled in convention at San Francisco, September 17, 1951, go on record as being vigorously opposed to the granting of any tariff or import duty preferences which will permit continuation of the intolerable condition described above, and as supporting any reasonable changes in such import duty or import quota regulations which will permit American-made motorcycles to compete on a fair and equal basis with English-made motorcycles for American sales.

(P. 550) The convention considered four resolutions (Nos. 13, 16, 21, and 23) jointly inasmuch as all dealt with competition between American workers and those in substandard countries whose products are brought into the U.S. for sale. The committee report was unanimously approved as follows:

In reporting on these resolutions, your committee recommends reaffirmation of the repeatedly asserted opposition to unfair competition as a threat to wage standards and conditions of work. We do not oppose a high volume of international trade; we favor it. But we cannot look with indifference when the very objectives of our long effort and struggle in the economic and social field are threatened by imports that derive their competitive advantage from lower wage payments and inferior working conditions.

We reassert the principle that fair competition as contrasted with sweatshop or cut-throat competition assures both the highest and healthiest flow of trade, whether domestic or international.

Our minimum wage laws, both state and federal, our social security laws, our system of unemployment insurance and our collective bargaining guarantees, all are evidence of our conviction that foreign competition based on wages and standards of employment is destructive of a sound social, industrial and commercial system. It is our judgment that the American market and the interest of America's workers can best be maintained in its expanded and expanding condition by continued adherence to this conviction.

In keeping with the foregoing, your committee recommends these resolutions be referred to the officers of the American Federation of Labor for consideration and action and as hereinafter outlined. It is our further recommendation that all efforts be made to the end that authentic cases of unfair import competition are eliminated, fully recognizing that removal of unfair trade will not restrict trade in general but will promote it. It is, likewise, recommended that we endeavor to help shape our foreign trade legislation to assure fair and equitable import conditions where the imported goods compete with the products of our members and do not tend to undermine our standards of work and compensation for services rendered.

Whereas—Continued employment at fair wages is dependent upon a steady market for the products of Labor at fair prices, and

Whereas—Our extremely high national financial obligations, including outlays for national defense, interest on the national debt, foreign aid, assistance to veterans and price support of agricultural products require a high national income, and

Whereas—Such a level of national income can be maintained only if employment and wages remain at or near the present high level, thus producing a large volume of goods salable only in a strong market backed by a high purchasing power, and

Whereas—We are conscious of the need to maintain democratic governments and prevent them from gravitating toward totalitarianism and we are mindful of the fact that as workers in the United States we benefit by an expanding world trade in two particular aspects: (1) Over two million workers in this country are dependent upon exports for their jobs; the most recent analysis of the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicates that the employment of nearly 2,400,000 workers in the first half of 1947 were dependent upon exports; (2) As consumers we are able to purchase foreign-made goods, which otherwise would not be available, for consumption in this country, and

Whereas—What is true for American industry as a whole is not true for each specific product made in this country. There are some instances in which foreign competitors utilizing substandard conditions of employment can and do compete directly with American products and could, in the absence of reasonable protection by import duties, drive these producers to lower levels and deprive American workers of employment, therefore, be it

Resolved—That we condemn as unfair and unjustifiable any foreign competition that derives its competitive advantage in our markets from payment of lower wages and imposition of inferior working conditions in the countries shipping their products to us, and be it further

Resolved—That we support all efforts to establish reasonable safeguards against such unfair foreign competition either through the tariff or import quotas to the extent necessary to assure fairness of competition, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor be accorded full and adequate representation on all agencies set up to effectuate the above purposes.

Referred to the officers of the A. F. of L.

(Narrow Fabrics)—1953, pp. 446, 649) Res. 129 protested against free importation of competitive narrow fabric textile products as follows:

Whereas—There are thousands of members in good standing who are gainfully employed in the narrow fabrics textile industry, and

Whereas — Free importation of competitive narrow fabric textile products from low-wage areas constitutes a continuing threat to the perpetual employment of these members, and

Whereas — Legislation to permit free import of woven narrow fabrics from low-wage areas abroad in competition with similar products manufactured by the textile industry in Connecticut and other states by high-wage labor would foster unemployment, and

Whereas—Direct aid programs are made possible in large part by our national full employment and prosperity which, in turn, would be seriously jeopardized in the narrow fabric textile industry if low-price narrow fabrics were imported without suitable tariffs, and

Whereas — The conception of imports being beneficial to United States business and employment is valid only to the extent that free trade must be highly selective and should exclude woven fabrics and other products, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor objects strenuously to the programs of the United States Congress and the Federal Administration reducing import tariffs and advocating free trade in certain products such as, for example, woven narrow fabrics, and be it further

Resolved—That the meaning of the foregoing, and the sentiment of this convention with regard thereto, be communicated to the appropriate bodies in the Congress of the United States and the appropriate departments of the National Administration.

Referred to officers of A. F. of L. for consideration and aid to organizations concerned.

(Handbags, Luggage, Etc.) — (Pp. 408, 649) Res. 42:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled in St. Louis, Missouri, go on record to instruct its officers and Executive Council to use all their efforts in favor of the restoration of the 35% tariff on handbags made of reptile and leathers regardless of from what country they may be brought to the United States, and be it further

Resolved—That all state federations, city central bodies, federal unions and local unions extend all moral support to the International Handbag, Luggage, Belt and Novelty Workers' Union, a constituent and integral part of the Federation, in its national campaign to eliminate said unfair and cut-throat competition which endangers the working and living standards of the handbag and pocketbook workers, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention assembled of the American Federation of Labor go on record to urge each and every international union affiliated with the Federation to pass appropriate resolutions appealing to Congress to restore the 35% tariff on handbags made of reptile and leathers and to 50% on handbags made of straw and other materials, as was the case prior to the 50% cut effected in the reciprocity agreements.

Referred to A. F. of L. officers for consideration and aid to organizational interest.

(Japanese Imports)—(1955, p. 120) Domestic textile and apparel industries are facing a rapidly growing unfair competition from products imported from Japan. At the moment, competition to domestic manufacturing is seriously affecting cotton blouse production. The growth in these imports in the last two years has been spectacular. According to the sources in the trade, in 1954 cotton blouse imports from Japan amounted to 10,000 dozens; the 1955 rate of imports, however, advanced to over 2,000,000 dozens. In terms of domestic manufacture, the 1954 imports of cotton blouses represented about 0.1 per cent, in 1955—20 per cent. Most of this increase took place before the tariff concessions granted to Japan under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade became effective on September 10, 1955. The threat of this unfair low-wage competition, which enables Japan to dump cotton blouses on the American market at a fraction of the prices charged by domestic manufacturers, is apt therefore to become intensified. Vigilance must be exercised and remedies found to safeguard the employment of American workers and their labor standards.

Taxation (also see: Aliens; Income Tax; Seamen's Income Tax; Poll Tax; Sales Tax; Social Security)

(Tax Exempt Securities)—(1924, p. 71) An amendment to the constitution was introduced in the House proposing that the U.S. shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from securities issued by the federal, state, county and municipal governments in the various sections of the country. This amendment was reported favorably by the Committee on Ways and Means. It was debated and rejected by the House, failing the necessary two-thirds majority. The vote was 247 yeas and 133 nays.

(P. 187) The convention requested the E.C. to have the 69th Congress approve an amendment to the Constitution that would give the U.S. power to tax securities now exempt.

(1925, p. 55) H.J. Res. 315, proposing an amendment to the Constitution giving Congress the power to levy and collect taxes on now tax-free securities, was reported favorably in the House but failed of passage. It provided also that states would be given power to tax such securities.

(1931, p. 467) The A. F. of L. approves in principle a tax on incomes for the benefit of states, levied by the states in like manner as the federal income tax, to be so graduated that it will be levied in increasing percentages on progressively larger incomes.

(Estate Tax)—(1928, pp. 82, 216) For several Congresses a determined effort has been made to repeal the estate tax. As is well known the object of this is eventually to repeal all taxes and establish what is known as the sales tax, otherwise the buyers' tax. The Administration favored the repeal of the estate tax and many witnesses appeared before the Ways and Means Committee urging that that recommendation be made to the House.

Representatives of the A. F. of L. entered vigorous protest and the committee finally refused to approve of the repeal of the estate tax.

When the revenue bill reached the Senate an attempt was made to include the repeal of the estate tax but failed.

(Financing U. S. Government)—(1932, p. 74) In 1789 our Federal Government had these administrative departments: State, Treasury, War, and Justice. To these were added: Post Office Department, 1789; Department of the Navy, 1798; Department of the Interior, 1849; Department of Agriculture, 1889; Department of Commerce, 1903; Department of Labor, 1913.

The number of independent offices, commissions, bureaus, etc., has grown steadily. These include Civil Service Commission, Personnel Classification Board, Employees Compensation Commission, General Accounting Office, Federal Coordinating Service, Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Reserve Board, Federal Trade Commission, Tariff Commission, Federal Farm Board, Radio Commission, Veterans Administration, Federal Board for Vocational Education, U.S. Shipping Board, Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, etc.

The increase in governmental activities reflects the growing public interest in various economic undertakings; the need for protecting the consumer; the need for advising producers who must sell and buy in world markets; the need for conserving natural resources; the need for having standard weights and measures, etc. The fact that governmental activities, employees and costs have steadily increased is not in itself a reason for alarm and an argument for curtailing such expenditures. Each item of expenditure should be evaluated on a basis of service, efficiency, relation to social welfare. What we do need to guard against is watertight compartments, doing things that can best be done by some other agency, bad business management.

Because governmental activities are so comprehensive, there should be some method of considering these expenditures as a whole and reviewing developments. In other words we have developed the budget system. The budget is intended to serve as a work and tax program. It affects economies while it adds its own expenses to governmental costs.

In the early days of this country, government was a very simple matter. Individual citizens and communities took care of their needs, looking to the government chiefly for the recording of deeds, transfer of property, the regulation of relations with outside countries. As our population increased and became denser, as our business enterprises increased, as the country was more closely united by railways, telegraph, telephone, airways, radio, the mechanisms used in living are more inter-related and individual well being inter-dependent. We no longer use the candle or the oil lamp. Cheap transportation must be provided within a city. The household is no longer dependent on the home well or wood pile or its individual garden.

Government which formerly was confined chiefly to activities which required compulsion found it necessary to undertake services, to regulate, to furnish information and technical data.

In this complicated modern age we are finding it necessary to do many things collectively; some through voluntary agencies, and some by delegating new functions to the government. The choice of agency depends upon conditions and the work to be done.

As a result of activities of various interested groups in Labor, agriculture, industry, commerce, finance, etc., governmental departments and bureaus have been established and developed. The government is our agency to do those costly and unremunerative undertakings which are indispensable to future progress and which benefit the nation as a whole.

In the Federal Government there are undoubtedly inefficiencies, duplications, waste through lack of coordination, inflexibility, inept management, etc. But these are matters to be dealt with upon a basis of fact and efficiency, and not matters of expediency. The work of the government should be the promotion of national welfare for which legislators should make adequate appropriation covering considerable periods of time.

To carry on our governmental work, federal employees have been employed from practically every state in the Union. The greater number of these employees are under the Civil Service and have won their positions in competitive examinations. While as competent as those in private employment many work for much lower salaries than are paid to those in private positions. Many have invested years in developing capacities for the distinctive needs of government work. This group of workers has been made the football of politics, together with the activities of various governmental agencies.

Propaganda from those who wish to curtail their personal tax payments by restriction of government work, curtailment of federal appropriations, salary cuts for government workers, should not be allowed to stampede legislators into uneconomic curtailment of work, and neglect of the fundamental purposes for which our government was created.

The increased costs of government have not been due to increase in the percentage going to operating costs, but to more and better services to the nation. We cannot get very far in understanding governmental costs and economies until we apply informing methods of accountancy.

Trends indicate the government will increasingly serve as the coordinating agency for more groups and more undertakings and that governmental expenditures will increase. We shall meet the bills collectively through taxation instead of attempting to do the same work as individually paying private bills. In deciding any of these matters we must apply measuring rods of money costs and social costs.

Our state governments which were formerly mainly concerned with maintaining order, collecting taxes, and protecting property, now are concerned with public works, including highways, supervising insurance, banking, education, agriculture, forests, fish, game, public health, welfare, charitable and reformatory institutions; there are special boards for Labor, mines, registrations, sanitation, tenements and housing, licensing boards, etc. These new functions represent a developing concept of what society should be organized to do in promoting social welfare.

Municipal functions have added to the maintenance of public safety the various activities of community house-keeping—sewers and sewage, garbage disposal, water supply, city lighting, public utilities, construction, repairing and cleaning of streets, public schools, libraries, control of traffic, public health, parks and recreation centers, markets, welfare departments, school attendance administration, transportation, etc. The services rendered help to raise standards of community living. Their costs increase taxes but represent the most economical method of doing what society wants done. . . .

A detailed study of the reports of the United States Treasury on receipts, expenditures and deficit will disclose the essential solvency of our nation and its capacity to meet emergencies. Our national wealth is the basis of our fiscal planning and policies. Government expenditures have increased, paralleling growing needs and broadening concepts of national service.

Depression has reduced the national income from $89,584,000,000, for 1929, to $52,446,000,000 for 1931. New demands made upon the government for aid to the unemployed in the form of work and relief as well as relief for banks, agriculture, and business, debts arising from the World War, have brought the problems of taxation before our citizens with force. In the various demands and movements for tax reduction there has been much confusion and misstatement.

Declining national income and rising need for relief occasioned the demand for a "balanced budget"—in the sense that expenditures should be paid out of current income. Such procedure is unprecedented in our fiscal policies and unjustifiable. Our nation has always made use of its credit and our government has long made use of deficiency appropriations. Apparently, the primary purpose of the proposal was to reduce the costs of normal government. But government is not a business institution that can expand or contract its activities in accord with the ups and downs of the business cycle.

The government cannot abandon its functions temporarily. It must continue to keep the peace, protect property, promote the general welfare in good times as well as bad. Its capital investments must be maintained; child welfare, workmen's compensation, statistical services, crime prevention, education, highways, airways, and all the services and agencies necessary to modern life. The normal trend of such expenditures is steadily upward, unless national decline sets in. These are not things we can do more or less, as business management is more or less successful. The costs must be provided for by fiscal planning covering a decade or more, differentiating between capital expenditure and operating expenses.

There are those who regard the mounting costs of government as something wholly undesirable. There comes under consideration the sweep of changing functions of government to conform to the needs of the citizens under changing ways of working and living. Mistrust of many proposals for retrenchment in government expenditure is based on the fact that they come from those corporations that would profit by escaping regulation in general interests and from groups representing concentration of wealth.

In the U.S. taxation is divided into three general groups according to the agency levying and expending the taxes: federal, state, and local. In 1890, the combined gross governmental expenditures were $855,000,000, of which 34% was disbursed by federal authority; 9% by state, and 57% by local. By 1930, the total gross governmental expenditures had mounted to $13,048,000,000, with the following percentage distribution: federal, 31.0%; state, 15.3%; local, 54.6%.

In Great Britain the government took 25.2% of national income; in France, 16.1%; in Italy, 14.2%; in Germany, 13.6%; in the United States, 10.4%. The percentages are for 1928, the latest year for which figures for all countries could be obtained.

(1936, p. 571) The E.C. is directed to undertake a study of the base and structure of taxation—national, state and local—with a view to determining the deterrent effect of present taxes upon enterprise and employment, and recommending such changes as will produce the maximum tax revenue with the minimum burden upon labor, industry and the consuming public.

(1938, p. 424) The E.C. is instructed to establish a committee for the purpose of study and appropriate action concerning the crucial problem of equitable distribution of the tax burden with especial reference to taxes of discriminatory and punitive character.

(Whiskey Tax)—(1938, pp. 167, 552) Congress increased the revenue tax on each proof gallon of newly distilled liquor 25 cents after July 1, 1938. It then developed that arrangements were being made to manufacture great amounts of liquor so that when the law went into effect they would be exempt from the increased tax on all liquor manufactured before July 1. This would have thrown many thousands of the workers out of employment after July 1.

Therefore, a bill was introduced in Congress to place a floor tax of 25 cents on each proof gallon. This would prevent holders of whiskey from taking advantage of the original law taxing only newly manufactured whiskey 25 cents per gallon after July 1.

In order to protect the distillery workers the A. F. of L. urged the passage of the floor tax bill and it was signed June 16, 1938.

(1952, pp. 38, 467) Res. 49 protested against steadily rising tax rate on distilled liquor, threatening the stability and security of the industry and the workers engaged therein and called upon the affiliates of the A. F. of L. to seek the enactment of proposed legislation reducing the tax rate applicable to distilled spirits. Referred to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(Machinery) (Labor-Displacing) — (1940, p. 533) Resolution calling for the imposition of a tax on machinery which displaces workers, was referred to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(1949, pp. 343, 501) Res. 117 proposed that Congress enact necessary tax measures to adequately tax labor-saving machinery which is taking the place of manpower and contributing to the ranks of the unemployed and requiring that such moneys provide increased benefits to unemployed workers. Referred to Tax Committee.

(1942, p. 165) Presentations of the A. F. of L. to Congressional committees on this subject were predicated upon reports made by our Committee on Taxation.

We opposed a general sales tax, a manufacturers' sales tax, or a spending tax and none of these were adopted.

In regard to war costs, we recommended a pay-as-we-go policy, insofar as possible, depending mainly on taxation of incomes in accordance with ability to pay.

The committees were requested in connection with the entire tax plan, to consider payments made by employees to Social Security and the need for increased contributions, with a parallel plan for industry refunding approximately 20 per cent of excess profits taxes for post-war industries giving employment to workers.

The Senate Finance Committee has superimposed upon the income taxes, which are 6 per cent of the net income, plus a surplus tax of 13 per cent to 93 per cent, a 5 per cent tax on gross annual earnings exceeding $624.

This gross tax will evidently apply on earnings invested in savings or War Bonds.

While the bill is still unreported to the Senate, action by its Committee to date assures the adoption of the highest income tax rates in the history of this country. This is, no doubt, necessary, but the present danger to workers is that in the effort to secure additional revenue there will be enacted a specific tax of 5 per cent on all gross earnings, except $12 weekly, in addition to the normal tax and surtax on net incomes, and, while the need is great, when to this is added payroll deductions of 10 per cent for War Bonds, Red Cross, etc., Social Security deductions, the results will be crushing and may lower earnings below the point necessary to maintain health and efficiency.

Attention is directed to the proposals for higher tax levies to increase the tax yield from thirty-eight billions of dollars, as estimated for present laws, to forty billions of dollars in the next year. Also that different methods proposed include forced loans to the Government, increased pay-roll deductions, ranging as high as 41 per cent, and a general sales tax.

This convention instructs the Executive Council to continue its efforts in behalf of just and equitable taxation based upon ability to pay and in unremitting opposition to a sales tax. Executive Council is instructed to oppose any increase in taxes levied upon wages or compensation of the workers and that any increase in the amounts withheld from such wages or compensation be in the form of savings represented by Government bonds.

(1944, p. 166) The war has made practically every self-supporting person keenly aware that the Federal Government collects revenues. The number of persons paying income tax has risen from 4 to 50 millions. The size of payments has risen both because of changes in exemptions and increases in rates.

Personal exemption for single persons has dropped from $1,000 in 1939 to $500; for couples from $2,500 in 1939 to $1,200. The normal rate has increased from 4 per cent to 22 per cent; the surtax from a top of 75 per cent on incomes in excess of $5,000,000 to 90 per cent on incomes in excess of $200,000. Corporation tax rates have increased from a range of 12½ to 19 per cent to 40 per cent plus a 95 per cent excess profits tax.

These tax rates make a heavy burden on wage earners and small salaried persons, who in addition pay this direct income tax into old-age insurance and have plans for more adequate social insurance in order to provide against dependency. Such social insurance contributions are based on earnings.

The needs of Government will remain high after the war. The costs of the war are piling up a huge national debt which together with annual interest will have to be paid in the coming years. It is variously estimated that the post-war annual budget will be between $16 and $25 billions. Obviously, unless we can maintain a national income, approximating present levels, such a budget will amount to a capital levy. If there are jobs for all, the national income will remain high and more incomes will fall within the taxable levels, so that adequate revenues can be secured and rates materially reduced.

It is obvious that we must have a permanent federal tax program to reduce our national obligation which can remain in operation with minor changes during the difficult years ahead. Since enterprise provides the employment that creates income, our tax proposals should encourage the expansion of industry.

Since income tax is a main dependence for revenue, it is important that rates paid by low income families do not deprive them of the essentials of living and that they are adjusted so that these families can also make contributions for social insurance.

The American Federation of Labor Tax Committee is studying the proposed post-war tax programs for the purpose of making recommendations.

(P. 587) A sound tax policy is indispensable for the government to meet its obligations and equally necessary to enable private enterprise to provide the employment basic for economic prosperity.

We note that the American Federation of Labor is studying proposals and urge that wide publicity be given its findings.

(Reporting by Labor Organizations) —(P. 411) Under this caption the Executive Council reports its activities in the formation and enactment of the federal tax law. The Executive Council vigorously opposed the provision in the law requiring organizations, including labor organizations, to file annually itemized statements of receipts and disbursements. A letter by the President of the A. F. of L. was read into the Congressional Record during consideration of the bill in the House of Representatives. The opposition was continued when the bill was under consideration by the Senate but, as finally enacted, that provision was retained.

The opposition to a general sales tax was successful.

The bill was vetoed by the President and subsequently passed over his veto.

Your Committee recommends adoption of this section of the Executive Council's Report and that the Executive Council be instructed to use every possible means to secure the repeal of the provisions in the tax law requiring labor organizations to make periodic financial reports to any Government agency.

No. 82, was unanimously adopted by the convention.

Whereas—The present federal tax structure provides for a withholding tax of 20% of the gross income of wage workers, and

Whereas—Other taxpayers, including industry, are asked to pay their taxes only on a net income basis, and

Whereas—The 20% withholding tax has seriously cut into the wages of many thousands of American working people, who have been unable to get any relief from the mounting increased cost of living, and

Whereas—It is now evident that the employers and businessmen of America contemplate further reducing the tax burden on business, and keeping the burden on the pay envelopes of the wage worker, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor ask the United States Congress to revise the tax laws and provide that the wage worker subjected to the 20% withholding tax be given credit on defense bond purchases to the extent of 50% of the withholding tax, as this is the only way that many of them now have of providing savings for their future security.

(1946, pp. 185, 610) The size of the public debt is already causing anxiety, for the debt is a considerable factor in our inflation problem as well as cause of high tax rates. However, the war and the war situation still exist. It is unsafe to reduce military expenses too drastically and our nation must assume new responsibilities in international fields and for the United Nations.

Our own Federal agencies must have funds with which to perform needed social services. In the coming year expensive war agencies will doubtless be liquidated and economies in administration can be made.

Congress and the Treasury must find ways to reduce the national debt before taxation can be materially decreased. In the meanwhile there should be more equitable distribution of the tax burden.

(Pp. 221, 614) H.R. 3633, a bill to facilitate reconversion, provides an increase in the excess profits tax exemption from $10,000 to $25,000, a 10% credit of 10% of the excess profits tax to be taken currently with respect to 1944 taxes and subsequent years. Advanced to 1946 the maturity date of postwar refund bonds, speeds up refunds from carry-backs, net operating losses, and speeds up refunds of recomputations of deductions for amortization of emergency facilities.

Reconversion and readjustment to peacetime operation, it is claimed, will be facilitated by enactment of the bill as business men could intelligently plan for postwar business

The bill passed Congress and was approved by the President on July 31, 1945 (Public Law No. 172—79th Congress).

We approved the extension to business of some measure of relief from the burden of taxation in the amount of five billion dollars by this bill, but some relief should also have been extended to the great mass of taxpayers by increasing the amount of exemptions approximately as follows:

Single individual.....	$1,200.00
Married couple	2,000.00
Credit for each dependent....	500.00

Tax laws should be equitable and practical and the purchasing power of the mass of the people should not be reduced to such a level by heavy taxes and low exemptions that business is retarded and living standards lowered.

This section reports tax legislation relieving business by refund provisions. The American Federation of Labor tried also to secure more equitable exemptions for those in the lower income brackets.

—The Executive Council directed attention to the continued necessity for heavy federal taxes. Their report stated in part: . . . by pre-war standards federal taxes will continue to be heavy. Federal debt charges, defense needs, continued service for war veterans, and current and future social security costs will all require substantial revenues. A federal program of aid to public schools much more extensive than anything proposed up to this time is urgently needed. Provision for health services and adequate housing will require government aid. It is probable, too, that our assumption of increased international obligations may involve us in additional financial commitments before any degree of economic stability abroad is assured. Finally, with the prospect of wage and price levels higher than those prevailing before the war, it is reasonable to assume that the ordinary services of the federal government will cost considerably more than they did in the pre-war years.

Added together, all these factors point to the need for keeping federal revenue at a level sufficiently high to meet the foregoing requirements during the immediately foreseeable future. The tax structure therefore in our opinion should balance the budget and yield substantial surpluses during periods of high employment. Looking ahead, however, we all recognize that certain modifications in the tax structure may be made that will contribute much toward determining the degree of prosperity we maintain.

Any and all such modifications in the federal tax structure should be made with the following objectives in mind:

1. The proposed taxes should be adequate to provide for necessary services and to maintain the federal credit.
2. The proposed taxes should be equitable, increasing progressively as individual income increases with due regard for the necessity of exempting the incomes of those at below minimum-subsistence levels.

3. The proposed taxes should operate so as to keep the buying power of consumers at the highest possible level, so that production and employment may be maintained.
4. The proposed taxes should not combine with other economic measures to depress or retard the development of any area, or place it at an economic disadvantage in relation to other areas.

In line with these objectives, we believe future federal tax programs should be based on the following considerations:

Personal income taxes must provide the bulk of revenue; excise taxes should be reduced; taxes on consumption should be opposed; revenue from business profits should be maintained; social security income and expenditures should be segregated from the remainder of the federal budget; estate and gift taxes should be re-studied with a view to increasing revenues; there should be integration of federal-state tax policies.

Excise Taxes—(1947, p. 264) As total revenue needs will permit we urge the repeal of all excise taxes except those on liquor, tobacco, and gasoline (providing income from gasoline tax is needed and used for highway developments). These reductions in excise taxes which should be second in priority to income tax reduction for those at below subsistence level income, would mean tax savings of approximately $3.3 billion dollars based on excise tax revenue estimates for 1947. Approximately $4.4 billion dollars in revenue from excise taxes on liquor, tobacco, and gasoline would then continue to accrue at present levels of income and spending. Rates on liquor and gasoline should also be reduced to the pre-war level as federal revenue needs permit. The new excise taxes levied during the war were for the most part levied on commodities and services which in ordinary times must be regarded as essential to the proper functioning of our economy. Heavy taxes on telegraph and telephone service, passenger fares, transportation of goods and many other services and commodities, however justified they may be in time of national emergency as contributing to the conservation of manpower and necessary materials can be regarded only as discriminatory in normal times. Their perpetuation results only in an inequitable distribution of a hidden tax burden. Removal of these war-time taxes would result in a substantial decrease in the tax load on low and medium incomes which would contribute considerably to the establishment of a healthy post-war economy.

(1949, pp. 240, 476) Reference to the enactment of a sales tax in the District of Columbia in the face of overwhelming evidence that it was not necessary, in the legislative section of the Council's Report underscores the importance of the recommendation Taxation.

The Executive Council's reference to the continued need for close integration of the federal, state and local tax systems is particularly timely. Cities, in addition to paying high local taxes, continue to bear the major part of state tax burdens; they also continue to receive a disproportionately small portion of state and federal aid. The consequence is our cities are having increasing difficulty in supporting their own long-deferred means for capital improvements and services because of the combined burden of local, state and federal taxes which in so many respects discriminates in favor of taxpayers in small towns and rural areas. Tax competition between states and between communities within states continues to provide further reason for an integration of federal, state and local tax systems as proposed by the Executive Council. Your committee recommends careful study of this section of the Executive Council's report by every delegate.

The statement of the Executive Council that gains to workers in bargaining for wages or in price reductions may be lost if unwise tax policies are adopted certainly has been borne out by the experience during the past four years. Your committee heartily endorses the recommendation of the Council that all affiliated bodies actively oppose proposals to continue or enact taxes on pay rolls, amusements, sales, etc., and initiate and support progressive programs based on the ability-to-pay principle.

(Cooking and Heating Equipment) — (Pp. 67, 494) Removal of the excise tax on heating and cooking equipment was sought through Res. 88 as follows:

Whereas—There has been a considerable slump in the sales of cooking and heating equipment, and

Whereas—The thousands of people employed in the industries which manufacture this cooking and heating equipment have been either layed off, or the time employed has been reduced to such an extent that they are unable to earn a living for themselves and families, and

Whereas—The purchase price of this equipment has increased because of the increase in manufacturing costs and taxes, to such an extent that the average citizen is unable to pay the sale price, and

Whereas—The removal of the excise tax would bring about a reduction in these prices and would be an inducement to the public to buy cooking and heating equipment, and thereby furnish employment to the thousands of unemployed and short-time workers in this industry, and

Whereas—The manufacturers have reduced the prices to the limit, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor call upon the United States Government to remove the excise tax from the cooking and heating equipment, which is a necessity and not a luxury, and would also be an inducement to the public to buy said equipment, thereby giving steadier employment to the workers of that industry and thereby reduce the number drawing unemployment compensation, and helping the unemployment situation in general.

Referred to Tax Committee, A. F. of L.

(Pp. 317, 494) A. F. of L. requested to call upon the President of the United States and Congress to remove all excise taxes. (Res. 98.)

Referred to Tax Committee.

(Distilled Spirits) — (Pp. 345, 392) Res. 125 requested the A. F. of L. to instruct its legislative representatives and E.C. to use every effort to secure enactment of proposed legislation to permit collection of the Federal excise tax on distilled spirits after rectification and bottling processes at the time of shipment. Such legislation would stimulate employment of members of Distillery, Rectifying and Wine Workers International Union and other unions employed in the industry, and thereby promote a sustained purchasing power in many communities throughout the country.

The convention committee made the following recommendation which was unanimously approved:

It is the policy of the American Federation of Labor and its officers to render aid to every affiliated group where such aid is not inconsistent with the policies of the Federation. In line with this policy, the Committee recommends that Resolution No. 125 be referred to the Executive Council for study and appropriate action.

Handbags, Luggage and Leather)—(Pp. 341, 494) Res. 113 sought support of the A. F. of L. for the campaign of international union concerned, for the elimination of wartime excise tax on luggage and handbags. Referred to Tax Committee.

(1951, pp. 279, 551) Res. 15 proposed that support be given to the efforts of the Handbag, Luggage, Belt and Novelty Workers Union to secure repeal of excise tax on products on which their workers are employed. Convention expressed sympathy with the purposes and objectives of the resolution and referred it to the Tax Committee for consideration.

(1953, p. 407) Res. 41 called upon the A. F. of L. to seek the removal of excise tax on personal luggage such as ladies' handbags, luggage, belts and novelties. The convention expressed sympathy with the resolution and referred the subject matter to the Tax Committee and be given every possible aid.

(Integration of Federal-State Tax Policies)—(1947, p. 265) We would point out in conclusion, that the present high level of federal tax revenue emphasizes the need for serious consideration and action on studies that have been made carrying recommendation for integrating Federal and State policies and programs in certain fields. Such integration could result in eliminating much needless overlapping and duplication, would make for a high degree of progression, and could do much to eliminate conflicts among states, and between states and the Federal Government, in the tax field.

(P. 624) The problems of the workers in connection with the several areas of taxation were covered in the E.C. Report and in Resolutions 38, 123 and 142. The convention committee made the following recommendations which were unanimously adopted:

Your committee recommends that Central Labor Bodies, State Federations of Labor, and all International Officers give increasing attention to the need for developing an informed and active membership to promote the adoption of sound programs of taxation at the local, state and national levels. Informed members of organized labor know that tax revenue requirements will continue at a high level for the indefinite future. This question, then, is one just as important as the question affecting wages and prices. The problem is how will high tax revenues be raised in the most equitable manner with a minimum of disturbance to our economy?

It is the recommendation of your committee, therefore, that the Committee on Taxation, A. F. of L., should increase its efforts to bring timely and pertinent information regarding issues and developments in the field of taxation to the attention of all A. F. of L. affiliates, so that the necessary program of education may be carried on more effectively.

The resolutions were referred to the permanent Committee on Taxation of the A. F. of L.

(Business Profits Tax) — (P. 265) In considering future tax measures as they apply to business it should be borne in mind that business has been relieved of a considerable tax burden much sooner after the cessation of hostilities than many economists thought advisable. In the face of a definitely favorable post war market for both durable and non-durable goods, the removal of price controls combined with the repeal of the excess profits tax and reduction in the surtax rate contributed considerably to bringing about the inflationary conditions now prevailing. Discussions of further reduction in corporate tax rates at this time we consider premature and ill-advised.

(Estate and Gift Taxes)—(P. 265)

Present estate and gift tax schedules and laws should be restudied with a view to increasing revenues. Loopholes made possible by the creation of trusts, gifts, and powers of appointment should be closed.

(Consumption Taxes) — (P. 264) During the war many state and local governments accumulated surpluses because of inability to secure needed materials and personnel. These surpluses are being rapidly exhausted and in a great many instances increased taxes and new taxes have been levied to take care of servicemen's bonuses and accumulated building, material, and personnel needs.

Unfortunately these new and increased taxes levied by state and local governments have in many instances taken the form of sales taxes, cigarette taxes, and other taxes that still further increase the load of taxes on consumption levied at the local, state, and national level. Approximately 29 percent of the $48 billion in taxes collected by all levels of government are currently being derived from taxes on sales. State federations and local central bodies should vigorously oppose current campaigns that are being waged to decrease federal and state personal and business income taxes based on ability to pay, thereby throwing the burden for necessary governmental support increasingly on sales, excise, and nuisance taxes which are most burdensome to taxpayers in the lower income groups.

Efforts in industrial communities to shift the tax burden from property to consumption taxes should likewise be resisted.

(Multiple, Government Employees) (P. 542) Res. No. 170:

Whereas—There is an increase in the number of taxes Government employees are being forced to pay, and

Whereas — Certain municipalities, notably Philadelphia, have imposed so-called wage taxes, the burden of which, particularly during wartime, has fallen heavily upon Government employees in those cities, and

Whereas — Government employees have been given no choice in the matter when their jobs have been sent to other cities under decentralization programs and are forced to abandon their homes or lose their jobs, and

Whereas — Government employees, as result, have found themselves beset with tax systems not of their own choosing, and

Whereas—The United States Government, including the Congress, has not provided any relief against multiple taxation against its own employees, and

Whereas — The purpose of the O'Hara bill which would have brought some relief against such oppressive taxation was denied final passage in the Congress, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor now records its unreserved approval of passage of a bill similar to the O'Hara bill (H.R. 127) and gives unstinting support to the efforts of the Government Employees Council of the American Federation of Labor in an effort to remove existing tax abuses.

This resolution calls for relief against multiple income taxation of Government employees and asks support of the American Federation of Labor by legislation to remove existing tax abuses.

(1948, p. 141) The E.C. reiterated the recommendations of the 1947 convention and emphasized that in tax reduction proposals the tax burden should be lightened on those in the low income groups.

(P. 420) Convention adopted committee report as follows:

The Executive Council's report points out that the bulk of the $5 billion in tax savings approved by the 80th Congress over the President's veto accrued to taxpayers in the income groups above $3,000. The Executive Council reiterates its recommendation that the tax burden of those in the low income groups should be lightened in future tax reduction measures that may be adopted. We do not believe this point can be too strongly stressed because increasing tendencies of local and state governments to adopt new and heavier sales, payroll, and excise taxes, combined with continued heavy dependence of the Federal Government on excise taxes means that more and more of the tax burden is being shifted to the low income groups. These are the groups already burdened by increased prices. Further burdens on these people imperil economic stability through inadequate purchasing power.

We know that the national budget will be increased in the coming years by expenditures for national security. The tactics and policies of the U.S.S.R. has greatly increased costs of occupation in Central Europe and has necessitated rearming for national defense.

In planning for increased revenues we urge that no additional taxes be placed on the low income categories until other groups have been increased proportionately up to the point of correcting the unfair discrimination against the low income groups.

Amusement—(P. 415) The impact of the federal tax on amusements was presented to the convention through Res. 141 as follows:

Whereas—The Federal Amusement Admission Tax of twenty (20%) per cent constitutes an enormous burden and detriment to the purchase of tickets for admission to all phases of amusement, including motion picture houses, theatres, night clubs, concert halls, opera and ballet presentations, and

Whereas—Such burden has been reflected in the decreasing employment available for performing artists and technicians in such field, and

Whereas—The earning capacity of such artists and technicians as described above has consequently substantially decreased, and

Whereas—There is grave danger that such trend will increase, and

Whereas—The largest percentage of all employed in such entertainment and cultural activities of performing, talent and technicians are members of unions affiliated with the A. F. of L., and

Whereas—The impact of substantially decreased gross receipts has gravely endangered the continued existence and operation of all of the cultural centers of the United States, such as the Metropolitan Opera House, The Philadelphia and Philharmonic Symphony orchestras, and many others, and

Whereas—Relief particularly must be obtained to permit these cultural non-profit organizations to continue so that such activities may enrich the educational and cultural life of the country, and

Whereas—It is the intent of the American people to create and foster in the United States these cultural activities so as to place the United States in the forefront of the nations of the world in this field, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention go on record as favoring the elimination or reduction of the Federal Amusement Admission Tax, and be it further

Resolved—That the Federal Amusement Admission Tax be eliminated entirely with respect to cultural activities conducted and fostered by non-profit organizations, thereby restoring to these organizations their pre-war tax status and reaffirming the government's prewar policy of granting such organizations exemption from the Admission Tax.

(P. 471) Resolution referred to the A. F. of L. committee with statement that the committee is "wholeheartedly in favor of the objectives outlined in the resolution."

(Cabaret) — (Pp. 30, 475) — Res. 27 called attention to unemployment problem resulting from cabaret tax which had been imposed as a wartime measure, and proposed repeal of the tax. The convention referred the resolution to the A. F. of L. Tax Committee.

(1952, pp. 57, 473) Res. 97 called attention to the depression in theatre and amusement industry due at least in part to the amusement tax, and sought repeal of the tax. Convention referred the resolution to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

Whereas—Proposed tax conventions between the United States and certain foreign countries to eliminate double taxation on income earned by a citizen of one country who works for a limited period in another country are awaiting ratification by the United States Senate, and

Whereas—Some of these proposed agreements contain a discriminatory provision whereby one class of citizens, namely, public entertainers such as stage, motion picture or radio artists, musicians and athletes, are expressly banned from receiving the benefits of elimination of double taxation which the proposed tax conventions extend to other classes of citizens, and

Whereas—On protests made by the Associated Actors and Artists of America and its branches, Screen Actors Guild, Actors' Equity Association, American Federation of Radio Artists and American Guild of Musical Artists, all affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, this unfair discrimination against professional entertainers as one class of citizens was removed from the tax convention between the United States and Great Britain, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, does hereby protest a new attempt to discriminate against the 60,000 professional performers in the United States all of whom are members of the American Federation of Labor, and does hereby request that the United States Senate delete from all proposed tax conventions the discriminatory clause which seeks to deprive professional performers of the benefit of elimination of double taxation accorded to other citizens.

Luxury Tax—(1948, pp. 237, 458) Res. 16 opposed the continued luxury tax on baby necessities, such as baby powder, baby creams and oils.

(1952, pp. 58, 474) Res. 99 called for the elimination of luxury taxes on necessities, such as hearing aids, etc. The subject was referred to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(1949, p. 242) Unfortunately, from the point of view of those interested in sound tax policy, a much smaller percentage of this larger amount of revenue is now being collected from taxes based on the ability to pay. To the extent this is so, it is clear that by heavier taxation on low income groups we are cutting into much needed purchasing power and inviting unemployment and depression.

It should be noted, too, that during the past year large sections of the membership of organized labor have registered protests against Federal excise taxes. These taxes imposed during the war on amusements, transportation, telephone, cosmetics, leather goods, jewelry, etc., have undoubtedly contributed to unemployment of our members, because of curtailed demand for goods and services to which they apply. When enacted, Congress referred to these excise taxes as temporary war emergency measures; its continued failure to reduce or modify them constitutes a breach of faith with the American people.

An overall approach to tax needs is still lacking. Competition in the tax field between the various units of government continues unchecked. Coordination of tax policy is sorely needed to eliminate continued overlapping, competition, and confusion. It is no less important because greater cooperation in developing Federal, state, and local taxation and spending policies would do much to contribute to economic stability.

Moreover, if the need for revenue at the present high level continues, it is apparent that reductions in excise and other taxes on consumers must be accompanied by increases in taxes on income, corporation profits, inheritance and gifts, so that the proportion of overall revenue accruing from progressive taxes will show a substantial increase.

Since it is obvious that gains to workers in bargaining or through price reductions may be lost if unwise tax policies are adopted, it is urged all affiliated bodies actively support sound tax programs. Regressive and unsound programs calling for heavier taxes on payrolls, amusements, sales, etc., should be opposed; sound, progressive tax programs based on the ability to pay should be initiated and supported.

(1950, p. 149) Developments in Korea since July 1, which have led to requests by President Truman for a considerable increase in Federal expenditures, have been reflected in proposals for additional tax revenue. Specifically, President Truman has suggested that the revenue needs now require that the proposed reduction in excise taxes be eliminated, that the corporation income tax be increased to 45%, and that rates on personal income be restored to a level between those in effect in 1944, and those established by the Revenue Revision of 1945.

The American Federation of Labor has supported the President in his request for increased taxes. However, it believes the specific proposals made by the President for increasing Federal revenues are not equitable nor adequate at this time. His proposal to defer excise tax cuts may be necessary at present. However, his further proposal that corporation income tax rates be increased to 45% will probably serve to give an impetus to price rises, rather than to check them, as would an excess profits tax. . . .

Whatever action of an emergency nature may be taken before adjournment of the 81st Congress, the American Federation of Labor will continue to work for a constructive tax program directed at providing necessary revenue based on equality of sacrifice in the present period of emergency and after.

(P. 492) In line with the President's request to raise revenues in view of the new expenditures required by the crisis in international affairs, the Senate Finance Committee found it necessary to convert the excise tax reduction bill passed by the House in June of this year into a bill to raise revenues. The bill as amended by the Committee and passed by the Senate on September 1st will increase tax liabilities by four and one-half billion dollars a year when fully effective, and will increase collections in the fiscal year of 1951 by about three billion dollars.

The bill (H.R. 8920) includes many of the loophole closing measures, and minor excise tax increases contained in the House bill, and extends the 10 percent tax on radio receivers to television sets. The House plan to accelerate corporate income tax payments is also retained. However, the bulk of the additional revenue provided under the bill will come from the imposition of higher corporate and individual income tax rates. The top corporate income tax rate is raised from 38 to 45 percent. The percentage reduction in the wartime income taxes, made by the Revenue Acts of 1945 and 1948, are eliminated, increasing the effective starting rate from 16.6 to 20%, and the top rate from about 82 to 91%. The full increase in both corporate and individual rates will be effective in 1951 and subsequent years. The corporate income tax increase applies to approximately one-half, and the individual income tax increase to about one-fourth of the income for the calendar year 1950.

In terms of the effect of the two bills on tax liabilities, there are three major variations. First, the House bill provides for a net excise tax reduction of $910 million, while the Senate bill increases excise tax liabilities by $55 million. Second, the Senate bill increases tax liabilities under the individual income tax by $2,745 million, while the House bill made no change in this tax. Third, the Senate bill increases corporation income tax rates by $1,500 million, while the House bill would have increased these liabilities by only $450 million. On the other hand, the Senate bill does not contain all of the House loophole closing and tax adjustment provisions which would raise revenue. In terms of revenue the two most important such items, which are included in the House bill but not in the Senate bill, relate to withholding on dividends and lower interest rates on tax refunds. In other words, the Senate proposals widen existing tax loopholes and create new possibilities of evasion.

The American Federation of Labor strongly opposed the action taken by the Senate and sent a wire to all members of the Senate Finance Committee and House Ways and Means Committee in which we set forth the following objections: 1. Failure to include percentage withholding corporation dividends means unnecessary loss of revenue. 2. Easing of family partnership provisions are undefensible liberalization of stock option. 3. Corporation reorganization and personal holding company provision absolutely unjustified. 4. Failure to take action to recapture hundreds of millions in revenue lost through depletion allowances and to strengthen ineffective provisions of estate and gift taxes seems to constitute neglect in period when all possible revenue is needed. 5. Failure to exact excess profits tax and make equitable adjustment in personal income tax rates is regretted.

We urged the members of the Committee to reconsider their action and to replace the Senate proposals by a tax policy geared to the current economic needs.

A movement in the House to block sending the bill to conference until an excise profits tax was added was made by Congressman Eberharther of Pennsylvania and Congressman Young of Ohio. However, the House Rules Committee on September 13 reported out a rule to send the bill to conference. On September 14, the House by a vote of 225 to 106 insisted upon consideration of an excise profits tax when the present tax bill was taken up in conference.

The House also voted 331 to 2 in favor of putting into effect an excise profits tax on corporations this year. This action puts the House on record as favoring the adoption of such a tax during this session.

The House and Senate conferees finished their report in time for the House and Senate to consider it yesterday.

They agreed to an increase of $2,700,000,000 in individual income taxes and $1,500,000,000 in regular corporation taxes. Individual income taxes are increased from 15% to 18% effective October 1, 1950. The tax bill has been passed by both houses and sent to the President.

The conferees also agreed to consider increasing excess profits taxes on businesses when Congress resumes either after the November elections or in the Eighty-Second Congress in January 1951, and it will be retroactive.

The Committee on Legislation recommends that the Convention concur in the position taken by the Executive Council in recommending that an increased portion of the tax burden be derived from excess profits taxes. In view of greatly increased price levels, the committee further recommends that the Executive Council be instructed to continue pressing for downward adjustments in individual income tax rates, not only on net incomes below $2,000 but for net incomes on up to $5,000.

(P. 281) For several years past Labor has had much reason to be concerned by the increasing tendency of the federal, state, and local governments to depend more and more on regressive taxes. This tendency was particularly regrettable because in 1945 the proportion of the overall tax income derived from progressive taxes, based on ability to pay, had reached a high point.

Two successive tax cuts made by Congress since 1945 concentrated reductions in the income, estate and gift tax fields. These reductions resulting in a decline in revenue from personal and business taxes have made for heavier dependence on excise taxes which, enacted as war emergency measures, have seriously curtailed the purchasing power of large sections of the American people. States and local municipalities facing accumulated needs for service and capital improvements have also relied more and more on consumption taxes. During the present year a number of states have authorized cities to impose additional local taxes. In most instances these taxes take the form of sales and use taxes which still further increase the burden on consumers.

The serious nature of this situation in relation to the economic health of our nation may be realized from the fact that in 1948 over 16 million Americans belonged to family units with annual income below $1,000 yearly; over 20 million belonged to family units with annual income between $1,000 and $2,000 yearly; and 28 million belonged to family units with annual income of between $2,000 and $3,000. These statistics indicate that 64 million Americans or 45% of our population belong to family units with less than $3,000 in annual income in a year when $3,000 is worth approximately $1,800 in term of pre-war purchasing power. It is clear that to the extent that taxes on consumers, both hidden and open, eat into the purchasing power of these Americans, just to that extent their standards of living are undermined.

Realization that considerations of equity as well as the long term economic health of the nation require substantial reductions in the tax burden on consumers has motivated the American Federation of Labor during the past five years in its insistence that the federal government take the lead in substantially reducing or eliminating the war emergency imposed excise taxes.

The prospect of recurring deficits in the Federal budget resulting from the continued high level of Federal expenditures and the tax reduction measures so prematurely and ill-advisedly adopted by the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses has complicated the federal tax picture. As a consequence the American Federation of Labor has wholeheartedly endorsed President Truman's proposal to the Eighty-first Congress, that any revenue losses resulting from reductions in excise taxes should be made up by amending income and estate gift tax laws so as to plug up existing loopholes and secure new revenue.

The American Federation of Labor, therefore, has supported the tax revision program recommended by President Truman and the Treasury, believing that the long overdue reductions in excise taxes should be accompanied by upward revision and integration of estate and gift tax schedules, elimination of depletion allowances, and cancellation of unfair tax advantages enjoyed by certain classes of individual and corporate taxpayers.

It should be noted that an overall approach to tax needs is still lacking. The serious consequences of the lack of coordination of tax policy between the various units of government is not sufficiently appreciated. However, it should be obvious that if reduction of federal excise taxes is used as the occasion for wide and indiscriminate adoption of additional sales and excise taxes at the local and state levels little or no benefits will accrue to consumers. Indeed, the addition of county and city taxes on consumers to already burdensome state sales and excise taxes is an increasingly serious problem. It should be clear that taxation of income and profits are just as important to the support of local and state governmental services as they are to the support of the Federal government.

The need for continued active concern of Labor in the adoption of sound tax policies cannot be overemphasized. All affiliated bodies are urged to continue opposition to regressive and unsound programs calling for taxes on payrolls, amusements, sales, etc. Sound progressive programs based on the ability to pay should be initiated and supported.

(Pp. 43, 483) Res. 61:

Whereas—Our country is involved in a war with Red Korean forces, which many informed persons believe will lead to World War III, and

Whereas—It is imperative that each and every American contribute to the utmost of his ability in matters of services and finances, and

Whereas—In the past many serving in the armed forces have actually suffered a reduction in income to serve their country, in addition to loss of life, personal injury and misery of family separation while many large companies, firms, corporations and individuals have actually made millions because of such wars, and

Whereas—In time of war all loyal Americans should have no desire to better themselves financially, as all finances possible should be channeled into our Government's treasury to the end that such conflict may be speedily won by our country with the least possible debt, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled does hereby urge the United States Congress to immediately enact such excess tax law to be used when our country is in a state of war, such law to declare as war excess taxes all earnings above $6,000.00 per year for any individual without dependents, to further declare as war excess taxes all incomes above $12,000.00 per year for persons with dependents, whether the earnings are made jointly or individually, and be it further

Resolved—That such war excess tax law be intended to cover the profits of any firm, partnership, company, business or corporation whereby 80% of such profits will be declared as war excess tax to be used by our Government to carry on such war.

Referred by the convention to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(Excess Profits) — (p. 149) The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor strongly endorses adoption of an excess profits tax as the best means of avoiding price increases with the probable resulting necessity of adopting price controls, rationing, and other forms of regulation.

(P. 493) The Committee on Legislation recommends that the Convention concur in the position taken by the Executive Council in recommending that an increased portion of the tax burden be derived from excess profits taxes. In view of greatly increased price levels, the committee further recommends that the Executive Council be instructed to continue pressing for downward adjustments in individual income tax rates, not only on net incomes below $2,000 but for net incomes on up to $5,000.

(P. 458) The account in the legislative developments in the tax field during the past year and the conclusion of the Executive Council that an increasing proportion of the tax burden has been borne by workers in the lower income groups as a result of action taken by Congress since World War II should be a matter of real concern to all members of organized labor.

It is generally agreed that further inflation should be checked. To this end any and all sound measures that will check unnecessary consumption of strategic materials and commodities should be adopted. However, the Executive Council quite correctly points out that adoption of a tax policy that undermines the living standards of low income workers is neither necessary nor in line with such an objective.

We therefore commend the Executive Council for its vigorous support of the principle that net income up to $2,000 should be taxed at lower rates than those now in effect. The further proposal that any resulting loss of revenue should be made up by slight upward adjustments on higher bracket income is both equitable and practical.

Your Committee urges that during the next year a particular effort be put forth in the A. F. of L. publications, and by the labor press generally, to acquaint members with the position of the Federation on current tax issues and on its long-term tax program. It is essential that more of our members realize that the same forces—represented by the same Senators and Congressmen—which support anti-labor and anti-public measures, line up with equal zeal behind regressive, uneconomic and inequitable tax measures.

(1951, p. 198) The Executive Council submitted a comprehensive report on the national tax program and proposals in Congress to raise taxes to the point where it was calculated that one-third of the 1952 national income would be required to finance defense spending and the ordinary operations of government at the federal, state and local levels. The following excerpts from the E.C. report are of special importance to persons in the lower income brackets:

Serious question is being raised as to whether our American economy can stand such a drain on its resources.

... The answer seems to be that if we wish to maintain our free institutions we must devise ways and means of bearing the burden. However, it is obvious that to the extent an undue share of that burden is thrown on any one section of our people, the defense program and the economy may be weakened.

The inequities and discriminations at present operating against those in the low-income groups in the general economic field are becoming increasingly evident in the tax field. For six years the American Federation of Labor has repeatedly warned of the danger of the increasing dependence on sales and excise taxes, both by the state and federal governments. It urged Congress to keep faith with the American people by removing war emergency imposed excise taxes as it had undertaken to do when they were enacted. The failure of Congress to do this has without question meant that the more than $5 billion yearly increase in sales and excise tax collections by the federal and state governments have contributed substantially to the rise in the cost of living.

The result of excessive dependence on taxes on consumers, combined with the several ill-advised tax reductions made by Congress in the period following the war up to 1950 has been that increasingly a larger proportion of the tax burden has been thrown on those in the low income groups. . . .

Later in the report statistics are cited which show that the 53 per cent of the American families with income below $3,000 are not responsible for what might be termed inflationary spending. Such statistics reinforce the contention of the American Federation of Labor that while excise and sales taxes do cut into the living standards of low income workers, they do not effectively brake the spending of those with excess purchasing power. . . .

The facts cited constitute the basis for the American Federation of Labor insistence that current economic conditions underscore the need for concentrating any proposed increased taxes in higher personal income tax rates for middle and upper income group taxpayers and increased corporation profits taxes. In the latter connection, it should be pointed out that in the event the increases in corporation taxes proposed by the Treasury are adopted, it is estimated corporation net incomes after taxes will still be somewhat higher than average yearly net profits for the four years 1946-1949 inclusive. . . .

The American Federation of Labor is continuing to stress the responsibility of the Federal Government for using its greater taxing power to enable states and local units to provide services more adequately and with a greater degree of equity than they are now being provided. We do not believe the Federal Government has paid due regard to the revenue needs of the states and local governments in the shaping of its tax policy.

The Federation recognizes the need for financing the defense program at home and abroad through the machinery of the Federal Government. We have the human and material resources to finance necessary services at home which are not a whit less essential to that defense. Sound economy as well as equity would seem to require that such services should be supported by a progressive tax system. To this end, we are continuing to urge that studies of a practical nature be initiated that will be directed at eliminating existing competition among units of government and between the several levels of government in the tax field.

(P. 538) Legislative developments as well as prospective developments in the tax field at all levels of government are, in the opinion of your committee, inadequate and increasingly inequitable. We agree with the conclusion of the Executive Council that to the extent an undue share of the prospective tax payments of $86 billion in 1952—one-third of the income estimated for the year—is thrown on one section of our people, the defense program and the national economy may be weakened.

Members of your committee believe that the warning of the Executive Council that inequities and discriminations operating against those in the low-income groups in the economic field generally, are becoming increasingly evident in the tax field, is timely. Statistics are cited showing that the great majority of American families with incomes of $3,000 yearly or less are already overburdened by the increased cost of living in the present level of taxes.

It should be recognized too, that those in the lower income brackets are only to a very small degree responsible for inflationary spending. In millions of instances they are living at below the levels of decency. These facts reinforce the A. F. of L. contention that there should be no increases in excise taxes at the Federal level and that increases in the personal income tax should not be made on those in the lowest income brackets.

The Executive Council's report shows that state and local governments are coming to rely more and more on regressive sales and excise taxes for revenue. This tendency throws more and more of the tax burden on those in the lower income groups. The serious nature of this problem may be appreciated by reference to the study cited by the council which shows that those in the income bracket below $1,000 pay 10 per cent of their income in taxes to local and state governments while those in the brackets above $7,500 pay only 5.5 per cent of their income to those units of government. All affiliated organizations are urged to continue their opposition to increases or extensions of all types of regressive taxation.

A detailed reference to the A. F. of L. position on tax legislation adopted during the past year by Congress as well as on the legislation now pending will be found in the Executive Council's Report. Delegates should note that the A. F. of L. has emphatically protested the levying of any additional excise taxes at this time; has supported the Treasury's proposal for further increases in corporation taxes, and has urged that major increases in the personal income tax rates should be mainly concentrated on those in the income level of above $5,000.

Delegates should note that the A. F. of L. has repeatedly pointed out that needed revenue could be secured through enactment of measures to recapture revenue losses due to operation of the split income provision under which married couples, particularly in the income groups between $7,000 and $100,000, are enjoying tax savings of $2.5 billion yearly. Effective revision of the estate and gift tax laws would add substantially to current revenues. We have also urged the closing of specific loopholes which permit the evasion of millions of additional revenue that is not being collected under present laws.

Committee members note with approval the reference in the Executive Council's report to the drive to defeat the campaign to limit federally collected income taxes to 25 per cent of income. This campaign should be continued and the state federations which have been responsible for the action formerly taken on this measure, which has been termed the "Millionaire's Amendment," should be commended.

Your committee also recommends that the problem of taxation of annuities and pensions be taken up by the A. F. of L. Permanent Committee on Taxation for study and recommendation.

(Pp. 281, 538) Res. 19 points out enormous profits being derived by big business while workers are being forced to submit to a wage freeze, higher prices, higher rents, increasing tax deductions and sales tax on the necessities of life. Called upon the A. F. of L. to oppose any program of taxing those least able to pay, whether it be in direct payroll deductions, sales taxes, excise taxes or any other device for adding tax burdens upon those in the lower income brackets.

Referred to Committee on Taxation for consideration and disposition.

(Government Held Property) — (1951, p. 274) Res. 4:

Whereas—On December 30, 1949, the Boeing-Renton Airplane Manufacturing plant and the new Pacific Car & Foundry Company were transferred from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to fee title in the U.S. Government, as record title owner, also personal property within said plants, thereby removing said property from the tax rolls, resulting in loss of tax revenues to the City of Renton alone of approximately $104,000.00 during the year 1951 and a similar amount annually; same being the largest tax-yielding properties in said City of Renton, occupying several acres of said city and containing structures suitable for and used for manufacturing and business purposes for which the government leases same and receives revenues and rentals therefrom, and

Whereas—The U.S. Government has heretofore followed and established a policy of paying to local taxing districts payments in lieu of taxes, in respect to properties therein which yield the government income; and the loss of above and similar properties from tax rolls imposes a correspondingly heavier tax burden upon the residents and private taxpayers of said city; and a like situation prevails in other areas of the U.S., therefore, be it

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled that it is the consensus of this body, representing the wage earners and taxpayers of this country, that the nature of the above-mentioned plants and similar properties, and the revenue-producing character thereof, make it only fair and proper that the US Government should take necessary steps or essential measures to provide reimbursements or payments in lieu of taxes for said properties to the cities or local taxing districts concerned, and be it further ation described above, where unfair tax burdens and hardships are being imposed on the taxpaying residents, the majority of whom are working people and members of organized labor, be immediately and emphatically brought to the attention of the proper officials of the U.S. Government and to the members of the Congress with the request that necessary action be taken to remedy this situation and bring such properties within the generally understood government policy of paying to the local taxing districts payments in lieu of taxes upon income-producing government properties.

(P. 548) Your committee is in sympathy with the resolution and recommends that it be referred to the Tax Committee. Your committee further recommends that the Executive Council consider and act upon whatever report or recommendation is made by the Tax Committee.

(1952, p. 202) The annual report of the Executive Council on the subject of taxation took cognizance of the need of our government for defense and non-defense spending; the retention of certain "war emergency" excise taxes and high personal income tax rates which resulted in a lowering of living standards for those in low income brackets affecting millions of American citizens; the efforts of certain high-income groups to secure privileges, etc. The Executive Council report recommended in part:

Government expenditures should be reduced as our international commitments and the needs of the defense program permit. As expenditures are reduced, every effort should be made to achieve a budgetary surplus, particularly during any continuing periods of high prosperity and employment. If and when tax reductions are made, they should be carefully considered in terms of their impact on the economy. Indiscriminate and ill-considered tax reduction during the twenties was a contributory factor to the depression of the thirties just as reductions between the close of World War II and 1950 have been a major contributory factor to current inflation.

Any further changes in federal tax programs should take into account the fact that a combination of ever increasing costs and need for services is making the financing of state and local governmental services more difficult. Excessive dependence of states and local governments on various forms of regressive taxes combine with federal excise taxes to constitute a significant inflationary factor at the present time. Continued major dependence on regressive taxes will find many states and localities unable to provide needed services at a time when federal spending declines. Sales taxes and various forms of excise taxes at the local, state, and federal level now provide close to $16 billion in revenue yearly. Of this total, federal excise taxes account for close to $10 billion. Because of the fact that these taxes in many cases appear with a considerable mark-up in the final pricing of goods, consumers actually are paying considerably more than the amount collected by the government in taxes.

If and when cuts are made in federal taxes, therefore, highest priority should be given to reductions in excise taxes. Next in priority should come recognition of the fact that the present $600 exemption is inadequate for low income taxpayers. Certainly the need for a tax rebate or tax credit to take into account the injustice of taxing a worker at the 75 cent minimum hourly wage at an income tax rate in excess of 20 per cent on a considerable portion of his income should be apparent. Not only equity but the future health of the economy demands that excise taxes at the federal level and excessive taxation of low bracket incomes should be eliminated as soon as possible. . . .

In spite of the high level of federal expenditures and the many inflationary factors which continue to exist, the representatives of certain business and taxpayers organizations continue to agitate for immediate reductions in personal and corporate income tax rates. This agitation is evident in moves to impose overall limits on income tax rates, in efforts to adopt arbitrary budget limitations, and in campaigns to increase and extend regressive tax measures at the local and state levels as well as at the federal level.

The overall tax load is high; an abnormally large percentage of the national income is being devoted to the support of government services. However, real national income is increasing year by year; investment in capital plant is continuing at high levels; personal savings in 1951 were in excess of $18 billion, more than double the average amount of personal savings for the five years 1945-50. Taking all these facts into account it cannot be said that the taxes for fiscal 1952 operated to restrict economic development unduly, taking into account that tremendous strides were made in speeding up defense production.

It should be pointed out, however, that while the overall operation of the tax program may not be unduly restrictive, certain aspects of it may be undesirable. There is no doubt, for example, that taxpayers on pensions and those on low fixed income have had their living standards considerably lowered by a combination of high prices and high taxes. The ever increasing tendency of states and local governments to throw a disproportionate share of the burden of governmental support on low income taxpayers increases the serious nature of the problem.

Future tax adjustments should take these problems into account as well as recognize the fact that the existing tax structure favors certain groups of taxpayers unduly. Unless we have more effective laws governing capital gains, estates and gifts, partnerships and over-liberal depletion allowances, concentration of economic power will be intensified. The approval of the split income provision by Congress eliminated elements of equity that continued to inhere in our dependency allowance exemptions. It also established different categories of taxpayers to which the income tax rate schedule applied with varying impact favoring wealthier couples in the income brackets above $5,000 yearly.

These problems as well as the necessity for rationalizing the relationship between local, state and federal revenue system deserve the continued attention of labor representatives.

(P. 408) The convention unanimously approved the following committee report:

Spokesmen for many special interest groups while tacitly admitting the need for the present high level of government spending, publicly indulge in violent criticism of the high taxes necessary to finance that spending.

The American Federation of Labor has supported reasonable economies in all areas of government spending. However, the Federation recognizes that expenditures for defense constitute the most necessary and economical form of assurance that our democratic institutions may expand and flourish. We recognize that the cost of this assurance when translated into taxes constitutes a severe burden on many of our citizens; we feel this burden is a particular hardship for low paid workers and millions of Americans on fixed incomes and that many aspects of the revenues system stress it has placed on the importance to operate to the particular advantage of the taxpayers in the middle and upper income brackets.

Your committee commends the Executive Council for its consistent recognition of these problems and for the of relating tax policy and program at all levels of government to broad economic and social developments and needs.

Members of your committee feel that the Executive Council has been correct in placing emphasis on basing our revenue system on taxes based on the ability-to-pay to the maximum degree possible, for sound economic reasons, as well as because of considerations of equity.

We note with regret that local and state services particularly in the fields of health, welfare and education are becoming increasingly dependent on regressive taxation. This development constitutes a violation of the very principle on which our public schools were founded and state aid has been justified, namely, the need for support by tax funds levied on the basis of ability-to-pay.

We, therefore, strongly commend the Executive Council for its proposal that federal, state and local tax systems be coordinated and urge that in such coordination the financing of education, health and welfare services be given the same priority as defense needs. This may involve a greater use of the federal taxing power to take care of more of the essential needs of states and localities. Such a program could be developed with safeguards which would guarantee shared tax funds to units of government as a right and not as a handout. While the importance of establishing local and state responsibility for efficient and economical expenditure of funds should be recognized, the need for providing reasonably decent services by eliminating senseless compe-

Whereas—An employer, in the necessary course of his business, entertains clients, said expense being tax deductible, and

Whereas—A woman worker in the necessary course of her holding a job must in many instances pay someone for domestic service, said expense being taxable, and

Whereas—This results in an inequitable tax structure, favoring business and ignoring the woman worker, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention call upon Congress to enact legislation correcting this obvious tax bias.

Convention referred the resolution to the Committee on Taxation

(1953, p. 295) The E.C. submitted to the convention a concise report on the general over-all tax situation, and its application to earnings in particular. In summarizing A. F. of L. position with regard to an equitable federal tax policy, the E.C. report stated in part:

... the belief of the American Federation of Labor that when further tax revisions are made by Congress, first consideration should be given to eliminating all preferential tax treatment accruing to any group of taxpayers to the disadvantage of taxpayers generally. Following such necessary revision if the budgetary situation permits tax reductions, the American Federation of Labor favors giving first priority to substantial cuts in excise taxes and in personal income taxes paid by those with gross income below $4,000 yearly. The American Federation of Labor opposes any across-the-board percentage cuts in the personal income tax, preferring rather that reductions be concentrated at this time largely in the income groups which have been most adversely affected by postwar tax policy. Tax policy directed at raising the purchasing power of these low income taxpayers would be both equitable and economically sound.

(P. 641) Orderly and equitable revision of the country's tax structure in a way which would make it possible to meet rational requirements for revenue and at the same time distribute the burden of taxation justly and in accordance with ability to pay, is a foremost concern of American labor.

We share the anxiety of the Executive Council over the heavy pressure from business quarters demanding tax cuts and the governmental commitments to make substantial tax reductions at the federal level. We are in accord with the council's opposition to premature tax reductions that would mean increased budget deficits in the present period of prosperity and high employment.

Premature tax reduction would undoubtedly affect the economy adversely. However, taxes that will total approximately $90 billion for federal, state, and local purposes for fiscal years 1953 and 1954 may be substantially reduced in subsequent years. The danger in the present situation appears to be that the same groups that are urging adoption of a sales tax or manufacturers excise tax to take care of current high tax needs are steadily pressing for the reduction of taxes on personal and business income. Undoubtedly they aim to make a federal sales or excise tax a permanent part of the tax structure. All our affiliates are urged to inform their Representatives and Senators in no uncertain terms of their opposition to any and all efforts to enact a federal tax on consumers.

Especially timely is the Executive Council's insistence that, when tax reductions are made, they should be designed to maintain the economic health and prosperity at the highest possible level. The present tax structure is discriminatory and particularly burdensome to wage earners. Highest priority must be given to a reduction in excise taxes which are currently above World War II levels. It is equally urgent to raise the personal exemption or lower the income tax rates on the first $2,000 of taxable income as a means of maintaining needed purchasing power and high employment. The need is paramount for correcting those features of our federal tax policy which continue to contribute to the concentration of wealth and economic power by favoring those taxpayers who are least in need of tax relief.

Your committee calls upon our national and international unions, state federations, and city central labor unions to give greater attention to developments in the field of local and state taxation where, as the council points out, $20 billion yearly in taxes are now being collected. About 60 per cent of the $10½ billion collected by state governments is derived from taxes on consumption, while in certain states as much as 90 per cent comes from taxes paid by consumers. Cities, too are increasingly adopting payroll taxes, sales taxes and a variety of nuisance taxes which fall on consumers. This reinforces the recommendation of the Executive Council that the Federal Government should assume its responsibility for bringing about a more business-like relationship between local, state, and national revenue systems. The increasing seriousness of the tax problems facing our metropolitan areas also deserves close attention of our affiliates. We direct this vital phase of the tax problem to the attention of the A. F. of L. Standing Committee on Taxation so that proper guidance may be provided to our affiliates in dealing effectively with it. We also urge that provision be made to enable the Federation to present fully its views on federal-state-local tax relationship to the recently established Presidential Commission.

We note with satisfaction the report of the council dealing with activities of the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation and its National Legislative Committee in connection with hearings on tax legislation considered during the year and urges continued activity in this field.

Since economic gains so often won with difficulty in collective bargaining can be wiped out through unfair taxes applied directly or indirectly through higher prices, your committee urges our affiliates to devote increasing time and attention to promoting the adoption of progressive tax policies at all levels of government.

The American Federation of Labor has urged that federal taxes be maintained at levels necessary to protect the national security and promote sound economic conditions. We have opposed premature tax reductions that would impair our ability to provide adequately for defense and foreign aid needs. At the same time we have warned against tax cuts that would stimulate inflation and have urged a balanced budget during years of prosperity and high employment. . . .

Events of the past year strengthen the American Federation of Labor in its belief that Congress should give first priority to eliminating all preferential tax treatment accruing to any group of taxpayers to the disadvantage of taxpayers generally. So-called high rates on upper bracket income mean little or nothing as long as upper bracket income taxpayers benefit so substantially from the tax escapes made possible by the split income provision, failure to withhold taxes on investment income at source, over-liberal depletion allowances, loose estate and gift tax provisions, family partnership abuses, preferred treatment accorded capital gains, tax-exempt securities and other loopholes. Elimination of these legalized tax escape devices should be accompanied by substantially lower rates on the first $2,000 of taxable income and the highest possible increase in personal exemptions permitted by revenue needs. . . .

(P. 279) Under the sub-title of "The Role of the Federal Government," the E.C. reported the formation of a Presidential Commission composed of members of Congress and private citizens to study and make recommendations directed at improving federal-state-local tax, fiscal and other relations. . . . The A. F. of L. takes the view that any program of federal aid should be predicated on local and state governments bearing financial responsibility within the limits of their ability to pay. . . .

Delegates will find the specific measures through which Congress has sanctioned Administration-supported proposals fully described in the Executive Council's report and in a new A. F. of L. pamphlet entitled "Who Gets the Tax Cuts?" which is being publicly distributed for the first time to the delegates of this convention.

Your committee notes the Executive Council's concern at the increasingly regressive character of the federal tax structure. The income tax system had previously been considerably weakened by action taken by Congress between 1945 and 1953. The various tax measures approved by the 83rd Congress during the past few months have further weakened it by making it less progressive. The much publicized Tax Revision Act (Public Law 591) was used as a smokescreen for opening up entirely new tax escape devices through which hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue will be lost.

The possibility of a more intelligent approach to the federal tax problems is further complicated by the fact that the 83rd Congress has scheduled further tax reductions which may amount to $5.5 billion in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956. These scheduled tax reductions will again accrue in major part to corporations and upper income group taxpayers. No downward revision of the income tax burden for taxpayers in the low income groups has been scheduled up to this time. Nothing short of decisive action by the 84th Congress can reverse the current trend in federal tax policy toward more tax relief for preferred groups of taxpayers which least need relief with a resulting concentration of wealth and economic power.

Your committee urges national and international unions, state federations and city central bodies to give continued and increasing attention to developments in the field of local and state taxation. Approximately 60 per cent of the more than $11 billion collected in state taxes for the year ending June 30, 1954, came from taxes on consumers; an increasing proportion of local tax revenues is also being derived from regressive taxes. The danger to the economy inherent in these trends may be appreciated from the fact, cited by the Executive Council, that taxpayers in the income groups below $7,500 pay a considerably higher proportion of their income to support local and state services than those taxpayers in the income groups above $7,500.

In the above connection your committee believes that President Eisenhower's recommendations that additional financial burdens be placed on states and local communities for maintaining health, welfare, institutional and economical services are unsound and dangerous.

If low income taxpayers are now paying a disproportionate share for the support of these services, it is obvious that additional burdens on them would merely multiply existing inequities. A constructive proposal from the President as to how the federal taxing power could be used to assist states and local communities in providing needed services would be most timely.

We note that the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation and the National Legislative Committee have issued statements and appeared at more than the usual number of hearings before Congressional committees on various aspects of proposed tax legislation. We commend them for this activity and would urge them together with all A. F. of L. officers and affiliates to continue to devote time and attention at the national, state and local levels to initiating and promoting sound, progressive tax policies at all levels of government.

(Exemption of Municipal Bonds Protested)—(P. 387) Res. 46:

Whereas—Some southern communities have lured northern manufacturers to the South by offering them the use of manufacturing plants rent free, and

Whereas—Such property is often acquired through the issuance of federal tax-free municipal bonds which in effect makes every taxpayer in the United States a subsidizer of the unfair manufacturer who uses such premises rent free, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the delegates to the American Federation of Labor Convention assembled in the City of Los Angeles, Calif., go on record instructing the National Legislative Committee of the American Federation of Labor to cause to be drafted and introduced in Congress suitable legislation to remove the federal tax exemption of municipal bonds which have been issued by any community which has lured manufacturers to move to its boundaries through the means of a subsidy, and be it further

Resolved—That the National Legislative Committee of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to give its full support to legislation such as Bills H.R. 4083, H.R. 4127 and H.R. 6123, introduced in this session of Congress and which also seek to curb the existing evil heretofore referred to.

(P. 531) On page 123 (1954 proceedings) the E. C. Report dealt with the vitally important subject of pirating of industry from high-wage to low-wage areas through inducements of tax reductions, etc., and low production costs. The convention committee considered that section of the E.C. Report, together with Res. 46, and submitted the following report which was adopted:

This part of the Executive Council's Report deals with one of the most serious problems facing the industrial workers of this country. There are numerous states which have set up organizations for the "pirating" of industry into low-wage areas with concessions of every kind being used as an inducement. This leads to unfair competition, a dislocation of people and a very serious consequence to the whole economy.

We recommend that every effort be made for laws to close loopholes which allow tax concessions and other means which in the end set up unfair competitive conditions.

The committee agrees with the purport of the resolution . . . but wishes to make clear that the only bonds which should lose tax exemption are those issued for the specific purpose of building industrial establishments. We do not desire to take away tax exemption from legitimate municipal bonds.

(State and Local Problems)—(1955, p. 174) President Eisenhower established a Presidential Commission composed of members of Congress and private citizens early in 1953 to study and make recommendations directed at improving tax, fiscal and other relations between the federal, state and local governments. The commission submitted its report for transmittal to Congress in June of 1955. It contained virtually no recommendations directed at resolving the very difficult problems facing states and local communities in their efforts to finance services to meet the needs of a rapidly increasing population.

Competition between states and communities and tax limitations—legal and constitutional—have combined with the lack of taxable resources to make the property tax a less effective source of tax revenue than it was 20 years ago. In some states property tax revenue has been supplemented by revenue from corporation and personal income taxes. However, the majority of states have no state income taxes or have ineffective income taxes which yield insufficient revenue.

In 1955 states and local communities will each collect approximately half of a $23 billion total in revenue. For the nation as a whole, approximately 60 per cent of state tax revenue is collected from taxes on consumers. State and local tax systems generally have become increasingly regressive and unduly burdensome to the taxpayers in the lower income groups. When the President's Commission recommended, therefore, that states and local communities should assume more responsibility for meeting their fiscal problems, it was merely reiterating the same timeworn advice that has been repeated frequently during the past 20 years. The commission failed completely to come to grips with current problems. With billions of dollars of additional revenue needed to take care of immediately pressing needs, the commission recommended a continuation of a policy of independent action by states and communities that experience has shown will not meet those needs.

All states could benefit by a sound program of federal leadership and co-operation. The federal taxing power and credit can and should be used to provide necessary educational, health, highway and developmental facilities that the states cannot provide for themselves. Programs of federal aid, tax sharing, and federal-state-local underwriting of projects are urgently needed. Local and state services are closest and therefore most vital to the daily lives of our citizens. The American Federation of Labor should continue to press for more practical co-operation of the Federal Government with state and local governments through its affiliated international unions, state federations and city central bodies.

Income Tax—(1946, pp. 492, 529) Res. 11 and 72 recommended that the A. F. of L. support efforts to reduce the income tax on wage earners. The convention concurred with the objectives of the resolutions and referred them to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(1947, p. 240) The Executive Council reported the filing of an A. F. of L. statement in opposition to proposal of an across-the-board reduction in income tax for the following reasons:

1. The American Federation of Labor is unqualifiedly opposed to an across-the-board percentage reduction.
2. Tax reduction measures, not part of an integrated tax program, taking into account the present high excise tax burden and the increasing tendency of state and local governments to depend on consumption taxes are unsound.

3. It does not go far enough in reducing the tax burden of those in the low income groups.

We feel it is imperative to lighten the tax load of families with moderately small incomes. Increasing the personal exemption is a simple and efficient method of obtaining this objective. In addition, the principle of progressive taxation is best retained by lowering the taxes consistent with a long-term plan of retirement of the federal public debt.

(Excess Profits Tax)—(1948) Res. 1 Called upon Congress to restore the excess profits tax and restore the principle of taxation in accordance with ability to pay by increasing taxes in the high income brackets; and increase mass purchasing power by raising the personal income tax exemption from $600 to at least $850.

(P. 454) The convention referred the resolution to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation without instructions.

(1950, p. 149) The American Federation of Labor also expressed disapproval of the proposal to restore income tax rates to the 1945 levels without taking into account the tremendous increase in the cost of living that has occurred during the past five years, which has worked particular hardship on the low income groups. We have taken the position that downward adjustments should be made in the income tax rate on net income below $2,000.

(P. 458) We therefore commend the Executive Council for its vigorous support of the principle that net income up to $2,000 should be taxed at lower rates than those now in effect. The further proposal that any resulting loss of revenue should be made up by slight upward adjustments on higher bracket income is both equitable and practical.

Your committee urges that during the next year a particular effort be put forth in the A. F. of L. publications, and by the labor press generally, to acquaint members with the position of the Federation on current tax issues and on its long term tax program. It is essential that more of our members realize that the same forces—represented by the same Senators and Congressmen—which support anti-labor and anti-public measures, line up with equal zeal behind regressive, uneconomic and inequitable tax measures.

(Retirement and Disability Pensions)—(1950, pp. 46, 498) Res. 70 sought A. F. of L. cooperation in securing needed legislation to grant income tax exemption in pensions of retired employees of federal, state and local governments as well as disability pensions for other than recognized line of duty injuries.

(1951, pp. 111, 445) The Committee on Legislation desires to call the specific attention of the delegates to the legislative policy of the American Federation of Labor on the subject of taxation:

The American Federation of Labor, at hearings before the House and Senate Committee, has supported the President's recommendations that as nearly as possible the full amount of tax increases needed to keep the federal budget in balance be levied.

However, the Federation has emphatically protested the levying of additional excise taxes at this time. It has, on the other hand, supported the Treasury's proposal for further increases in corporation taxes. We have stated before both committees, moreover, that major increases in personal income tax rates should, in our opinion, be concentrated on those with incomes above $3,000 and particularly on those in the income level above $5,000.

The Treasury recommended a four percentage point increase in income tax rates throughout the schedule within an over-all 90 per cent limitation. The House has approved a 12½ per cent increase. The American Federation of Labor has gone on record as favoring the percentage as more equitable, but opposes having it applied to those with net incomes of less than $1,000.

The committee recommends that the convention concur in this policy.

(P. 113) The E.C. reported on the opposition exerted by the A. F. of L. and its affiliates to the enactment of a repeal of the 16th Amendment. The E.C. declared that the A. F. of L. drive to defeat the proposed amendment would continue unceasingly until it is finally dropped.

(P. 504) Convention approved the report of the Executive Council and affirmed determination to defeat the amendment.

(Limitation of Federal Income Tax)—(1951, pp. 198, 280, 281, 537) E.C., Res. 17 and 19. Legislative developments as well as prospective developments in the tax field at all levels of government are, in the opinion of your committee, inadequate and increasingly inequitable. We agree with the conclusion of the Executive Council that to the extent an undue share of the prospective tax payments of $86 billion in 1952—one-third of the income estimated for the year—is thrown on one section of our people, the defense program and the national economy may be weakened.

Members of your committee believe that the warning of the Executive Council that inequities and discriminations operating against those in the low-income groups in the economic field generally, are becoming increasingly evident in the tax field, is timely.

Statistics are cited showing that the great majority of American families with incomes of $3,000 yearly or less are already overburdened by the increased cost of living and the present level of taxes.

It should be recognized too, that those in the lower income brackets are only to a very small degree responsible for inflationary spending. In millions of instances they are living below the levels of decency. These facts reinforce the A. F. of L. contention that there should be no increases in excise taxes at the federal level and that increases in the personal income tax should not be made on those in the lowest income brackets.

The Executive Council's report shows that state and local governments are coming to rely more and more on regressive sales and excise taxes for revenue. This tendency throws more and more of the tax burden on those in the lower income groups. The serious nature of this problem may be appreciated by reference to the study cited by the Council which shows that those in the income bracket below $1,000 pay 10 per cent of their income in taxes to local and state governments while those in the brackets above $7,500 pay only 5.5 per cent of their income to those units of government. All affiliated organizations are urged to continue their opposition to increases or extensions of all types of regressive taxation.

A detailed reference to the A. F. of L. position on tax legislation adopted during the past year by Congress as well as on the legislation now pending will be found in the Executive Council's Report. Delegates should note that the A. F. of L. has emphatically protested the levying of any additional excise taxes at this time has supported the Treasury's proposal for further increases in corporation taxes, and has urged that major increases in the personal income tax rates should be mainly concentrated on those in the income level of above $5,000.

Delegates should note that the A. F. of L. has repeatedly pointed out that needed revenue could be secured through enactment of measures to recapture revenue losses due to operation of the split income provision under which married couples, particularly in the income groups between $7,000 and $100,000, are enjoying tax savings of $2.5 billion yearly. Effective revision of the estate and gift tax laws would add substantially to current revenues. We have also urged the closing of specific loopholes which permit the evasion of millions of additional revenue that is not being collected under present laws.

Committee members note with approval the reference in the Executive Council's report to the drive to defeat the campaign to limit federally collected income taxes to 25 per cent of income. This campaign should be continued and the State Federations which have been responsible for the action formerly taken on this measure, which has been termed the "Millionaires' Amendment," should be commended.

Your committee also recommends that the problem of taxation of annuities and pensions be taken up by the A. F. of L. Permanent Committee on Taxation for study and recommendation.

It is further recommended that Resolutions 17 and 19 dealing with this subject be referred to the Committee on Taxation for consideration and disposition.

(Pp. 280, 538) Res. 17:

Whereas—There is a concerted effort on the part of the American Taxpayers' Association to escape their fair and just share of the burden of taxation by proposing an amendment to our national Constitution to limit the federal income tax to not more than 25 per cent, and

Whereas—The American Retail Federation, purporting to speak for one million stores, is actively working to establish a national sales tax, thus shifting a still heavier burden of taxation upon those least able to pay, and

Whereas—The National Association of Manufacturers is "urging tax-writing Senators to levy a manufacturers' excise (sales) tax," shifting as much as an additional eighteen billion dollars to the consumer, and

Whereas—The only fair and just method of meeting the tax burden is the payment of taxes in direct proportion to one's ability to pay, and

Whereas—Organized labor is the only spokesman for the already overtaxed laborer, therefore, be it

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled

1. That we are unalterably opposed to any and all attempts to shift the burden of taxation to those least able to pay;
2. That we go on record opposing such amendment to the Constitution limiting the federal income tax;
3. That we actively sponsor and support a campaign to defeat such proposed legislation;
4. That we alert our membership and the public to the issues involved;
5. That we give active support to our state federations of labor and central labor unions in their fight against such taxation trends.

Referred to Committee on Taxation for consideration and disposition.

("Millionaires Amendment")—1951, p. 113) For nearly fifteen years there has been an insidious campaign to repeal the Sixteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and substitute language limiting Federal income tax to 25 per cent of individual incomes.

The net effect of this proposal would be to saddle low income groups with nearly all of the Federal tax burden, a situation which we cannot tolerate.

The Committee on Legislation desires to commend the tireless efforts of the various state federations of labor and point out that through their efforts, in a large number of states this measure has been defeated in the state legislatures.

It is recommended by the Committee that the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations continue this untiring campaign to defeat the amendment until the matter is dropped by its sponsors.

(1952, pp. 45, 466) Res. 63 called for support of A. F. of L. of legislation which would exempt from taxation pensions received by retired workers and their dependents. Convention referred the resolution to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation.

(1952, p. 205) The Executive Council reported opposition of the A. F. of L. to the proposed constitutional amendment repealing the 16th Amendment to the Constitution which provided that the Federal Government could levy taxes on income. While the proposed amendment did not specify any limit, the proponents of the amendment advocated a 25 percent limitation on the amount of taxes which may be collected. Attention was directed to the fact that enactment of the proposed Amendment can only create the need for a national sales tax to assume the burden shifted from the backs of those who now bear more than 25 percent tax. Further, federal tax revenues would be cut more than 16 billions or more than 30 percent of present income and gift tax sources and that taxation would be conducted without regard to tax paying abilities.

(Pp. 30, 464) Res. 23:

Whereas—A group of millionaires has hatched the biggest swindle ever perpetrated on the American people, and Pierre S. du Pont 3d, of the du Pont Empire, together with representatives of many other corporate empires, have been attempting to sell the American people on a proposal to amend the U.S. Constitution which would limit taxes to 25 per cent of a person's or corporation's income; obviously, this kind of limitation would cut down the taxes of the millionaires and the corporations, the amount which would be cut from their taxes would then be imposed on the working men and women of the country, and

Whereas—The drive for the Amendment is being sparked by the Western Tax Council, the American Taxpayers' Association and the Committee for Constitutional Government. Only recently the Chamber of Commerce of the United States adopted a resolution supporting this anti-workers' tax program. The men behind the drive are all representatives of big business. The very people who are complaining against corruption in government are pushing this corrupt conspiracy against the people. The symbol of their patriotism is the dollar sign. The undercover operations of these men have already resulted in affirmative action by the legislatures of twenty-five states in which resolutions have been adopted, requesting Congress to call a convention to amend the Constitution. No such constitutional convention has ever been called in the history of this country. Nevertheless, these various state legislatures have now recorded their demand for such a convention, the purpose of which would be to impose an outrageous tax burden on the working people of this country. According to the Library of Congress, although 25 state legislatures adopted the resolution, eight legislatures have rescinded their motion. The Tax Council says such resolutions may not be rescinded, and

Whereas—The proponents of the Amendment are not asleep. This year they have succeeded in adding two more states to their roster. This drive must be stopped. The amendment has well been called the "Millionaires' Amendment." It is a 16 Billion Dollar swindle. A tax load of 16 Billion Dollars will be shifted from those who can best afford to pay to the shoulders of the working men and women of America who certainly should not be subjected to sabotage of their standard of living, and

Whereas—Only families with incomes over 40 thousand dollars a year will derive any benefit from the Millionaires' Amendment, it will be necessary to enact sales taxes of at least 10 per cent to make up the loss. The American Labor Movement must rally to halt the progress of this creeping conspiracy against the American people. If 32 state legislatures adopt the amendment, it will then become necessary to call a constitutional convention in which the earning capacity of the American wage earner will be disastrously crippled, and

Whereas—The future of America is at stake. Those people who are demanding the proposed tax limit should realize that their continued efforts will earn them a medal from Stalin. The Communists could not do a better job than they will accomplish in destroying the faith of the American people in the democratic process. They ought to remember that the road to a Communistic hell is paved with evil tax intentions, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the membership of organized labor in every state of this country must be on the alert. All local unions must maintain contact with the members of the state legislatures to induce repeal of these tax convention resolutions already passed and to prevent new ones from being passed and, be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor take an active part in finally defeating this proposed Millionaire Tax Swindle.

(1954, p. 124) The E.C. Report contained an accounting of efforts to secure a Constitutional amendment establishing the objectives of the proponents of this type of tax legislation. The A. F. of L. had anticipated this maneuver for several years and had been countering the proposed legislation state by state. It was pointed out that proponents of this legislation included the Western Tax Council, Inc., and an array of constitutional experts who presented their views on what they declared was the advisability of submitting the Constitutional Amendment question to the states. In giving his testimony, the director of the Western Tax Council declared that the A. F. of L. and its affiliated bodies were instrumental in stopping this campaign in a number of key states. The E.C. warned, however, that defeat of the proposed legislation in Congress would not end the struggle with the so-called "Millionaires' Amendment".

(P. 583) Your Committee is pleased to note that efforts to secure Congressional approval of the "Millionaires' Amendment" preliminary to submitting it to the states were defeated. The amendment proposed to limit the tax rate to 25 per cent regardless of income.

The great majority of taxpayers in the income groups below $5,000 are already paying more than 25 per cent of their income in local, state, and federal sales, excise and income taxes. A limitation of the income tax rate proposed in the amendment would not decrease the need for tax revenue. It would, however, inevitably result in raising sales, excise and nuisance taxes on taxpayers in the lower income groups considerably above their present high levels. Attempts to secure adoption of this amendment will undoubtedly be renewed in state legislatures and should in all instances be opposed.

Whereas—During the past fifteen years the cost of living according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics has increased approximately ninety per cent, and

Whereas—Retirement and pension allowances earned by state and local government employees who have been retired cannot be increased generally because of constitutional prohibitions, nor have the state and local laws providing for retirement and pensions been substantially liberalized to care for those who will be placed on retirement, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor in convention has taken strong position in favor of exempting from Federal income taxation employee retirement allowances, and

Whereas—Retirement benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act are specifically made exempt and Social Security benefits are by rulings exempt from Federal income taxation, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor pledges support of bills in Congress and bills that may be introduced in Congress to make substantial exemptions of public employee retirement allowances from Federal income taxes.

(1954, pp. 384, 473) Res. 37 called for revision of the income tax law to provide $1,000 exemption from both state and Federal income tax. Referred to the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation

(P. 94) The E.C. submitted a brief report on the general subject of taxes and included a section on trends in income taxation. The E.C. took issue with the position of the President of the United States which recommended a reduction in the corporate income tax and in excise taxes which would have resulted in initial tax savings of $1.3 billion, and other specific recommendations. The A. F. of L. could "see no reason for the new and unscheduled tax reductions proposed by the President, particularly since he was at the same time urging that the excessively high excise taxes be continued beyond the scheduled expiration date. . . . The A. F. of L. has urged steadily that if revenue needs permitted new and additional tax cuts, priority should be given to reducing the tax rate on the first $2,000 of taxable income and in raising the exemption."

(P. 540) Changes made in the tax laws by the 83rd Congress will have a serious impact on our economy. The Executive Council's Report shows that these changes have not been equitable nor directed at strengthening the economic health of the nation.

The record shows quite clearly that the Administration, committed to a policy of balancing the budget, has sanctioned tax reductions that will result in an estimated deficit of $4.7 billion for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956. Your Committee would not suggest that there is anything sacred about a balanced budget. It would point out, however, that the anticipated $4.7 billion deficit will be the direct result of tax reductions totaling $7.4 billion, which have accrued in major part to business and to taxpayers in the upper income groups. This is particularly serious at a time when an increase in purchasing power which could be achieved through long overdue relief to taxpayers in the lower income group is so urgently needed.

Students)—(1954, pp. 385, 473) Res. 38:

Whereas—There are many families in Oregon and other states, who find it impossible to send their children on to college due to the added expense, and

Whereas—There is no provision in the present income tax structure recognizing this added burden on the family budget, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled, go on record favoring an amendment to existing tax legislation to permit parents to claim dependency credits for children under 21 years of age instead of 18 as is now provided, and be it further

Resolved—That the income tax exemption for college students be established at $1,000 per year.

Referred to the Committee on Taxation.

(1955, p. 154) When asked to record his support of the "Organization to Repeal Income Taxes, Inc." President Meany stated:

"American Labor is proud to bear its legitimate taxation burdens as its share of the cost of Government and the defense of this Nation against the dangers from within and from without. The only fair arrangement is for our citizens in proportion to their incomes to bear this expense.

"It is quite clear that if one type of taxation is to be abolished some other tax means must be found. With repeal of income taxes, whether at the federal or local levels, the only result will be more and heavier taxes on the consumer at retail outlets or in the form of processing taxes on the essentials of life.

"The American Federation of Labor through its affiliates has consistently opposed imposition of a limitation on taxes through a proposed amendment to the United States Constitution, as I assume you already know.

"This year's collection of federal income taxes has amounted to some sixty-four billion dollars. There could be no greater dislodgment of the fiscal structure of the United States Government than suddenly to remove all personal and income tax liability.

"The young men of this nation under the Selective Service System are obligated without limitation to make great sacrifices in the defense of this Nation even to the extreme if need be. There is no limitation upon their obligation. I find nothing wrong in the remainder of us standing ready to match such sacrifice as best we can gauged in worldly goods."

(P. 173) The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly urged and supported measures to extend tax relief to taxpayers with net taxable income of less than $2,000. We have maintained that the rate of 20 per cent on the first $2,000 of taxable income is too high and that the $600 exemption is inadequate. . . .

The American Federation of Labor supported the proposal in the Senate to grant a $20 tax reduction to each head of a household plus $10 additional for each dependent. This proposal was coupled with the repeal of certain provisions enacted in 1954 which granted preferential status to dividend income and provided for more liberal depreciation allowances to business. The A. F. of L. gave its support to this proposal, because it would provide needed tax relief to the lower income families without contributing further to the budget deficit.

Proposals to reduce Federal taxes in 1956 should be carefully examined. Any reductions that would bring about an imbalance between receipts and expenditures in a period of continued high prosperity could be justified only by over-riding considerations of equity and economic necessity.

The American Federation of Labor believes that further tax reductions would be both premature and ill-advised if made at the expense of defense needs or by sacrificing services for civilians. In this connection, it appears pertinent to point out that 1956 expenditures for military services, mutual defense purposes, the atomic energy program and stockpiling of strategic materials will be $11.6 billion less than in 1953 and approximately $2 billion less than in 1955. The accumulated demands for Federal assistance in financing expanded highway construction programs, school construction, and for other needed services will also result in greater need for Federal revenue. We would oppose any tax reductions at the Federal level that would prevent proper provision for vital defense or civilian services.

However, Congress will again be faced in 1956 with the opportunity of eliminating preferential tax treatment accruing to various groups of taxpayers to the disadvantage of taxpayers generally. Several billion dollars yearly continues to be lost to the Treasury through the operation of the split-income provision, the failure to withhold taxes on investment income at its source, loose estate and gift tax provisions, over-liberal depletion allowances, the preferential treatment accorded capital gains, tax exempt securities, and the preferential treatment of dividend income. Elimination of these tax escape provisions is long overdue, and the recapture of this additional revenue would permit the Federal Government either to finance necessary services or make more socially and economically desirable tax adjustments.

If tax reductions are made in 1956, we believe that Congress should recognize that tax reduction measures approved during the past ten years have tended to channel a disproportionate share of tax savings to taxpayers in the income groups above $5,000. This circumstance reinforces the need for decreasing the 20 per cent rate on the first $2,000 of taxable income and increasing the $600 exemption.

The American Federation of Labor is also concerned at the continued high level of Federal excise taxes on a number of commodities and services. If revenue needs do not permit any general reduction of excise rates in 1956, we hope that Congress will reduce any rates which unduly discriminate against specific goods or services.

Poll Tax (also see: Racial Discrimination)—(1939, p. 456) Res. 22 requested the A. F. of L. "to go on record as condemning White Primaries" and the Poll tax as Un-American, further calling upon all A. F. of L. affiliates to work for and support legislation which seeks to abolish the poll tax and white primaries. Convention approved committee report as follows:

In lieu of this resolution, your committee recommends that this convention declare its approval of the principle that all citizens, regardless of color or race, should be equally entitled to the full rights of adult suffrage.

(1943, p. 341) Res. 114, calling for action looking to the repeal of the poll tax law was not acted upon by the convention. However, convention recommended that efforts be continued to secure the enactment of legislation repealing the poll tax law.

Sales Tax—(1924, p. 73) When the tax bill was before the Senate, Senator Smoot, of Utah, offered an amendment that was recognized as another attempt to establish the principle of the sales tax. Senator Smoot's amendment provided for a tax of one-half of one per cent to be placed on all purchases. This attempt to revive the principle of the sales tax was vigorously fought by the representatives of the A. F. of L. and it was decisively defeated.

(P. 187) Convention noted with extreme gratification this rejection of the proposal of Senator Smoot—the arch reactionary and handy servant of special privilege—in his latest attempt to enact tax legislation discriminatory against the workers.

We commend the E.C. for its vigilance and vigor in thus repelling another attack on the part of those tax dodgers who would shift upon the wage earners through a sales tax, the major burdens of taxation.

(1925, p. 51) No question is of more importance to the workers than taxation. There is a well defined agitation for a reduction in the federal income taxes, the greatest to be on those best able to pay the tax. It is believed, however, that the objective of those who are endeavoring to reduce taxation for the well to do is a forerunner of agitation to introduce a sales tax, otherwise a buyers' tax. The supporters of the sales tax say that the people would not know they were paying a tax and therefore there would be no complaint.

One supporter of the sales tax in a public editorial said: "A sales tax properly directed will raise all the revenue we need and nobody would feel it."

The fact is it would relieve the well to do from taxation and place the burden upon those least able to bear it.

The sales tax would be oppressive. It would be felt in the homes of the poor where on every penny spent for the necessities of life a tax would have to be paid. That is, the price of the article purchased would be increased in proportion to the amount of the tax. Besides the vendor, who would pay the tax to the government, would be in a position to add to the tax and withhold the difference for his own benefit.

The A. F. of L. has repeatedly warned the people of this contemplated scheme of taxation and unless they awaken to its dangers it may be slipped through Congress.

(1929, pp. 85, 228) The agitation since the war to relieve the well-to-do from taxation and place the burden upon those least able to bear it through a sales tax is reaching its height and demands will be made upon Congress to establish that principle in taxation.

The A. F. of L. has repeatedly condemned the sales tax as a means of raising funds to conduct the government. For several months public propaganda has been spread broadcast, and some of our local unions have been deceived by it, calling upon Congress to reduce the tax on earned incomes. The Revenue Act of 1928 thus defines earned incomes:

"'Earned income' means wages, salaries, professional fees, and other amounts received as compensation for personal services actually rendered, but does not include that part of the compensation derived by the taxpayer for personal services rendered by him to a corporation which represents a distribution of earnings or profits rather than a reasonable allowance as compensation for the personal services actually rendered. In the case of a taxpayer engaged in a trade or business in which both personal services and capital are material income producing factors, a reasonable allowance as compensation for the personal services actually rendered by the taxpayer, not in excess of 20 per centum of his share of the net profits of such trade or business shall be considered as earned income."

In "no case," the law states, is "the earned income to be considered to be more than $30,000." According to the Secretary of the Treasury 97.2% of the population paid no federal income taxes whatever in 1928 for the year 1927. Nevertheless the 2.2% who paid Federal taxes had previously passed them on to the 97.8% in whole or in part. Of the 114,000,000 in the United States in 1927 only 2,453,101 paid an income tax. Of these 2,120,312 paid on incomes of $10,000 or less.

The sales tax means that a certain tax is placed on every sale—everything the manufacturer sells to the jobber, the jobber to the retailer and the retailer to the consumer, in fact between the producer and the consumer every person who handles a product and sells it will pay a certain tax. Of course this tax is passed on to the consumer. It should not be called a sales tax. The right term is a "nuisance tax," as all such taxes placed on certain articles during the war were so designated. It is an indirect tax and those who advocate it say the people will not object because they do not know they are paying a tax. Of course we pay an indirect tax on everything we buy at present but to increase this tax in order that the well-to-do may shift practically all taxation to approximately 98% of the people is a most vicious proposal.

A reduction of 25 per cent is now permitted on certain earned incomes. Among the 2,453,101 persons who made returns in 1927, there were many who paid no tax as their exemptions made them immune. Nevertheless they had to make a report. Wage earners now pay an income tax only on a small portion of their income because of these exemptions, but if a sales tax were established they would pay a tax on every purchase they made of the necessities of life as well as the luxuries. Accordingly they would pay more tax under the proposed change in the "sales" tax than they now do because it generally requires all their income upon which to live. The A. F. of L. has repeatedly warned the American labor movement of this surreptitious scheme of placing taxes upon those who find it difficult to pay and relieving those who are well able to pay.

(1931, pp. 117, 290) Although defeated year after year in every attempt to saddle the "nuisance tax" under the name of "sales tax" upon the people, another campaign has been launched to bring about that legislation in the next Congress.

High public officials also have advanced the idea that the best way in which income taxes could be increased would be by decreasing the exemption of married men to $2,000 and single men to $1,000. The objective of those who pay high taxes is to relieve the well-to-do from taxation and place the burden upon those least able to bear it.

The argument used in advocating the sales tax has been:

"If you tax the people so they do not know it they cannot object; but if they know they are paying a tax they will object."

We pay an indirect tax on every purchase we make. In 1927 only 2.2 per cent of our then 114,000,000 population paid income taxes and three-tenths of 1 per cent paid 95.5 per cent of the total income tax. For 1930 two per cent of the population paid all the income taxes. These are Treasury figures.

The only persons to be benefited by the consumption tax are the 2 per cent of the population who pay an income tax. On the other hand, the burden of taxation would fall upon the 98 per cent who do not pay an income tax. Besides they now pay an indirect tax on everything they buy. The "sales tax" will increase that tax load.

In all the statements given out in reference to taxation none suggests that estate taxes should be increased. The greater part of many estates was created without paying any taxes as the taxes were passed on to the consumers. The Federal Government collects an estate tax before the estates are distributed to the heirs. Then those states where the descendants live that have inheritance taxes are credited with 80 per cent of the federal estate tax collected. The heirs pay the inheritance tax to the states in which they live where such laws are in effect and operative. States that have no inheritance tax laws do not receive the 80 per cent collected by the government.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, one of the richest men in the United States at one time, said that "the American public is a partner in every large enterprise where money is made honorably." He added:

"The growing disposition to tax more and more heavily large estates left at death is a cheering indication of the growth of a salutary change in public opinion. Of all forms of taxation this seems the wisest. By taxing estates heavily at death the state marks its condemnation of the selfish millionaire's unworthy life. It is desirable that nations should go much further in this direction. Indeed, it is difficult to set bounds to the share of a rich man's estate which should go at his death to the public through the agency of the state, and by all means such taxes should be graduated, beginning at nothing upon moderate sums to dependents, and increasing rapidly as the amounts swell."

In a message to Congress in 1907, Theodore Roosevelt said:

"A heavy progressive tax upon a very large fortune is in no way such a tax upon thrift and industry as a like tax would be on a small fortune. No advantage comes either to the country as a whole or to the individuals inheriting the money by permitting the transmission in their entirety of the enormous fortunes that would be affected by such a tax."

It always has been the belief of the A. F. of L. that the most just forms of taxing great wealth are through the estate, gift and inheritance taxes as there is no question of the ability to pay.

Dr. Thomas S. Adams, the famous authority on taxation and formerly financial adviser for the United States government, declared that "if we must tax it is better to tax him who merely receives than him who earns."

The A. F. of L. is alarmed at the persistent agitation of the well-to-do to relieve themselves of taxation. Because of that fact we urge upon all state federations of labor, city central bodies and local unions to urge their respective U.S. Senators and Representatives to vote against the enactment of a "sales tax." They should also insist upon an increase in the estate tax and the restoration of the gift tax as they are the fairest taxes collected by the government.

Forty-five states have inheritance tax laws. Alabama, the District of Columbia, Florida and Nevada have neglected this source of revenue. The state federations of labor in those states and the District of Columbia should urge the enactment of inheritance tax laws. It is generally believed that the three states and the District of Columbia have not enacted inheritance tax laws because they wished to induce persons of great wealth to become residents. Representatives of those states named also appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee in 1929 and urged repeal of the estate tax. This was to still further encourage wealthy people to go to those states and become residents. Congress, however, refused, declaring that no more just tax could be collected. The exemptions provided for in the estate tax law are $100,000 and the cost of administration. This cost is sometimes as high as $50,000.

Few, if any, heirs of a large estate have had anything to do with its accumulation. Their legacies can be termed gratuities. Therefore, there is no doubt of the ability to pay the inheritance tax, which is paid to the states having such laws. We, therefore, recommend that more stringent state inheritance tax laws be enacted so that the great sums accumulated from the consuming public will be more equitably distributed.

A tax that should not have been repealed was the federal gift tax. The A. F. of L., therefore, believes that before considering an increase in any other taxes, the estate and inheritance taxes should be increased and the gift tax restored. In these three taxes there is no doubt of the ability to pay.

If the "sales tax" is established and exemptions are reduced then the taxes of the well-to-do will be greatly reduced and the burden placed on those least able to pay.

Members of Congress should not forget that while wages were increasing from 1923 to 1929 only from $11,000,000,000 to $11,421,000,000, corporation dividends were increasing during the same period from $930,648,000 to $3,478,000,000. Net additions to profits of banks were increasing from $279,000,000 to $556,000,000, and interest paid to bond holders was increasing from $2,469,000,000 to $7,588,000,000.

Congress, therefore, will find a fertile field from which to garner more income tax, if needed, among those who are well able to pay.

(1932, pp. 62, 234) Strong, aggressive, determined efforts were put forth during the last session of Congress to enact sales tax legislation. The advocates of this form of taxation announce that they favor this policy of raising revenue for the government. Some of them have been so bold as to assert that they favor the gradual substitution of the sales tax for the income tax.

The A. F. of L. has consistently opposed sales tax legislation because it represents an attempt to transfer the burden of taxation from wealth and from those who are able to bear it, to the masses of the people and to those who are least able to bear the burden of taxation. The A. F. of L. regards this form of taxation as a movement to "soak the poor."

In operation the sales tax would be collected from every purchaser of an article. It is reprehensible because it is concealed. The tax upon the articles bought would not be in evidence so that those who purchase could see and understand the amount of tax they would be called upon to pay.

Even though many of the necessities of life, including agricultural products, would be excluded from the provisions of the sales tax in the beginning of the enactment of sales tax legislation, it is reasonable to conclude, based upon experience in taxation procedure, that ultimately it would be extended to cover all sales of all articles including the bare necessities of life. Because of this possibility the A. F. of L. has vigorously and uncompromisingly opposed all forms of sales tax legislation.

A vigorous campaign for the enactment of sales tax legislation was carried on during the last session of Congress. The Speaker of the House and the leaders of the majority party in the House, with the assistance of the leaders of the minority party, endeavored to secure the acceptance and adoption of this form of taxation. Surprising as it may seem, the Ways and Means Committee recommended the adoption of sales tax legislation. . . . When a vote was taken, a motion to strike out the sales tax provision from the revenue bill was adopted by a vote of 236 to 160. Following this action by the House, the Senate defeated the sales tax legislation by a vote of 53 to 27.

We are confident that another attempt will be made when Congress meets December 5th, to secure the enactment of a sales tax law. Those who favor this form of taxation are aggressive, as is evidenced by the propaganda which is being carried on in various ways in support of such legislation. It presents a serious problem for the consideration of the masses of the people. They must face the issue and decide as to whether they will permit their representatives in Congress to enact a sales tax law which in effect will require them to pay a tax every time they make a purchase.

The A. F. of L. is standing guard in opposition to the enactment of this legislation. In order to be successful it must be accorded the support of Labor and the masses of the people, and their true friends. Great interest must be aroused in this question. The opposition of these groups to which reference is made must be made known to their representatives in Congress.

The A. F. of L. urges all organizations of labor affiliated with the A. F. of L. and their friends, together with the individuals who make up these organizations, must make known to their representatives in Congress, both in the House and in the Senate, their unyielding opposition to the enactment of sales tax legislation, if the attempt to pass this form of legislation is to be defeated.

(1942, p. 609) The convention adopted the report of its committee which considered the general subject of taxation, including a resolution opposing a national and state sales tax as follows (Res. 137):

Whereas—As a result of the combined pressure of the high income groups and emergency requirements following the first World War to obtain the higher revenue which was claimed to be needed, the indirect tax was resorted to as a means of reaching the low income groups, and

Whereas—While formerly the direct taxes supplied all the revenue, the income from the indirect tax, which in 1934 supplied 59 per cent of all the revenue to our Federal Government, rose to 65 per cent in 1937, and a year later reached the impressive figure of 70 per cent, and

Whereas—There is no sound economic reason to shift the taxation burden to the working people, since not only does the Sales Tax, which is one of the most offensive kinds of indirect taxation, reduce the real wages of the workers by increasing the cost of the products he buys, but it forces him to curtail his purchases, thereby restricting the amount of sales which, in turn, affects industry and contributes toward depression and unemployment, and

Whereas—The Federal Government is increasing taxes to such an extent that the low income groups, especially the workers, are paying and will be paying even more than is equitable in comparison with the high income groups without resorting to the Sales Tax, and

Whereas—Greater efficiency and economy of government as well as just direct taxation on all groups in proportion to their incomes is a good way to solve the problem of revenue without making it necessary to use the Sales Tax, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record as being opposed to the national and states sales tax as an unduly and unjustified burden on the low-income groups, and unnecessary from the standpoint of justly solving the problem of revenue.

Under this caption the Executive Council reports on its representations to the Congress on taxation. It reports successful opposition to the imposition of a sales tax. It also points to the probable burden of taxation affecting especially the lower paid workers.

Your Committee recommends that the Executive Council be instructed to continue its opposition to a sales tax.

(1943, p. 338) The E.C. reported on moves to change federal tax laws, including a proposal to enact a sales tax. The convention took the following action on the subject:

Under this caption the Executive Council reports briefly on the course of the Federal tax law (Public No. 68, 78th Congress) in the first session of the 78th Congress and inclusion of the proposal submitted by the American Federation of Labor. . . .

Your Committee commends the Executive Council for its successful activity in connection with the current tax law and recommends that this convention instruct the Executive Council to continue its efforts in behalf of just and equitable taxation based upon ability to pay and in unremitting opposition to a sales tax. Your Committee recommends that the Executive Council be instructed to oppose any increase in taxes levied upon wages or compensation of the workers and that any increase in the amounts withheld from such wages or compensation be in the form of savings represented by Government bonds.

(1948, p. 160) The E.C. reported that for many years repeated efforts had been made to enact a national sales tax and attention was directed to the position of the 1934 A. F. of L. Convention as follows:

" . . . It also calls attention to the sales tax, the most iniquitous of all taxes, and stated that Labor is seeking a more just source of revenue for the schools. Your committee concurs in this portion of the Council's report and recommends taxes based on ability to pay, i.e., inheritance and income taxes levied and collected by the Federal Government with the elimination of tax exemptions, teachers, public employees and all others, as the most appropriate way to finance education."

It was further pointed out that efforts to enact a sales tax for the District of Columbia which could prove an entering wedge to the enactment of a national sales tax.

(P. 449) Reference is made in the Report of the Executive Council to efforts that have been made during the past 25 years to enact a national sales tax and of the consistent and unswerving opposition to its enactment in any form by the American Federation of Labor.

During the 80th Congress an unsuccessful effort was made to enact a sales tax law applying to the District of Columbia. Adoption by Congress of the sales tax in the District would, as pointed out by the Council, almost certainly be used as an argument for adoption of a national sales tax. The Council's recommendation that sales taxes be opposed at all levels of government is therefore heartily endorsed.

The sales tax, as we have repeatedly pointed out, has no realtion to capacity to pay—in fact, operates inversely to that basic principle. In addition, it is costly as well as difficult to administer and adds disproportionately to the burdens on low income.

(1949, p. 212) We have steadfastly maintained our position against legislating a sales tax for the District of Columbia. Any such law inevitably would encourage similar taxes in all states and on the national level.

During 1949 our position in this regard was amply vindicated when, following enactment of a District of Columbia sales tax, Public Law No. 76, the tax rate on real estate was increased only 7½ percent, from $2 per $100 of valuation. We had said that a sales tax would become a screen behind which the landlords of the District of Columbia would be excused from a material tax burden increase while saddling the real increase upon those least in position financially to assume the added responsibility. This prediction further was substantiated by the fact that the forces in Congress, particularly in the Senate which proposed the sales tax, are the same forces that demanded landlords be released from rent controls.

Our stand in this matter now having been vindicated, we return to the original position, in opposition to the sales tax and in support of a plan to eliminate the sales tax.

The mild manner in which merchants accept this tax indicates new profits are in store for them under the sales tax law. They are responsible for reporting a straight percentage tax on sales, though multiple sales in small amounts need only be reported at the regular dollar basis. The small sales are almost invariably made to the small consumer, the one least able to bear the tax burden.

(P. 383) Convention approved committee report on this subject:

The A. F. of L. vigorously opposed the introduction of that vicious form of taxation, the sales tax, into the District of Columbia. Although the plan was forced through Congress by the same group that has been demanding elimination of rent controls, the A. F. of L. will continue to fight this measure and support its repeal.

(1953, pp. 296, 642) The most serious tax issue the country will face in the coming year is almost certain to be a demand for a national sales tax. The increasing budget deficit and the tax reductions scheduled for the coming months have led the new Administration to search for new ways to raise additional revenue.

There are already indications that in this search for new revenue tax policymakers are seriously considering the introduction of a national sales tax, long and vociferously advocated by the National Association of Manufacturers. The American Federation of Labor will vigorously fight this proposal.

Any tax of this type, even if it is disguised as a manufacturer's excise tax and even if certain consumer purchases, such as food and medicine are exempt, is in effect a sales tax which falls far more heavily on lower income families than on the well-to-do. The American people are firmly committed to a tax policy based clearly on the principle of ability to pay. The sales tax completely negates this principle.

There is no need to resort to a national sales tax to meet the revenue needs of our government. The proposals advanced by the American Federation of Labor for closing inequitable tax loopholes will go a long way toward increasing the needed tax revenue. A complete and equitable tax program can and should be developed in accordance with the democratic principle of progressive taxation based upon ability to pay.

(P. 642) Your Committee calls upon our national and international unions, state federations, and city central labor unions to give greater attention to developments in the field of local and state taxation where, as the Council points out $20 billion yearly in taxes are now being collected. About 60 percent of the $10½ billion collected by state governments is derived from taxes on consumption, while in certain states as much as 90 percent comes from taxes paid by consumers. Cities, too, are increasingly adopting payroll taxes, sales taxes and a variety of nuisance taxes which falls on consumers. This reinforces the recommendation of the Executive Council that the Federal Government should assume its responsibility for bringing about a more business-like relationship between local, state, and national revenue systems. The increasing seriousness of the tax problems facing our metropolitan areas also deserves close attention of our affiliates. We direct this vital phase of the tax problem to the attention of the A. F. of L. Standing Committee on Taxation so that proper guidance may be provided to our affiliates in dealing effectively with it. We also urge that provision be made to enable the Federation to present fully its views on Federal-State-local tax relationship to the recently established Presidential Commission.

We note with satisfaction the report of the Council dealing with activities of the A. F. of L. Committee on Taxation and its National Legislative Committee in connection with hearings on tax legislation considered during the year and urge continued activity in this field.

Since economic gains so often won with difficulty in collective bargaining can be wiped out through unfair taxes applied directly or indirectly through higher prices, your Committee urges our affiliates to devote increasing time and attention to promoting the adoption of progressive tax policies at all levels of government.

Teachers (also see: Federal Aid to Education; Thought Control (Education); (Education and Planning))

(1928, p. 274) We recognize that the teachers in our public schools should be appointed and retained in office because of their professional fitness.

In some localities boards of education appoint or discharge teachers because of their purely personal views or affiliations without regard to the professional fitness or conduct of such teachers in the class room.

The American Federation of Labor in convention assembled does condemn all such practices. To right such unsound practices, it calls upon every state body to make every effort to have enacted a sound state tenure law as soon as possible.

(1930, p. 289) Permanency of tenure for teachers, together with freedom in teaching and opportunity for advancement and for cultural improvement will constitute an investment for communities that will yield bountiful returns in better training for the children in our schools, and more competent citizens for the nation.

Even in certain states where tenure has been guaranteed by law, teachers are regularly dismissed before the trial period of three years is finished in order that a staff of cheap teachers may always be employed. Such practices are destined to drive away from the profession of teaching intelligent young men and women whose presence in the schools is indispensable if a nation of educated and intelligent citizens is to be maintained.

(1931, p. 349) The present industrial depression has caused school boards in certain sections of the country to make economic needs rather than teaching efficiency, the basis for selection in the employment of teachers.

Such practice is certain to lower the efficiency of the schools and create a deplorable condition in our educational system.

The A. F. of L. reiterates its declaration for equal opportunity for employment for workers, without discrimination on grounds of sex, race, creed, or other extraneous considerations.

(1932, p. 390) It is a well-known fact that as a general rule teachers' salaries have not kept pace with the wages of other workers or with the cost of living and that at their best teachers' salaries have been far from adequate.

The A. F. of L. will continue to oppose with all its power and influence any salary cuts, whether direct or as so-called "voluntary contributions" and in places where such cuts have been made, endeavor to bring about the restoration of the previous schedule.

(1933, pp. 144, 301) During the last two years teachers' salaries have been drastically cut, in some cases as much as 50 per cent, in a few places, 75 per cent. Worse still, many cities and counties have paid them in depreciated, non-marketable commercial paper and others have not paid them at all. In a few places teachers were "boarded around" among the parents of the pupils who can afford this form of tuition.

At a time when industry is asked to maintain a living wage; when minima for wages are set in all crafts with additional graduated increments for those who merit them, it is a sad commentary to note that the legal minimum salary is being reduced to a new low level.

Forty dollars a month in several states "when school is open" is set for the teachers, and school is never open more than nine months a year under the best conditions in the most forward states. Now in the states paying the lowest salaries, school is open four or five, as much as six months. The living wage of teachers therefore is perhaps as much as $240 a year, in these states.

These facts and figures are alarming and they are tragic. They paint the picture of the passing of the free public school. They tell the tale of the direst sort of poverty for one group of workers—the teachers.

In the face of this situation an appeal was made last spring for legislation which would enable states to borrow money to pay teachers, and to maintain the public schools, as banks could borrow to maintain their business. No help could be had directly through legislation it was felt. But at this moment there is made available some relief for teachers.

In some localities teachers are placed on public relief funds and they expect to teach without salary. A direct loan to states for educational purposes would keep the problem on an honest basis and prevent all these indirects.

The employment of the thousands of unemployed teachers to teach illiterates, and to promote good citizenship in general, is a different matter, for in this case the teachers are admittedly being paid for teaching work. This is a commendable form of re-employment activity.

(P. 301) The factors involved in proper working conditions for teachers, and the standards approved, are:

(1) The normal number of hours of work prevailing in the best schools, with a maximum of five (5) working hours for five days.

(2) The maximum number of pupils in a class which, in the general judgment of experts can be taught efficiently at one time. The number will vary in accordance with the work, the subject taught, and local conditions.

(3) The physical conditions of school buildings should be such as will protect the health and safety of teachers and pupils against:

- (a) Overcrowding
- (b) Bad sanitation
- (c) Inadequate ventilation
- (d) Inadequate toilet arrangements
- (e) Fire hazards.

(4) Efficient health inspection is necessary, to protect the personnel of the school as a whole in the interest of the community itself.

(P. 302) The provision which the civilized states of the world are establishing for the protection of old age are among the best proofs of our advancing civilization. Not only are old-age pensions proof of our developing altruism, they are also evidence of our growing understanding of ways to improve the public service through the retirement of over-age employees. Many of the large cities of the country have adopted retirement systems for their employees on various plans of participation in creating an adequate pension fund, built upon an actuarially sound basis. Some of the states have also adopted retirement systems. But the rank and file of teachers throughout the country serve at low wages without prospect of a pension allowance, for they are not permitted to hold positions long enough to establish claim to a pension, even if one existed.

(P. 303) An adequate teacher training program should be maintained for those who would teach our working people, employed and unemployed, and that whatever extra teachers are employed they be employed at a wage schedule insuring decency and comfort for teachers of the locality where they are employed, and that their competence as teachers be passed upon by boards of education or boards of vocational education as the case may be.

(1939, p. 625) Forty public school teachers of Duval County, Fla., including all the officers of the local teachers' union, have been dismissed from their positions, without presentation of any charges whatever. It is reported that some of these teachers have served as long as 30 years in the public school system of Duval County and that the average length of service is 10 years. It is also reported that the only reasons expressed unofficially for the mass dismissal of teachers are (1) that the teachers had been active in the work of the teachers' union, with a membership of more than 300, and (2) that this group had been active in attempting to establish a teachers' tenure law for Duval County. It should be emphasized, however, that no official reason whatever has been given by the board of education for refusal to renew the contracts of these 40 teachers.

The Central Labor Council of Jacksonville, Fla., has given wholehearted support in seeking reinstatement of the group, and our president has sent a communication to all local labor bodies in the state urging their support on behalf of the group. The board of education, however, has steadfastly refused to open the case to present specific charges or grant hearings as provided in sound principles of tenure.

In a statement issued by the board of education to all teachers on September 28, 1939, teachers were warned of the consequences of affiliating with the teachers' union. We quote from the report:

The administration, however, desires to make it clear that individual teachers who by the activities of any organization must necessarily assume responsibility for the acts and activities of the organization to which they lend such support.

Since the regimentation of the labor movement and control of the public school system are two of the first steps in the destruction of democratic governments, and since mass dismissal of public school teachers, without specific charges, is an undemocratic procedure and not in the public interest, we condemn such action and urge all labor bodies of Florida to rally to the support of these teachers who have been unfairly treated.

The A. F. of L. has repeatedly declared its position in favor of sound tenure laws for teachers and freedom for teachers to affiliate with organized labor. The convention at Denver in 1937 declared:

The A. F. of L. was one of the pioneer agencies in this country in the establishment of free public instruction. It has ever jealously guarded the fundamental democratic development of our public school system since its inception. It must continue to do so, for it is not only true to say that the labor movement can progressively continue only under democratic institutions, but the democratic institutions can continue to progress in safety only so long as there is a labor movement.

Education committees and Labor everywhere should watch carefully the conditions under which our public schools are administered. The A. F. of L. has ever and will continue to support teachers and other employees of our public school system and higher institutions of learning in their demand for complete freedom of organization.

It was also reported that several outstanding union teachers at the University of Montana have been dismissed in a highly autocratic manner and that the Montana State Federation of Labor is at the forefront in a battle to protect the state university from political domination and control by the enemies of organized labor.

(Gag Law)—(1930, pp. 107, 286) The Washington Board of Education issued an order that school teachers should not appear before Congressional committees unless they had the sanction of the board or that members of such committees had invited them to appear. This aroused Senator Blaine who introduced S. 4588 to protect the school teachers of the District of Columbia against this reactionary policy of the school board. Charges had been made against several teachers but after the introduction of the Blaine bill the matter was not pressed. The board, however, later intimated that the teachers would be obliged to comply with the ruling in the future.

(Unions)—(1933, p. 299) The American Federation of Teachers was organized in 1916, and immediately affiliated with the A. F. of L. Within the period of 17 years, many attacks have been made on the organization in various parts of the country. School officials, both local and state, have attempted to prevent the formation of local unions, and have tried to destroy locals already formed. In some cases the courts have assisted the school authorities in this destructive work.

With the support of organized labor, many of these attempts at hindering the work of teachers' unions in improving the conditions existing in the schools have been defeated. But the spirit of opposition to teachers' unions is still strong in certain parts of the country. Under the National Recovery Act public recognition of the professional and economic right to continue their existence and to perform their services in behalf of the public schools of the nation and the teachers who work in them should be established.

The organization of public school teachers is fundamental to the future of trade unionism, and trade unionists, in their organizations and individually, should make the greatest endeavor to bring teachers into the movement in order to develop a sympathetic attitude and an intelligent understanding in the minds of the children and the general public of the constructive philosophy of the labor movement as a struggle for human betterment. The A. F. of L. now as always is opposed to the use of the schools for propaganda of any and all kinds. It asks only protection from misrepresentation and a sound exposition of its constructive principles and work.

If teachers were organized in trade unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. they could and would give such protection from false propaganda and create a new attitude and understanding of the labor movement.

(1935, p. 611) The A. F. of L. directs the president and the E.C. to make an immediate and thorough investigation of the charges publicly made that the American Federation of Teachers is now controlled by those openly hostile to the principles of the A. F. of L. and after ascertaining the facts the president and the E.C. are authorized and directed to take such action as the facts may warrant and to notify all state federations of labor and central labor unions of such facts and their action thereon.

Merit Rating System—(1947, p. 445) The practice of setting teachers' salaries by a fixed rating system was condemned by the convention through Res. 68:

Whereas—Certain industrial organizations are promoting a cleverly camouflaged campaign to reduce the costs of education by basing salary increases of teachers upon scores made on rating scales and thus limiting the increases to a few selected teachers, and

Whereas—In the States of New York and Delaware, laws have already been enacted requiring that teachers' salaries be based wholly or in part on rating scales, and similar laws have been introduced in a number of other states, and

Whereas—Such schemes of basing salary increments on rating are labelled "merit systems," but in operation are the very opposite of a true merit system, and

Whereas—The principle of basing salaries on rating scales would tend to provide promotions and salary increases for those teachers who are politically able rather than for those who are most competent professionally and would thus tend to crush the freedom of the teachers and to promote political bootlicking, and

Whereas—Now, as never before, the teachers of the United States should demonstrate to the world a democratic school system in which teachers are free and unafraid, and

Whereas—The Permanent Committee on Education of the American Federation of Labor has condemned the plan to base teachers' salaries on rating, and

Whereas—The U.S. Commissioner of Education has stated that no system of measurement has ever been devised which will indicate how many dollars one teacher is better than another, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled in San Francisco in October, 1947, emphatically condemn the plan of basing teachers' salaries on rating schemes and urge that salary schedules for teachers be based on training and experience—the only reliable objective criterion for determining salary schedules, and be it further

Resolved—That all affiliated bodies of the American Federation of Labor be urged to oppose further extension of the plans to base salaries on rating scales and to assist in eliminating such plans wherever they have been adopted.

The committee agrees with the position of the Permanent Committee on Education of the A. F. of L. and the position of the U.S. Commissioner of Education, that no measuring device has ever been invented, or ever will be invented, by which supervisors or school administrators can determine exactly how many dollars one teacher is better than another. On the other hand the basing of teachers' salaries on rating schemes would place in the hands of school politicians a powerful weapon by which the freedom and initiative of the classroom teachers would be seriously curtailed and political bootlicking, rather than professional efficiency in the class room, would be encouraged. Since many of the administrative systems of the public schools throughout the Nation are deeply embroiled in local and state politics, the practice of basing salaries on rating scales has resulted in the very opposite of a true merit system where the plan has been placed in operation.

In condemning rating schemes as a basis for determining salaries of teachers, the committee recognizes that in the larger interpretation of the term, there is a legitimate place for job rating in employer-employee relationship. Negotiating a uniform salary schedule, under which all teachers with equal training and experience receive the same rate of pay, is, in a sense a type of job evaluation. However, once a salary schedule has been established for a school system, all teachers with the same experience and training should receive the same salary and be free from political manipulation of their salaries and from reprisals if they fail to hew to the political line of those who hire, fire and rate the teachers. The so-called merit rating system in the public schools is an attempt to apply to American education the incentive plans which have resulted in such gross exploitation of workers in American industry.

The committee, therefore, recommends concurrence in this resolution as an emphatic condemnation of a practice which constitutes one of the most serious threats to democracy in American education.

(1948, p. 250) Res. 55. The A. F. of L. was requested to take an emphatic stand against basing teachers' salaries on rating scales and to urge affiliated bodies to assist union teachers, wherever possible, to secure sound salary schedules based on equal pay for equal work, and to provide the same salaries for all teachers who have the same training and experience and are doing the same kind of work.

(P. 506) The 1947 Convention of the American Federation of Labor in San Francisco took a strong stand against the proposal, currently advocated by certain industrial organizations, taxpayers' leagues, and reactionary politicians, to determine salaries of teachers by scores made on rating scales. This plan of attempting to determine the dollar value of teachers in the same manner in which cattle and hogs are weighed to determine their market value is a disgrace to the school system of the United States. It is of significance that the same political machines which supported wholeheartedly the obnoxious Taft-Hartley Act, were not only supporters of, but instigators of, the plan to base teachers' salaries on rating scales.

If this type of falsely labeled merit rating system should spread to workers in other crafts, it would mean that wage scales would be eliminated and every plumber, every carpenter, and every teamster would be rated individually by his foreman and paid according to his personal rating. Such a system would eliminate collective bargaining and place every employee on his own. Dismissals would be simplified since employees could be fired by the simple device of reducing their rating to the "freeze out" point.

The danger and ridiculousness of basing wages on merit rating scales is emphasized by the fact that many of those who are promoting rating schemes advocate that rating should be based not only on the work of employee, but on such intangible criteria as attitude toward the community, service to the community, participation in community projects, etc. Imagine the chaos which would be created if workers' wages were based on merit and if in turn the rating were based on the workers' community attitude.

The proposal to base teachers' salaries on rating scales and the attempt to determine the exact dollar value of each employee is a threat to the basic principle of collective bargaining and of negotiating wage scales which are applicable to all employees in the bargaining unit. The committee, therefore, recommends concurrence in this resolution and urges all affiliated bodies to seek the elimination of the practice of basing salaries on rating where it has already been adopted and to prevent the adoption of the plan in those areas where it is being currently proposed.

(Overtime Pay) — (1951, pp. 314, 400) Res. 99:

Whereas—Thousands of teachers in the United States are required to perform overtime work in addition to their full day's work of teaching without any additional pay, and

Whereas—Extra-curricular activities constitute an essential part of the school program requiring highly skilled professional service on the part of the teacher, and

Whereas—The labor movement stands for the principle that overtime work beyond the regular hours of work should be paid for at a rate of time and one-half, and

Whereas—Work performed without compensation by any group of workers tends to lower the standards of all workers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in Convention assembled, in San Francisco, California, in September, 1951, go on record condemning the practice of compelling teachers to work after regular hours without additional pay, and be it further

Resolved—That all affiliated bodies be urged to support union teachers in their efforts to secure additional pay for overtime work in addition to the regular hours of work.

(Representation in International Education Meetings)—(1947, p. 658) Representation for class room teachers in international education meetings, and in UNESCO, were called for by Res. 61 and 62. Res. 61, calling for representation in all conferences and workshops established under UNESCO or any other governmental agency, was referred to the Executive Council. Res. 62, calling for teacher representation specifically in UNESCO was unanimously adopted as follows:

Whereas—The American Federation of Teachers, the largest, nationwide, voluntary teacher organization in the United States was denied representation by the Department of State at the San Francisco Conference, at the London Preparatory Conference on UNESCO, and at the Paris UNESCO Conference, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor at its 1946 Convention unanimously adopted a resolution calling upon the officers of the A. F. of L. to insist on the recognition of the American Federation of Teachers in its own right as a nationwide professional voluntary teachers organization at all future UNESCO Conferences, and

Whereas—At the Mexico City UNESCO Conference many highly technical educational matters, concerning international educational organizations will probably be considered, and that therefore it is of the greatest importance that the American Federation of Teachers be represented by a delegate of its own choosing, who has actively participated in the organization's international work in opposing Communist dominated groups, and other forces inimical to the best interests of American education and to the free teacher organizations throughout the world, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled call upon the Secretary of State and the President of the United States to afford the American Federation of Teachers the privilege of being represented by a qualified person of its own choosing, in like manner as this privilege has been afforded to the company union in education, and be it further

Resolved—That the President of the American Federation of Labor be asked to convey the purpose and content of the resolution to the Secretary of State, the President of the United States and to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to the Sub-committee on State Department Appropriations of the House Appropriations Committee and of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Rights—(1951, p. 191) We emphatically demand that the teacher's personal civil liberties be completely protected. The teacher must be free to teach the truth. He must also be free himself.

The lack of freedom of the American teacher today is alarming. It is this lack of freedom which more than any other factor, we contend, is responsible for the shortage of teachers in the United States today.

Teachers are told which organizations they must join, and which organizations they may not or should not join. They are urged, in every state, to join the state education association, which actually is the company union, in education. In 17 states teachers are required, as a condition of employment, to join this company union at the national, state or local level. In many places, dues for the administratively controlled teacher's association—the company union—are deducted from the teacher's salary often without his permission, before the teacher is paid.

On the other hand, teachers are dismissed, in many places, for forming or joining a union. In other places, they are penalized in many other ways. They may be assigned to badly located schools; they may be given an extra heavy teaching load; they may be denied promotions; they may be openly attacked by their superior officers in a most humiliating manner, simply because they choose to join with their fellow citizens, through the American Federation of Labor, to serve the common good and protect their own economic interests.

In North Carolina teachers were threatened with reprisals for forming a union. The State Federation of Labor in Virginia, Iowa, Florida, Idaho, Texas, as well as in North Carolina—just to mention a few—are at this moment, actually engaged in a determined struggle to help make the teacher free to join any legal organization of his own choosing.

Once a teacher is free to join a union he will be better able to fight for his personal right to protect his professional and economic status. Teacher tenure laws are essential to protect the teacher on the job from political pressures. Yet, in many legislatures the fight for teacher tenure laws has been made more difficult by the opposition to such laws from the state education association, the company union.

The teacher, like every other worker, must be economically more free than he is today. Teachers' salaries are woefully small. The salary should be increased and be graduated by annual increments, until in about five or six years, he reaches a salary level commensurate with the significant contribution he is making to the communities and with the opportunity for continuing salary improvement, as any other professional worker would.

The teacher must be relatively more free in his contemplation of his old age security than he is today. His small salary does not enable him to save much. Teachers' pensions, in most cases, are not adequate. The American Federation of Labor sought last year, to have teachers given an opportunity to increase their pensions by authorizing the state to enter into an agreement with the Federal Government to enable teachers now covered by a state pension law to vote by secret ballot to determine if they would want to have federal social security coverage to supplement their state pensions. But, as the printed hearings show, the company union successfully opposed such additional protection for the teacher.

The teacher must have enough free time—unassigned time, to enable him to work closely with the individual pupil, to give to his work that inspiration which must come from close personal work with the individual child and youth. The teacher must, in addition, have adequate leisure time for his relaxation, and time to continue his personal professional growth.

The teacher must be free to use his professional training and experience in helping shape administrative school policy. The tragic waste inherent in a system which denies the teacher—the professional worker who is most closely identified with actual child training—a right to participate in planning the educational program for a school system, is certainly disturbing.

The teacher must be freed from the all-too-prevalent petty tyrannies of school administrators. A person to whom a parent and a community entrusts its children should certainly be regarded as capable of running his personal affairs without interference from school authorities.

There is an urgent need for the development of special machinery through which teachers and incidentally other public employees, may seek to adjudicate their problems without threats or reprisals against them, for any protective action which they may take, in their own behalf. In such a machinery, the teacher, as a worker with heavy professional responsibilities should have representation of his own choosing.

(P. 396) Under the title of "The Teachers Rights" the Executive Council declares emphatically that:

1. Teachers must be free to teach the truth and have personal freedom to lead their lives as citizens of the United States.

2. Teachers should have freedom to join organizations of their own choosing and should not be compelled to join non-union organizations.

3. Teachers should have the right of collective bargaining and adequate machinery for settling grievances.

4. Teachers should have salaries which are commensurate with their costly training and their service to the community and to the nation.

5. Teachers should live and work in an atmosphere of democracy.

Since these objectives are in accord with previous announcements of the American Federation of Labor, we recommend adoption of this section of the Executive Council's Report.

State and local labor organizations will continue to fight for adequate salaries for teachers. We call particular attention to an alarming trend in school employees' salary schedules. The teacher who has the principal responsibility in the educational process, is being given relatively less and less consideration to pay schedules. The salary differential between school officials who do not deal with pupils at all, and teachers, is being widened. This is particularly disturbing as it is accompanied by the establishment of an ever increasing number of non-teaching supervisory positions. The teacher in the average city school system today has from a half to a full dozen officers over him who are paid from 15 per cent to 500 per cent more than the teacher gets. We do not believe that the administration of a school plant is of so much greater value than the teaching of the children. Good teaching and good administration are both important, but the relative value of teaching should be fully recognized and the teachers' pay, accordingly, raised.

At the national level we believe that teachers who so desire must be given the right to secure coverage under federal social security to supplement their meager state and local pensions. All possible help should be given to the teachers in obtaining in full measure their just rights to security.

In addition to the support which teachers need for greater economic security, we must continue to fight for the recognition of their personal and civil rights. Probably no group of workers has their personal affairs more hemmed in than do the teachers. They are told how to occupy their free time, which organizations to join and which not to join, which civic duties they may accept and which they must decline.

Teachers throughout the country continue to be forced to join the company union, and are deprived of the right to join a free trade union. Our state federations and central labor unions must help teachers regain and hold their rights.

Whereas—The United States Department of State in recent months has consistently favored and cooperated with non-union teachers' organizations and has discriminated against the American Federation of Teachers, as a union organization, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Teachers was denied representation at the San Francisco Conference of Educational organizations while teachers' organizations opposed to the teachers' union were strongly represented at the invitation of the Department of State, and

Whereas—The Department of State appointed a number of professional functional committees and, only after formal frequent protest, was the teachers' union invited to any meetings except such meetings as were called to receive such information as the Department of State wishes the public to have, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Teachers was denied representation at the London Conference to draft the UNESCO charter and as a result the United States of America was the only nation supporting a free public school system which denied its classroom teachers any representation at the London conference, and

Whereas — The Division of Cultural Relations of the Department of State has advised foreign governments to deal with non-union organizations to the exclusion of the American Federation of Teachers, and

Whereas — The Division of Cultural Relations of the Department of State has set up an advisory committee on teacher exchange, and has excluded the American Federation of Teachers from this committee, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled in Chicago in October 1946 protest to the President of the United States and to the Department of State this unjust and unfair discrimination against union teachers of the nation and demand that the American Federation of Teachers as the largest voluntary organization of classroom teachers in the nation and as the educational union of an organization of more than 7,000,000 members be given fair and adequate representation in all phases of the educational programs of the Department of State.

(Dismissal on Confidential Information)—(1954, pp. 450, 556) Res. 130:

Whereas—The strengthening of democracy in education is fundamental to the sound functioning of our free public school system, and

Whereas—Continued insecurity of teachers, both as to their academic and economic rights, weakens rather than fosters the teaching of democratic ideals and the practice of democracy in school administration, and

Whereas—During the past year, in particular, teachers have been dismissed by local boards of education on the basis of allegations, hearsay, and anonymous charges without being permitted the right to have a hearing or to face their accusers, even when the so-called charges had no bearing on their teaching in the classroom; and

Whereas—The Chairman of the National Governor's Conference, the Governor of Colorado, has passed on allegations about the political activities of teachers in his own state and has indicated that governors in all states have sought, through the conference, information from confidential files of agencies under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of the United States; and

Whereas—The many sub-standard teachers employed in our public schools are the result of this continuing attack against basic constitutional rights of all citizens—the right to have due process of law followed in determining the guilt or innocence of teachers anonymously accused of disloyalty or other activities (including in many instances the right to join and form unions affiliated with the A. F. of L.); therefore, be it

Resolved—That the Denver Trades and Labor Assembly, in regular meeting assembled on this 8th day of September, 1954, do respectfully urge the delegates to the 73rd Convention of the American Federation of Labor to protest the unauthorized use of confidential information under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of the United States for the purpose of dismissing teachers without charges or hearings; and be it further

Resolved—That the Denver Trades and Labor Assembly do seek the full support of the American Federation of Labor and its officers in all states to provide for teachers the rights of receiving charges, having hearings, and answering to and questioning those who accuse said teachers of their respective fitness to seek and teach the truths in the classrooms of the public schools of our nation.

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled in Cincinnati, Ohio, in November, 1948, emphatically condemn the practice of bringing pressure on teachers to join non-union organizations, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor also emphatically condemn the practice of using public funds to promote non-union (and often anti-union) teachers' organizations by giving the teachers days off their jobs to attend meetings of the non-union organizations and requiring membership cards of those organizations for admission to the meetings, and be it further

Resolved—That all affiliated unions be urged to make investigations of the public school systems in their respective communities to see whether these undemocratic and unethical practices are followed by school administrators; to urge the elimination of such practices, and if local school administrators refuse to take action to correct these violations of the civil rights of teachers, to demand the dismissal of those guilty of such violations.

(P. 507) The committee concurs in the general recommendations of this resolution. As long as teachers are shackled by such unethical and undemocratic practices as bringing pressure on them to join non-union organizations, the schools can never fully perform their true function in a democracy. Freedom can be nurtured only in an atmosphere of freedom. It is to the interests of organized labor to see to it that teachers are not the victims of dictatorial practices. The use of public funds, either directly or indirectly, for promoting membership in non-union organizations and for opposing membership of teachers in bona fide trade unions is a serious violation of the principles of democratic government and should be eliminated.

(Fifth Amendment)—(1954, p. 323) Congressional committees and other legislative and administrative bodies investigating alleged Communist influence in our schools have asked witnesses, including a number of those engaged in teaching in our schools and colleges, whether they are Communists. Many of those asked have declined to answer, pleading the Fifth Amendment.

The question has been asked whether we should oppose the employment of such teachers or whether opposition to their employment is, in effect, a denial of their civil liberties guaranteed under the Constitution.

As American citizens, we are dedicated to the spirit and the letter of the Fifth Amendment. It is an essential element of the judicial process, designed to vouchsafe the accused a fair trial by providing that he shall not be compelled to testify against himself.

However, there exists a wide gulf between the invoking of this eminent-fair device for the protection of an individual under criminal charges in a court of law and citing it as a negative claim to the privilege of holding an office of public trust.

We submit that an individual's refusal to admit or deny Communist Party membership when asked, by properly constituted authority, places on the authorities who employ him the responsibility to determine if he is fit and qualified to hold office.

The teachers in our public schools are employees of their respective states. It is the right and the duty of the state to determine the qualifications of its employees. Its teachers are rightfully required to demonstrate possession of certain qualities—to be intellectually free and ethically bound by basic moral principles. A Communist cannot possibly comply with such requirements. He is forcibly disciplined by his party to follow its precepts only, regardless of their relationship to truth, and to obey its commands implicitly even though the Communist Party has been determined, at law, to be an instrument designed to overthrow our government by force and violence.

Obviously, therefore, a Communist is not fit to be a teacher, regardless of any other attainments he may claim. And it follows logically then, a refusal to admit or deny Communist Party membership would properly place on the authorities who employ him the responsibility of determining his fitness for office through the school system's own properly constituted machinery for hearing and trial and to remove such teacher from office if he is found to be unfit.

The American Federation of Labor reaffirms its positive opposition to the employment of Communists as teachers and maintains that an individual's refusal to admit or deny Communist Party membership places the responsibility on the board of education to re-examine the facts and to determine his fitness through properly constituted machinery to continue in their employment.

(P. 561) Your committee concurs in the position taken by the American Federation of Labor in its clear declaration in opposition to the employment of Communists as teachers. We would point out further that the council's report:

1. Emphasizes its unqualified support of the right of any person to invoke the Fifth Amendment for his protection.
2. Differentiates between a man's right to protection in any criminal action in court, and a man's right to a job.
3. Clearly affirms the absolute necessity of having any action brought against any teacher because he invoked the Fifth Amendment based on factual evidence. It further emphasizes that any action taken must be based on the findings in a fair trial conducted "through the school systems' own properly constituted machinery for hearing and trial."

In this way both the public interest and the teacher's personal interest are protected.

Social Security—(1947, p. 661) Res. 119, calling for extension of the Social Security Act to teachers "without jeopardizing or sacrificing" pension or retirement plans presently in effect, was referred to the Committee on Social Security.

Whereas — Public school teachers are excluded from the provisions of the Social Security Act, and

Whereas—Many public school teachers have for years been in definitely low wage brackets, and

Whereas—Some states provide no pension and retirement system at all, while other states have woefully inadequate systems wholly unsatisfactory to provide for security and economic well being during the declining years of the retired teachers, and

Whereas—The United States Government, although professing grave concern over the plight of the teacher, has not made federal aid possible for teachers or for public schools on any general basis, and

Whereas—The plight of the public school teacher becomes progressively more desperate, as the cost of living has increased, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record as urging the amendment of the Social Security Act to cover the public school teachers of the nation, and be it further

Resolved—That this shall in no wise jeopardize nor supplant the pension and retirement systems now in effect in the various states, but shall bolster and support the American educational system which is disintegrating because of lack of public support.

Whereas—Teachers and other public employees are excluded from the provisions of the Social Security Act, and

Whereas — The great majority of the teachers of the United States do not have pension systems which provide adequate retirement in old age, and

Whereas—The inadequacy of teachers' salaries make imperative the provision of sound retirement systems, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled in New York City in September 1952, go on record in support of federal legislation which will make it possible for teachers to choose by their own vote whether they desire to supplement their inadequate pension systems with social security, and be it further

Resolved — That the legislative forces of the A. F. of L. be urged to support legislation to make possible social security for those teachers who desire to supplement their pensions with federal social security.

(P. 475) Convention referred the resolution to the A. F. of L. Committee on Social Security.

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor is strongly committed to securing social security coverage for all workers who desire such coverage, and

Whereas—Teachers and other employees of state and local governments are sorely in need of federal social security benefits to supplement state and local pensions in which they now hold a right and interest, and

Whereas—A bill was introduced in Congress this year which was claimed to represent the official position of the American Federation of Labor even though the bill, in direct contradiction to repeated convention commitments of the American Federation of Labor, would, if enacted, continue to deprive teachers and millions of other employees of state and local governments of the benefits of social security, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, directs that legislation be prepared which covers fully the convention action and commitments of the American Federation of Labor in providing social security coverage for all workers, definitely including teachers, who desire such coverage, and that arrangements be made for the introduction of this legislation in both the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, as soon as Congress reconvenes, and be it further

Resolved—That this bill covering the American Federation of Labor's true position be given wide publicity to contradict the erroneous impression regarding the American Federation of Labor's position, and to emphasize the American Federation of Labor's determination to fight for legislation making it possible for teachers to avail themselves of the benefits of federal social security coverage to supplement existing state and local pension laws.

Res. 61:

Whereas—A bill was introduced in the Senate of the United States . . . and similar companion bills were introduced in the House . . . providing for extension, revision and liberalization of the Social Security Law, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has demanded for many years amendments to the law to provide wider coverage and substantial liberalization of its provisions, and

Whereas—The bills herein identified meet substantially the demands of the American Federation of Labor excepting their lack of provisions for coverage on an optional basis of state and local employees, excluding firemen and policemen, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor pledges its support of these bills, providing such bill or bills are amended to include all public employees on an optional basis, excepting only firemen and policemen.

(P. 644) The convention committee recommended that since there were certain conflicts in approach to the improvement and extension of old age and survivors' insurance benefits and in legislative strategy for achieving these ends, the Lehman Bill should be endorsed in principle but not fully endorsed until such time as the teachers are included. Report and recommendation of the convention committee unanimously approved.

Teamsters-Brewery Workers (Jurisdictional Dispute)—(1939, p. 54) The Executive Council reported at length on the continued jurisdictional dispute between the two named organizations as follows:

The 53rd Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor which was held in Washington, D. C., beginning October 2, 1933, adopted the following decision in the jurisdictional dispute which arose between the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers of America and the International Union United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America:

In the case of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers of America vs. the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America, the Executive Council is of the opinion and decides that teamsters and chauffeurs in the brewery industry properly belong to and come under the jurisdiction of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and Chauffeurs.

Later on, at the 54th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor held in San Francisco, California, beginning October 1, 1934, the officers of the American Federation of Labor were directed to continue their efforts to bring about a condition under which the decision of the Washington Convention would be observed and complied with.

The Executive Council has diligently endeavored to persuade and prevail upon the officers of the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America to comply with the decision of the Washington Convention herein referred to. All efforts possible have been put forth to bring about full compliance with the decisions and instructions of these conventions.

The representatives of the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America have assumed an unyielding position; they have not complied with these convention decisions. Instead the officers of the Brewery Workers union have resorted to court action. The Executive Council reported to the 57th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor which was held in Denver, Colorado, beginning October 4, 1937, upon the institution of an application for an injunction in the Federal Court of the District of Columbia by the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America. This application for an injunction was reported upon quite fully to the Denver Convention under the heading, "Fundamental Structure of the American Federation of Labor Attacked." Justice Bailey, to whom the application for this injunction was presented, dismissed the case.

When this decision was rendered the Executive Council assumed that no further attempts would be made by the officers of the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America to transfer the controversy which arose within the family of Labor to the equity courts of the nation for settlement. Subsequent events proved that this assumption was in no way well founded, for on March 4, 1938, an amended petition was filed asking for an injunction restraining the officers of the American Federation of Labor and of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers of America, from carrying into effect the decisions of the Washington and San Francisco Conventions. The hearing on this application for an injunction has continued over quite a long period of time. The case is being heard by Judge Goldsborough of the Federal District Court of the District of Columbia.

The officers and members of the American Federation of Labor have always recognized the authority of tribunals set up within the structure of the American Federation of Labor to compose differences and to settle said differences within the family of Labor. We cannot successfully follow any other line of procedure. If the stamp of approval were placed upon resort to equity courts and to the use of the writ of injunction in the settlement of jurisdictional controversies which arise between organizations chartered by the American Federation of Labor, chaos, confusion and rebellion would follow. Jurisdictional controversies must be settled through mediation, conferences and decisions within the family of organized labor. That is fundamental to the success of our great voluntary movement.

We have fought against the use of injunctions in labor disputes between employers and employees during all the years of our existence. Our bitter opposition to the use of the writ of injunction in labor disputes inspired conventions of the American Federation of Labor to demand the enactment of legislation which would prohibit employers from resorting to the use of the injunctive process in labor disputes. Our efforts in this direction met with a large measure of success when we succeeded in prevailing upon Congress to pass the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act.

If we cannot tolerate and approve the use of the writ of injunction by employers in labor disputes, how can we consistently endorse and approve resort to the same line of procedure by organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, in jurisdictional controversies. If, as we contend, a resort to the equity courts and the use of the writ of injunction by employers is wrong, it must be increasingly wrong for the same procedure to be followed by an international union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The gist of this conclusion is well set forth in the brief filed in the case of the Brewery Workers against the American Federation of Labor and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters now pending in the court of Judge Goldsborough. We quote from the brief referred to, as follows:

If the courts begin to try to overthrow the vote of Conventions of the American Federation of Labor on questions of jurisdiction, and if the courts begin to try to determine respective jurisdiction of labor unions themselves, and if we have the great variation in decisions of the various United States Courts of Appeals as the plaintiffs point out, then we will have nothing but chaos among organized labor in the United States leading to confusion, squabbling and strikes. It is in the interest of public policy that the law which lets labor organizations determine these matters of jurisdiction for themselves be not altered at this late date.

Six years have elapsed since the decision of the Washington Convention of the American Federation of Labor herein referred to was rendered. Surely sufficient time has elapsed for passions to cool and feelings to be subordinated. Calm judgment ought to assert itself so that in accord with the principles and procedure of democracy all concerned would bow and yield to the will of the majority. But instead, opposition to the expressed will of the majority has continued during all these years and has become more intensified. The amount of money which has been spent in an effort to prevent the majority decision of conventions of the American Federation of Labor from being carried into effect, has been enormous. The fight has been carried on in a most relentless and cruel way. There is no indication at this time that the officers of the Brewery Workers International organization will comply with the decisions of the Washington and San Francisco Conventions of the American Federation of Labor. Instead, it seems that having lost in the tribunals of Labor, these officers have now indicated a determination to endeavor to defeat the American Federation of Labor itself and to utilize the power of the equity courts in order to accomplish that purpose.

Because the Executive Council has exerted every means at its command to bring about compliance with the decisions of the supreme authority within the American Federation of Labor, and because the officers of the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America have challenged the authority of the American Federation of Labor itself by seeking an injunction to restrain it from exercising its legal and moral rights to settle jurisdictional controversies, the Executive Council recommends that the charter of the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America be suspended and that it remain suspended until the International Union of the United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America complies with the decisions of the Washington and San Francisco Conventions of the American Federation of Labor.

proved report of convention committee as follows:

Under this caption is set forth the recommendation of the Executive Council with regard to the long-standing dispute existing between the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers' of America and the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America.

The Executive Council of the Federation has used every reasonable effort to bring about a reconciliation and amicable settlement through conferences between these two unions over a period of years.

While this jurisdictional question was before the council the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America applied to a court of equity in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia for an injunction to restrain the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers from attempting to carry out the decision rendered by the Executive Council, date of May 2, 1933, and approved by the Convention of the American Federation of Labor in 1933.

The Brewery Workers Union also requested from the court an injunction to restrain the American Federation of Labor from carrying out the provisions of the Executive Council's recommendation which was approved by the convention in 1933.

Your committee is of the opinion that the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor and the Convention of the American Federation of Labor was acting well within its rights in recommending the jurisdiction of national and international unions in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, and in submission of its decision to a convention for final consideration and action.

The committee deplotes the action of the Brewery Workers Union in taking questions which properly should be considered and adjudicated within the family of Labor to an outside agency.

The American Federation of Labor has for many years deplored and denounced the use of injunctions in labor disputes between employers and employees. The Federation has used its agency, its finances and its combined influence to curb the power of courts in issuing injunctions in industrial disputes. This has been the position of the Federation with regard to the use of injunctions by employers against the international unions in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. This being so, your committee is of the opinion that it is far more reprehensible and deplorable for a union within the family of the American Federation of Labor to employ this means in the settlement of its differences with another union within the family of the American Federation of Labor. It is even more deplorable that this injunction was sought in anticipation of, and not because of, a decision on the part of the Council and a Convention of the American Federation of Labor.

The Brewery Workers Union was not seeking relief from any final or binding action on the part of the council or of the Convention of the American Federation of Labor.

The order of the court carries the date, October 6, 1939. This Convention of the American Federation of Labor was not called into session until Monday, October 2nd, and no one could know in advance what the action of this convention would be with regard to any recommendation or decision rendered by the Executive Council.

It is a matter of common knowledge that conventions frequently disagree with recommendations made by the council; therefore the relief being asked in the court of equity by the Brewery Workers Union was, at best, based upon their own gratuitous and unsupported supposition that the action of the convention would be in accordance with their guess. Therefore their procedure in this matter is doubly ignominious.

First—Because it sought relief by a medium that has been denounced and condemned as an instrument in the adjudication of labor disputes.

Second—Because at the time application was made for relief no one could possibly have had definite knowledge as to what would or would not be the action of the Convention of the American Federation of Labor, convened in Cincinnati, beginning October 2, 1939.

The recommendation of your committee in this matter will, in the judgment of the committee, be far more lenient and considerate than the facts in the case warrant.

The history of the American Federation of Labor proves that its policy in these matters is judicious, patient and considerate in the extreme.

Your committee wishes to make its position clear that it believes it to be within the constitutional right of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to make recommendations with regard to jurisdiction to the conventions of the Federation.

A committee of the convention has no opportunity to weigh and consider all of the merits involved in cases of disputes covering long periods of time.

The international unions at dispute in this case appeared before the committee and were heard. It was clearly evident to the committee that full and proper consideration of the merits involved would extend to a period of time which the committee was unable to give under the rules of convention procedure.

In view of the circumstances surrounding this case, and the belief of the committee that every effort should be made to preserve peace within the family of Labor, and without thought of or intimation that the council and the Convention of the American Federation of Labor is without proper authority to finally decide all matters in dispute in the family of Labor, your committee recommends that the President of the American Federation of Labor appoint a special committee of members of the American Federation of Labor to proceed in an effort to find a basis of accommodation, leading if possible to a satisfactory settlement of the dispute at issue.

Your committee further recommends that this special committee meet and organize to carry out the provisions of this recommendation within a period of 30 days.

Your committee further recommends that this special committee be empowered to establish reasonable methods of procedure; permitting presentation of evidence and reach its conclusion and report to the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor at its first meeting held in 1940.

Your committee further recommends that, if an adjustment is not consummated by the special committee, this convention authorize and direct the Executive Council to take such action as in their opinion will conform to the recommendations submitted by the Executive Council to this convention.

Technical Assistance Programs—(1955, p. 141) The E.C. reported support for both the UN multi-lateral and the U.S. bilateral technical assistance programs:

We have enthusiastically supported these programs since their inception.

We believe they have made a significant contribution to the development of the economically backward countries and to broadening relationships between the people of the United States and other countries. One of the most valuable features of the program is the person-to-person contacts which have been established.

In addition to pushing the appropriation for technical assistance we made appearances before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee urging still further expansion of these programs. In this testimony we stressed the necessity for including representatives of the free trade union centers of the participating countries in both the planning and administration of projects.

Technological Changes — (1933, p. 473) The A. F. of L. requests the E.C. to prepare and have introduced in Congress a measure which will provide that there shall be established under the appropriate department of the government, a division whose duty it shall be to set up and to carry on the necessary research and statistical study which will supply all necessary information concerning the existing stage of technological development in the industries, and the changes which will occur in industrial methods and processes, and their effect in increasing per capita production in eliminating the number of wage earners required for production purposes.

(1936, pp. 169, 715) Since there are no unified and comparable sources of data on output, employment and actual hours in manufacturing industries, we have at the present time no way of determining beyond a rough approximation the year to year changes in labor productivity in manufacturing industries. A careful analysis of the available series covering these factors can serve as a basis, however, for a rough estimate of the average production turned out by one worker per each hour of working time.

The best estimates we have indicate that productivity of labor per man-hour of work increased by about 25 per cent during the period extending from 1929 through 1932. A further increase of about 13 per cent has been registered during the years from 1933 through 1935. Such indications as these of the changes in productivity may be derived from the Federal Reserve Board's index of the physical volume of production in manufacturing and the index of the estimated man-hours worked from the employment and hours' figures on manufacturing industries covered by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The chief difficulty in deriving a thoroughly reliable index of productivity by this method lies in the fact that the statistics of production cover establishments and industries not entirely identical with those from which employment statistics are obtained. Furthermore, the statistics of average weekly hours are secured only from a portion of the establishments and industries which report the number of employees. An additional difficulty is found in the fact that the index of production on the monthly basis may reflect labor expended in an earlier month. Finally, the production figures are generally based on an average for the month while the employment index is derived from figures covering the week ending nearest the middle of the month. Deficient though these figures are, they give us an indisputable indication of the increasing trend in labor productivity in recent years. The vast increases in the output of workers in manufacturing industries during the past few years make imperative a detailed study of the situation to enable us to determine with certainty the extent of displacement of men by machines.

As an example of an industry in which relationships between employment, production, and output per worker have undergone drastic changes in the past 10 years, a brief discussion of the experience in the shoe manufacturing industry will suffice.... the volume of production of shoes was 18 per cent greater in 1935 than in 1926. In fact, the record production of last year exceeded even the previous all-time high of 1929 by six per cent. At the same time, it will be observed that in 1935, it took 22.7 per cent less man-hours of work than in 1926 to produce 18 per cent more shoes. Most marked of all was increase in the output per man per hour. In the 10-year period the man-hour productivity increased by 52.5 per cent.

It is significant that in this industry the major increase in production since the beginning of the depression occurred between 1932 and 1933. The second major advance in productive output was recorded between 1934 and 1935. In the pre-depression peak year of 1929, 361,412,000 pair of shoes were produced. In 1935, 383,761,000 pairs were produced, an increase of 22,349,000 pairs. On the other hand, the number of jobs in the industry had dropped from 205,600 in 1929 to about 197,600 in 1935. In other words, it took 8,000 fewer workers to produce 22,000,000 more pairs of shoes.

More than that, during this period all workers engaged in the production of shoes worked on the average 8.8 fewer hours per week. This curtailment in both hours and employment resulted in a 23.2 per cent reduction in total man-hours required for production between 1929 and 1935. The productivity of each worker in one hour during this time was increased by 38 per cent.

It is clear that had there been no curtailment in weekly hours, a much larger number of workers would have been thrown out of employment. Between 1926 and 1929, while weekly hours remained constant, a 10 per cent increase in production gave only one per cent more employment. In 1933, a reduction in hours occurred under the NRA, which set an average maximum 40-hour-week for the industry and an absolute maximum 45-hour-week. The 40-hour-week was not enforced during the 16 weeks of peak production during the year. Although this restriction of hours was, therefore, by no means stringent, permitting the necessary elasticity of hours, it did away with much of the usual overtime output in the weeks of a heavy production load and spread employment among a larger number of workers. This was reflected in the fact that a nine per cent increase in shoe production between 1933 and 1935 resulted in a 3.5 per cent gain in employment.

Important changes in the marketing of shoes had occurred prior to 1933, which also stimulated the increased use of mechanical equipment. One of those was a notable increase in production of lower grade footwear reflected in the fact that between 1929 and 1933, the value of output had dropped by 42 per cent, although the volume of production was only three per cent lower. These cheap shoes which require much less time and labor caused the elimination of many important processes in their production and required much less direct labor.

While it is impossible to say in the absence of more detailed data just how much labor saving machinery was directly responsible for the 52 per cent increase in labor productivity since 1926, it is clear that important technological changes had occurred in this industry, causing a loss of thousands of jobs and preventing gains in employment proportionate to the increased output.

Our inability to determine with reasonable precision the extent of technological changes in the basic industries is due to the fact that we are compelled to rely entirely on generalized statistical data which often does not disclose the real changes in industrial technique. Only first-hand surveys of plant operation can disclose the real nature of technological changes. Changes in productivity must be studied in direct relation to such factors as changes in equipment, managerial changes, investment, cost and price structures, if we are to gain an understanding of the social and economic consequences of technological developments. Without such knowledge, it is impossible to deal intelligently with such fundamental national problems as that of industrial unemployment.

The first comprehensive effort to determine the extent and significance of technological changes with regard to unemployment was initiated in October, 1935, by the Coordinating Committee of the Central Statistical Board and the Works Progress Administration in approving a comprehensive fact-finding program under the supervision of WPA.

Designed to be the first project in a more comprehensive plan to be known as the National Research Program, the first study was entitled: "A Survey of Reemployment Opportunities and Recent Changes in Industrial Technique." This project was placed under the direction of the Research Division of WPA, and was launched as a joint project in cooperation with such outstanding private fact-finding agencies as the National Bureau of Economic Research, as well as a number of the agencies of the Federal Government.

While no comprehensive study of technological changes or technological unemployment has ever been attempted, much valuable material has been gathered by public and private agencies on special phases of the problem.

The first task in the WPA study, therefore, was to assemble and organize the existing materials so that later they could be augmented by systematic surveys carried on as a part of the National Research Project. The important function of this search of available materials was to provide background for plant surveys of productivity. In this connection, the files of the NRA are being searched in order to collect and abstract materials on specific industries including background technological data and statistics already accumulated.

Data on costs in various industries have been secured from the files of the Federal Trade Commission and the Tariff Commission, and arrangements have been made with a large number of manufacturers to secure further cost and investment data indispensable for the interpretation of technological and productivity statistics which the study will obtain. Finally, bibliographical research has been undertaken in the form of abstracts of books, articles and other materials dealing with the subject of technological change, for the guidance of the staff members in their work on the project and as a permanent contribution to the study of the subject.

Thus solidly based on the data already available, a program of actual investigations was laid out along the following lines:

1. Plant surveys of changes in productivity in certain industries.

2. Statistical studies of changing productivity.

3. Surveys of the effects of industrial changes on the labor market and on individual workers.

All government agencies which collect industrial statistics are collaborating in the project. These include the Department of Commerce with its Bureau of Census, the Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Department of Agriculture, and other agencies. Of the agencies outside the government, the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private non-profit corporation on which the A. F. of L. is represented, is the chief collaborator. . . . The Wharton School of Economics and Finance of the University of Pennsylvania is also among the non-government institutions collaborating in the study.

The first objective in the work on this project is to secure a statistical over-all picture of production and man-hours. Related to this general picture are intensive studies in selected industries which will attempt to isolate the specific developments in each industry underlying the broader general trend. The following are a few examples of types of individual industrial surveys undertaken:

1. An industry which has introduced new machinery.

2. Another which has not.

3. An old established industry, such as the shoe industry.

4. A new industry, such as rayon, radio, automobiles.

5. A suffering industry, such as coal.

6. A durable goods industry which has declined precipitously during the depression.

7. A perishable goods industry which has declined little during the depression.

8. An industry in which the production process involves primarily the use of human labor, and in which therefore the costs fluctuate more or less directly with the volume of production and number of people employed.

9. An industry in which the production process involves primarily the use of expensive machines, which continue to represent a fixed cost burden regardless of fluctuation in volume of production.

In making the plant by plant surveys in these selected industries, a staff of trained technicians and engineers, closely familiar with the technical problems of industry and its economic setup, has been engaged.

This study represents a unique, and by far the most impressive, attempt to date to analyze the mechanization of industry and its complex effect on the equilibrium of our economic structure. In the short time in which this enormous undertaking has been carried on much progress has been made and a number of industrial studies are nearing completion.

The entire project, however, is placed on an emergency basis and financed from work relief funds so that even the completion of the work in progress is by no means assured. The high caliber of the personnel engaged in the study and the quality of the data already accumulated, indicate that means must be found to carry this work to conclusion. If the results of the study fulfill the well-justified expectation of fundamental and conclusive achievement, the group engaged in the study should be placed on a permanent basis so that its important fact-finding functions may be continued without interruption.

Labor is vitally concerned with the continuation of this work because its welfare has been directly affected by the displacement of men by machines. Organized labor is determined to make sure that technological unemployment is not dealt with blindly in the years to come. It realizes that only sound and comprehensive fact-finding will make it possible to chart the employment opportunities of the future.

(P. 132) S. Res. 241 provided for an investigation of the number of persons unemployed by reason of the use of labor saving devices, mechanical and otherwise, in operation in the United States. The unemployment relief situation was also to be investigated. The object of the investigation was to determine which laws are most likely to protect Labor. The bill was introduced after a conference with our president who explained the necessity for the measure.

Members of Congress are taking an interest in this question. Representative Sumners of Texas on May 6 called attention to the enormous number of labor saving devices being invented continually. He read a letter which he had written to the Chairman of the Committee on Patents, suggesting the possible advisability of suspending for the present patents for labor saving devices. In his talk Mr. Sumners said:

This is a practical matter. Government is a practical thing. With the number of unemployed which now obtain in this country, is it not a thing worthy of our consideration whether the government should not, for the present, discontinue granting patents for labor-saving devices; discontinue offering the inducement of a monopoly of 17 years in the right to use to anyone who will invent a machine that will put more people out of work? This is a practical proposition.

Many suggestions have been made to tax labor-saving machinery with the expectation of minimizing its use. This method, however, has never received sufficient support.

A bill (H. Res. 49) was introduced in the House in the first session of the 74th Congress. Hearings were held and a representative of the A. F. of L. testified as to the necessity for legislation that would meet the issue.

(1939, p. 140) It has become apparent that we need facts and figures on productivity and labor costs in our efforts to prevent technological unemployment. We need facts and figures that will show in what industries work hours should be shortened because new machinery and techniques have increased productivity and reduced labor costs.

To this end, at the request of the E.C., Joint Resolutions (S.J. Res. 114 and H.J. Res. 265) were introduced to appropriate $100,000 for the purpose of carrying on such studies regularly in the Department of Labor.

Authentic information is constantly needed by employers and employees for wage negotiations. By making adjustments in those industries where scientific advance makes shorter hours and higher wages possible, we can attack the problem of technological unemployment at its source and control it through the normal channel of trade union agreements. This is the logical and constructive way to make sure that scientific advance in our industries will bring higher living standards instead of an increasing problem of technological unemployment.

Estimates show that approximately 1,000,000 men and women are unemployed today because of labor-saving devices installed in industry since 1929.

The information necessary to give productivity and labor cost information each month in 59 industries is readily available in the monthly records kept by these industries. This information has already been compiled so as to show productivity and labor costs from 1910 through 1936 in a study made with WPA funds. By keeping the figures up to date the usefulness of this original investment will be increased and information continuously developed that can be of real assistance to unions in planning their lines of action.

The House resolution was reported favorably by the Committee on Labor but failed to receive consideration by the House in this session.

Telegraph Companies, Proposed Merger—(1942, p. 159) The Commercial Telegraphers Union, with the aid of the American Federation of Labor, has opposed pending legislation permitting a merger of the Postal and Western Union Companies unless adequate provisions are made to safeguard established rights for the employees. S. 2598, as adopted by the Senate, provides in sub-section (f) that all employees of any carrier which becomes a party to consolidation or merger, who were employed on March 1, 1941, shall have full job protection at the compensation and rate of pay they received on the date of the approval of the consolidation or merger, with the added proviso that no employee may be assigned to work inconsistent with his training and experience. Paragraph (2) provides that if any employee who is not covered by paragraph (1) is discharged as a result of consolidation or merger, he shall receive severance pay equal to four weeks' pay multiplied by the number of years he was employed by any carrier which was a party to consolidation or merger; and no employee, regardless of the tenure of his employment, is to receive less than four weeks' pay as a severance allowance. Paragraph (3) requires that for five years following merger or consolidation, employees of any carrier which was a party to merger or consolidation shall have a preferential hiring status with the merged telegraph carrier for such positions as he is qualified to fill. Paragraph (4) provides for payment of traveling expenses, continuance of salary, and a bonus equal to two months' pay for any employee transferred from one community to another as a result of consolidation or merger. Paragraph (5) provides against impairment of any pension right or any other health, insurance, or death benefit as a result of merger or consolidation. Paragraph (6) protects the jobs of those employees who have entered or shall enter the military service since August 27, 1940. Paragraph (7) pro-protects employees against discharge, or reduction in earnings, or furlough for five years after the consolidation or merger, or for six months before, in anticipation of consolidation or merger. Paragraph (8) is the usual provision permitting discharge for incompetency or similar cause. Paragraph (9) protects employees' rights now guaranteed by any collective bargaining agreements until such agreements are terminated, and extends to employees the remedies provided by the National Labor Relations Act. Paragraph (10) exempts employees who are paid more than $5,000 per annum from the provisions of the subsections. It is expected that certain amendments providing additional safeguards can be obtained in the House Committee on Interstate Commerce where the bill is now pending.

(P. 606) In commending the activities of the E.C. in bringing about the proposed merger, the convention recommended continued efforts to bring about final enactment of a satisfactory law.

Television (also see: Public Relations)

(For Education Work by Unions)—(1952, pp. 36, 466) Res. 41:

Whereas—The Federal Communications Commission has indicated that the television channels set aside for non-profit, educational operations will not be available to bona fide labor unions who desire to carry on educational programs through this medium, and

Whereas—This medium will be vitally important for the promulgation of trade union ideals, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor at its Convention held in New York, N. Y., respectfully petition the Federal Communications Commission to make the designated educational channels available to qualified legitimate labor unions.

Tennessee Valley Authority—(1941, pp. 97, 672) This section of the Executive Council's Report refers to the additional appropriation secured for the Tennessee Valley Authority for the construction of additional power and transmission facilities. This measure was enacted with the active support of the American Federation of Labor, and its timeliness was demonstrated by the appearance of severe power shortages in areas strategic to defense.

(1948, pp. 237, 458) Res. 15 called upon the A. F. of L. to urge the President and the Legislature of the United States to support the program and policies of the TVA and to assist the TVA administrators in the development of the program.

Termination of Service Certificates—(1949, p. 35) Through Res. 2, the A. F. of L. was requested to (1) take the necessary steps to bring about the introduction of legislation to outlaw practice being followed in some states, whereby employers refuse to hire workers for jobs for which they are otherwise qualified unless they produce certificates of termination of service from the last previous employer; and (2) to alert every affiliated local union, city central body and council to the dangers of this practice.

(P. 478) Convention approved recommendation of its committee that the A. F. of L. investigate this complaint and take whatever steps are necessary to stop the oppressive practice imposed by some employers upon workers to produce a certificate of termination of service when they apply for employment.

This resolution posed a difficult problem from a national standpoint, especially for jobs confined solely to intrastate commerce as Congress can legislate only in regard to interstate commerce.

We do fully sanction the purposes of the resolution believing that elimination of certificates of termination of service though highly desirable should be eliminated by action of the legislatures in the respective states.

A large portion of the solution seems to lie in the field with social security, including unemployment benefits for periods elapsing between jobs, medical benefits, pensions, etc. Life insurance, vacations, etc., have long been regarded only as "fringe benefits" and until recently they were dispensed in large degree at the whim and pleasure of the employer. For this reason it would seem that these subjects are fair topics for consideration as part of the working contract, except that once the employment ceases, there is no further working contract involved.

Therefore, the matter appears to get into what could be described as a "no-man's land" lying between the old jobs and the new jobs and thus not subject to any degree of control. It further seems that because this is true that it is asking that the Federal Government be implored to do something that, at least in large measure, seems to belong either to the state or to the contract.

A bill could of course be drawn, but if enacted into law eventually would be ruled unconstitutional as an unlawful encroachment in a domain not lying within the federal field. Of course, in interstate commerce, almost anything could be done, but there again we would appear to be handing over to the Federal Government the rights of the employee to bargain to the extent of his greatest benefit.

To focus attention on the difficulties of this proposal, we point out that the A. F. of L. has a retirement plan, also a life insurance plan. It will readily be seen how difficult it would be to draft either state or federal legislation to protect A. F. of L. employees, in other employment, if they leave its service.

Such action as is indicated seems properly to lie within the field of social security and could well be advanced in our claims for passage of H.R. 6000, the pending Social Security Bill now before the Senate Finance Committee.

(P. 454) This resolution (No. 2) was adopted by the 1949 Convention, and proposed the drafting of federal legislation to eliminate the requirement of certificates of termination of service, and to take care of other benefits ranging from matters which are properly included in collective bargaining, and social insurance, to public welfare.

The Executive Council is of the opinion that it is not feasible to carry out the resolution and we move approval of this recommendation.

Territorial Department Proposed— (1947, p. 415) Res. 77, calling for the establishment of a Territorial Department of the American Federation of Labor was referred to the Executive Council. The resolution follows:

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has encouraged and fostered organized labor movements in the Territories of Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, facilitating a better understanding of the ideals and democracy of the United States of America, and

Whereas—The educational and social work started in these territories should be continued, enlarged, and systematized so as to raise the living standards of the working people of these territories to American levels as a safeguard against the penetration of foreign and un-American doctrines and obnoxious propaganda, and

safeguards for the American people and our nation and as strongholds of the American Federation of Labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 66th Convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in the City of San Francisco, authorize and empower the Executive Council to establish where it will consider it advisable and convenient a Territorial Department in charge of all the affairs of organized labor in the Territories of Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico to coordinate constructively the work to be done in the organization field between the Central Office of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates in these territories and assure them full cooperation and assistance in their endeavor to organize the toiling masses within the American Federation of Labor and in their fight for American ideals and democratic principles.

Territorial Federations of Labor (Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico) — (1947, p. 620) The convention committee considering reports from the several Territories of the U.S. (Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico) made the following recommendations which were unanimously approved:

... these areas constitute the frontiers of our country. We recommend that the President of the American Federation of Labor call the attention of all national and international presidents to their responsibility to the wage earners of their areas and urge them to organize unions. To safeguard the frontier is just as wise Labor policy as it is necessary for military defense. All unions should be alert to the fact that fifth column activity is increasing rapidly in the economic field as in the military. Our greatest contribution to the maintenance of democratic institutions is to extend and keep healthy free trade unions in every area over which our flag waves.

We also recommend that international unions send representatives to visit these territories.

Textbooks, Labor History in—(1943, p. 592) Res. 66 and 68 were reported on jointly by the committee and unanimously adopted as follows:

Res. 66:

Whereas—The progress of the working men and women of the United States of America rests wholly upon the education the masses receive, and

Whereas—The public schools are the main source of education for the majority of Americans, and

Whereas—Few schools ever make any attempt to enlighten the pupils as to Labor's part in the founding and maintenance of the United States of America, therefore be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record as demanding that all branches of organized labor bring pressure to bear on their respective state legislatures to make it mandatory that public school history text books contain the true story as to who made the Declaration of Independence, who staged the Boston Tea Party and the true facts as to the origin and progress of the American labor movement.

Res. 68:

Whereas—One of the important functions of the trade union movement is to educate the trade unionists in order to understand the problems confronting the labor movement and the best policies and methods to be adopted in order to solve these problems, and

Whereas—Labor education is necessary in order to combat anti-union propaganda which is carried on continuously by enemies of Labor through the press, radio, movies and textbooks, therefore be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations be and are hereby requested to enlarge and extend their educational activities, making use of the press, special pamphlets, radio and the movies, and be it further

Resolved—That we use our influence in order to bring about the establishment of trade union courses in high schools and extension courses giving the history, structure, policies and accomplishments of the trade union movement so that the boys and girls that will enter industry after graduating from these schools will take along with them some basic knowledge of the true facts of the trade union movement.

Resolution No. 66 advocates the teaching of labor problems, American history, and citizenship in public schools. Resolution No. 68 advocates not only teaching of labor problems in the public schools but also a more extensive program of education and public relations by means of the press, radio, movies and pamphlets. The committee calls attention to the fact that the American Federation of Labor has already taken steps to establish a public relations department and that this service will be further extended in the near future. Also the Workers' Education Bureau, at this very convention has launched an enlarged program of education and public relations. The American Federation of Labor has long advocated the teaching of labor problems in public schools and colleges. The extent to which such subjects are taught varies widely. Elsewhere in this report reference is made to the Harvard Fellowship Plan. Professors from several universities are visiting this convention to study at first hand the problems of organized labor so they may give their students reliable information about Labor.

The committee therefore concurs in these two resolutions and urges affiliated unions to follow the example of the A. F. of L. in enlarging educational and public relations programs and promoting the teaching of Labor history and problems in public schools and colleges.

Textile Workers of America, Re-affiliation (also see: Labor Unity; C.I.O.)—(1939, p. 48) A substantial group of textile workers who were a part of the United Textile Workers organization which participated in the formation of the C.I.O., became disillusioned and disappointed over the actions taken by the C.I.O. and by the policies which it pursued. They expressed a desire to return to the American Federation of Labor. These unions of textile workers were located in New England, in Southern states and in other places. A substantial number were textile workers organized into Textile Workers Unions at Providence, Rhode Island. An attempt was made by certain representatives of the C.I.O. to gain possession of funds which had been accumulated in the treasury of certain textile workers unions in Rhode Island. These unions resisted this attempt on the part of the C.I.O. to take over their treasuries. A suit was instituted in court at Providence. The court decided in favor of the local unions. The C.I.O., as represented through the Textile Workers Organizing Committee, was prevented from taking over the funds and property of these local unions. This action on the part of the court was interpreted as a decided victory for the textile workers in their fight against the C.I.O.

The representatives of the United Textile Workers organization who withdrew from affiliation with the C.I.O., made application for a charter of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor.

The Executive Council at its meeting held in Miami, Florida, beginning January 30, 1939, ordered that a certification of affiliation shall be issued to the United Textile Workers of America in accordance with the constitution, rules and laws of the American Federation of Labor.

In granting this certificate of affiliation, it is the intention of the Executive Council to re-invest the said United Textile Workers of America with its former certificate of affiliation with its former jurisdiction rights and obligations.

Following this action of the Executive Council, the United Textile Workers charter which had been cancelled when the United Textile Workers became part of the C.I.O., was returned. A convention of textile workers was called and met in the City of Washington on May 8, 1939. The charter of the United Textile Workers of America was formally returned to the officers and delegates in attendance at this convention on May 10, 1939.

During the interim while the United Textile Workers were a part of the C.I.O., the American Federation of Labor organized 27 federal labor unions composed of textile workers. These federal labor unions are directly affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. This means that many thousands of textile workers are now organized into unions directly affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

A hearty welcome was extended to the officers and members of the United Textile Workers back into affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. They have renewed their pledge of devotion and loyalty to our great movement. We have assisted them in the reestablishment of the United Textile Workers organization and in the extension of organizing work among textile workers everywhere. It is our purpose to carry on this organizing campaign in New England, the South, and in other sections of the country where textile workers are employed, in a most aggressive and determined way. We firmly believe that the majority of the textile workers of the country believe in the principles, policies and philosophy of the American Federation of Labor and that ultimately the textile workers of the nation will be organized into the United Textile Workers organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

(P. 393) Convention unanimously approved action of E.C. in granting reaffiliation to United Textile Workers and recommended that all possible assistance be given in its efforts to rebuild its organization and to rally to its ranks those workers believing in the principles and policies of the American Federation of Labor.

Thought Control (see: Education; Teachers)

Tidelands Oil, Income for Educational Purposes—(1951, pp. 292, 398) Res. 44 called upon the A. F. of L. to support proposal to use income from submerged tidelands to further educational purposes.

(Pp. 312, 398) Res. 96 requested A. F. of L. support to efforts being made to secure legislation providing that royalties from tidelands oil shall be earmarked for educational purposes.

Timber Lands, Conservation—(1946, pp. 489, 502) Two similar resolutions were adopted by the convention, Nos. 2 and 18. These resolutions provide substantially the following as outlined by the "resolve" in Res. 2:

Resolved—That we favor immediate action in the development of a state and national program for all forest lands that will protect the forests from fire, insects, and disease damage; promote forestry practices that will result in full use of the productive capacity of these lands but not overuse which would bring exhaustion of usable timber at a later date; promote greater utilization of the wood products thereby eliminating waste and conserving timber supplies now available; and provide for an aggressive start on reforestation of lands now not producing anything of commercial value, and be it further

Resolved—That we specifically favor immediate action through the passage by Congress of a cooperative insect law comparable to the cooperative fire control law which will provide for the protection of privately owned lands now threatened by outbreaks of destructive insect pests which each year destroy much valuable timber in northern Idaho and western Montana, and be it still further

Resolved—That we demand immediate action on an expanded federal forest road development program to open up inaccessible timber stands in the mountainous country most of which are within the boundaries of the national forests and which roads are needed if overmature or diseased timber is to be salvaged and these back country timber stands put on a better managed basis.

Tito Regime Condemned—(1946, p. 625) The A. F. of L. Committee on International Labor Relations made the following report which was unanimously approved:

At this time your committee wishes to call to the attention of the delegates of this convention another example of the ruthless, despotic disregard for the essential principles of justice which characterizes the Tito regime in Yugoslavia—a puppet “government” of Soviet Russia.

Specifically, reference is made solely to the procedures followed by Tito in arriving at the judgment that Archbishop Stepanic was guilty of treasonable acts which merited a sentence of 20 years imprisonment.

This brutal disregard for the basic tenets of justice and civil liberties and the chicanery which characterized the so-called “trial” demonstrates all too clearly that the policies which contributed to the rise of the Axis powers have not been erased by their defeat. While the names of the totalitarianism government have changed, their practices still remain. It is, therefore, the obligation of every freedom-loving person to continue without hesitation the fight against totalitarianism no matter when it may appear.

It is the considered judgment of your committee that the American Federation of Labor should be among the leaders in this fight against dictatorship or oppression in any or all forms. For that reason, therefore, your committee recommends that this convention go on record as condemning the tyrannical, despotic government of this Tito regime.

Tobacco Workers vs. Teamsters (see: Teamsters)

Towing Between American Ports—(1940, pp. 90, 408) Prior to enactment of H.R. 8283 (Public 599, 1940) the American ships had a monopoly on towing between American ports the total penalty which could be collected from foreign ships for towing between American ports was only 50 cents per ton. This small penalty has proved wholly inadequate to protect domestic trade from foreign competition. Under the bill penalty increased from $5 to $50 per ton.

Trade Mark Act, Lanham—(1954, p. 452) Res. 141:

Whereas—In 1946 there was passed by the Congress of the United States legislation known as the Lanham Trade Mark Act, and

Whereas — Said Lanham Trade Mark Act has as its intention the clarification of previous legislation protecting union trade marks registered by labor organizations, and

Whereas—Said union trade marks of union labels are designed for the special purpose of promoting those products manufactured by members of organized labor under contract to fair employers, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor did support passage of the Lanham Trade Mark Act as it sought to prevent the unauthorized use of union labels or trade marks, and

Whereas—Certain sections of the Act subject to court interpretation have given rise to serious doubts as to whether the Act provides the protection for which it was designed, and

Whereas—Unscrupulous manufacturers and printers have seized upon this doubt and are presently in increasing numbers violating the spirit of the Lanham Trade Mark Act, and

Whereas—If this condition is allowed to continue, all union labels, shop cards, and buttons will lose their value as a means of identification of union made products and union services, thus resulting in the destruction of one of organized labor's greatest assets; therefore, be it

Resolved—That the Union Label and Service Trades Department go on record as urging an immediate clarification amendment of the Lanham Trade Mark Act so that the very foundation of the department—the union label—be protected from unauthorized use, and

Resolved—That upon the passage of this resolution by the Union Label and Service Trades Department Convention, the secretary of the department stand instructed to introduce this resolution into the Convention of the American Federation of Labor convening in the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles, Calif., on September 20, 1954, and urge its adoption by this body, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor assist in drafting and securing passage of adequate legislation to clarify and restore the original intent of the Lanham Trade Mark Act of protection of the union label, shop cards, and buttons.

(P. 596) This resolution had to do with amendments to the Lanham Trade Mark Act, as adopted by the United States Congress in 1946. Earlier recognized loopholes in the Act have been capitalized upon by unfair and unscrupulous manufacturers and printers in increasing numbers and who are engaging in a practice of violating the intent and spirit of the Act. If existing conditions are allowed to continue all union labels, shop cards and buttons will lose their value as a means of identification of union-made products and union services, thus resulting in the destruction of one of organized labor's greatest assets. Your committee knows that delegates to this convention feel keenly that the Lanham Trade Mark Act should be amended and your committee concurs in the expression of the resolution that the American Federation of Labor assist in drafting and securing a passage of adequate legislation to clarify and restore the original intent of the Lanham Trade Mark Act as a means of further protecting union labels, shop cards and buttons.

Trade Schools (Public)—(1924, p. 245):

Whereas—Many so-called public trade schools which are in reality financed and controlled by private interests, mislead the youth of America into the belief that through the processes of short and intensive training competent mechanics are being created; and

Whereas—Experience has demonstrated that most of these institutions are more concerned with selfish motives rather than that of benefiting the youth of our land, and do not provide competent journeymen mechanics; therefore, be it

Resolved—That the 44th Annual Convention of the A. F. of L. expresses its disapproval of these so-called "trade schools," which are in reality controlled and used by private interests to serve their own selfish purposes, that it warns the youth of America against the wastage of time and money involved in patronizing such institutions, and urges their return to the apprenticeship system, under union conditions of employment, so that knowledge of fundamentals may be coordinated with skill and training, and so that the guidance and direction of skill and training may be confined to those having attained competency in the trades and having an accurate knowledge of conditions within the trades.

"Trade Union Courier," Protest Against—(1954, pp. 451, 491) Res. 140:

Whereas—The International Labor Press of America has consistently endeavored to eliminate from the labor press field unethical and irregular publications parading as Labor papers, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has at all times encouraged and cooperated with the labor press in carrying out this important task, and

Whereas—In the course of this phase of ILPA endeavors, a complaint was filed with the U.S. Federal Trade Commission against a publication known as the Trade Union Courier, published in the City of New York, charging that publication with unauthorized use of the name of the American Federation of Labor in the solicitation of advertising and donations, and

Whereas—The aforesaid Trade Union Courier has been announcing publicly through its columns and in testimony before a Federal Trade Commission examiner, that it has the bona fide endorsement of over 2,000 A. F. of L. unions, and

Whereas—This publication has continued to claim of 2,000 A. F. of L. union endorsements in the high-pressure solicitation of advertising and donations, in spite of the fact that the officers and Executive Council of the A. F. of L. and the ILPA have repeatedly denounced the Trade Union Courier for its unethical methods which have proved injurious to the prestige and good name of the labor movement, be it therefore

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor at its 73rd Annual Convention at Los Angeles, California, September 20, 1954, that we hereby go on record requesting the officers of this Federation to institute a thorough investigation into the validity of the 2,000 A. F. of L. union endorsements claimed by the Trade Union Courier, and be it further

Resolved—That in the event that any of the above mentioned endorsements are found to be valid, the offices of the American Federation of Labor are hereby urged to bring about the cancellation of such endorsements, to the end that the good name of the American Federation of Labor, the International Labor Press of America and their affiliates be protected from further injury, and be it further

Resolved—That copies of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this convention, and forwarded to the International Labor Press of America and to the affiliated international unions of the A. F. of L. for their information and guidance.

Trade Union Discipline—(1927, p. 87) In Hall vs. Morrin et al., the St. Louis Court of Appeals held that a general executive board was not disqualified to try a member who had made charges against the personnel of the board, because under the laws of the union it was the only body to weigh and determine the charges, and if the board was incompetent to try him it must be manifest that he could not have been tried at all. It was also held that a suit is prematurely brought before all the remedies within the union are exhausted.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska, in Crisler vs. Crum, has also held that a member of a trade union is bound by and required to observe the law of the association which requires that he shall exhaust his remedies within the association before appealing to the courts. According to the decision, a labor union may lawfully adopt rules for the government of its members and provide tribunals within the association for determining controversies within the organization, provided such rules are reasonable and uniform.

While the courts uniformly hold that a member of a trade union must first exhaust his remedies within the organization before appealing to the courts, this rule does not hold good where one has been wrongfully expelled. This rule of law was expressed in the case of Mullens vs. Seegers, decided by the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

Trade Unions Defined (Free) — (1944, p. 629) The convention committee considering international affairs, included the following terse definition of a "free trade union" in its report, which was unanimously adopted:

Free trade unions are independent organizations controlling their own terms and conditions of membership, deciding their own rules, and discipline of membership, able to make a contract with assurance of fulfillment. Free trade unions are not state controlled nor are they auxiliaries of the state, dominant party, or any employer or employers' organizations. Free trade unions are not subject to any political party nor do they serve as party tools. Power of deciding policies and the course of the organization is lodged with the union membership.

Trade Union Functions—(1928, pp. 22, 235) The American trade union movement is an institution that reveals what is in the minds of representative wage earners of the North American continent. It is an institution that directly influences the thought and development of the whole western atmosphere. It is continental, following commerce and economic developments regardless of political boundaries, and in this respect differs from the labor movements of Europe. We have, therefore, in this wide base of our movement unusual problems in addition to those of languages and nations due to the number of immigrants who have come to our shores. Although men and women have come to us with the customs and manners of foreign countries, so strong has been the spirit of the New World, so influential have been economic conditions and situations, that the work of blending conflicting elements into a cohesive whole is developing unity of feeling that controls and works through distinctive regional characteristics.

Our movement has ever been a most effective Americanization agency that has interpreted to wage earners from practically all other countries of the world the American spirit of independence and self-help and has helped them to realize American standards of life and work. We have been the standard-making agency that has set the pace for wages, hours and conditions of work for the unorganized as well as the organized.

Because our purpose is to help in promoting industrial and social progress, a report of our undertakings and progress during the past year is of consequence to industry and of public importance. Our undertakings will be considered from two aspects: what we have tried to do and how we have gone about it.

Some of our most important undertakings have to do with intangible things, and progress cannot be measured in concrete terms. We are fundamentally concerned to establish constructive relations between management and workers that will give workers status, steady work, high wages, and proper hours. As workers achieve status comes opportunity to participate in the problems of production. Both policies agree in that an efficient economic organization is the essential basis of all planning. The workers become one of those groups that has a personal interest in the prosperity of their industry instead of being time servers only.

Reflecting this progress toward economic status the problems of the trade union movement are changing, although not uniformly. In some industries workers are still struggling for the right to belong to unions, while unions that are in the van of progress are studying problems of cooperation and increasing union services. There are two opposing policies of making progress—one which makes force alone its agency for progress and the other endeavor through intelligent strategy to make progress without strife. The advocates of force believe that men's decisions yield only to force and that Labor must rely solely upon militant tactics. Those who believe that progress is made through increasingly better agreements and relations between employers and employees, hold that problems must be settled by conference and discussion even after the fight is over, believe that it is therefore better to develop a strategy that will make the fight unnecessary and then to concentrate on gathering facts and following policies that will enable the union to sustain its proposals in the conference. These economic statesmen of the labor movement realize that industrial as well as all other relationships of life rest upon associated activity and that the spirit of conflict prevents clear thinking and retards progress. But workers alone cannot determine the nature of industrial relations. Employers also must put their faith in intelligence if constructive relationships are established. Intelligence assures a square deal to both groups and abandons efforts on the part of one to profit by taking advantage of the other. Where the principle of cooperation is accepted, the union is in a position to enter into the problems of production. With the principle formulated by the Federation some years ago—standards of living can be permanently raised only by increasing production—organized labor has a basis of common interests with management and therefore finds cooperation an advantage. By following policies based on this understanding, trade unions are lifting their undertaking to the spirit and purpose of economic statesmanship. As economic statesmen we are doing a constructive work second to no other group in the country.

In common with the change that has come in the use of this word in the field of politics we no longer think of a statesman as a person above the affairs of daily life, who gives utterance to ponderous statements and is generally out-manuevered by the politicians. We use the word to designate men actively responsible for urgent problems of national welfare, alert to see where constructive principles can be applied and competent to achieve practical results.

(1931, p. 59) While the A. F. of L. is the channel through which all organized labor cooperates and as such it has influence and effectiveness, it has no existence separate from the progress and development of affiliated national and international unions. Certain broad fundamental principles are characteristic of the American labor movement and those are promoted and strengthened by the federated trade union movement.

The work of the past 50 years may be summed up as an effort to establish status in industry for wage earners, to define their relationships within industries, and to establish securities for them in their work relationships.

The prerequisites to industrial progress for wage earners is organization to mobilize and direct their forces. Organization represents consciousness of labor problems and the practicability of attacking these problems as something to be solved. The first objective of the union is a collective work contract. The unorganized worker either accepts the terms offered or hunts another job if he can afford to run the risk of unemployment. Only when workers act collectively through their chosen representatives, can they negotiate a work contract, carefully weighing each item in order to reach mutually satisfactory terms. Acting collectively, workers become party to an agreement, and their relationship to the industry becomes truly contractual. As the terms of contract or the relationships existing under a contract are more carefully defined, new fields for collective undertakings open up and the essential partnership of Labor in the production undertakings is developed and utilized as the basis of progress.

The steel workers were among the earliest to negotiate work contracts, setting up a sliding scale of wages for their industry. The cigar workers and printers adopted scales of prices which were submitted to employers as the basis for negotiations. The flint glass workers, the glass bottle blowers and the window glass workers early persuaded the employers in their industries to the practice of annual joint negotiations. In 1891 the International Iron Molders and the Stove Founders National Defense Association established the practice of conference and joint labor agreement covering the industry which has since been maintained uninterrupted.

It is unionism of this type that has been promoted through the federated trade union movement, which has helped to organize workers into unions and to federate these unions into national or international unions.

The Federation has been the instrumentality through which the collective support of all workers can be brought to the rescue of a group in an emergency, such as interruption of joint relations, a strike, lockout, the revolt of an insurgent group that refuses to follow accepted practices of the union. The Federation has helped to secure conferences between unions and employers, to present the union's cause to the public and to political authorities.

It has served as the clearing center for information on new developments in collective bargaining so that the information might be available for all groups.

In addition to the work contract, which usually contains work rates as well as definite conditions of work and pay, the collective agreement usually provides for the interpretation of the agreement and the adjustment of disputes arising under it. More recently agreements have been including provisions for sustained cooperation in the processes of production or sales.

During the 50 years of the Federation's service, national and international unions have made tremendous progress within their jurisdictions. The Federation has furnished the agency through which overlapping problems of trade organization have been adjusted and has promoted the spirit and practices of cooperation. It has served as the constructive force among wage earners pointing out to them that their welfare could be better advanced by sustained intelligent self-activity than through efforts to establish a new order by revolution or by legislation. It has held that freedom and progress can be achieved by thought and organization. It has been at once the most effective force for the advancement of Labor and a constructive national asset.

Trade Union Advisory Committee (ERP)—(1948, p. 486) Bona fide trade unionists everywhere can only welcome the establishment of the Trade Union Advisory Committee and the program adopted by the July London Conference for mobilizing free labor behind ERP. The decision of this historic conference to have the Trade Union Advisory Committee collaborate closely with the Office of European Economic Cooperation (O.E.E.C.) and to secure adequate labor representation in the most important industrial subdivisions (transport, metal, etc.) will bear fruitful results. The decision to have affiliation fees and permanent functioning by the Trade Union Advisory Committee in guiding and mobilizing European labor for reconstruction is a highly significant and welcome development for the entire international trade union movement.

The Trade Union Advisory Committee must be popularized and strengthened. The four editions of the "International Free Trade Union News" should be devoted to this task. The International Labor Relations Committee should publish special literature toward this end. We recommend that there be assigned a representative of the A. F. of L. to give a substantial part of his time and services in the T.U.A.C.

We further recommend that the Executive Council invite the principal leaders of the T.U.C. to confer with it at its January-February session with a view of strengthening the collaboration between the A. F. of L. and the British labor movement for the fullest and most effective participation by labor in assuring the success of the ERP in achieving continental economic integration and reconstruction, improving the standards of living and working conditions of labor, enhancing the growth and effectiveness of the Trade Union Advisory Committee as a unifying force of free labor in Europe and elsewhere.

We can only hope and pray that as a result of such intensified and expanded cooperation of the trade union movements of all the free countries the day will be hastened when trade unionism in France will be completely liberated from the clutches of Communism and become united under the banner of democratic labor like the Force Ouvriere and when there will be established in Italy a united democratic trade union movement based solely on economic lines and free from all political and governmental domination. It is with heightened hope and confidence that we look to the day when there will again be functioning in an inspiring and effective manner a genuine international of free trade unions. Freedom-loving labor throughout the world can count on the enthusiastic and energetic support of the A. F. of L. for the attainment of this great goal.

The Department of Labor, which is responsible for the formulation of our government's foreign and domestic labor policies, receives direct advice on international labor affairs from the leaders of American labor through this Committee. The Trade Union Advisory Committee provides the machinery through which the Department of Labor works with the American trade union movement. . . .

In line with its desire to strengthen the labor aspects of American foreign policy the American Federation of Labor is actively supporting the work of the Committee and the Department of Labor's international objectives.

(P. 504) Never before was it so urgent for our labor movement and government to cooperate heartily and effectively in the extension and expansion of decent working and living conditions and the promotion of human rights on a world scale.

In view of the increasingly aggressive challenge of totalitarian despotism to our free society and American way of life, your Committee recommends the furtherance of the above-noted cooperation through the A. F. of L. representatives.

(1951, pp. 76, 471) A brief resume of the work of this committee was presented to the convention by the E.C. concluding with the statement that: The American Federation of Labor lends its full support to this committee, and welcomes this means of working with the Department of Labor in implementing the labor aspects of American foreign policy.

Trade Union Statistics—(1925, p. 33) We are, therefore, striving to collect and collate information on trade union membership that will enable us to gauge our progress and to plan for more effective organizing work. We hope to develop statistics for trades, for industries, and for cities, states and geographic and industrial districts. As the facts become available they will be published or made accessible in the most practical way.

(P. 229) As a basis for planning organization work exact trade union statistics are indispensable as measuring rods in estimating the job and to test the results of specific methods. We hope that the A. F. of L. will continue to improve trade union statistical information and to make the data available in periodic reports.

Trade Unity Conference (Anglo-Russian)—(1925, p. 333) A resolution was introduced into the convention which called for support to the Anglo-Russian Unity Committee in its efforts to convoke a world conference of trade unions of every country for the purpose of establishing unity in the international trade union movement. However, the convention declared it an "impudent proposal" and added:

"It is proposed that we join what is called the Anglo-Russian Unity Conference in an effort to bring about world labor unity.

"This is merely new language for the old 'united front' propaganda by which Moscow for years sought to bring world labor under its undemocratic and destructive sway.

"It is almost impossible to understand how any thoughtful democratic national labor movement could be so deceived as to lend the color of its support to such a treacherous proposal.

"The A. F. of L. is willing at all times to join with the free labor movements of other countries for the promotion and protection of the interests of the toiling masses. It will not lend its support to any movement to destroy from ambush the freedom of the workers of democratic countries. On the contrary, it will do all in its power to reveal the truth and to open the eyes of Labor everywhere to the infamy of this proposed treachery.

"The British workers have sent to us a message urging our sympathetic consideration of the proposal contained in this resolution. In addition to recording our own hostility to that movement, we return to the British workers and to all workers everywhere the call to stand by liberty, democracy, freedom, the right of peoples to self-rule, the right of national labor movements to determine their own policies and their right to be loyal to the free institutions of their countries.

"Furthermore, we convey to the world the most solemn warning of which we are capable that we will not willingly tolerate in the Western Hemisphere any old world movement which seeks to impose itself upon American peoples over the will of those peoples. What the U.S. Government, through President Monroe, expressed to Europe as a warning against armed territorial aggression, we convey in equally emphatic terms regarding aggression by propaganda. The Americas stand for democracy. The Pan-American Federation of Labor is the recognized international labor movement of the Americas. Through it the American Republics give expression to the aspirations and ideals of their wage earning masses and the American peoples are determined that it shall so continue.

"Neither the red internationale of autocratic Moscow nor any other internationale may in complacency ignore this definition of American labor policy. American labor is friendly to all the world, insofar as the world is bent upon achievement of the aims of democracy. It will contest to the last every inch of ground whenever and wherever autocracy seeks to invade the hallowed soil of this hemisphere. And we shall accept no pretense of 'world labor unity' as a mask for invading disrupters and destroyers.

"The New World is dedicated to human freedom. We want all the world to be free and we shall help to that end wherever possible. But above all and beyond all it shall preserve and develop the freedom of the Americas."

Training for National and International Service (Labor)—(1950, p. 62)
Trade unionists have been steadily lifting the status and influence of their organizations and consequently have wider and more important opportunities for service in both industrial and national life. Correspondingly in other countries wage earners have gained economic and political influence and as national institutions their policies and procedures are of importance in understanding the national life and probable developments within nations. Consequently the labor philosophy and union procedures of a nation constitute a very important part of intelligence for guidance of our foreign policies and relations. In this field also our embassies and legations need continuous service somewhat akin to that which has helped the European Recovery Program make a constructive contribution.

With opportunities for wider service in many fields the trade union movement should be seeking and developing facilities to prepare capable trade unionists to be ready to utilize these opportunities. We should not leave the development of such facilities to the initiative of educators who wish chiefly to expand existing educational institutions. We should seek institutions and personnel best able to work out this constructive undertaking. What we need in the international field may also be duplicated in the political field. At least we should keep this possibility in mind in connection with developments.

(P. 433) We especially need training facilities so that we may better perform the obligations devolving upon us.

We recommend that the E.C. consider plans for such training facilities.

Transportation Companies, Subsidies—(1939, p. 454) Res. 16:

Whereas—The continued high taxes on eral estate is still causing stagnation in the Building Trades; and

Whereas—The enormous subsidies paid to Commercial Highway, Waterway, and Airway Transportation Companies in the form of Canals, Harbors, Deepened Waterways, Streets, Highways and Landing Facilities, is one of the chief causes of high property taxes; and

Whereas—The large majority of those on relief in most cities are connected with the Building Trades, be it therefore

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record to petition the American and Canadian Governments, as well as State and Provincial Legislatures, to compel all forms of Commercial Transportation to pay for all right-of-way services and other necessary facilities, in order that there may be a reduction in property taxation, which would again permit the Building Trades to function in a more normal capacity, bringing greatly increased purchasing power to our country.

Referred to Executive Council.

Travel (International) for Union Members—(1949, p. 58) A. F. of L. approved Res. 61 as follows:

Whereas—The promotion of world peace and international brotherhood is essential to the welfare of organized labor throughout the world, and

Whereas—International travel and visiting among the citizens of the several nations of the world are effective means of promoting world peace and brotherhood, and

Whereas—A primary cause of war is the fact that travel among the citizens of the world has been left largely to wealthy individuals and representatives of business, and

Whereas—UNESCO and other international agencies have pointed out the vital need for more travel on the part of average citizens, including especially members of organized labor and other persons who are not interested primarily in profit, and

Whereas—The exchange of union members has proved to be a wholesome and effective means of promoting mutual understanding and international friendship, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled in St. Paul, Minnesota in October 1949, go on record in favor of:

1. Promotion of inexpensive tours abroad which are within the economic reach of the average citizens of the nation.
2. Negotiation of vacations with pay which will make possible international travel.
3. Inclusion in the education program of organized labor of information in relation to travel programs and encouragement of members of unions to participate in such programs, and
4. Recommendation to the standing committee on education of the A. F. of L. that study and support be given to working out programs of international travel for members of unions.

(P. 357) This resolution urges the establishment of inexpensive tours abroad so that members of organized labor will have an opportunity to visit other countries as a means of promoting international brotherhood and good will. It has been pointed out in the program of UNESCO that too much of the travel among the citizens of the world has been left to persons who are interested only in the profit motive and often in the exploitation of the peoples of foreign countries, rather than in the cultivation of their friendship. While rapid travel in this modern age is increasing the possibility of world wars, the same rapid travel may also be used as a means of creating good will and implementing world peace.

Travel Commission Proposed — (1954, p. 155) The A. F. of L. supported a proposal to create a U.S. Travel Commission to further more travel by American citizens in foreign countries for the purpose of promoting international understanding, scientific advancement, and cultural enrichment. The A. F. of L. proposed certain amendments to safeguard the safety and health of traveling Americans and to make sure that labor standards would not be impaired. The A. F. of L. also suggested the inclusion of representatives of labor on the Commission. The proposed bill was not reported out of the subcommittee, however.

(P. 587) Your Committee recommends continued support for legislation to create a U.S. Travel Commission responsible for the promotion of travel by American citizens abroad to promote international understanding, scientific advancement and cultural enrichment.

Trieste (Plebiscite for)—(1952, pp. 65, 549) Res. 117:

This resolution appropriately calls for ending the dangerously strained relations between democratic Italy and Tito's Yugoslavia by having "the destiny of the Trieste territory left to its inhabitants through an early plebiscite under U.N. supervision in the contested zones."

Your Committee recommends indorsement of this resolution. We further recommend that our government make every effort to rally British and French support of the proposal to settle this vexing problem along ethnic lines. In this connection, Yugoslavia, which has been receiving considerable military and economic aid from our country for the purpose of preserving its national independence now menaced by Russian aggression and Soviet satellite provocation, should be reminded in a firm and friendly manner that, to be worthy of continued American help, it should reciprocate such life-saving aid by accepting this moderate and just proposal for eliminating Italo-Yugoslav friction over the problems of the destiny of Trieste.

Trip-Leasing (Highway)—(1955, p. 93) A. F. of L. proposed bill and reported to convention as follows:

As originally proposed, we joined in opposition to this bill chiefly because of its lack of assurance of conformity with highway safety standards as well as its being not in line with the rigid standards met by our Teamsters for safe driving in over-the-road hauls.

As reported, the bill contains requirements of "liability and cargo insurance covering all such equipment" which clause was not in the bill as introduced. The reported bill also includes no limitation upon time trip-leasing may be in effect or the period vehicles and drivers may be part of any agreement.

A much more loosely-worded bill on this subject was passed by the House in the Eighty-third Congress, but got no action in the Senate. Delay in final passage in both houses has served to improve the measure slightly, though we join with our Teamsters in opposition to the minimum 30-day rule applying to return trips.

Truman, Harry S., Address—(1953, p. 602) Ex-President Truman attended and addressed the William Green Memorial Service held at the 1953 Convention. His remarks are printed in the proceedings of the convention.

Tunisia (see: Iran, A. F. of L. Plan)

Typographical Union, International (also see: National Labor Relations Board)

Reaffiliation—(1940, pp. 57-58) Negotiations were entered into with the International Typographical Union toward reaffiliation with the A. F. of L.

year which were projected to bring about a return of the ITU into the Federation. The membership of the ITU had refused, through a referendum to reaffiliate. The report of the E.C. to the 1941 Convention contained the following observations:

We are firmly of the opinion that the International Typographical Union will lose much because it has decided to remain outside the American Federation of Labor. Time will show and experience will prove that the best interests of the membership of the International Typographical Union are served through affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, and that in many ways both the organization and its members will suffer because of non-affiliation with the American Federation of Labor.

The Executive Council expresses keen regret because of the refusal of the membership of the International Typographical Union to vote to return to the American Federation of Labor. We hope that in due course of time they will reconsider their action. We will welcome them into the American Federation of Labor when they decide to return.

In view of the fact that the International Typographical Union has decided to remain out of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, the Executive Council decided that conferences be held with representatives of the printing trades unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and with the Allied Printing Trades Council for the purpose of considering a plan which would provide for the creation of a printing trades label reconstructed, improved and changed to be used by said Printing Trades Council exclusively.

The council also decided to consider a policy designed to protect the interests of the American Federation of Labor and the printing trades unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in the printing of publications, pamphlets, circulars and in fact all printed matter of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated organizations.

(P. 399) The convention adopted the following report:

Your committee notes with deep regret that as yet the International Typographical Union has not reaffiliated with the A. F. of L. in which for many years it played so vital a role. There are a number of factors which must be observed in this connection, factors which materially affect the attitude of the parties involved in this question. First of all, the ITU is unique among trade union organizations in having within its membership two permanently organized groups, groups which share alike in the benefits of trade unionism to which their membership entitles them, but which nevertheless are frankly rival groups. This basic division within the organization can readily become the basis of further differences which may develop.

Second: The International Typographical Union is one single unit in a very closely knit group of cooperative unions; that is, the ITU is one of the unions in the Allied Printing Trades. This group of unions working jointly for the protection of their members' benefits has been exceedingly effective, as an association in their work. All of these unions and their members have profited richly because of their mutual aid in a common cause. The Allied Printing Trades of which the ITU is one has the full backing of the American Federation of Labor and of all state federations and city central bodies.

Third: The ITU is one of the unions which, in close cooperation with the other printing trade unions will be called on to play an ever increasing role in our national defense program.

From these three factors we realize that while on the one hand internal differences within the union are likely to play an important role in the consideration of any problem, on the other hand that a way must be found through which a united Typographical Union may function within the Allied Printing Trades as a functional part of the American Federation of Labor and as a part of the well coordinated allied printing industry, as a part of our national defense program.

The International Typographical Union has contributed richly to the rise and development of our bona fide American labor movement, and in turn its members have profited richly from the help that all of organized labor has given to this union. Your committee would ask that due consideration be given to the fact that the failure of the International Typographical Union to be in the American Federation of Labor may give encouragement to those groups which are promoting trade union piracy, and hence to the ultimate destruction of existing strong unions.

Your committee would commend the Executive Council for its splendid work in seeking to effect an adjustment with the International Typographical Union and would further recommend that the committee which has thus far so ably worked be continued, to the end that the ITU may again be in our organization.

Your committee would further recommend that to protect the interests of the individual worker in each of the printing trades and to protect the good name of the Allied Printing Trades, that pending these further negotiations no action be taken by the American Federation of Labor regarding the union label of the Allied Printing Trades unless the Allied Printing Trades themselves ask for such action during the interim of further negotiations.

(1942, p. 62) A referendum on re-affiliation of the ITU with the A. F. of L. revealed the membership wanted to remain unaffiliated. No further action reported during 1941.

(P. 415) The Executive Council's Report states that no steps have been taken this last year by the International Typographical Union which would bring that union back into the American Federation of Labor.

Your committee deeply regrets this fact. The rich contribution which the International Typographical Union made to the rise and development of our bona fide trade union movement, the splendid part played by its members in their respective state and local bodies in which they have served so long and so well, is a token of the need which the labor movement has for their continued cooperative action. On the other hand the benefits which the international, its affiliated locals, and its individual members have enjoyed during all these years, because they were an integral part of the American Federation of Labor should be well noted by all the members of this union. Your committee would urge that every effort be made to help effect reaffiliation of the International Typographical Union with the American Federation of Labor at the earliest possible moment.

(1943, p. 509) . . . the membership of the Typographical Union are to shortly take a referendum vote on the question of reaffiliating with the A. F. of L. We sincerely hope that this vote will result in bringing this great union back into the fold; that the Typographical Union is assured that in returning, their autonomous rights will be fully observed, and protected; that they are further informed by this convention that the conditions previously agreed to by a committee of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. and the officers of the International Typographical Union will be fully observed and carried into effect.

(1944, p. 124) The members of the International Typographical Union voted to become reaffiliated with the American Federation of Labor through a referendum vote taken on May 17, 1944.

The Executive Council interprets this constructive action taken by the members of the International Typographical Union as evidence of a desire on the part of Labor to become united. It is the opinion of the Executive Council that the reaffiliation of the International Typographical Union will prove to be of mutual advantage and help both to the American Federation of Labor and to the officers and members of the International Typographical Union.

The International Typographical Union was formed in 1850. That means that the membership, through training and experience, have become well established in the field of trade unionism and collective bargaining.

The Executive Council extends a hearty welcome to the International Typographical Union and to its participation through chosen delegates, in the deliberations of the 64th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor.

We express the hope that nothing will ever occur which will interfere with the friendly and mutually helpful relationship now established between the American Federation of Labor and the officers and members of the International Typographical Union.

(P. 437) Your committee notes with great pleasure that the International Typographical Union has reaffiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

This union, one of the oldest and strongest unions in this country, has contributed richly to trade union development in this country. It has, in turn, been aided and supported by the other trade unions. It belongs within our close family circle. We welcome them back and join with the E.C. in expressing the hope that nothing shall ever occur again which will in any way mar the friendly and mutually helpful relationship now established between the A. F. of L and the ITU.

(Newspaper, Support Urged) — (1953, pp. 394, 646) Res. 10:

Whereas—In several cities where unfriendly newspaper publishers have shown a determination to use the Taft-Hartley law to break down and destroy traditional rights and prerogatives established by members of the International Typographical Union in more than a century of collective bargaining, and have refused to negotiate or to agree to minimum standards of wages, hours and working conditions not destroyed by law, strikes and lockouts have occurred as a last resort when all other recourses have failed, and

Whereas—In several cities where an agreeable settlement of such strikes and lockouts was found to be impossible, the International Typographical Union has established competitive daily newspapers so members of organized labor and the general public may not have to rely upon or patronize unfair papers produced by strikebreakers behind union picket lines, and

Whereas — Such ITU - established daily newspapers include Daily News-Digest at Allentown, Pa.; Meriden, Conn.; Monroe, La.; Beckley and Huntington, W. Va.; Springfield, Mo.; Texarkana, Ark; and the Jamestown, N. Y., Sun—all dedicated to fair dissemination of news and recognizing the rights of the readers to receive truthful, factual reporting of current events, and all worthy of the full support of union members in the areas of publication, and graphical Union on September 16, 1952, launched Labor's Daily in Charleston, W. Va., Waukegan, Ill., and the Quad-Cities of Illinois, as a daily newspaper devoted to the cause of Labor and serving organized labor by presenting Labor's news truthfully told and Labor's views fairly stated, and

Whereas—It is traditional with organized labor that members should support and promote the products of union labor and withhold patronage from struck shops and unfair employers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor endorse the principle of giving full support to union-produced newspapers in the cities above mentioned, and the withholding of patronage from unfair newspapers produced in shops where strikes and lockouts are continued, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor call to the attention of all international unions, state federations of labor and city central bodies the need for support, by all local unions and members of organized labor, of the ITU-produced newspapers in the cities above named.

Assistance in Taft-Hartley Fight— (1949, p. 46) The activity of the International Typographical Union in combatting the Taft-Hartley Act, and the need for more substantial assistance in the struggle, was reflected in Res. 31 which requested:

That the A. F. of L. Executive Council authorize and actively direct and promote more substantial assistance to the International Typographical Union in support of this defensive fight, against tremendous odds, which the ITU has waged in the preservation of the fundamentals of craft unionism as it has been known in this country.

(P. 487) Convention amended the original resolution which was unanimously approved:

Your committee recommends that this resolution be adopted to the end that not only the ITU as a craft union but all other craft unions be accorded the special attention that the situation warrants in order that the extreme destructive burden of the Taft-Hartley law on craft unions be lightened as much as possible until that law is repealed.

Unemployment (also see: Full Employment; Unemployment Compensation; Hours; National Youth Administration (1939); Employment and the Shorter Work Week (1939); WPA)

Employment Regularity— (1928, pp. 45, 236) One of the most fundamental aims of wage earners is regularity of employment. The whole organization of life for the wage earner and his family depends upon steady income. The commercial organization of the community is in turn dependent upon the incomes of its residents for sustained patronage. When groups of workers of the community are unemployed business depression follows. The business community and the wage earners have a common concern for regularity of work.

During the past year reports of unemployment reached headquarters with insistence and frequency. No government agency had data disclosing the size of the problem. Definite information on unemployment was necessary to constructive planning of industries, or even a presentation of the difficulties wage earners were facing. Unemployment seemed higher than seasonal changes alone could account for.

(1931, pp. 108, 286) The Wagner bill, to provide for advance planning and regulated construction of public works, stabilization of industry and aiding the prevention of unemployment during periods of business depression, became a law.

It provides for the establishment of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board to be composed of the Secretaries of the Treasury, Commerce, Agriculture and Labor. It shall be the duty of the board to advise the President of the trend of unemployment and business activity and of the existence or approach of periods of business depression or unemployment. The board also will cooperate with construction agencies in formulating methods of advance planning, to report progress and perform other functions assigned to it by the Act.

The President may be advised by the board concerning volume, based upon value, of contracts awarded for construction work in the United States, or in any substantial portion thereof, during any three-month period in comparison with the corresponding three-month period of three previous calendar years. It shall also consider all indices of employment furnished by the Department of Labor or any public or private agency.

Upon recommendation of the board that there is likely to exist within six months a period of business depression and unemployment, the President can transmit to Congress estimates for emergency appropriations. Such emergency appropriations shall be expended only for building roads, rivers and harbor works, flood control projects and public buildings under the provisions of laws now in effect.

The intent of Congress is to arrange for the construction of public works in such a manner as will assist in the stabilization of industry and employment through the proper timing of such construction.

For many years the A. F. of L. has pleaded with Congress for this legislation. In 1893, the A. F. of L. declared that "while we applaud the humane efforts of private individuals to relieve the terrible distress of the unemployed, we most respectfully but emphatically insist that it is the duty of the city, state and national governments to give immediate and adequate relief." It was also repeatedly declared that arrangements to construct public works in times of depression should be made in prosperous times.

We are sure that if the advance planning law is faithfully carried out it will prove its effectiveness in times of business depression.

In U.S.—(1928, pp. 81, 237) No question caused greater concern than that of acute unemployment in the U.S. Members in both Houses of Congress delivered many speeches on this subject. The number unemployed was estimated by the different speakers to be from 2,000,000 to 8,000,000. Several bills were introduced with the view of preventing acute unemployment in the future. One provided for appropriations to be used when construction work had declined 10 per cent for a three-month period below the average of the corresponding three months period of the preceding three years. Others provided for the creation of employment agencies and others for investigations, out of which it was expected sufficient data would be obtained to awaken Congress to the necessity for action. The Senate ordered the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the causes of unemployment and the relief necessary.

A most vigorous campaign should be launched in every city, town and hamlet in the U.S. where members of unions are located to demand of Congress some measure that would make it obligatory to appropriate large sums in good times to be expended when there is acute unemployment anticipated. The A. F. of L. always has contended that unemployment is curable. Congress has power to furnish a remedy.

(1929, pp. 84, 287) After much urging the Senate Committee on the Census included in the census bill a provision to investigate unemployment. It passed the Senate. When it reached the House two provisions for taking a census of unemployment were stricken out. This was a day before the committee arose to report the bill back to the House. The Legislative Committee immediately began a fight to have the unemployment feature replaced in the bill. Only a short time was given to accomplish results. Twenty-four hours after the word was eliminated the bill was reported to the House and friends of Labor insisted on its to a census of unemployed, but by a vote of 189 to 188 the word was put back in the bill in the first section, but later on it was stricken out of another section. When the bill went to conference the conferees restored "unemployment" to the measure and both Houses approved of the report.

(1930, pp. 47, 303) The outstanding economic fact of the past year is serious unemployment. Business depression which gained impetus through the stock market crash last fall replaced a period of prosperity. Decline in production had begun in July, 1929, and had progressed unrecognized until the crash of the stock market. As credit extended for speculating purposes had greatly increased money rates, loans made to foreign countries had declined. While production undertakings were generally in a sound condition, failure to make the proper adjustment of credit forces and to provide wage earner and small salary incomes adequate to buy the products of industries, contributed to end what had been a long period of economic prosperity.

Beginning with November unemployment began to increase. The catastrophe which overtook these unemployed workers and their families brought all of the evils that come from insufficient money to supply wants and necessities.

Under our present business economy, there have been frequent breakdowns due to failure to adjust production to markets and the inability of our credit system to meet such emergencies. The responsibility for such breakdowns rests squarely upon business management. Despite the progress that has been made in fact finding in the past decade, management has not adequate information and does not know how to use such information as is available in order to help prevent business depressions. Producing industries do not provide adequate machinery for accumulating and organizing the information necessary to guide them. The field of distribution is quite unorganized and only the first steps have been taken to accumulate information for the development of better management in this field.

The organization of business has become more complicated and more centralized due to mass production and mergers, and the consequences of management even more completely control the lives and welfare of an increasingly greater number of people employed in business. Management of modern industries has a much greater responsibility than management of small scale industries—just as driving an automobile in city traffic is a greater responsibility than driving a horse and buggy through village streets.

The consequences of management in a single producing establishment are increased by the fact that distinguishes our present economic structure—interdependence. Not only are the units of a single industry dependent upon each other in order that the whole industry may be prosperous, but industries and countries are interdependent. If a serious shortage of raw materials is experienced in a single industry its effect may be felt throughout the world; the boll weevil in the U.S. may cause unemployment in the British textile mills. The past year has brought falling prices throughout the world and serious unemployment in Japan, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, Australia, and increasing unemployment everywhere even in France, although in that country the problem is negligible in comparison with other sections. Commerce and business are organized on a world wide basis—shortage of crops or production in any one country affects prices in all countries.

Since business organization is so sensitive and so intricately interrelated that the consequences of misjudgment in any one field are transmitted throughout the whole structure and every community, the responsibility resting on management is correspondingly grave.

Those elements in business which have been in the strongest positions to take care of their own interests have already made provisions against the emergencies that arise in business. Reserves have been built up to stabilize dividend payments, to replace machinery, to take care of amortization, etc. Those who have no protection against industrial emergencies are persons employed to carry on the work of production and distribution. To these groups the emergency means loss of job and income. The industry slows up its activities when depression develops. The immediate result is to intrench depression forces. Because industrial managements are unable to interpret trends they are guided by fear. They wait for a sign.

Wage earners and small salaried persons are groups who have practically no security in their work relationship. The work of these groups is essential to the undertaking—as vital as the use of credit. When these groups are in a position to have included in their work contracts provisions to stabilize their employment and incomes, industry will provide securities for them in its planning. Persons employed by a production undertaking and giving service essential to production are in reality partners in the undertaking and the administration of the undertaking should be so organized as to recognize and compensate the relationship proportionately. These partners work together—instead of against each other—and should have the same stability in their relationship to the undertaking that is provided for the others who contribute to its operation. They put themselves in the work—that is, their time, energy, ability, interest. They help to maintain standards of production and service which constitute the firm's good will. These investments of personal capacities are equally as important as the materials, machinery, the money that buys them, or the directing management. Wide differences in compensation or consideration accorded those contributing elements is unjust. It rests with each group to secure proper recognition for its services and upon the individual to distinguish himself.

Where contributions are personal, and the contributions so numerous that the individual becomes relatively unimportant to management, these individuals are helpless to advance their interests unless they pool their influence by acting as a group. Individuals cooperating with each other on common problems may become a powerful institution, able to control their future and to have representation in the determination of their work contracts. We need information to point the way.

In the fact of interdependence of individual and group interests lies the main explanation of the inadequacy of our industrial information. While information for some fields is fairly comprehensive, there are wide gaps and what is vitally important, no attempt to chart the interplay of interests, to discover how they must work together in order to sustain prosperity and synchronize progress in various groups. We need knowledge of the facts and principles of coordination in order to change all planning for progress from conflicts of interests to integration of purpose and activity.

Endeavor to this end can be advanced only under Federal Government leadership. The work done by the Committee on Recent Economic Changes laid the foundations for projecting the next dynamic inquiry—the development and coordination of government fact finding and information services in cooperation with the voluntary associations with inherent authority to represent distinctive functional groups in industry.

Never has the closeness of interest between the nations of the world been more clearly demonstrated than in the present year. The business depression, from which we have been suffering on this continent, has been world wide. We have suffered because of the depression abroad, and conditions in foreign countries have been intensified by the depression here.

European countries were very seriously affected by the stock exchange crash of last fall, for they had large investments in this country, and the Wall Street crash was followed by similar financial disorders abroad. Business depression spread, and very few countries were able to hold out against the general downward trend.

With business depression has come world wide unemployment. The suffering in the U.S. and Canada has been severe, but in foreign countries, millions more have been out of work, and their plight was the more serious because in so many cases they had a long period of unemployment behind them.

Unemployment and business depression have cut down the market for our goods, for wage earners out of work could not buy our products and merchants cut down their orders. Exports this year have been 23 per cent below last year. Industry in general and manufacturers who depend on foreign trade, have seen their orders dropping off and have had to curtail production.

Following shows the number or percentage of wage earners out of work in foreign countries. These figures do not by any means show the whole number unemployed. They cover those persons who are either registered under unemployment insurance plans or who are members of trade unions or both. But they indicate the serious suffering European and Asiatic wage earners have been through this winter. The reports show more than 6,000,000 workers unemployed in these countries in March this year. The majority of countries report between 9 and 16 per cent of their wage earners out of work.

Comparing this year with last year, the Scandinavian countries and two small Slavic countries are the only ones which do not show increases in unemployment, and in most cases the increases are large. Last year the majority reported from 6 to 14 per cent out of work as compared to 9 to 16 per cent this year, and in those countries reporting for both years, the number out of work last year in March was 3,427,909 as compared to 5,020,649 this year. It is important to note also that there is an increase in part time unemployment. Those countries reporting for both years show in every case more on part time work in March this year than last. Part time work also means reductions in wage earners' incomes.

It is significant that seasonal changes were the reason for laying men off in over half the plants. This suggests the magnitude of the seasonal unemployment problem. Probably seasonal dull periods are responsible for more unemployment than any other cause, and it is likely that a very large proportion of the workers in the U.S. and Canada lose a portion of their income every year because it is the custom for plants to lay off their workers without provision when the dull season comes.

Nearly all industries find their operations seasonal to some extent. But much seasonal unemployment is preventable to a very large degree. It is common knowledge that many plants have found it not only possible but advantageous to regularize their production schedules so that uniform operation is maintained throughout the year, and their work forces are given continuous employment.

The following figures from three industries give a picture of the huge number affected each year by seasonal unemployment. The figures are for the year 1929.

In automobiles, the industry needed 475,000 workers for six months of the year—these men and women had to depend on the automobile industry for their living. But 70,000 of them were laid off for three months and 150,000 for two months. How can these workers maintain their standard of living while their incomes are cut off? In clothing factories, 155,000 are needed for six months, but 4,000 of them are unemployed for five months—nearly all the other half year, and 11,000 are laid off for three months. In cotton textiles, 431,000 are employed for six months, and 13,000 of them are laid off for four months, and 21,000 for two months.

Here are 182,000 workers, in these three industries alone, who lost from two to five months work last year. This immense loss of income means a very serious lowering of living standards.

It has been estimated that under present conditions it costs $2,400 a year to give a workman's family of man, wife and three children a standard of living which provides for a few comforts. This standard must be the minimum if American workmen are to help maintain our economic prosperity and to develop the qualities of character worthy of American citizens. This standard costs $47 a week for a family of five, if the father has work for 52 weeks of the year. But if with the same wage he loses two months' work (eight weeks) he is immediately reduced below the standard sufficient to support health and decency, and if he loses five months, he is reduced to the poverty level.

A yearly wage basis instead of a weekly would give workers assurance of a steady income the year round and at the same time encourage employers to stabilize their operations so that their entire work force might be permanently employed.

Some plants are following the custom of laying workers off for two or three weeks in the dull season and calling it a "vacation." A layoff without pay is not a vacation.

After the strain of modern industrial work, wage earners need rest and recreation. Intelligent employers readily see that they also profit if their workmen are able to give their best when the pressure of work comes. A vacation is a very important preparation for the next busy season. But a layoff without pay does not give rest or recreation. Anxiety, undernourishment, feverish efforts to find other work, if any can be found, fear lest he may not be taken on when the plant reopens—these characterize the workers' layoff without pay and are anything but a suitable preparation for the next season's work.

A true vacation with pay on the other hand gives the worker real rest, and often a chance to get away with his family for a short trip; and he has the assurance that his job will be waiting for him on his return. A yearly wage, planned to cover 50 weeks' work and at least two weeks' vacation, would mean much to workers in physical and mental well being and ability to do careful and responsible work.

A comparison of wages and employment in the depressions of 1924 and 1930 shows striking differences which have doubtless been the result of efforts to maintain wage levels and keep wage earners at work in this depression. A very just comparison can be made between these two depressions, for 1930 had until July been similar to the depression of 1924, about as severe, and probably a little more extended in time. (In comparing wage cuts, the comparison is made between the worst six months of 1924 and the worst six months of 1930 up to and including the month of June.)

In 1930, less than half as many firms cut wages and the wage cuts were almost entirely in smaller firms; only one-fifth as many employees were affected, and the wage cuts on the average were less severe. Employment was better maintained, the decrease in the number at work being only 9.5 per cent as compared to 11.5 per cent in 1924. (Comparisons of employment, workers' incomes and workers' buying power are made between the best six months of the boom preceding the depression and the worst six months of the depression through June, 1930.)

But there was more part time work in 1930 than in 1924. This may have been due to the efforts of employers to keep workers employed by putting the whole force on part time rather than laying any off. Part time work reduced workers' annual incomes considerably. In 1924, workers' incomes declined only 2.7 per cent, while in 1930 they were reduced 3.8 per cent. (Since there were fewer wage cuts in 1930, this greater reduction was due entirely to part time work.)

In spite of part time work, however, workers' buying power was a little better maintained in 1930 than in 1924, because of efforts to keep workers employed and to avoid wage cuts. In 1924, workers' buying power fell 13.8 per cent, in 1930 only 12.9 per cent. But the fact that workers' buying power fell as much as 12.9 per cent this year shows need of better planning to maintain wages and employment, and especially to keep workers employed full time.

It is highly significant that more than one plant in every four laid off men because of increased efficiency, according to the conference board's study. Displacement of workers by machines and technical improvements — "technological unemployment" — is no less serious now than it has been at any time in the last 10 years.

In fact it seems likely that we may look forward in future to even greater mechanical developments than we have seen in the past and even larger numbers of workers affected.

The amazing developments of the past 10 years have already left us with a problem of unemployment which probably involves millions of workers. In older days, when machine developments took place more slowly, increasing production gradually created new jobs and workers eventually found work again. But in the past 10 years new machines and new techniques have been introduced so rapidly and so generally throughout industry that there has not been time for adjustment. Increasing production has created new jobs, but these jobs have been quickly taken away by newer machines and newer technical changes.

Industries on which 40 per cent of our wage earners depend for their living actually employed 900,000 fewer wage earners in 1929 than in 1919 although the business handled was far greater.

In manufacturing, our factories produced 42 per cent more with 546,000 fewer wage earners; on railroads, seven per cent more business was handled with 253,000 fewer employees; in coal mines, production per worker increased 23 per cent and 100,000 fewer miners were employed.

But the effect of reduction in the number of workers in these industries is far more serious than these figures at first indicate. For in the 10 years from 1919 to 1929 population has increased and about seven million more persons are looking for work as wage earners and small salaried workers.

One would expect these newcomers to look for work in factories, mines and railroads as well as in service trades, stores, banks, commercial houses, insurance and other lines. But work in factories, mines and railroads can be had only by displacing someone already employed. For these three industries are not only not creating new work opportunities, but have actually added 900,000 to the army of job seekers by cutting their forces. Thus 7,900,000 men and women must look for work in stores, service industries, banks, and other lines outside manufacturing, coal mining and railroads. It is no wonder that these industries cannot furnish enough employment.

No adequate figures are available to show what proportion of these 7,900,000 have been able to find work.

We know that certain industries are creating new work opportunities and employing more wage earners and small salaried workers; service industries (such as hotels, restaurants, barber shops, laundries, gasoline stations, garages); salesmanship; insurance agents, professional groups. But studies made in different localities indicate that the jobs to be had in these industries have not provided for the great army of job seekers.

The decrease in work opportunities has had several effects. (1) With a surplus of workers, younger men have taken older men's places and it is becoming exceedingly difficult for men over 45 to find work. (2) When a man is laid off, it takes him longer to find new work because there are more looking for jobs. A study covering 750 workers who were laid off in different cities, finds that more than 60 per cent of them, nearly two-thirds were out of work three months or more before finding new employment, and 31 per cent or nearly one-third, were out of work six months or more. Many who have dependents are out of work for a year or more. (3) It is harder to find temporary work to tide over the unemployment period. The study showed that less than one-third (31 per cent) found temporary work. (4) Many who want work, but can get along without working by depending on someone else, do not try to find work. This means that family living standards are lower. (5) Many who are displaced in an industry where new machines have been introduced must find work in another industry where the skills required are altogether different, and often the new work means a lower standard of living. The study shows that 54 per cent of the new work was totally different and required learning new skills, and 48 per cent took a reduction in pay.

Part time employment is becoming a serious part of the unemployment ment problem. As was noted above, there has evidently been more part time work in the depression of 1930 than in that of 1924. Even in a year of very high business activity such as last year, part time work in dull months makes severe inroads into wage earners' incomes. In the month of July, 1929, workers' incomes were lower than in June in industries employing over half the wage earners in manufacturing. These losses of income were due almost entirely to part time unemployment. The only figures we have greatly minimize the losses to those working part time because they include also those who worked full time and only the average for all can be calculated. But these average losses give an idea what part time means to the wage earner when it is remembered that they show only part of the loss.

From June to July, the average wage for workers in manufacturing in the United States dropped from $27.79 a week to $26.54, or $1.25 a week. Since this figure includes many who work full time, losses of part time workers must be very much higher than this. Wage decreases were particularly large in automobiles, where the average loss for all workers was about $4.50 a week, millinery and lace about $2.00, women's clothing about $1.60, and glass about $1.40.

We have very little knowledge about the extent of part time work. The Federation is beginning September to collect figures on part time with its monthly unemployment reports. These will be exceedingly valuable as they will throw light on the extent of the problem.

A preliminary questionnaire on part time was sent in August to a small group of unions affiliated with the Federation. Replies were received from 198 unions in 12 cities, representing a membership of over 80,000. These reports show 26 per cent unemployed and 15 per cent on part time in August. Where figures for part time are available in foreign countries, they show that in March this year 12.6 per cent in Germany and 28.9 per cent in Poland were working part time, and in Belgium and Switzerland over four per cent were on part time.

The social degeneration resulting from unemployment can hardly be estimated. First, there is physical deterioration, undernourishment not only for the wage earner but for his wife and children, often illness resulting from privation, anxiety for the future which is a constant strain on nerves. For growing children, undernourishment and privation at the period when they need to store strength for the future may mean permanent weakness.

The moral and spiritual deterioration resulting from undernourishment, anxiety and discouragement is even more serious. When a worker has given his best to his work and is laid off without consideration, when he has made every effort to save against the future only to see his savings wiped away again and again by unemployment, when his attempts to rise to a better standard of living are repeatedly annihilated by loss of work, is it any wonder that he loses hope? The injustice of it alone disheartens him. Can he be blamed if he develops an irresponsible attitude, lives up to the limit of his income while it lasts and appeals to charity when he is laid off? The wonder is that in spite of the constant drag of unemployment so many wage earners do save against the future, so few go to charity for help until they have exhausted every resource for independent living and made every possible sacrifice. This fact is striking evidence of the inherent courage, independence and self-reliance of American working men and women.

But the increasing insecurity of employment is having its unmistakable effect on the morale of wage earners. It is undoubtedly an important cause of the increase in wage earner bankruptcy, of irresponsibility and appeals to charity in cities where employment is particularly unstable. The habit of dependence develops from just such circumstances.

The extent of the dependence on charity is strikingly shown by figures from charity organizations in 79 cities collected by the Russell Sage Foundation. In the first half of 1930, over $24,000,000 was given out in relief by these charity organizations. A very large portion of the relief was due to unemployment. An average of more than 160,000 families applied for help each month. Even in the prosperous year of 1929, in the three most prosperous months, relief given by charity organizations was over a million a month.

These figures, impressive as they are, can not show the full extent of the human and economic waste resulting from unemployment. To give a man charity when he wants work is to teach him dependence and take from him the satisfaction of earning his living by constructive activity. It is equally unsound economically to give men charity while they are idle instead of letting them create wealth by their labor. Unemployment is an indictment of our economic control.

No employer would depend on charity to keep his machinery in repair or carry his overhead in dull seasons. And yet thousands actually depend on charity to carry their work force when they are not needed for production. Is not their investment in men as much their concern and responsibility as their investment in machines? Is it not vastly more important to the nation that its human resources be kept intact?

We estimate that those wage earners who were thrown out of work by the business depression this year lost $1,200,000,000 in wages in the first half of 1930. (This figure does not include agricultural workers or salaried employees.) Had they been at work they would have created wealth equal to more than the value of their wages. The country is therefore poorer by far more than a billion dollars. Their lost wages alone would have increased the total national income by 2.8 per cent.

This huge loss in workers' buying power has had its inevitable effect on business. It has added to depression forces and helped to postpone recovery. Business needs the stimulation of consumer buying. Because stores have seen their trade falling off, they have ordered less from manufacturers, and manufacturers have been forced to curtail production.

The importance of labor as consumer is one of the outstanding facts of the modern era. Eighty per cent of those who buy consumer products of our industries and use the consumer services of transportation, communication and other industries, are working men and their families.

Labor's purchase and use of industrial products has become a keystone on which our economic prosperity depends. Never has this been more forcefully demonstrated than in our present industrial depression. Workers' purchasing power in the first six months of 1930 averaged 12 per cent below the same period of 1929. With the cumulative effects of unemployment and part time work adding to depression forces, sales of department stores fell further below last year in June and July than in any other months this year. The failure of workers' buying power is shown especially in the clothing industries, for workmen must make last year's outfits do in order to stretch their reduced incomes over the necessities of living—food and shelter.

As the forces of business depression were gathering, the President of the U.S. called to conference in the White House representatives of industries, of railroads, and of Labor.

As a result of his conferences with employers and with Labor, President Hoover issued this statement to the press:

The President was authorized by the employers who were present at this morning's conference to state on their individual behalf that they will not initiate any movement for wage reduction, and it was their strong recommendation that this attitude should be pursued by the country as a whole. They considered that aside from the human considerations involved, the consuming power of the country will thereby be maintained.

The President was also authorized by the representatives of Labor to state that in their individual views and that as their strong recommendation to the country as a whole that no movements beyond those already in negotiation should be initiated for increase of wages and that every cooperation should be given by Labor to industry in the handling of its problems. The purpose of these declarations is to give assurance that conflicts should not occur during the present situation which will affect the continuity of work and thus to maintain stability of employment.

This definite repudiation of wage cuts as the method of meeting business depression was a constructive achievement. It meant a definite effort to maintain standards and to prevent the foundations of buying power from being completely undermined. It added a new element of security to wage earners' status. It was recognition of the principle that the misfortunes of business are not to be handed over to wage earners in the form of wage reductions.

This agreement not to reduce wages has been lived up to by many large employers of labor who thus have shown their faith in high wages as an essential requirement for the maintenance of prosperity.

There have been wage cuts by some large companies but chiefly by small firms and firms of less secure financial foundations. Employers who have refused to make wage cuts deserve to be commended for their constructive policy and for their aid in averting a deeper business depression. Equal commendation is due labor organizations which cooperated by not raising issues that might embarrass or interrupt efforts to turn the tide upward. Unions have again demonstrated their methods and their appreciation of the interdependence between their interests and the interests of industry and society.

Strategic as was this agreement against wage cuts, it did not prevent great and widespread suffering from dismissals, lay-offs, and part-time work.

Difficult as this long depression is proving itself, it has disclosed with striking distinctness a growing responsibility on the part of management for the workers on their pay rolls and an appreciation of wage earners as consumers.

Labor's Unemployment Program.

Under our present business economy, people must have money to buy the necessities of life and whatever else they may include in their standards of living. For the great majority of people employment is essential as a source of income. Loss of employment is a tragedy. Unless work is obtainable, they can turn only to charity.

Society has a responsibility for providing service for all who need employment.

To provide aid in finding employment is the first constructive policy, though relief may be necessary for an emergency. Society through its organized channels owes it to its working citizens to provide them with information of all available work opportunities. Such a service would be equally useful to employers informing them where to get the kind of employees they need.

Private employment agencies profit through the misfortunes of workers. Labor turnover adds to their revenues. Their fees, even when legitimate, come at a time when the worker is least able to meet additional expenses.

Some industrial managements have been opposed to the development of a federal agency because they found a special advantage to them in requiring workers to apply on their premises. But this to those seeking employment means the heavy hardship of going from place to place, consuming time and physical energy which could be saved by accumulating employment information in a central office. Whatever the type of central office, whether for all industries or special offices for special industries, the State owes to Labor services essential to their progress and prosperity. The Government is now furnishing information and advisory service to other economic groups; the interests of wage earners are equally important to national advancement.

The State should also provide data on employment and unemployment indicating trends and other information necessary as the basis for constructive planning. Although widespread unemployment is recognized as a catastrophe, our government does not gather unemployment statistics and does not assemble comprehensive information showing when unemployment may be increasing or decreasing.

Because of the intricate interrelations existing in our economic structure, it is important to know shifts in employment as soon as they begin. Rapidity of technical change constitutes a distinct labor and social problem which if allowed to accumulate, will bring catastrophic consequences. Increasing productivity with growing unemployment and with low incomes to wage earners will surely wreck industries.

The basis for all planning to prevent unemployment is the records of what is happening in production, employment and unemployment. Employment and unemployment data should be supplemented by part time and man hours data. Accumulated records and understanding of the interplay of industrial forces will disclose constructive policies.

We propose as our program:

1. Reduction in hours of work.

As progress is made in increasing output and productivity, the world's needs can be supplied in fewer hours of work, and benefits of this progress should be shared by those who do the work. The shorter work day and work week bring to wage earners opportunities for other creative interests as well as for conservation of physical energy.

Where work hours—daily and weekly—are not progressively reduced to keep pace with scientific progress, practically the full cost of this progress falls upon wage earners in the form of unemployment. Instead of laying off employees as productivity increases, the work day should be reduced, the work week shortened and provisions for annual vacations with pay should reduce the work year.

Progress should mean leisure for the fullness of life for all. Shorter work hours take the element of drudgery out of work and raise the work life as well as leisure to a higher plane so that workers become more efficient as workers and better citizens.

Reducing the hours per day, the five-day week, and vacations with pay are major proposals in our unemployment program.

2. Stabilization of Industry.

The cumulative effects of unemployment reach far beyond the workers themselves. The most effective solution of the problem is prevention. When industries accept their responsibility to their wage earners, and abandon the habit of laying off employees in order to reduce costs, they must face squarely stabilization of production. This is a technical problem which concerns the whole work organization, and to which all can contribute useful information and service.

Management has records of policies and results which will help indicate how rush periods may be anticipated and plans for steady flow of work developed. Seasonal factors often are due to forces outside the control of industry. There are available technical skill and intelligence adequate to solve the production problems involved in regularization when management embodies in its thinking the principle of responsibility for regular employment and annual incomes for its employees. Every group in the business organization can help in solving the problem where the channels of cooperation are set up. In addition to what they can contribute to the problem within the plant, wage earners because of their numbers and contacts with outsiders can help create for the company public good will and support, and in some cases directly increase patronage. The will to give such help grows out of a feeling of partnership which underlies cooperation.

That the proposal to regularize production is practical has been repeatedly demonstrated by establishments that have tackled the problem. It can be done when management and all connected with the undertaking accept as basic in the determination of all policies that regular production must be maintained. Regularization requires careful planning and continuous watchfulness, and ties in with production economics. All groups in industry must become "employment" minded.

In working out a program to maintain regularity of production, shorter work days and work weeks should synchronize with technical progress. Vacations with pay should be a factor in planning for wages and employment on a yearly basis.

By thus assuring that the employees of various industries shall participate in the progress of industry and society through curtailment of work hours made possible by increased productivity, industries will help to provide buyers for the products which they put on the market. Progressive adjustments of hours should be accompanied by adjustments in compensation paid. Wage earners like all other citizens must have an annual income in order to maintain their standards of living and meet obligations incurred on that basis.

While individual production establishments must work out the problem of stabilization for themselves, there is needed in addition team work by the whole industry and team work between all industries. To accomplish this there should be comprehensive planning by an advisory body, representative of all production and consumer groups. Such a national economic council should plan the machinery for achieving economic equilibrium, and undertake to secure the cooperation of voluntary associations and governmental agencies in a coordinated undertaking.

3. Efficient Management in Production and in Sales Policies.

We must have money to pay the costs of living. The objective of all economic activity is profits. The higher the profits the greater the amount that can be given the producers. Profits can be increased by elimination of wastes and greater efficiency in production and sales policies and methods.

Accumulated inefficiencies create the wastes that contribute to business failures and business depressions.

All producers are part of our business society, individuals in business to get profits on their investments. Some invest capital, others technical capacity to direct operators, others technical capacity to carry on the production processes. All are directly concerned in increasing the total sum accruing from their joint efforts so the share of each may be larger. There is mutual obligation for efficiency and mutual right to demand efficiency. Each contributing group through its group organization should provide itself with technical counsel for increasing efficiency in performing its special functions. The federal government should increase its service to industry both in the technical field and in supplying information on how to work efficiently.

4. Nation-wide System of Employment Exchanges.

A nation-wide system of employment exchanges, the state to establish local services and the federal government to provide the channels for pooling information and experience is essential to any plan for assuring continuous employment for workers; an employment service is fundamental for better employment. Local exchanges must be organized along lines that will assure the confidence and cooperation of those served—industries and workers.

5. Adequate Records.

Although our federal government and some of our state governments supply splendid statistical services, there are not available all of the facts necessary to regularize production and prevent unemployment. Every unit and every functional group of our economic structure has a contribution to make in the accumulation of adequate records. With the government must rest coordination of available information and responsibility for furnishing it.

We believe this purpose would be greatly advanced if the federal government should consider unification of federal statistics so that they could be used for the widest comparative purposes.

Appropriations for statistical work should be sufficiently adequate to enable each federal department and agency to gather and compile the necessary information in its jurisdiction.

The principles we outline for federal agencies apply to state and municipal governments.

Organized industries such as trade associations, are also clearing centers for the facts about a whole industry. Union headquarters accumulate facts concerning workers as employees and as consumers and citizens. National and international unions can supplement the information compiled by trade associations.

In addition to the standards and indications separate groups may furnish, it is necessary to know the facts of industry as a going concern in a community or an area that constitutes an economic unit. The necessity for planning for coordinated information requires cooperation between the organized groups and industries. Coordinated planning is essential to cooperation to maintain prosperity and insure employment for all.

6. Use of Public Works to Meet Cyclical Unemployment.

Since we have not mastered the principles or the technique of sustained prosperity, we must be prepared to deal with business depression. Assuming that business forces are controllable, we must plan to stop the swing downward. The best way to inject new activity on large enough scale to have appreciable effect is to speed up construction of public works. To be most effective, steps must be taken when indications of business depression are evident. There should be an agency charged with this responsibility, organized and alert to take action.

7. Vocational Guidance and Retraining.

Vocational training and retraining must be tied in with our unemployment program.

Vocational and industrial education should give the workers that grasp of fundamentals of his industry that he may be able to adjust himself to changes or even a new occupation. The facts of employment and unemployment are necessary in planning courses and for vocational guidance.

Every employment bureau of our proposed national system should be able to assist workers displaced by new machinery or new processes, guiding them to employment for which their skills and experience can be adapted or giving them whatever retraining should be necessary. Society owes to such victims of progress assistance in meeting their personal problems in adjusting so that they too may share in benefits of social progress.

8. Special Study of Technological Unemployment.

We need basic knowledge of displacement of workers by machines. We need to know when and where such displacements will take place and to establish the practice of providing in advance adjustments for such workers.

The President of the United States will be asked to arrange for special study of technological unemployment and related problems.

9. Study Relief Proposals.

Industries that have the problem of seasonal unemployment should work out some plan to take care of employees during such periods of unemployment as cannot be prevented by more scientific, efficient planning. This has been done in some instances by unions cooperating with management, and a jointly created fund furnishes weekly incomes to workers during periods of cyclical unemployment.

A number of unions have provided unemployment funds for the relief of members out of work.

We direct the E.C. make a thorough investigation of all plans, legislative and otherwise, that have been discussed or suggested for the express purpose of finding a practical way by which relief may be accorded those who are suffering from forced unemployment.

10. Education for Life.

In conclusion we believe that what is needed is not a revolutionary program or the creation of many new agencies, but overall planning based upon knowledge of significant trends so that existing agencies may function effectively and cooperate in carrying through a program for human progress.

The primary step is to have every individual prepared to take a constructive part in life and to make sure there are work opportunities available for all. This purpose necessitates that education be planned with specific reference to the world of work. The training period involves three phases—education, vocational training and placement. None of these functions can be performed efficiently without intimate and continual knowledge of industrial trends and developments. To plan their school program educational directors need to know: which industries are declining and at which rate; which industries are expanding and at which rate; which industries are developing and at which rate; which technical changes are impending; in which fields will research and experimentation probably bring changes; what are the possibilities for expanding demand to absorb increasing productivity in industries where technical changes have been installed. Such information as this kept up to date is a basic necessity for that adjustment of policies that will keep education responsive to life needs.

Not all pupils are interested in going into industry. There are those who look to the professions, the semi-professional jobs, clerical and service employment. Educators need just as careful detailed information in these fields as they do on industry.

In addition to general education, everybody should have some special training through which he can earn his living. In our educational program we should include provisions for adult education. Now that educational opportunities are no longer restricted to our youth, it is possible at any time that the need may arise for workers to prepare for new or allied callings. This is a practical answer to the problem developing from technological progress and displacement of workers. The employment agencies should tie their work in with vocational training, retraining and guidance.

For, in order for planning to be effective, it is not enough for the leaders in each field to familiarize themselves with developments in other experiences, but there should be personal contact, conferences round the table between the leaders of all peoples for the purpose of discussion, interchange of experience and conclusions. Such discussions and conferences would have a profound effect upon all policy making and administration of work. What is important is understanding of the interdependence of problems and the interplay of causes and forces. The great problem is the need of finding the principles and technique of coordination. This is essential in making that preparation for the work of life that will avoid preventable wastes and will enable us to make constructive progress in planning for continuous employment. There is need for the specialist to make this thinking so comprehensive that it reaches out to encompass the whole of human experience in order to fit his functional service in a coordinated plan for progress in life.

(Pp. 93, 321) The past year has seen great progress in our unemployment reports, due largely to the splendid cooperation of local unions. The number of unions covered has grown from 930 in August, 1929, to more than 2,400 in August, 1930, and the membership covered has increased from 271,000 to 790,000.

We are also giving a further service to cooperating locals. Each month a brief survey of local business conditions and an interpretation of the local unemployment situation is sent out with the postcard questionnaire to every local in the 24 cooperating centers. From the interest shown in these reports we are convinced they are a valued service to local executives.

Our figures on unemployment receive wide publicity. They are given out each month in press releases and are carried by the leading papers and by hundreds of local papers in all parts of the country. Numbers of trade journals also quote them as authority on the employment situation. Through the present business depression, when unemployment has been such an important factor, the public has watched our figures with keenest interest. We have kept the problem before the public mind, showing the immense number of persons affected and the critical effects of unemployment on the general economic welfare. This constant publicity and educational work are most influential in stimulating action, and urging efforts to stabilize employment and prevent layoffs.

Because of the wide and constructive influence of our figures on unemployment, we are now extending our reports to bring information on part time work. Part time work is an important phase of the unemployment problem though one on which there is practically no information. A preliminary survey on part time work in August brought replies from 198 cooperating unions in 12 cities, and covered 83,000 members. Fifteen per cent were on part time work.

The public has little realization of the importance of this problem of part time work or its wide extent. Thousands of wage earners have their incomes reduced each year by part time employment. Our figures will show the need of action and give the necessary information for unionists and all others who want to work for constructive improvements.

(Pp. 104, 305) Notwithstanding the acute unemployment existing throughout the United States, the U.S. Congress failed to pass two measures dealing directly with this subject. Senator Wagner introduced three unemployment bills which passed the Senate without any particular opposition. S. 3059 provided for advance planning of public improvements, and $150,000,000 was to be appropriated and thus made available for immediate use when unemployment became acute. The House passed this bill after emasculating its principal features. It is now in conference. S. 3060 providing for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation of the states in the promotion of such a system, failed of passage in the House. S. 3061 is the only bill that became a law. It provided that the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall publish at least once each month changes in the employment.

(P. 322) The president of the A. F. of L. and the presidents of the departments were requested to call on the President of the U.S. and request that a long range planning committee of Public Works be created so as to avert future unemployment.

(1932, pp. 20, 313) Estimates based on government figures show that unemployment this year averaged 10,826,000 persons in the first nine months, and that in June, July and August the number of out of work passed the 11,000,000 mark.

Nearly one-third of all our non-agricultural wage and small salaried workers have been unable to earn their livelihood this year, and in the summer months more than one-third have been without income. This is the general average, but in many industries the situation is far worse. In October, union reports show 65% out of work in building, 46% in metal trades, 42% in manufacturing, 38% in water transport, 31% in theatres, and 50% among musicians and other professionals. During the summer unemployment in clothing and textile industries reached 51%. Some cities report conditions even worse than this. In October, building trades report that in Cleveland 76% of their membership were out of work and in addition 14% on part time so that only 10% had full employment; in Buffalo 70% were out of work and only 13% had full employment; in Birmingham, Detroit, Pittsburgh, San Antonio, Seattle, conditions are similar or even worse. Metal trades report that in Los Angeles only 1% of their membership were on full time in October, 66% out of work; in Cleveland only 4% on full time, 63% out of work. Similar reports could be listed indefinitely for other trades.

In addition to those entirely without work, millions more have only part time employment. A number of industries, especially in manufacturing and mining, report that more than half those at work are on short schedule; in manufacturing, those on part time average less than three-quarters of their full pay, and many are receiving less than half pay.

Reports from trade unions show that an average of nearly 21% of the membership have been working part time this year (first 9 months) and that part time work increased from 19% in January to 22% in September.

With these losses, due to full or part unemployment, and with curtailment of wages in addition, millions of workers' families are living far below the minimum standard for health and efficiency. We estimate that, counting all workers and those dependent upon them, at least 60,000,000 persons are now living below minimum standards—nearly half our entire population. Forty millions of them have been dragged into poverty by depression; twenty million more are in industries where living conditions even in normal times are below standard.

Could there be a more serious indictment of our present economic order? We are denying one-third of our wage and small salaried workers the right to work; we are slowly starving nearly half our population.

Because the effects of unemployment are lived out silently, in millions of homes, our nation is not yet fully conscious of its significance or its influence on our future. Slow starvation means that gradually physical vitality is being sapped, anxiety and despair are creating a spirit of suspicion, fear and rebellion. Families are burdened with debts which will last long after depression is over, millions are driven into dependency. Skills for work are lost and even the desire to work, many will never again be able to earn their living. People cannot go on for two or more years without work or income and keep normal. The futility of it destroys their self-respect. Resentment and despair may replace that fine spirit of independence and responsibility which has characterized our people. In short, millions are losing the capacity to live constructively and contribute in a creative way to our national life.

That we should allow this national deterioration when we have in our farms and industries a wealth of resources to supply every need, is sheer stupidity. Our productive capacity has not failed, but our planning to use and distribute the product. If as a nation we are alive to the problem and turn our combined intelligence to meet it, as we turned every resource to win the world war, we can check this wholesale destruction of human personalities. Our energies must be redirected to restore sanity and balance in economic life.

The Federation estimates of unemployment in the United States, based on government figures, show that this year nearly 8,000,000 more persons have been out of work than in April 1930. Unemployment this year increased steadily till September. Although normally employment improves during the spring and there are more jobs in summer than in winter, this year over 1,200,000 persons were thrown out of work from January to August; only 560,000 of them found even temporary work in September.

Trade union figures show a smaller percentage of unemployment than that of workers as a whole. The per cent of trade union members out of work this year has averaged 23.7, while the average for the country as a whole was 31.8% (nine months). This is striking evidence of the protection unions have given their members.

Due to unemployment and wage reductions, workers' income at present is scarcely more than half that of 1929; their loss this year alone will probably be at least $25,000,000,000. By the end of its third year the depression will have cost workers more than $48,000,000,000 in wage and salary losses alone.

Unquestionably, workers have borne the brunt of depression. Their loss is far greater than that of any other group, far more devastating in its consequences. This $48,000,000,000 of lost income exceeds the entire cost of the world war to the United States (slightly over $40,000,000,000 to date). Although living costs have declined somewhat the relief afforded by lower prices has been slight compared to total losses.

Work is the source of our wealth. In agriculture, industry, transportation, construction, work transforms raw materials into goods that have value. The value created is the stream of wealth which supplies income to every family, whether worker, manager or millionaire; the force which creates it is the skill, intelligence and devotion invested by workers and management, coupled with capital furnished by stockholders or other investors. Those who invest the work of their hands and minds have a right to claim a good living from the proceeds of their investment; this is their only source of income. Time was when industry could not produce enough to provide a good living for all; production was limited to what men could make by their hands with simple tools. But today machinery has made it possible to produce more than enough to fill every need for all our people and add many so-called luxuries as well. There is no excuse for anyone to go hungry or do without any of the necessities for a good life.

Whether all shall have a good living depends on the distribution of income at its source. That is, the payment in right proportion of wages, salaries and dividends by each individual operating unit. The proportion of this distribution is vital to our national life. Not only does it determine whether men and women shall live in comfort, or be deprived of the very essentials of life; it also helps to determine whether our economic life as a whole shall go forward with balance in continued growth and prosperity, or be wrecked periodically by business depression.

During our recent years of prosperity the natural flow of wealth was distorted. Income was distributed in such a way as to benefit the high income groups at the expense of workers and to encourage expansion of producing capacity without providing for the consumption of an increased volume of goods.

From 1922 to 1929 industry increased its dividend payments far more rapidly than its payments of wages and salaries; wages and salaries increased 45.5%; dividends 143.1%, or more than three times as much. (These figures cover all industry.) During the first year of depression, dividend payments actually increased 5% while wage and salary payments declined 15%. Each year from 1924 to 1930 more than $5,000,000,000 has been paid by industry in dividends to stockholders and in 1930 dividends exceeded $8,500,000,000.

Payment of huge sums in dividends helped to swell the incomes of the very rich. Only a small portion of the dividends paid in this country go to families of moderate income. In 1929 86.5% of all dividends were paid to persons who had an investment of at least $100,000. Other factors also piled up income for the wealthy—speculation on the stock exchange, and bonuses, fees, special privileges given by industry to those it favors.

Thus, while workers' income increased by only 45.5% from 1922 to 1929, incomes over $100,000 increased 389.3%. In 1929, when some 20,000,000 of our citizens were living below minimum standards for health and efficiency, 14,800 persons received incomes of more than $100,000, and 513 received $1,000,000 each.

What was the result of piling up excess income in the hands of a few while workers' share fell away?

Since a man who has over $100,000 income cannot possibly spend it all for the necessities of living, he re-invests a large portion. Piling up riches, therefore, greatly increased the volume of money available for investment in industry. New corporate capital issues—that is, stocks and bonds issued to furnish capital to industry—increased rapidly and much of this new capital went to build new industrial plants and equipment. From 1922 to 1929, new capital issues increased 213% compared to 45.5% increase in wages and salaries. Thus, our producing capacity increased rapidly, without corresponding growth in buying power.

In addition to its huge dividend payments, as shown above, industry was piling up large surplus funds each year. For profits were so great that even after dividends and taxes had been paid, the surplus amounted to nearly $2,500,000,000 each year (average). In the stock market boom plants were tempted to invest their surplus in brokers' loans where it would draw from 9% to 12% interest, with small risk to them. Thus, at the peak of the stock boom, industry was contributing $3,600,000,000 to increase speculation. From January 1926 to the 1929 peak this speculative use of industrial funds increased 515.7%. A considerable portion of the income paid to the very rich also helped to increase speculation.

Summing up: The wealth created by industry was so distributed that new capital increased 213%, industrial surplus used for speculation increased 515%, while wages and salaries increased only 45.5%. Producing capacity was increased beyond the capacity of consumers to buy; speculation became more profitable than normal business activity.

Increased capitalization is a continued charge on industry. Every new issue of stock means a claim for more dividends. Beside these new stock issues, industry paid $8,600,000,000 to its stock holders in stock dividends in these 8 years—another increase in the claim of stock holders over its income. A large part of the growth in dividend payments was due to this increase in capitalization and multiplication of shares of stock.

There is definite shortage of buying power among wage and small-salaried workers. Since they buy 83% of all goods sold to consumers, their buying power is vital to our national welfare. Industry depends on it. The shortage of workers' income was the brake which checked our economic progress in 1929. Engineers estimate that in that year of peak activity our industries were equipped to produce 50% more than could be consumed. Even the goods that were produced could not all be paid for. The deficit in buying power in 1929 was probably made up by selling goods below cost to those who otherwise could not buy. This represents a huge loss to industry.

If industry does not provide consumers with sufficient income to buy its product, it cannot sell enough to cover overhead and earn profits. Unquestionably, the "profitless prosperity" which thousands of business concerns experienced before 1930 was due to the shortage of consumer buying power. Paying money to increase dividends when wages and worker's buying power are not increased proportionately, is only cutting away industry's power to earn dividend. Consumer buying power must come out of industrial income; if it is not given at first in the form of wages, it will be taken later in the form of bad debts. And when the disproportion becomes too great, depression is the basic cure, with its widespread and unnecessary business wreckage. A consistent policy of increasing wages as rapidly as possible would in the long run bring greater and more general profit to all.

The effect of workers' income losses on business in general has been strikingly shown during the depression. When workers could not buy, retail trade took losses almost equal to the decline in workers' income.

Since all industry depends ultimately on retail trade as the outlet for its products these losses were reflected through our entire industrial system. Factories and mines found their orders cut; railroads have been in serious straits through loss of traffic; no industry has escaped. The market for over one-third of our consumer product has been cut away.

Industry cannot possibly recover until workers' buying power is restored. The income loss from unemployment has been very great, and millions of dollars have also been cut from worker's pay envelopes by wage reductions. Failure of workers' income was a primary cause of depression; we cannot hope to get out of depression by the same means which brought us in.

Relief — (1932, pp. 58, 361) Immediately when Congress convened on December 7th Senators LaFollette and Costigan became the joint authors of an unemployment relief measure which provided for an appropriation of $375,000,000 to be used in supplying aid to those who were in distress caused by unemployment. The A. F. of L. supported this bill with all the power and influence which it could command. By direction of the E.C. a conference of the officers of national and international unions was held at the headquarters of the A. F. of L. on February 9th. A strong appeal for the enactment of unemployment relief legislation was adopted. Those in attendance at the conference called in a body upon the President of the U.S., the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, urging them not only to favor but to bring about the enactment of the Costigan-LaFollette Bill at the earliest possible date.

The opponents of this relief legislation introduced a number of substitutes and amendments for the obvious purpose of bringing about the defeat of this important legislation. To our surprise and disappointment the bill was defeated by a vote of 48 to 35.

The E.C. continued its efforts to secure the enactment of unemployment relief legislation. It appealed to Congress for the passage of adequate relief legislation, emphasizing in a most forcible way the increasing need of those who were in distress because of continued widespread unemployment. The continued aggressive appeal of the E.C. for the enactment of unemployment relief legislation was inspired by a determination to redeem the pledge made organized labor by the President of the A. F. of L. when he made the following statement at the Vancouver convention:

"I propose to go, in the name of the E.C. and with the E.C., to the Congress of the U.S. as soon as it convenes and there tell them, in the name of Labor, that an emergency exists in the U.S. comparable with the emergency that existed during the war, and that we are knocking at the doors of Congress now, in the name of those millions of idle workers, and that we shall appeal and demand that Congress, without further delay, appropriate a sufficient amount of money, let it be millions or billions, in order to feed the hungry and care for them."

Following the defeat of the Costigan-LaFollette Bill, Senator LaFollette introduced another bill providing for the appropriation of $5,500,000,000 for relief of unemployment. Hearings were held on this measure. Senator Wagner later introduced a bill which provided that $375,000,000 be loaned or advanced to the states for the purpose of relieving distress. He also proposed a measure which authorized the construction of public works. After all these relief measures had apparently met with defeat, a number of our friends in the U.S. Senate joined in the presentation of a relief bill which finally passed the Senate. The House also prepared and passed a similar measure. After numerous meetings of the Conference Committees of the two Houses and after repeated votes taken by the House and Senate, on controversial clauses, a bill was passed on July 16th and signed by the President which provided for the appropriation of $2,122,000,000 for relief purposes. This measure authorized loans to states and municipalities for immediate relief of distress, for the construction of self-liquidating public works and for a limited amount of public building construction on the part of the federal government. It authorized loans to be made by the federal reserve bank direct to private industry and individuals based on adequate security if the applicant certified that a loan cannot be obtained through the customary channels.

The capitalization of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was increased to $3,800,000,000, an addition of $1,800,000,000. The measure provides that this added capital is to be obtained through sales of the Corporation's notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations. A section of the measure provides that a special fund of $300,000,000 is made available for loans to the states for immediate relief purposes. It provides that not more than 15 per cent of the amount thus made available can be secured by any one state. The bill provides that the loan for self-liquidating projects amounts to $1,500,000,000. A provision of the law which is of especial importance to Labor, appropriating money for public works, provides that in the construction of relief projects convict labor cannot be used and that no individual employed shall be permitted to work more than thirty hours in any one week. It also provides that the wages to be paid must be predetermined in the specifications. Preference is given to ex-service men with dependents. The publicity clause of the measure which was adopted by the House was finally accepted by the Senate.

The A. F. of L. did not regard the amount of money appropriated by Congress for relief purposes adequate to meet the existing and growing needs for help and assistance to those who are suffering so keenly from the effects of unemployment. We urged Congress to regard the existing situation as a great emergency, serious in all its aspects and grave in its potential consequences. We emphasized the increasing needs of the approaching winter and the increasing demands which would be made upon relief agencies for help and assistance. It is the purpose to bring to the attention of the members of Congress when they convene on December 5th, the increasing needs of the existing situation and to appeal again for an urgent appropriation of an adequate amount to meet the requirements of the situation which now exists in all the states, cities and communities throughout the land.

tional relief bill is about $1,000,000,000 a year, according to the July report of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. Of the total bill, about 5 per cent is now being furnished by private funds, 95 per cent by public funds; and of the public funds approximately 70 per cent is from the Federal Government, 10 per cent from the states and 20 per cent from local governments. This huge sum of relief is over and above the help given by neighbors, relatives, trade unions, churches and other organizations, which mounts into further millions, for care for the unemployed is now a large item in the budget of nearly every American family which has any source of income. For public relief, it is clear from the above figures that the unemployed are now depending largely on the Federal Government for sustenance, and the living standard they will be permitted, low enough at best, will be determined by the Federal money appropriated by the next Congress.

The Federal Emergency Relief Administration was established by the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933 and went into operation on May 22, 1933. Under the Act, Congress made available $500,000,000 to be expended through the states, half to be given on a matching basis—one dollar from the Federal fund for every $3 of public money spent in the state in the three preceding months; the other half is a discretionary fund from which grants may be made when necessary without regard to matching.

Up to August 31, 1933, $150,135,000 had been expended from this $500,000,000 Federal fund. With a winter ahead of us when need will unquestionably be greater than ever before, it seems probable that the remainder of this Federal fund will be exhausted by February.

In spite of the fact that unemployment had decreased by nearly 2,000,000 between March and July, and that the number out of work in August this year was at least 5 per cent below last August, the number of families receiving public relief in our principal cities in August, 1933, was between 85 and 90 per cent higher than last year. We cannot expect relief needs to be ended as soon as men begin to go back to work. On the contrary, even if unemployment is reduced in the next months, relief needs must be expected to continue near or even above the present level. Since employers tend to reemploy those most recently laid off, the first jobs are not necessarily given to those who need them most, and we have a situation where thousands are finding their resources exhausted by long unemployment and are becoming dependent on relief, while other thousands are going back to work.

Relief given from Federal funds this summer was higher in August than in July: $48,721,713 in July and $49,882,034 in August.

In making grants from the $500,000,000 fund, the Federal Administration adheres to the principles of Federal-state cooperation laid down in the Emergency Relief Act. The ability of states to contribute is investigated and state contributions required on a matching basis where possible. Texas, Illinois, Michigan, Kentucky, are among those required to raise funds through the action of their legislatures before receiving a Federal grant.

Although the field agents of the Federal Relief Administration are instructed to raise standards of relief, the amounts given are seriously inadequate in very many cases. While relief given per family averaged $16.85 a month from April to July, amounts vary between different states from $4.00 per family per month in Mississippi to $30.00 in New York state. The average family receiving relief has between four and five members (4.4 members); when it is considered that, at June 1933 prices, $21.50 a week was the necessary budget to give a family of four even a bare subsistence, the serious inadequacy of even the highest relief of $30 a month—$7.50 a week—is obvious. The social consequences of a living at this level for 3,500,000 people are the more striking when it is realized that many of the recipients of relief are children. Reports from Philadelphia and New York State show that 44 per cent of the persons on relief rolls are children under 16 years of age.

The Federal Emergency Relief Administration, in its rules for administering relief, states as follows:

"Relief shall be given as provided in this Act to all needy unemployed persons and/or their dependents.

"This imposes an obligation on the State emergency relief administration and on all the political subdivisions of the States administering relief. Insofar as lies in their power, to see to it that all such needy unemployed persons and/or their dependents shall receive sufficient relief to prevent suffering and to maintain minimum living standards."

While the provisions of the relief administration allow payments for rent, fuel and light, clothing, medical care and other necessities, since local funds, even when supplemented by Federal grants, are all too often totally inadequate to supply these needs, relief in most cases is limited to immediate needs for food. Rent is paid in some cases—in Milwaukee up to $25 a month, and rent payments are also made in Boston and in New York State, although not in all cases, and in other localities—and clothing and medical care are sometimes included.

Relief furnished by public funds is being supplemented to some extent by distributing the surplus agricultural products taken over by the government. Of five million hogs slaughtered, those which can be used for food are being distributed by the Relief Administration, but nothing has yet been done to provide for distributing surplus cotton, wheat, rice, eggs, poultry, butter and other products. Of the supplies of Farm Board wheat and cotton given the Red Cross for distribution, the wheat was exhausted by the middle of September, and very little is left of the cotton. Therefore, whatever surplus agricultural product is to be made available to the unemployed must be designated for that purpose by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

In view of the great need which faces the unemployed this winter, the following recommendations are made:

1. That the A. F. of L. insist on adequate relief appropriations from Federal funds by Congress immediately after its reconvening in January, so that funds may be available by February when it is expected the present appropriations will be exhausted.

2. That we insist that the surplus agricultural product be made available for distribution to the unemployed.

3. That the A. F. of L. and all state and local Federations of labor do all in their power to educate public opinion to the immensity of the relief need this winter. There is danger that taxation and appropriations for relief may not have the necessary public support, since there is widespread belief that the reemployment of millions has greatly reduced relief needs, and that relief needs are therefore less than last winter.

4. That special consideration be given to the character of taxation which is being passed by state governments in order to raise funds for relief. Higher incomes and surplus profits should be made to bear their fair share of the burden.

(Pp. 102, 428) The Wagner-Peyser Act "to provide for the cooperation of the federal government with the several states and territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardships and suffering caused by unemployment" is being administered in a more practical manner than that followed by the Reconstruction Finance Committee in relief measures. The law provides for an appropriation of $500,000,000, half of which is given outright to the states under certain conditions. The other half is granted the states on the matching basis of one federal dollar for three dollars of public money spent within the state for unemployment relief during April and May of this year.

Harry L. Hopkins was appointed Federal Emergency Relief Administrator. In the beginning there was some complaint that strikers were refused relief and that very small wages were paid by the states from the funds appropriated by the government. This has been changed, however, for on July 21 Administrator Hopkins issued an order that the Federal Emergency Relief Administration would not attempt to judge the merits of labor disputes and relief should be given the families of striking wage earners after careful investigation had shown that their resources were not sufficient to meet the emergency needs. If the Department of Labor determines that a strike is unreasonable and unjustified, the relief money is withheld. But under existing conditions no claim can be made that any strike is unjustified.

Mr. Hopkins also announced that the wages fixed in the supplementary blanket code to the National Recovery Act should apply to relief work.

The order stated that after August 1, these minimum wages should be paid: In cities of over 500,000 population, $15 per week; between 250,000 and 500,000 population, $14.50; between 2,500 and 250,000 population, $14; less than 2,500 population, 20 per cent increase in all wages providing this does not raise the amount in excess of $12.

All of these wages will apply also to the immediate trade areas of such cities and towns. The prevailing wage rate must be rigidly adhered to in each locality. If the prevailing wage is 40 cents or more per hour, that must be paid, but in no case shall payment be less than 30 cents per hour. Grants made under the Emergency Relief Act of 1933 can be used only in paying wages at or above 30 cents an hour.

These rates represent a slight improvement as in many cases local relief administrations were paying 50 cents to $1 a day. The order also forbade persons under sixteen years of age being employed, or working any one more than 40 hours in any one week except those in a managerial or executive capacity.

(1934, pp. 114, 543) It is a principle of civilization that society must make provision for those in need. With the breakdown of our business structure, those thrown out of jobs numbered millions from every walk in life. Whatever of old Poor Law attitude toward the needy lingers in our relief administration should vanish before the experience of the past four years. The unemployed are the victims of our inadequate understanding of economic principles and business administration together with maladjustments in foreign markets. No personal blame can be attached to them for their misfortune, nor should any stigma be associated with relief for their period of need. Relief is compensation for the injury which our economic cataclysm had done to their business and job investments. Organized society must assume responsibility for meeting needs due to social insecurities.

The relief problem is huge as is shown by the totals of unemployed and by the expenditures of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

In October, 1933, an unemployment relief census was taken covering families receiving public unemployment relief during that month.

The census showed the following significant facts: More than half the families on relief were in 8 states, Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, California, Oklahoma and Texas, and a third of the families in the first four states. In three states, Florida, South Carolina and West Virginia, one-quarter of the population was dependent on relief, while the average for continental United States was approximately 10; 7 states have 5 per cent or less on relief; large cities averaged higher than the U.S. as a whole; small families (2 to 4 persons) less frequently turned to relief and larger families (5 or more) more frequently; detached individuals constituted 13 per cent of all relief cases and a larger proportion in the cities than in the United States as a whole. Children constituted a disproportionately large part of the relief group; 42 per cent of relief persons were children under 16, whereas this group constituted 31 per cent of the population. Those between 6 and 13 showed the greatest proportion, although each age group up to 18 showed an excess of relief cases over its proportion to the entire population.

(P. 117) When provisions have been made for the dependent young and aged—two groups for whom society has accepted its responsibility, and also for the sick, there still remain the millions seeking jobs, competent and willing to work. There are the girls and boys turning from schools into the responsibilities of adult life and the workers who have successfully held jobs over periods of years or even decades.

Wage earners are at a disadvantage in preparing against the emergencies they meet in earning their incomes. Few industries have paid high wages or accepted the responsibility growing out of employing persons to work. We have long accepted the principle that ownership grows out of creative work, but have not carried the principle into modern production relationships. We have failed to recognize that workers who invest their producing capacity in making products or providing services have at least as real an equity in a business as the person who invests capital. This equity in the undertaking entitles the work relationship to some degree of protection. The rights of a worker attached to a payroll must be worked out by workers organized for collective responsibility and in negotiation with employers. We have just begun the development of the implications of Labor's equity in the job aided by legal recognition of the principle in Section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act.

The next step in the development is acceptance of responsibility for a stable income for wage earners. Either there must be assured work or reserves must be accumulated to pay wages when production falls off.

The A. F. of L. has endorsed the principle of unemployment compensation and formulated principles recommended for legislative measures. We believe that the adoption of a federal measure similar to the bill introduced by Senator Wagner in the last Congress, would greatly facilitate the enactment of state measures and might facilitate the establishment of the principle by industries.

We reaffirm the principles adopted by the convention of 1932 for unemployment compensation measures.

(P. 120) The adoption of any legislative program would not remove the need for emergency relief during the coming years or make unnecessary a permanent relief program. There is need to rewrite our Poor Laws into public welfare measures enlarging their recognition of Society's obligation to all persons incapable of earning a living, and eliminating their stigma of pauperism. We recommend the following principles as basic in such a program:

Because every individual is entitled to an opportunity to earn his living, every worker deprived of employment is entitled to the essentials of life. Relief must be supplied the needy.

These essentials must not be provided at the expense of sub-standard living for the employed—extension of poverty is not a sound policy, for maintenance and restoration of buying is the primary objective in recovery.

To increase production and to develop new employment opportunities are the only ways to relieve unemployment. Our present production level is so low that we are not producing enough goods to enable our citizens to live at their accustomed standards. Some jobs can be available if the work week were drastically reduced to 30 hours without reduction in pay, so that the result would be immediate increase in buying in the retail market. Relief is not a permanent substitute for normal producing of wealth and earning of income. It should provide income for the emergency in such a way as to conserve the morale and producing ability of the individual. Work is the keystone in any relief program. A well planned program of public works and national conservation is the most direct way to start up the depressed heavy or durable goods industries. By putting the unemployed back to work in the heavy industries, new consuming power will still further stimulate the consumer goods industries.

(P. 571) The A. F. of L. requests the administrator of the FERA, also all State Administrators, to take immediate action to have the maximum of relief per family raised to meet the requirements made necessary by the above mentioned increase in the cost of living.

(1935, pp. 66, 495) The extent of our national problem of relief may be best measured by the extent of unemployment. At the opening of the first year of depression, 1930, there were 3,216,000 unemployed. In March, 1930, the figures stood at 3,543,000. Three years later, in March, 1933, unemployment reached 13,689,000—its highest mark. In three years, more than ten million men and women were added to the jobless army—a development without precedent or parallel in the industrial history of the world.

In May, 1933, when the FERA began to function, the number of cases was 28 times greater and the amount expended almost 24 times greater than the same month of 1929.

Prior to May, 1933, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had carried on relief and work relief activities through allocation of funds to states. . . .

The Federal Emergency Relief Administration was established on May 22, 1933, and in that month 4,250,000 families, or nearly 19,000,000 persons, were receiving relief from public funds.

From the outset, the major portion of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration's work was devoted to direct relief activities. At the same time an effort was made to provide as much relief as possible in the form of work projects. One of the agencies designed to accomplish this purpose was the Civilian Conservation Corps, instituted under the Emergency Conservation Works project.

The CCC was formed to enroll unemployed young men between the ages of 18 and 25, to protect and improve the nation's forest lands. The boys were stationed at forest camps and given a cash allowance of $30 per month of which not less than $23 was to be sent to dependents. In addition, each CCC worker was provided with food and clothing and medical care.

(1936, p. 129) Congress appropriated $1,425,000,000 to be used in the discretion and under the direction of the President to provide direct relief and work relief on useful projects.

All activities of the government having supervision of projects for which funds from the foregoing appropriation are made available, shall not knowingly employ aliens illegally within the limits of the United States. The law also provides that the pay for persons engaged upon projects under the foregoing appropriation shall be not less than the prevailing rates of pay for work of a similar nature as determined by the Works Progress Administration with the approval of the President.

(Pp. 151, 715) Our first obligation in considering policies of relief for the future is to express our appreciation for the scope and the ideals of the relief program which the administration has sponsored. Never at any time in the nation's history has society accepted such definite responsibility for unemployment and for the rights of those to whom society cannot provide opportunity to earn their living. While there have been difficulties in administration and inadequacies in provision, the spirit of the federal administration has always been that of open-minded consideration of problems. We believe that the relationship between the federal and state agencies should in the future be better coordinated so that grants to states may be administered in accord with accepted and uniform standards. The most of our troubles have been due to the fact that never before has our nation been compelled to consider relief as a continuing social problem for which we must adopt policies and administrative standards. As the federal government cannot retire from the relief problem without endangering our national existence, the question of the kind of relief and the scope of the program, together with that of federal responsibility for local standards and policies, is a public issue of first order importance.

We know that in the past direct relief in some areas has been too niggardly not to do serious damage to the capacities of many. We know also that policies in providing work have not always taken into consideration consequences to the individual employee or social and industrial implications within our organization for normal living. Unskilled workers have been employed and trained for jobs requiring special skills, while the skilled workers trained for those jobs were unemployed. Public buildings have been constructed with indefensibly low wages. It has been impossible to remedy these situations through state administrations. Therefore, we urge that funds should be allotted to local governmental agencies with the provision that unskilled workers should not displace or be trained to displace skilled workers. In addition, all relief administration must be lifted from the plane of charity to that of the administration of an inalienable right of free individuals.

In planning for the future we have two concerns. First, to care for immediate needs; secondly, to plan a long-time program.

First, as regards immediate relief needs. Since it is expected that funds for WPA work will be exhausted by January or February, 1937, immediate action will be necessary when Congress convenes to provide for the continuance of the Works Program. Industry is by no means ready to care for the 3,364,000 still dependent on this emergency work, nor are local governments able to provide direct relief for the rest.

A standard of relief must be maintained which keeps relief families in health, and will provide for necessary clothing, rent and medical care in addition to food. Wherever states and localities are failing to provide for these minimum needs, responsibility rests with the federal government to see that these needs are met.

Secondly, planning a long time program for relief, we must accept the principle of federal responsibility. Conservation of our nation is a social obligation which we cannot delegate to private charity or entrust to the chance of individual conscience. There is involved analysis of relief needs and coordination of federal, state and local responsibility in meeting them. As a nation, we have already set ourselves to the task of providing social security which rests upon economic security. If a family cannot support itself, there must be some difficulty beyond its power to meet. These difficulties may be roughly classified under different main causes, and each provided for according to its special nature: (a) Unemployment. This requires, first, unemployment insurance, and secondly, relief funds beyond the insured period, supplemented by a planned program for work on public projects. To do this in a constructive way and to avoid the makeshift of mere made work involves long term planning of public works for the nation as a whole, coordinating state and local needs with national needs in such a way that a reserve of needed work will always be ready. (b) Employment service. An adequate public employment exchange in each locality should be the connecting link between workers seeking jobs and jobs seeking workers. (c) Old age. An old age pension should provide for families where the breadwinner is beyond employable age and for individuals over this age. (d) Dependent children. A mother's pension should provide for mothers of minor children who, through widowhood or for other reasons, are left without income. (e) Health insurance and disability pensions should take care of families needing relief because of illness and disability. Those handicapped by chronic illness constitute a special problem requiring special provisions.

These groupings outline the main types of need which bring families to relief. Experience would indicate that they can best be cared for by a plan for federal grants in aid to states, matched by state and local funds to cover the different types of need. Provision for some of these needs is already being made; others will require new services and further services in addition to the above may also be necessary.

The agencies dealing with these different types of relief must be closely coordinated, both nationally and locally, so that the whole program will function as a unit, while giving the different kinds of specialized care needed.

(P. 563) The A. F. of L. endorses the continued maintenance of government work relief through the Public Works Administration, the Works Progress Administration, the Civilians' Conservation Corps and such other agencies, until such time as the thirty-hour week or its equivalent, with no reduction of wages, is established on a national scale for the re-employment of the millions who are eagerly seeking self-sustaining employment in private commerce and industry.

(1937, pp. 170, 319) After several weeks of bitter debate both Houses of Congress passed and the President approved H. J. Res. 361 making appropriations for relief purposes.

The President recommended that not more than $1,500,000,000 be appropriated for the fiscal year 1938. The A. F. of L. did everything it possibly could to have at least $2,200,000,000 appropriated in order to prevent the laying off of thousands of WPA workers. However, only $1,500,000,000 was appropriated.

The law contains a clause that the funds appropriated should be distributed over the twelve months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938 and administered during such fiscal year so as to constitute the total amount furnished for relief purposes. Furthermore, the law provides that the Works Progress Administration shall liquidate and wind up the affairs of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration by June 30, 1938.

The bill provides that no alien illegally within the limits of the U.S. or aliens who have not filed declaration of intention to become citizens shall be employed. It also provides for the prevailing rates of wages.

Ten days after the law was enacted bills were introduced to appropriate money sufficient to employ all unemployed workers who cannot find employment in private industry. The Appropriations Committee of the House refused to consider this bill as it would conflict with the Relief Bill approved June 29, 1937.

(1938, pp. 156, 551) For the purpose of continuing relief, work relief and loans and grants for public works projects the following sums were appropriated by Congress:

For the WPA $1,425,000,000. Of this sum $484,500,000 is for the building of highways, roads, streets, etc., and $655,500,000 for public buildings, parks, public utilities, electric transmission lines for rural areas, sewer systems, water supply and power systems, airports and other transportation facilities; flood control, drainage, irrigation, conservation, eradication of insect pests and miscellaneous construction projects; for educational, professional, clerical, cultural, recreational production service and other miscellaneous non-construction projects including training for domestic service, $285,000,000.

The sum of $75,000,000 is allocated to the National Youth Administration in addition to other unexpended balances for the purpose of aiding needy young persons no longer in regular attendance at school to obtain part-time work and training, and to aid others in continuing their education in schools, colleges and universities.

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend up to $175,000,000, together with unexpended balances previously allocated to the Farm Security Administration, such sums to be available for administration loans, relief and rural rehabilitation to needy persons.

Persons employed on projects operated under appropriations for the WPA are to be paid not less than the prevailing rates of pay for similar work in the same locality. Each relief worker is required to sign a quarterly statement of his earnings from outside sources and no person who refuses a bona fide offer under as favorable conditions as prevail on relief projects shall be retained on relief project rolls during such period that such private employment would be available. Any person who accepts private employment and loses same through no fault of his own shall not be discriminated against, but shall be entitled to immediately resume his previous employment status if he is still in need.

The Public Works Administration under Title II is continued until June 30, 1941, and the sum of $965,000,000 is appropriated for carrying out the purposes of this legislation.

Funds will be used in making allotments to finance Federal projects; the making of grants or loans to states, territories and political subdivisions or other public agencies, and the construction and leasing of projects with or without the privilege of purchase to any such public agency. Not more than $200,000,000 may be allotted to Federal agencies for Federal construction projects which are confined to the following classes:

- (1) Projects authorized by law;
- (2) An enlargement or extension of existing Federal plants;
- (3) Hospitals and facilities for veterans;
- (4) Correctional or penal institutions under the Department of Justice.

Grants for non-Federal projects are limited to 45 per cent of the cost and not more than $750,000,000 of this fund may be used for grants to defray estimated non-recoverable portions of costs of projects constructed for lease to public agencies.

Only $15,000,000 can be used for administrative purposes. In order to hasten the beginning of work relief the Act provides that no fund may be allotted for any project which cannot be commenced prior to January 1, 1939, or can be substantially completed prior to June 30, 1940. Nor shall new applications for loans or grants to non-Federal projects be accepted after September 30, 1938 unless amendatory to applications received prior to October 1, 1938.

Under Title III of the Act the authorization for construction of public buildings outside the District of Columbia is increased from $70,000,000 to $130,000,000 and the sum of $25,000,000 is appropriated for this purpose.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration to the extent of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939. In addition $700,000 is appropriated for administrative expenses, including printing and binding, for the fiscal years 1938 and 1939.

Title V provides for an appropriation of $212,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make parity payments to producers of wheat, cotton, corn, rice and tobacco in accordance with the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938.

Under Title VI the United States Housing Authority is authorized to enter into contracts for contributions amounting to $28,000,000 per year. The Authority is permitted to issue and sell its notes and bonds or other obligations in an amount not to exceed $800,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out its objectives.

Another law enacted which will be helpful is Public No. 479 which authorizes the RFC to promote the economic stability of the Nation and to encourage the employment of labor, to make loans to or contracts to states or their subdivisions, public agencies, public boards and commissions to aid in financing projects authorized under Federal, state or municipal law.

Loans may be made through the purchase of securities and the corporation is authorized to bid for them. In addition the corporation is also authorized to purchase the securities of or make loans to any business enterprise when capital or credit is not otherwise available at prevailing rates for the character of the loan desired.

A further appropriation of $250,000,000 was made to permit greater employment in the WPA until June 30, 1938.

According to statistics submitted by the Administrator of the PWA for every employee at the site of PWA work two and a half times as much indirect employment is created in factories, mines, mills and forests producing, fabricating and distributing necessary construction materials and equipment. Heavy industries are stimulated and consumers' goods are given encouragement.

(1939, p. 122) The enactment of the Work Relief and Relief Law because of its provisions created consternation among skilled and unskilled wage earners throughout the U.S. It appropriated only $1,475,000,000 for the WPA. This was considered insufficient by the A. F. of L. which supported a measure for a larger appropriation.

The prevailing rate of wage provision and policy which had applied on WPA projects as a result of Executive Order was abrogated and set aside through the incorporation of the WPA Relief Measure of a provision for a 130-hour work month at a so-called security wage. The Theatre Project was also dropped from the Work Relief Measure for the year 1940. Art projects, however, will be continued until December 31, 1939. Following that date, local sponsors must be obtained who will be required to pay twenty-five per cent of the funds necessary in order to continue these art projects.

Another provision of the law provides that all employes of the WPA who have worked 18 months shall be "furloughed" for 30 days to give employment to needy persons who have been unemployed for three months. The statement was frequently made on the floors of the Senate and House that the men and women would not be "furloughed." Instead they would be discharged. This caused great alarm among the employes of the WPA as they realized that they could not return to the WPA for employment. It was estimated that 600,000 WPA workers who have worked eighteen months would be discharged. The bill originally had exempted persons 45 years of age and over, but this was stricken out, although it was stated that persons 45 years of age and over always find it difficult to secure employment in private industry. Members of Congress received thousands of protests, but when an attempt was made to modify the bill it was defeated.

Another provision which originated in the House provided for $125,000,000 to be expended by the Commissioner of Public Works. This would mean that that amount would be spent in giving work to the building trades workmen where for every employee on the site there would be two employes preparing materials. This provision was stricken out in the Senate and the conferees agreed.

The bill originated in the House Appropriations Committee. No public hearings were held. It was reported in the House June 14 with a rule for six hours' debate—that day and June 15. On the 16th after a few amendments were made the bill was passed by a vote of 373 to 21. During that time the parliamentary situation was such that it was impossible to get a straight vote on an amendment providing for the prevailing wage. Besides, it was evidenced later by the vote on passage that it would have been impossible under any consideration to have an amendment made in the House.

When the bill went to the Senate, Senator McCarran, at the request of the A. F. of L., introduced an amendment to restore the prevailing rate of wage amendment for all WPA work, which was passed without a roll call vote. Another amendment of the Senate restored the theatre project to the bill.

When the bill went to conference the provisions for the prevailing rate of wages and theatre projects were stricken out and other amendments made by the Senate were radically changed or eliminated.

No sooner had the bill passed Congress than a hue and cry came from all parts of the country. When it was understood that more than a million persons were to lose their employment, and that those who did work would have to put in 130 hours a month for the same wages then received it is easily understood why such an uproar began. Building trades' wages were reduced from 50 to 75 percent. Furthermore, the bill had not been signed by the President an hour before contractors in New York, Cleveland and other cities demanded a reduction in the building trades wages.

When the Economy Act was passed in 1933 reducing the wages of Government employes 15 percent employers in all parts of the country began to slash wages. That was the fear which developed among building trades and other workers on WPA, that the standard of wages they had gradually secured in private employment by more than 50 years of effort would be torn down.

So disastrous would be the Work Relief Bill to the standard of wages established in the U.S. after years of sacrifice that the President of the A. F. of L. called a conference of representatives of all national and international unions to meet in Washington July 12. This conference adopted a resolution calling upon Congress to restore the prevailing wage rate and other important provisions eliminated from the 1939 law.

It also requested him to appoint a committee, of which he would be chairman, to wait upon the President, the Vice-President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to present the resolution adopted and urge action upon it. These instructions were carried out and the committee forcefully presented the action of the conference.

Later when S. 2864, named the Spend and Lend Bill, was before the Senate, Senator McCarran again introduced his amendment as a rider and fought vigorously for its adoption. It was defeated by a vote of 40 to 38. S. 2864 passed the Senate by a vote of 52 to 28, but when it reached the House it was refused consideration by a vote of 193 to 166.

When the Third Deficiency Appropriation Bill was considered in the Senate two further attempts were made by Senator McCarran to restore the provisions for the prevailing rate of wages. It was necessary to make a motion to suspend the rules to consider the amendment which required a two-thirds vote. The motion was defeated.

Senator Pepper submitted a motion to suspend the rules to permit the addition to the bill of an amendment that would cure a very grave injustice. The amendment was to repeal the clause adopted forbidding any theater project from being any part of the Works Project Administration program. The motion was defeated.

H.. 5681, which became a law (Public No. 393) authorizes the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to purchase and distribute to persons on relief, at a cost not to exceed $1,325,000, surplus products of the fishing industry. Experiments along these lines were made during 1937 and 1938.

(P. 169) The peak of WPA employment was reached at the end of February 1936 when 3,040,000 persons were employed on works projects. With the approach of the summer of 1936, the decline in need, together with the broad expansion of private employment resulting from the improvement in the general economic conditions in 1936 and the first nine months of 1937, permitted a downward trend in WPA employment extending through the period from March 1936 to October 1937. In the early part of October 1937, a low was reached of less than 1,450,000 persons receiving WPA employment. The sharp recession in business activity and employment which began in the fall of 1937 forced the reversal in the work relief employment trend. As the result, a steady increase in WPA rolls continued from October 1937 until early November 1938 when the new peak was reached of 3,270,000 persons employed on WPA. Although in previous years, there had been a marked decline in work relief employment in summer months, a contraseasonal increase was necessitated in 1938 by a combination of several factors. Among these were the exhaustion of benefits by workers receiving unemployment compensation, the hurricane in New England, the new policy of employing needy farm tenants and farm operators in the South, and the pressure of need accumulated during the early part of the recession when the plight of the newly unemployed workers had been less well recognized.

After November 1938, in spite of two supplementary appropriations, limitation of funds authorized by Congress forced the curtailment of WPA rolls. By August 1939, about 2,020,000 persons were employed on WPA. For the current fiscal year of 1939-1940 sufficient funds are available to provide employment to an average of about 2,000,000. It is expected, however, that the number at work will be reduced to about 1,500,000 by the end of the fiscal year.

During the past two years, increasing difficulty has been experienced by WPA in finding suitable employments for those on relief rolls. This has resulted in a broad expansion of WPA relief employment on various types of construction projects. Thus of the 2,436,000 employed on WPA projects on June 24, 1939, the largest portion, 1,705,000 workers, or 70 percent of the total, were engaged in the construction of highways, roads, streets, public buildings, recreational facilities, publicly owned and operated utilities and of airports. The expansion of work relief into the construction field has in effect resulted in the transfer to WPA of a large volume of construction from PWA projects where the building is done under contract system and fair labor standards are required.

(Job Security)—(1932, pp. 31, 320) What every worker wants is a job and the sense of security that comes from having a dependable source of income. We want to earn our way and to have commensurate reward that will enable us to participate in those activities that will bring us opportunities for development. We want security so as to lay the fear of loss of job which haunts every wage earner. Fear is not the best stimulus to the highest quality of production.

As steps toward worker security we propose the following:

(1) Organization of the job market through a system of state employment services under federal coordination. Workers should be supplied with information of existing jobs for which they may be fitted and helped to make contacts with employers in need of workers.

The employment agency is indispensable to various proposals for wage earner betterment and would supply indices to unemployment, shifting vocational trends, seasonal industries, etc.

The strengthening of the state employment agency should be primary in every program for wage earner protection.

(2) Wage earners should be organized into unions of their own choosing and under their own control. No individual or group that is not looking after its own interest intelligently need expect to make the greatest possible progress. Only a wage earner organization can supply experience and opinion representing the needs and aims of this group. Labor organizations are necessary to supply the contributions that will give balance in industrial planning and distribution of returns from joint production. Unions are essential to industry and society as well as to wage earners.

(3) Distribution of man-hours so that all may have an opportunity to earn a living. When workers have been added to the producing staff, none should be laid off until the hours for all have been reduced at least to 30 per week. Management should not be allowed to shift the costs of irregular production upon wage earners. As technical progress makes it possible to do our work in less time, a commensurate benefit for increased productivity should go to Labor in the form of shorter work week and more leisure. Unemployment and a lack of purchasing power are causes of depression.

(4) Higher wages. Consumer buying power should expand proportionately to increases in production and services available to raise standards of living. This is essential to prevention of depression. Wage earners and small-salaried persons constitute 83% of retail buyers. When their incomes are not large enough to supply an adequate retail market, business contracts.

(5) Vocational counsel and retraining. Every boy and girl should have the best counsel in finding the kind of work for which he or she is best fitted. This kind of assistance should be continued during adult years through employment services, to help them make adjustments to changes in industry. Vocational counsel should be connected with opportunities for retraining when necessary.

(6) The larger aspects of unemployment prevention through national economic planning. . . .

(1939, pp. 204, 522) As the tenth year of serious unemployment draws to its close, we place the problem of getting the unemployed back to work in private industry as our first concern.

The persistence of unemployment, the inability of industry in this country to recover from depression and resume its normal rate of expansion, make it clear that the recovery forces which lifted business out of depression in the past are no longer operating sufficiently to break the present business stagnation. Nor has the Federal Government, with its spending programs and other recovery efforts, succeeded in putting the unemployed to work in private industry. For after almost seven years of partial recovery, we still find ourselves today with 10,000,000 who have no work in private industry; and at no time in these seven years has unemployment been less than 7,500,000.

The A. F. of L. is not willing to tolerate permanent unemployment. We know that idle plants can be brought into operation, idle capital can find investment in productive private enterprise and idle men be put to work producing the goods they need for a decent living. Our nation has all the elements necessary to provide an adequate living for every American family; we lack only the proper coordination of effort.

The employment of the nation's work force in private industry depends on the investment of private capital in productive enterprise. In the past century, private capital flowed freely into such enterprises without special measures for coordination of effort. The high profits afforded by developing our country's vast natural resources, building railroads, creating our unequaled industrial plant and equipment were sufficient to draw private capital into long-term investment. More recently, the requirements of a world war, the development of the automobile and electric power industries and the building of our modern cities has provided highly profitable investment. In the years 1923 to 1929, private industry invested an average of $12,000,000,000 a year to build industrial plants and equipment and private housing. The volume of work provided by these investments, the steady increase in workers' producing power by industrial improvements and mass production, resulted in a 23% increase in the average per capita living standard in the United States in the decade before depression (1919 to 1929) and in practically full employment of our working population.

Today, the picture is entirely changed. Now there is no longer opportunity for highly profitable investment in great expansion of the nation's producing plant and equipment, for our industries cannot sell enough goods to keep their present plant in operation. The high profits and huge fortunes of the past cannot be made in industry today. The Cleveland Trust Company estimates that the chance of even succeeding in business today is only half as great as in the past, and the profits rewarding those who do succeed are at least 20% less. The risks are greater, the reward less. Consequently, private capital is not seeking investment in productive enterprise, but instead seeks security in tax free government bonds. During depression, private investment in industrial plants and in housing shrank to $3,500,000,000 or less, in contrast to the $12,000,000,000 invested annually before depression.

It appears from these facts that our problem of industrial expansion today is entirely different from that of the past. High profits to be made by developing natural resources and industrial plants no longer draw private capital into productive investment. Profits today depend on an increasing sales volume of goods produced by mass production. This requires steady expansion of consumers' buying power. Satisfactory profits can be made when consumers' buying power reaches high enough levels, for in 1937 the nation's leading corporations earned more than 10% on their net worth; but except in 1936 and 1937 consumer buying has not reached high enough levels to provide this rate of profit at any time in the past 10 years.

The failure of consumer buying power today is due chiefly to unemployment. As shown elsewhere in this report, the average hourly wage rate has been lifted by trade union action and legislation so that it is 24% above 1929. This higher wage level will provide buying power well above that of 1929 once industry can be expanded to higher levels of production and employment. There can be no doubt that once a high level of activity is reached, providing profitable investment and reducing risk, private capital will again flow into productive enterprise. This was the case in 1937, when private investment in plant and housing reached $9,000,000,000, even though production was not yet high enough to put all the unemployed to work or to create the goods necessary to give everyone a decent living.

Our problem then is how to lift production, in the shortest possible time, to levels which will furnish stable profits and put the unemployed to work. We are also concerned with keeping production at high enough levels to provide a steady flow of goods, once the necessary volume has been attained.

The immediate lifting of production and the maintenance of a steady flow of goods can never be accomplished by individuals acting separately. It requires coordinated action.

We have no precedent for action on the problem which now confronts our economy. Coordination of effort can only be accomplished through the co-operation of all concerned in agriculture, industry, finance, distribution, and service, with representation for the functional groups that constitute every industry, capital, Labor, management, and consumers. The Congress of the U.S. is the logical agency to act in behalf of the people, yet Congress has no advisory group possessing the technical knowledge and experience necessary to work out the complex problems of industrial coordination and provide a plan of action.

Many steps are necessary to prepare the way for industrial expansion through profitable private enterprise. Some can be taken by private industry and Labor acting in cooperation, some will require action by the Federal Government. Balanced expansion and maintenance can only be accomplished through coordination of effort by all groups concerned.

Federal spending and "pump priming" cannot permanently restore business to healthy activity unless it is coordinated with other action to assist private industry in resuming normal expansion.

Our problem is one of management on a national scale. Although more complicated than the management of any single industrial enterprise, many of the methods used in coordinating the activities of a large company, with branch plants and offices scattered across the continent, are applicable to the national economic problem. Also, our experience in organizing human relations on a representative basis in the political field will provide precedent for developing the agencies for individual government.

Modern industrial management when confronted with a problem of developing new fields for activity, turns first to its division of research and planning. Experts study the situation in all its aspects, then submit to management a plan for action. This plan may be modified, submitted to further study and adjusted by new discoveries—eventually it emerges as a workable project and is put into effect.

It appears to us that our national problems will yield to similar treatment. We cannot believe that American engineering skill, American labor, and the genius of American management, which have developed our unequalled industrial mechanism, will fail to solve the problem of national economic coordination if given a mandate to undertake it.

We emphasize the fact, however, that in the group which undertakes such a task, Labor, farmers and consumers must be adequately represented so that their interests will not be neglected. Industrial engineers and persons familiar with the problems of management and its administration of large business undertakings are also essential, for theirs is the particular knowledge of experience needed.

We urge that Congress set up an advisory council of this nature in the coming session with the mandate to develop measures by which private industry can expand production and maintain balanced prosperity. The suggestions of this advisory group should be submitted to Congress for action and made available to the general public.

This procedure follows democratic principles. There is an opportunity for public opinion to be informed and to express itself through its normal agency, the Congress of the United States. The character of the advisory group assures representation of every sector of our population.

We need not be at the mercy of haphazard forces which have governed business expansion during the period of national industrial growth. These forces at best brought about periods of high productive activity followed by depressions; they did not bring stable expansion; they are no longer adequate to meet our needs. During recent years government controls have been extended over an increasing portion of our economic activity, with a growing danger of bureaucracy. We have need now of a central advisory agency, representing the economic groups concerned, forming a channel for their views and experience, commissioned to coordinate industrial activity.

Such an agency, advisory to Congress, can prepare the way for balanced expansion of private industry and reemployment of the unemployed.

(1933, p. 85) Unemployment increased almost steadily for three and a half years. In April, 1930, when the census was taken, 3,187,647 were reported out of work; in March 1933 when unemployment reached its peak, our estimate shows 13,689,000 out of work. From March to July this year, with the rapid increase in industrial activity, over 2,000,000 persons were reemployed, but encouraging as this gain is, it leaves 11,781,000 still out of work. Although our trade union unemployment figures show that employment was still gaining in August the gain was too small to make any substantial decrease in the army of unemployed who must face another winter without work and without resources. Unless the return to work takes place at a faster rate in the months just before us, the employed will suffer worse hardship in the coming winter than ever before.

(P. 87) Our estimate of unemployment covers all workers in the U.S. including farmers, farm laborers, management, professional workers, public service and the industrial groups. The figures are based on the census brought up to date by employment indices furnished monthly by the Labor Department and other monthly figures from the government: Roads; Bureau of Public Roads; Railroads; Interstate Commerce Commission; Federal employees; Civil Service Commission;

Hired workers on farms; Department of Agriculture; Armed Forces: Army, Navy, etc.; Local and state government; government reports from the localities.

A group of some 7,851,800 workers (in April, 1930) were not covered by any index and employment in this group is considered to vary correspondingly with employment in all other groups combined. This group includes domestic servants; automobile service; restaurants; clerical workers in banking, insurance and real estate; semi-professionals and others.

In addition to these workers who have already been employed, there are constantly being added to our population new recruits seeking jobs. Our estimate counts these as part of the total number seeking employment. The increase in this group from April, 1930, to July, 1933, is over 1,350,000.

Some groups cannot be accounted for in the estimate because no reports exist to show their conditions. Of these groups the following are counted as unemployed: 1. Those unemployed who have gone to the country to occupy deserted shacks and raise their food. 2. Those who are given food and shelter on farms but no wage payment in return for their work. 3. Those in forestry camps and on relief work are not counted as employed since they are not in permanent earning positions. 4. Many unemployed are of course able to find temporary work in bringing in intermittently a small income. This work cannot be accounted for and these workers are considered unemployed.

Offsetting these groups are three groups counted as employed because, lacking data on which estimates for their unemployment may be based, they automatically fall into the employed groups: 1. Teachers who are teaching school but not being paid. 2. Those unemployed who have gone to the country to live with relatives on farms and are provided with at least food and shelter. 3. Those who were living on income from investments and are now forced to seek work; we have no way of estimating them.

In general our estimate aims to count as employed only those who actually have earning positions in normal industrial or service work.

(1934, p. 110) It is fully a year now since the President's reemployment drive put some 1,700,000 men and women back to work. During that year, unemployment has never fallen below the 10,000,000 mark, but has been continually higher than it was in September, 1933, when the drive ended. During the 12 months since the drive, we have made no progress whatever in putting these 10,000,000 unemployed to work.

The Federation unemployment estimates which have been published monthly for the last few years furnish a measuring rod by which we can follow the unemployment situation and know our progress. The figures which are widely used throughout the country are based on monthly employment data collected by the U.S. Government, which give as nearly accurate a picture of the situation as can be secured. These figures show that during depression, unemployment reached a peak in March, 1933, when 13,689,000 were out of work. The business boom of May to July, 1933, put 1,900,000 back to work; the reemployment drive from July to September created jobs for 1,700,000 more; so that by September, 1933, 3,600,000 were back at their jobs, and unemployment had been reduced to 10,108,000.

Labor expected this progress to continue as industry increased its activity this spring, and was confident that emphasis given the problem by the President as well as its catastrophic extent, would be enough to call forth every effort on the part of business to put men to work. Instead, very few industries cooperated in the President's request to increase wages and shorten hours, and although business activity at its highest point this spring (May) was five per cent above last September, unemployment at this point was higher than last September by 140,000 persons.

Thus it is clear that we cannot count on increasing business activity alone to put the unemployed to work. Other measures will be necessary.

Part of the present unemployment problem is due to the failure of so-called heavy industries to recover from depression. At present 3,200,000 are still unemployed in the heavy industries, while increased consuming power has put back to work all but 600,000 in consumer industries. The heavy industries, producing durable goods, include: building, mines, industries manufacturing iron and steel, machinery, automobiles, building materials, railroad equipment.

(1935, p. 60) The problem of putting some 11,000,000 unemployed back to work in industry is one of the greatest tasks now before the American people. Many persons take it for granted that, as industry comes back to normal, the unemployed will automatically find work. We wish the problem were as simple as this. Careful observation of economic facts indicates, however, that (1) increases in the worker's productivity have been so great, both during the decade ending in 1929 and during the following five years of depression, that even a return to normal business will not give work to all who seek it. The problem will never be solved until reduction in the hours of labor goes hand in hand with the introduction and development of machinery. (2) The greatest progress made during depression in putting the unemployed to work was accomplished through the codes and the President's Reemployment Program, by shortening work hours; through this program, 1,800,000 men and women went back to work from July to October, 1933. (3) Very little progress has been made since then in creating jobs in industry, although business activity has increased considerably.

Reemployment under codes reached its peak in May and June, 1934, when 39,500,000 persons in all were at work in the U. S., compared to 35,700,000 at the bottom of depression. Since that time, employment has continually been below the 39,500,000 figure, although industrial activity has averaged 3 per cent higher during the first 6 months of 1935 than it was in May and June of 1934.

Comparing production and employment, we find the following: In manufacturing industries, production in the first half of 1935 exceeded the last half of 1934 by 16.3 per cent, while employment was higher by only 5 per cent. Comparing the first half of 1935 with the same period in 1934, for both manufacturing and mining, we find that production in 1935 exceeded 1934 by 4.7 per cent while employment was only 1.5 per cent higher. Thus it is clear that, at the present time, in our great mining and manufacturing industries which employ nearly one-third of all industrial wage and small-salaried workers, production is increasing more rapidly than employment.

This lag of employment stands out just as clearly when we compare business activity as a whole with employment in all industries and review the whole period from the bottom of depression to the present time. Employment gains made through codes have not been continued during the past year and consequently, by June, 1935, recovery in employment had fallen behind recovery in business activity. In the two years and three months since March 1933, which was the bottom of depression both for business activity and employment, business activity has risen half-way back to normal but only 39 per cent of those laid off during depression have gone back to work. Of the 9,500,000 persons who lost their jobs during depression, only 3,700,000 had found work in industry up to June 1935 and all these jobs were found before June 1934. Business activity, on the other hand, has risen from a low point of 58.4 per cent of normal to 79.1 per cent of normal—a recovery of 50 per cent (according to the Annalist index of business activity).

It is clear from this record that we cannot count on recovering business to put all the unemployed to work unless business activity reaches a level very substantially above normal. To sustain business at a level adequate to give work to all would require large increases in workers' buying power, and maintenance of workers' buying power at a higher level than any thus far attained. By lifting workers' income through the economic power of labor organizations we have already started to lay the necessary foundation of buying power, but progress has not yet gone far enough.

Why has employment failed to increase with business revival during the past year? This is a question of vital importance, since the livelihood of millions depends on their finding work in industry as business recovers.

To answer the question adequately requires study of the economic factors underlying the present business situation. By comparing the business recovery of 1933-35 with previous periods of recovery and expansion since 1920, we find this significant fact: In recent periods of business revival, production has always increased more rapidly than employment.

Comparing the present revival with three previous periods of revival approximately equal to the present in degree of recovery, we find: (1) The increase in factory employment in various revivals varied from seven to 16 per cent; in 1933-35, it was 31 per cent. (2) The increase in factory wage payments in previous revivals varied from 12 to 27 per cent; in 1933-35, the increase was 46 per cent.

Thus it is clear at once that our effort to control economic forces through organization has tended to speed the readjustment of labor income. This is the more important since workers' income declined more in proportion to the gross income of manufacturing industry during this depression than in any previous depression since 1920. The National Bureau of Economic Research states: "Wage liquidation paralleled the general drop in gross income . . . In this respect the recession of 1929-33 stands alone . . . for traditionally the decline in wage disbursements lags behind the drop in gross income of manufacturing industries."

The controlled revival of 1933-35 differed from previous revivals in other respects. Normally, in a period of business recovery, the primary emphasis is on production as a means of increasing profits and workers' income. Production increases more rapidly than wage payments and labor cost per unit of product declines. Work hours are lengthened without increasing wage rates and workers raise their income by working longer hours. Thus workers' share in the income from production steadily falls behind.

In the present recovery, this process occurred in the usual way until the introduction of codes. Then it was reversed. Instead of emphasizing production as a means of increasing income, under codes workers' income in many instances was lifted by shortening work hours and putting men to work. Thus is the period from the depression bottom to the beginning of 1935, wage payments increased more than production and labor costs were not reduced as rapidly as in previous recoveries. A reduction of eight per cent in labor costs during this period compares with reductions varying from 12 per cent to 23 per cent in previous recoveries.

In previous recent recoveries, industry has depended largely on decreasing labor costs to permit reductions in prices to consumers and increase in profits to investors: Labor costs were reduced by increasing productivity; production increased faster than either employment or wage payments; and thus the total share of Labor as a group in the income of industry declined. This is the usual development when industry recovers from depression without measures for control. It results eventually in gains for investors and consumers at the expense of Labor. Its immediate effects, however, are greatly to speed recovery. For (1) reduced prices lead to greater consumer buying and (2) rapidly increasing profits together with the increasing demand for production of goods induce industrial executives to make rapid increases in the production of goods. Employment increases as production rises (though less rapidly) and the unemployed are returned to work more quickly than they have been in the present depression.

These forces, if allowed to operate unchecked, however, eventually produce an unbalance in industry—a shortage of consuming power, because Labor's income increases less rapidly than production. This shortage prevents production from reaching its highest possible levels and is instrumental, within a few years, in bringing on another recession. Such a shortage of buying power in 1929 is now generally recognized as one of the outstanding causes of the present depression.

In the present recovery, measures for control have emphasized the increase in Labor's income rather than the reduction of labor costs. Prices of manufactured goods are not yet entirely readjusted—they are still high in comparison with the prices of other goods. As a result, consumer buying and the demand for production of goods have not yet increased as rapidly as in some other recoveries, and production and employment have recovered more slowly.

That recovery is proceeding there can be no doubt. Consumer buying today (June 1935) is 22 per cent above the depression low point and three per cent above last year. Profits of industrial firms are increasing. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York reports an increase of 48.5 per cent in profits of 163 industrial firms from 1933 to 1934, and the National City Banks report an increase of 18 per cent in the first half of 1935 over the same period of 1934 for a similar group.

The fact that employment failed to increase during the past year is probably due partly to the slow recovery of production and also to readjustments in industry following the large increase in employment in 1933. Industrial indicators today give evidence of a healthy development in business which promises gains in employment and production during the next few months. If workers' buying power can be maintained and further increased in proportion to industrial income as business rises we may look forward to a period of more healthy business than that of the pre-depression decade.

Gains in workers' buying power are shown by the figures on income recently released by the U.S. Department of Commerce. These figures show that the share of industrial wage earners in the nation's total income paid out has increased from 14.6 per cent in 1932 to 18.1 per cent in 1934. The fact that this gain was made during a period when the share of property holders and entrepreneurs did not increase shows a readjustment of labor income. This readjustment is not yet complete, however, for wage earners in 1934 received only 18.1 per cent of the total income paid out while in 1929 they received 21.9 per cent. Labor today is receiving a smaller proportion of the total income than in 1929. The proportion going to investors (property income) on the other hand is practically the same as in 1929, and the income of entrepreneurs is actually a larger proportion of the total than in 1929 (16.4 per cent in 1934 compared to 15.8 per cent in 1929).

These figures indicate that a further increase in Labor's buying power is essential to assure a healthy recovery. This increase must be made by re-employing the unemployed as well as by increasing the income of those already at work. With the gradual increase of production and the consequent reduction of unit overhead costs; and with the steady increase in productivity and consequent reduction of labor costs, increases in workers' income and in workers' share of total income will be possible without unduly burdening industry. This will not be accomplished, however, unless we have strong labor organizations to enable workers to secure their share of industry's earnings.

(1936, pp. 158, 436) More than six years have elapsed since the census of unemployment was taken in 1930. Federal indices of employment which we have used to bring the census unemployment figure up to date gave a close representation of the changes in employment in the U.S. during periods of industrial decline, but in a time of rising business activity they do not show the full extent of reemployment. This is due to the fact that no satisfactory method has yet been devised to record the employment given by new firms starting in business. That these new firms furnish a substantial amount of employment is clear to those who have studied the biennial censuses of manufactures and trade; some estimate the total number of jobs offered by new companies since March 1933 at one million or more.

It is clear, therefore, that any estimate of unemployment which depends for its basic statistical data on the federal indices of employment will understate the number at work and overstate the unemployed. While government bureaus issuing the figures are in a position to adjust them to the biennial censuses of manufactures and American business and so arrive at a close figure on unemployment, this task is so complicated as to extend beyond the scope of most organizations outside the government. These facts point to the need for another unemployment census at the earliest possible date, and for periodic censuses in future. It is a serious matter, in a great industrial nation such as the United States, to be without any adequate method of measuring unemployment. Industrial changes deprive millions of American families of their livelihood; we cannot plan to provide adequately for these families during their unemployment nor can we make the industrial adjustments necessary to assure them productive employment in future unless we have this statistical information as a basis for planning.

The U.S. Employment Service records six million three hundred and seventy-five thousand registered for work on July 1, 1936, who were without jobs in industry. In September, the figure is approximately six million five hundred and thirty-seven thousand. We know that not nearly all the unemployed who seek work in industry have registered with the Employment Service; trade union members, for instance, usually register with their business agents and depend on their union to find work for them. In September about five hundred thousand union members were seeking work, most of whom probably were not registered with the exchanges. Many other workers depend on other contacts to find their jobs. Therefore, it is clear that there are today many more than six million five hundred thousand unemployed who have found no place in industry, although business recovery is well advanced.

(1937, pp. 172, 352) Agitation for an unemployment census resulted in Congress providing for investigation on or before April 1, 1938, of the number of persons partially employed and unemployed together with occupations. A census of their dependents and their incomes is also to be made.

The questions to be included in the census are to be prepared by the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor, Works Progress Administrator, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board and the Director of the Census. The President is authorized to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of the Act.

(Pp. 181, 352) Gains in employment this year show the effect of preventing an increase in the work week. Although production increased less this year than last, employment increased more. In the 12 months ending May 1937, when the work week was not lengthened, Labor Department estimates of all non-agricultural employment show that 1,961,000 went back to work with a 16% increase in industrial production, while last year in the same period a 21% increase in production put only 1,542,000 to work, for 3 hours were added to the work week. Although these figures do not give an exact comparison, it appears that roughly, at least 400,000 jobs were lost in 1935-6 by adding 3 hours to the work week.

This year's gains, however, leave us with 7,800,000 still unemployed in the month of May. This figure is estimated from Labor Department figures on total non-agricultural employment of 34,722,000, by assuming that 5,000,000 have been added to the working population since 1929. The estimate of working population is ours. The employment service records 5,310,000 registered for work in May this year, 5,016,000 in June.

Our own reports from trade unions in 24 cities in July 1937 show that in many cases unemployment is still very serious in our own ranks. Union building tradesmen report unemployment still 37½% above 1929, in printing it is 150% higher, and the report for all trades shows unemployment 22% above 1929. Several cities still have a considerable part of their membership out of work: New York 19%, Los Angeles 16%, Philadelphia 15% and the average for 24 cities shows 11% still unemployed.

These figures are enough to indicate that the problem of unemployment is still very serious. We have 7,800,000 still unemployed when industrial production in the first half year was less than 1% below the 1929 average. To provide an adequate living for our population and put our unemployed to work producing it, we must look far beyond all previous peak levels of industrial production. The first step is greater buying power for those now at work, so that they can increase production and employ their fellows. The second is a further shortening of work hours.

Until the unemployed can find work in industry we must continue to provide them with public funds. At the end of July, 2,158,000 were still at work on the works program and there were 1,400,000 on state and local relief in May, the latest figure.

A retraining program is also badly needed, for several hundred thousand have either lost their skills through unemployment or lost their trade through machine displacement. Such a program should be closely tied in with the U.S. Employment Service.

A periodic record of the number of persons unemployed, either monthly or quarterly, is essential if we are to plan so as to overcome this basic cause of poverty and demoralization. The Social Security Board is in a position to collect such information for the industries it covers. Steps should immediately be taken to see that the information is collected, and is made available to the public promptly enough to be of use.

An unemployment census, taken at least every ten years, is essential to give complete periodic checks on unemployment in the entire population. Such censuses, however, cannot meet the need for current information. When an unemployment census is taken, it should be accompanied by a complete census of population, with a careful enumeration of the employed as well as the unemployed. If this is not done, incomplete information is likely to result, making unemployment appear less than it actually is. Such misleading information would have the most serious consequences.

Building Trades—(1937, p. 610) The A. F. of L. requests the Congress of the U.S., in order to promote stability of employment in the building industry and forestall and alleviate future depression, to take the following steps:

1. Establish the Public Works Administration, as well as the United States Housing Authority, as a permanent agency of the Federal Government;

2. Establish a special fund or authorize special bond issues, in addition to their regular and normal funds, which shall be available to these two agencies for making loans and grants on additional construction projects, in periods when employment in the building industry shows positive signs of a serious decline;

3. Instruct the Public Works Administration and the U.S. Housing Authority to develop long-term programs, and make plans and prepare projects at least three years in advance of normal construction schedules, in order to be ready greatly to increase construction activity in the United States at short notice in an emergency, and thus forestall any such disastrous stoppage in building trades employment as that which has impeded national prosperity throughout the past eight years.

The records of the A. F. of L. disclose that a committee consisting of four Cabinet Members was appointed by Congress to study this question and to set up machinery that could be used in the case of depression and unemployment. The appointment of this Committee by Congress was prompted by the resolution adopted at a previous Convention of the A. F. of L. calling upon the Government to take such action.

The records of the A. F. of L. further disclose that this Committee never functioned. Therefore, when the depression came in 1929, the Government was in no position to deal with it, whereas had the recommendations of the A. F. of L. been followed out previous to the time the country began to suffer from the depression, our Government would have been in position to immediately set the machinery to moving that would stabilize the building industry and defeat the depression in a very large measure.

Investigation—(1938, p. 420) The unemployment problem is still the foremost question confronting this nation.

The president of the A. F. of L. is authorized and instructed to appoint a national committee on unemployment and public works. This committee shall be instructed to make a careful study and survey of the effects public work programs have had on the unemployment conditions throughout the nation and to prepare a full and complete report of their findings and recommendations prior to the next session of Congress.

The President and E.C. are authorized to establish an adequate agency through which an effective campaign sponsoring legislation for the correction of existing unemployment conditions can be carried on and through which a careful analysis of the entire question can be made for presentation to our Federal Government.

(Pp. 107, 472) The business recession which started after September, 1937, has added 3,500,000 to the ranks of the unemployed. In addition, there has been no increase in jobs to provide for the young persons who came of working age during this period, and these boys and girls add about 475,000 more to the total number to be employed.

In September, 1937, unemployment had reached the lowest point since recovery started, but there were still 7,513,000 out of work. By June, 1938, unemployment had risen to 11,445,000, a total increase of nearly 4,000,000. These layoffs brought our army of unemployed back to the levels of early 1935, cancelling the gains of the last three years.

During this nine month period of depressed business, from September to June, unemployment has risen steadily. Only one month, April, showed a slight gain in employment due to the spring busy season in industry; but spring employment gains this year were almost negligible and far below normal. Not until July was there any sign of a real employment upturn. The gain of some 41,000 jobs in manufacturing in July is small, but since it comes at a time when employment usually declines, it suggests a change for the better. Employment on farms and in road building also increased in July, making a total gain of 104,000.

Trade union members have fared very much better than employees in industry generally during these months of declining employment. Throughout the late spring months, April through June, while employment in general declined, trade union employment increased. Our figures show that 2 per cent of our members who had been unemployed in March were back to work by June, while in the country as a whole unemployment increased by 174,000 from March to June. Trade union unemployment declined from 21 per cent of the membership of 19 per cent in this period while general unemployment rose from 11,226,000 in March to 11,400,000 in June. Employment of union members has continued to increase through July and early August so that another 2 per cent of our unemployed are now back at work. Thus in the entire period since March, trade union unemployment has decreased from 21 per cent of the membership in March, to 18 per cent in July and 17 per cent in early August, while unemployment as a whole has not decreased at all; 23.1 per cent of all workers (omitting management) were unemployed in March and 23.3 per cent were unemployed in July.

Social security payments were by no means sufficient to take care of the large number of men and women who found themselves without work this winter and spring. WPA has steadily increased its rolls, and with the new Government funds, further increases are being made. From January 1 to July 30, 1938, 1,338,000 were added to WPA payrolls, so that on July 30, WPA employment reached 2,967,000. There were at this time 285,000 on CCC and about 300,000 employed by other Government agencies, so that total emergency employment amounted to more than 3,500,000.

Funds provided by the Government spending program will also provide work on PWA, Rural Electrification, and the United States Housing Authority. Counting funds already allotted by these organizations, including large housing projects under the Federal Housing Authority loans and new WPA employment, and including work required in private industries to furnish materials and transportation, we estimate that the Government program will furnish 9,237,000 man-months of employment before July 1, 1939. This is equivalent to 770,000 full year jobs or 1,540,000 half-year jobs. It will greatly stimulate reemployment and recovery, for the men employed on these jobs will, by their purchases, create jobs for others.

The outlook is for further gains in employment this fall and next spring. In addition to jobs created by the Government, improvement in private business in the last few months promises an increase of private employment.

Hours — (1939, p. 164) The E.C. Report, in a special section under the given title, analyzed some of the reasons for protracted unemployment, and included the following indictment of the role which industry had played in bringing about increasing unemployment:

Clearly the following facts are basic in any consideration of our unemployment problem: With a steadily increasing population and a constantly growing work force, living standards must decline and unemployment must increase unless national production expands at a rate sufficient to balance the combined effect of population growth and workers' increasing productivity.

It is safe to say that today's unemployment would not exist if our industries had continued to expand at the rate of the pre-depression decade. For in that decade national production increased 43%. A 43% increase in national production from 1929 to 1939 would probably have created enough jobs in industry and agriculture to absorb all the 1,500,000 laid off by technological change and depression, all the new job seekers and the major part of the pre-depression unemployed.

Instead of a 43% increase in production, however, the year 1930 is likely to show about an 18% decrease below our 1929 production.

Since the national living standard must be measured on a per capita basis, we adjust these figures for the 8% increase in population. This indicates that the living standard we are producing today (1939) for each family is 24% below the 1929 level. Industrial expansion at the pre-depression rate would have produced in 1939 an average living standard 32% above 1929. Even at our recovery peak in 1937 however, the living standard we produced, on a per capita basis, was 7.5% below 1929.

The failure of industry to expand during the last decade has meant an immeasurable loss to our people. We know that even in 1929 20,000,000 persons in the United States or one-sixth of our population were living below minimum standards for health and efficiency. In 1935 to 1936, estimates based on a study by the National Resources Committee of the Federal Government show at least half of all American families living below the minimum health and efficiency standard. In that period the Heller Committee of the University of California, a recognized authority on family budgets, showed $2,000 per year as a health and efficiency budget for a family of five. One-third of our families were living on $780 a year or less, which is not even an adequate income for single individuals; another third were living on incomes between $780 and $1,450, and in this group all families of four or more members and most families of two or three were below a decent standard. In all, 59% of our population were living below minimum health and efficiency levels.

Thus the failure of American industry to expand at pre-depression rates has meant starvation incomes for a large portion of our families and idleness for millions of our wage earners. A great nation, with productive capacity above any other in the world, with industrial equipment and manpower capable of producing a comfort level of living for every family, has kept its industries running at part capacity, has ceased to expand industrially. This we consider the tragedy of the 1930's. To restore our industries to normal productive activity and normal expansion, to get our idle men and women back to productive activity in our industries is the first task before us, the first step in solving the unemployment problem.

Experience in the 8-year period from 1929 to 1937 gives striking proof that shortening the work week effectively compensated for technological unemployment. In manufacturing industries, the shorter work week has reversed the trend of declining employment and created jobs where technological unemployment would have eliminated them. In all we estimate that nearly 2,000,000 jobs were saved in manufacturing alone by taking ten hours from the average work week. Had hours remained the same, the 25% increase in production per hour would have eliminated some 1,700,000 jobs, whereas actually nearly 200,000 jobs were added.

tivity will make it both necessary and possible to reduce hours progressively and continually. With our working population growing steadily, even if less rapidly than the past decade, increasing leisure is a necessary part of the national adjustment that must be made to keep our work force employed. Increasing leisure is also an essential part of a rising standard of living for our people.

In addition to the progressive reduction in hours which must take place year by year, there are certain industries which have not properly shared in the shortening of the work week during the past ten years; there are others which, although hours are shorter, have not reduced their work week sufficiently to compensate for labor displacement. These last include: Telephone communication, electric power production, rubber factories, petroleum refineries, and oil wells, cigar and cigarette plants, and others. Industries in which hours still average over 40 per week include: Motor bus operation, wholesale and retail stores, hotels, laundries and dry cleaning establishments, railroads, service stations and others.

We reemphasize the need of continual striving toward the shorter work week on the part of all unions, keeping in view our 30-hour week goal.

While continuing to shorten hours, however, we feel that the major national effort should be to lift industry out of its stagnation and restore it to a rate of expansion which will progressively raise living standards and put the unemployed to work creating the goods and services needed by all. Future employment trends will involve major shifts of workers from producing industry to service industries, from one type of product or service to another, from one kind of work to another. Such changes are essential in a growing economy and are bound to affect thousands of workers.

It is essential, therefore, that the proper agencies be at hand to give workers the training they need to learn new skills for new jobs, that this training be adequate and easily available, and that they be helped to locate the employment for which they are trained. Employment exchanges and vocational schools, which are an essential part of our mechanism to combat unemployment, are discussed elsewhere in this report.

(P. 533) The convention unanimously adopted the committee recommendations on this subject as follows:

Your committee, in concluding this report desires to strongly register our concurrence in the recommendation of the Executive Council that the American Federation of Labor devote its best efforts to lift industry out of its stagnation so as to put the unemployed at work and progressively raise living standards. In this same spirit, your committee further recommends that this convention strongly reaffirm its endorsement of the six-hour day, five-day work-week, without reduction in pay and that the Executive Council be instructed to resolutely continue their efforts to forward the widest possible adoption of this shorter work-week program.

And we further recommend that the Executive Council be directed to initiate a campaign of publicity intended to exalt and to feature the high importance of the shorter work-week from a standpoint of public welfare, through its affiliated international and national unions and through State and Local Central Bodies.

(Unemployment (Permanent) Not Necessary) — (P. 204) The A. F. of L., in a special report to the convention, treated the subject of continued unemployment under the title "Jobs For All In Private Industry". The report follows:

As the tenth year of serious unemployment draws to its close, we place the problem of getting the unemployed back to work in private industry as our first concern.

The persistence of unemployment, the inability of industry in this country to recover from depression and resume its normal rate of expansion, make it clear that the recovery forces which lifted business out of depression in the past are no longer operating sufficiently to break the present business stagnation. Nor has the Federal Government, with its spending programs and other recovery efforts, succeeded in putting the unemployed to work in private industry. For after almost seven years of partial recovery, we still find ourselves today with 10,000,000 who have no work in private industry; and at no time in these seven years has unemployment been less than 7,500,000.

The American Federation of Labor is not willing to tolerate permanent unemployment. We know that idle plants can be brought into operation, idle capital can find investment in productive private enterprise and idle men be put to work producing the goods they need for a decent living. Our nation has all the elements necessary to provide an adequate living for every American family; we lack only the proper coordination of effort.

The employment of the nation's work force in private industry depends on the investment of private capital in productive enterprise. In the past century, private capital flowed freely into such enterprises without special measures for coordination of effort. The high profits afforded by developing our country's vast natural resources, building railroads, creating our unequaled industrial plants and equipment were sufficient to draw private capital into long term investment. More recently, the requirements of a world war, the development of the tries and the building of our modern automobile and electric power industries has provided highly profitable investment. In the years 1923 to 1929, private industry invested an average of $12,000,000,000 a year to build industrial plants and equipment and private housing. The volume of work provided by these investments, the steady increase in workers' producing power by industrial improvements and mass production, resulted in a 23% increase in the average per capita living standard in the United States in the decade before depression (1919 to 1929) and in practically full employment of our working population.

Today, the picture is entirely changed. Now there is no longer opportunity for highly profitable investment in great expansion of the nation's producing plant and equipment, for our industries cannot sell enough goods to keep their present plants in operation. The high profits and huge fortunes of the past can not be made in industry today. The Cleveland Trust Company estimates that the chance of even succeeding in business today is only about half as great as in the past, and the profits rewarding those who do succeed are at least 20% less. The risks are greater, the reward less. Consequently, private capital is not seeking investment in productive enterprise, but instead seeks security in tax-free Government bonds. During depression, private investment in industrial plant and in housing shrank to $3,500,000,000 or less, in contrast to the $12,000,000,000 invested annually before depression.

It appears from these facts that our problem of industrial expansion today is entirely different from that of the past. High profits to be made by developing natural resources and industrial plants no longer draw private capital into productive investment. Profits today depend on an increasing sales volume of goods produced by mass production. This requires steady expansion of consumers' buying power. Satisfactory profits can be made when consumers' buying power reaches high enough levels, for in 1937 the nation's leading corporations earned more than 10% on their net worth; but except in 1936 and 1937 consumer buying has not reached high enough levels to provide this rate of profit at any time in the past 10 years.

The failure of consumer buying power today is due chiefly to unemployment. As shown elsewhere in this report, the average hourly wage rate has been lifted by trade union action and legislation so that it is 24% above 1929. This higher wage level will provide buying power well above that of 1929 once industry can be expanded to higher levels of production and employment. There can be no doubt that once a high level of activity is reached, providing profitable investment and reducing risk, private capital will again flow into productive enterprise. This was the case in 1937, when private investment in plants and housing reached $9,000,000,000, even though production was not yet high enough to put all the unemployed to work or to create the goods necessary to give everyone a decent living.

Our problem then is how to lift production, in the shortest possible time, to levels which will furnish stable profits and put the unemployed to work. We are also concerned with keeping production at high enough levels to provide a steady flow of goods, once the necessary volume has been attained.

The immediate lifting of production and the maintenance of a steady flow of goods can never be accomplished by individuals acting separately. It requires coordinated action.

We have no precedent for action on the problem which now confronts our economy. Coordination of effort can only be accomplished through the cooperation of all concerned in agriculture, industry, finance, distribution, and service, with representation for the functional groups that constitute every industry—capital, labor, management, and consumers. The Congress of the United States is the logical agency to act in behalf of the people, yet Congress has no advisory group possessing the technical knowledge and experience necessary to work out the complex problems of industrial coordination and provide a plan of action.

Many steps are necessary to prepare the way for industrial expansion through profitable private enterprise. Some can be taken by private industry and labor acting in cooperation, some will require action by the Federal Government. Balanced expansion and maintenance can only be accomplished through coordination of effort by all groups concerned.

Federal spending and "pump priming" cannot permanently restore business to healthy activity unless it is coordinated with other action to assist private industry in resuming normal expansion.

Our problem is one of management on a national scale. Although more complicated than the management of any single enterprise, many of the methods used in coordinating the activities of a large company, with branch plants and offices scattered across the continent, are applicable to the national economic problem. Also, our experience in organizing human relations on a representative basis in the political field will provide precedent for developing the agencies for individual government.

Modern industrial management when confronted with a problem of developing new fields for activity, turns first to its division of research and planning. Experts study the situation in all its aspects, then submit to management a plan for action. This plan may be modified, submitted to further study and adjusted by new discoveries—eventually it emerges as a workable project and is put into effect.

It appears to us that our national problems will yield to similar treatment. We cannot believe that American engineering skill, American labor, and the genius of American management, which have developed our unequalled industrial mechanism, will fail to solve the problem of national economic coordination if given a mandate to undertake it.

We emphasize the fact, however, that in the group which undertakes such a task, labor, farmers and consumers must be adequately represented so that their interest will not be neglected. Industrial engineers and persons familiar with the problems of management and its administration of large business undertakings are also essential, for theirs is the particular knowledge of experience needed.

We urge that Congress set up an advisory council of this nature in the coming session with the mandate to develop measures by which private industry can expand production and maintain balanced prosperity. The suggestions of this advisory group should be submitted to Congress for action and made available to the general public.

This procedure follows democratic principles. There is an opportunity for public opinion to be informed and to express itself through its normal agency, the Congress of the United States. The character of the advisory group assures representation of every sector of our population.

We need not be at the mercy of haphazard forces which have governed business expansion during the period of national industrial growth. These forces at best brought about periods of high productive activity followed by depressions; they did not bring stable expansion; they are no longer adequate to meet our needs. During recent years Government controls have been extended over an increasing portion of our economic activity, with a growing danger of bureaucracy. We have need now of a central advisory agency, representing the economic groups concerned, forming a channel for their views and experience, commissioned to coordinate industrial activity.

Such an agency, advisory to Congress, can prepare the way for balanced expansion of private industry and reemployment of the unemployed.

(P. 522) In the introductory portion of this section of the E.C.'s report, your attention is called to the fact that there still remain some ten million wage earners who are unable to secure employment in private industry.

The Council points out that industrial conditions in our country have undergone a great change, that there is no longer the same opportunity as in the past for highly profitable investment in great expansion in the nation's producing plants and equipment. It points out that profits today must depend largely upon increasing the nation's capacity to consume.

In connection with this the Executive Council points out that Federal spending and "pump priming" cannot permanently restore business to healthy activity, unless it is coordinated with other action to assist private industry in resuming normal expansions, that the present problem is one of management on a national scale.

After reference to the problem facing industrial management, the Executive Council expresses the opinion that our national problems will yield to more cooperative action if this represents the several factors in the nation's economic life.

We cannot believe that American engineering skill, American labor, and the genius of American management which have developed our unequalled industrial mechanism, will fail to solve the problem of national coordination if given encouragement to undertake it.

The Executive Council, however, emphasizes the fact that in any national groups who undertake such a responsibility, labor, farmers, and consumers must be adequately represented so that their interests will not be neglected.

The Executive Council recommends that Congress create a National Advisory Council of this nature during the coming session, the suggestions of such an advisory group to be submitted to Congress for action and made available to the general public. Such an advisory council would give the people as a whole the necessary representation to guide Congress wisely instead of having Congress besieged by special interests with their own programs, prepared for their own self-advancement.

With these expressions of opinion your committee recommends adoption of the Executive Council's report.

(Shorter Work Week)—(1949, p. 254) In spite of the foreign aid and defense program and other measures which have had the effect of proping up demand production, and employment during this period of "readjustment", unemployment has risen steadily to a new postwar peak. . . .

The impact of unemployment in its early stages was largely confined to particular areas and industries. With unemployment now 4 million, the point where it could be considered a local problem has clearly been passed. Every industrial State in the country has been affected, and its widespread nature is further indicated by the fact that, with the exception of food processing, automobiles, and printing and publishing, each of the major industrial groups is employing fewer workers than last year.

The true employment picture is shown not only by the level of employment but also by the hours worked. Hours worked have declined significantly in some industries. In manufacturing as a whole, the average of weekly hours has declined by more than 1 hour between the first half of 1948 and the first half of 1949. This is due both to the elimination of overtime work and the institution of below standard workweeks (with equivalent reductions in pay) in industries where output has been reduced. . . .

It has also been estimated that during the past few months, one out of four unemployed persons was ineligible for unemployment compensation. Most of these were either not covered by any plan or had been unemployed so long that their benefit rights had been exhausted.

While these adverse developments are serious and the fact that they have caused a great deal of hardship should not be minimized, the situation calls for vigilance and a readiness to take timely appropriate action, rather than general alarm or hasty drastic measures. The forces which produced the postwar boom were too unstable and temporary to last for long, and this period of readjustment, while painful, is probably necessary to provide a less precarious base for future economic growth.

The recent downward trend should not obscure the fact that employment and economic activity generally is still well above any real depression level. While the unemployment rate of 52 per 1,000 for the first six months of 1949 was considerably higher than the 37 per 1,000 recorded during the first half of 1948, it was still much better than that of 1941, when, even during the so-called "defense boom," the rate was as high as 100 per 1,000. Also, even during this period of gradually rising unemployment, between one-third and two-fifths of the unemployed in one month have either returned to work or found new jobs before the next month.

The fact that the present situation is not as bad as in prewar days would be small reassurance in itself, as long as the trend continues downwards. However, there are elements of basic strength in the economy which encourage the belief that stability will soon arrive and be followed by renewed growth. In many lines, current sales are greater than current production, and increased production should follow the working down of excess stocks. New investments in plant and equipment are continuing at a high level and business credit on favorable terms is readily available. Construction activity is on the upgrade again, after a period of relative decline, and federal, state, and local governments have undertaken many of the urgent public works which were deferred during the war. Outlays by the Federal Government are expanding generally and wherever possible are being routed to areas where unemployment is highest. Wages have held up quite well, and unemployment insurance and other social security benefits have helped to sustain buying power and the demand for goods. Holdings of liquid assets are still high and private debt is low. If and when consumer prices, which in many lines have not been as responsive as they should be to the change in demand decline, all of the elements necessary for a rise in the general level of production and employment will exist.

The mistake should not be made, however, of viewing these strong points as a sort of impregnable Maginot Line against depression. The present decline can be traced to inadequate consumer demand at the prevailing level of market prices, for the surplus stocks which are now being scaled down could not have been accumulated had production not been in excess of demand. To call it an "inventory recession" is just another way of saying that sales, governed by effective demand, were too low. Rising unemployment further undermines effective demand, and consequently sales and production, which in turn results in more unemployment. Unemployment is bred of recession, and it in turn breeds further recession, and eventually, if not checked, depression. Too much faith should not be placed in the so-called "automatic correctives," for unemployment compensation alone can never replace the buying power that was lost with the loss of a job. Until the unemployment trend is reversed and those now seeking work find productive jobs, there is no cause for complacency about the future.

We must not be content just so long as our situation is better than "pre-war"—we are living in a new era and on a higher plane of activity, and our benchmarks and standards must advance with the times. Not only must past gains be preserved but new gains must also be made. It is not enough to secure the reemployment of those now seeking work—new jobs must be created each year for the million annual newcomers to the labor force.

To this end, the American Federation of Labor should once more consider a renewal of its drive for the shorter standard work-week and the shorter standard work-day, through collective bargaining. A reduction in the hours of work will be necessary over the coming years to keep our national productivity in line with our national income. This is essential if high unemployment is to be avoided. If the physical ability of our plants, machines, and labor force to produce exceeds the total national income or product, the difference between the two is made up of unemployed workers, idle plants and equipment, or both. The long-term tendency, from the beginning of the century until the boom of World War II—a tendency which again appears to be asserting itself—has been for the rise in national productivity to exceed the rise in national income, with an accompanying proportionate rise in unemployment.

If this tendency for productivity to expand faster than the per capita product is to be reversed in the future—and it must be if prosperity is to be maintained—either “real” production-consumption income must be increased either by raising wages or reducing prices, or both, as fast as over-all productivity, or, failing that, working hours must be reduced sufficiently to offset the disparity. It may very well be desirable in the interests of greater leisure, or more feasible on other accounts, to take the shorter hours as an alternative, up to a point, to the higher income. It may be possible to do both. If, for example, per capita income rises 12 percent over a period of years while productivity rises 20 percent, hourly wages can be advanced 20 percent without increasing unit costs, while hours must be reduced six and two-thirds percent to maintain employment. If both of these are done, the weekly pay will increase by 12 percent even with the reduced work-week.

While shorter hours alone can not perform the full task of the expansion of job opportunities that will be needed in an ever-growing degree, it can make a very important contribution to the achievement of that aim. It is furthermore an entirely worthwhile end in itself, and an historic one for Labor.

Insurance—(1931, pp. 148, 368) Unemployment is the great fear that constantly shadows the life of the wage earner. Unemployment means loss of income. Working people must earn money in order to live and buy the things they need. They depend upon their wage earning power and wage earning opportunities to procure for themselves a decent living. They spurn charity and abhor dependency.

Invention, science and mechanical improvement have revolutionized factory production but while doing this they served to displace many workers during normal periods of industrial activity. Technical progress has been very exacting. Even during the peak production period there were many thousands of working people suffering from technological unemployment. Now, with many millions of workers idle, it becomes imperative that we deal directly and constructively with this great social problem.

There are just two approaches to this problem: prevention and relief. Either we must make employment secure or provide an income for the unemployed.

The early experiments were made with various forms of unemployment relief in many cities and nations in Europe. Municipalities such as Berne, Basle, Cologne, Leipsig, gave assistance to voluntary insurance undertakings. Other cities undertook to subsidize trade union insurance as in the Ghent scheme. In some cases the government made loans to private industries.

Voluntary benefit systems were established in Denmark and Belgium, Norway, Czechoslovakia, Finland, France, Spain, Switzerland. Holland has municipal insurance.

Switzerland experimented with compulsory unemployment insurance as did individual cities. Great Britain was the first country to adopt compulsory unemployment insurance. It has since been followed by Australia, Austria, Bulgaria, Germany, Irish Free State, Italy, Poland and Russia.

With recognition of the responsibility of management for controlling business, have come efforts to distinguish economic forces and to find methods of control. Industries have been looking to stabilization. Regularization of production brings regularization of employment. To maintain steady industrial progress understanding of the principles of industrial balance is necessary. We have just begun studying this field. The possibilities of the prevention of unemployment have increasing significance and must be carefully safeguarded against policies that crystallize unemployment and habits of accepting it as inevitable.

Unemployment is the most urgent problem of business today. It is the great fear that stalks like a ghost in wage earners lives.

Because unemployment cannot be eliminated at once, there must be provisions for relief for the unemployed. Individual companies have been experimenting with stabilization. In a few localities the principle of stabilization has been extended to groups of companies. These local developments indicate the possibilities of applying these principles to wider areas. This means the development of industrial control. In the United States the movement toward industrial control is further along than in most industrial countries.

Recommendations—During the past year many legislative measures providing for unemployment insurance were introduced in Congress and in the various state legislatures. The measures varied in character and form. Most of these measures were referred to the legislative committees created by act of the different law-making bodies for the purpose of making a study and report upon the subject of unemployment insurance legislation. These legislative committees will no doubt submit a report of their investigations and studies in due course of time.

While it is the opinion that compulsory unemployment insurance legislation such as is now in effect in Great Britain and Germany would be unsuited to our economic and political requirements here and unsatisfactory to American working men and women, we recognize the fact that the owners and managers of industry through their failure to provide work for the working people of the nation who are able and willing to work have contributed much toward the creation of an increasing public opinion in favor of the enactment of unemployment insurance legislation. It is the opinion of the A. F. of L. that the owners and managers of industry will be largely responsible for the enactment of unemployment insurance legislation in the event public opinion becomes so crystallized as to demand unemployment relief through the enactment of compulsory unemployment insurance laws.

The A. F. of L. is directing its efforts toward the creation and enlargement of work opportunities. . . . No collective action of any kind has been taken and no response has been made to the appeals of Labor to accord to the working people of the nation an equal opportunity to share in the work available by the employers or management of industry. The ruthless discharge of millions of working men and women without means of support, dependent upon such relief as may be extended by municipalities and by local relief agencies, is in itself an indictment of our unsound economic and industrial situation, unsound and uneconomic because the owners and managers of industry have miserably failed.

American working people want work. They demand work. They abhor charity and they resent the imposition of the dole. They are proud in spirit and resolute in purpose. They must not and will not become the victims of a paternalistic policy. Work must be supplied to all who are willing and able to work. Managers and owners of industry must meet this social obligation and discharge their responsibility.

Working men have arrived at the point where they are firmly of the belief that they are as much entitled to work security, to enjoy the opportunity to work, as the owners of capital are to returns from their investments. Labor demands that these principles be recognized and accepted by the employers of Labor. Obviously, the owners and management of industry must decide as to whether working men and women shall enjoy the opportunity to work, or, whether as a result of the denial of this opportunity to work, industry shall have fastened upon it compulsory unemployment insurance legislation. It must be work or unemployment insurance. Working people must be privileged to earn a living or be accorded relief. If compulsory unemployment insurance is fastened upon our industrial, political and economic life, it will be because industrial ownership and management have failed to provide and preserve work opportunities for working men and women.

The A. F. of L., in contrast to the helplessness and failure of collective industrial management to offer a remedy for unemployment, renews the proposals which it has repeatedly offered as practical, constructive remedies for the unemployment situation:

"First, we propose that a national conference of employers and Labor be called by the President of the U.S. to deal directly and constructively with the unemployment problem and to devise ways and means by which and through which all working people may be accorded an opportunity to share in all work available.

"Second, in order to accomplish this purpose we propose the immediate inauguration of the five-day work-week and the shorter work-day in all public and private industry.

"Third, the maintenance of the wage structure and wage standards.

"Fourth, work assurance—a guarantee to all those workers who are employed that they are secure in their positions and that through the application of the shorter work-day and the shorter work-week all would be accorded an opportunity to share equitably in all work available.

"Fifth, the prohibition of child labor and the employment of adults in order that the slack of unemployment may be taken up.

"Sixth, the stabilization of industry, with particular reference to those industries which are classified as seasonal in character. This would contemplate the application of a plan whereby improvements could be carried on during periods of seasonal recession when because of the seasonal character of the industry the demands for goods has substantially declined.

"Seventh, the application of a more scientific plan of industrial production so that a stable balance may be maintained in order that production may be carried on systematically over longer periods of time."

These remedies for the unemployment situation have been submitted by the E.C. and the officers of the A. F. of L. to the owners and management of industry, but thus far there has been no response or no reply. We are firmly of the opinion that if they were accepted and applied in the manner herein outlined that the need for unemployment insurance legislation would disappear and that work opportunities would be accorded all men and women willing and able to work.

The practicability of the unemployment remedies herein proposed becomes increasingly apparent when we take into account the extent and capacity of our home market. In this particular respect the U.S. is exceedingly fortunate. Its greatest market is its home market. Its consuming abilities and its constant requirements are well-nigh incomprehensible. More than 90 per cent of all goods manufactured and produced in the U.S. is consumed and used in the home market. It has never been developed to its maximum capacity and for that reason its consuming power, which now seems well-nigh inexhaustible, can be further increased through the development of an increasing purchasing power on the part of the masses of the people.

On all matters of social justice legislation, the Canadian membership of organized labor who are affiliated with the A. F. of L., are free to act in accordance with their own judgment and their own decisions. While the economic proposals of the A. F. of L. as a remedy or remedies for the unemployment situation are as applicable to industry in Canada as in the U.S., the Council fully recognizes the right of the Canadian membership of the A. F. of L. to originate and support through the Canadian Trades and Labour Congress, such social justice legislation as in their judgment may be for the best interests of the working men and women in the Dominion of Canada.

The experience which working men and women have been forced to face and undergo during the past year, has been most bitter and disappointing. They cannot be expected to maintain faith in an economic order which has failed them so completely. They charge industrial management with failure to stabilize employment. The facts are that the management of industry has not provided work security or created work opportunities for those who are able, willing and eager to work. Unemployment has increased; there are more workers idle now than there were one year ago; approximately 11,000,000 are out of work, seeking employment, unable to find it.

The A. F. of L. has always emphasized both the necessity and importance of supplying work for all. Working people and their families depend upon wages earned for a livelihood. Life and living, in the full meaning of that term, are inseparably associated with employment, wages, work security, the possession of a job and the exercise of the right to work.

The E.C. has given most careful, painstaking and serious consideration to the problem of unemployment and to the application of the principle of unemployment insurance. The Council would much prefer that working people be privileged to work and be accorded job security than to see them forced to accept relief because of unemployment. The extension and enjoyment of the opportunity to work at decent wages, so that working men and women may earn a decent living, is the real objective of the American Federation of Labor. The E.C. urges work first and relief second, but it must be clear that working people must be permitted to earn a living or be supplied relief. They must earn their living or be supported. They cannot earn their living unless jobs are provided and work opportunities accorded them.

Obviously, the owners and management of industry have failed to provide work for all and thus make it possible for all to earn a livelihood. Their failure is reflected in the fact that during the past three years unemployment has steadily increased and at the present time about 11,000,- 000 people are idle. The E.C. believes that the owners of industry and industrial management must have known that the creation of an army of 11,-000,000 unemployed, forced to shift for themselves, to become dependent upon local, state and federal relief agencies, would create an intolerable economic situation fraught with most serious consequences.

The economic facts arising out of the unemployment situation, the continued displacement of millions of working men through the mechanization of industry and the substitution of power for human service, make it absolutely necessary, in the opinion of the Executive Council to develop and put into operation through the enactment of appropriate legislation, an unemployment insurance plan which will provide for the payment of weekly benefits to working men and women who are forced to suffer from unemployment.

The Council holds that because the ownership and management of industry have failed to provide and maintain work opportunities for working men and women, unemployment insurance legislation is made imperatively necessary. The responsibility for this state of affairs rests squarely upon industry and industrial management. They control industry; consequently, they control jobs. Labor cannot wait longer; it must now act. Industry must be compelled to do what it has thus far failed to do. Work or relief must be provided. If industrial management fails to provide work, it must be compelled to assume the burden of supplying relief.

Having all these facts in mind, the E.C. at a meeting held July 12-22, 1932, directed the President of the A. F. of L. to draft and present to a subsequent meeting a plan of unemployment insurance legislation. These instructions were complied with. As a result of a detailed survey and careful study of the subject, the President of the A. F. of L. submitted to a meeting of the E.C., held October 18-27, 1932, a report which embodied within it a plan of unemployment insurance legislation.

The E.C. has always endeavored to guard jealously the organization structure of the A. F. of L. For that reason the Council was apprehensive over the effect which compulsory unemployment insurance legislation might have upon the exercise of the right of working men and women not only to join but to maintain membership in trade unions. In the drafting of an unemployment insurance measure, the Council has constantly kept three very distinct fundamental principles in mind:

First, it has endeavored to provide in the plan which it submits to the convention a full measure of protection to the membership of the A. F. of L., and the preservation of the right to become a member and to continue membership in a trade union.

Second, that the payment of relief shall be made a fixed charge upon industry. Relief funds should be created out of the earnings of industry. The Council does not believe it is fair or just that any part of the money out of which relief would be paid during periods of unemployment should be collected from employees.

Third, that unemployment insurance should be compulsory and that the execution and administration of unemployment insurance laws should come wholly within the control and administration of federal and state governments.

The E.C. submits the following plan for the consideration and approval of the convention. This plan embodies within it the fundamental principles just enunciated and represents the best thought and judgment of the members of the E.C. and of the trained experts upon social justice legislation who rendered valuable assistance in the preparation of the plan. The Council recommends this plan of unemployment insurance legislation for the favorable consideration and acceptance of the officers and members in attendance at the convention.

It would be desirable, were it possible, to press for the enactment of one uniform measure for unemployment insurance applicable throughout the United States. But, due to the provisions and limitations of the U.S. Constitution as interpreted by the courts, since the regulation of manufacture and industry lies primarily within the province of state rather than federal activity, it is practically impossible to enact constitutional federal legislation adequately providing for unemployment insurance covering employees engaged in work in the different states. The A. F. of L., therefore, advocates the passage of unemployment insurance legislation in each separate state, and the supplementing of such state legislation by federal enactments; such for instance, as bills covering employees engaged in interstate commerce or employed in the District of Columbia or in federal territories, or such as the bill recently introduced into Congress allowing corporations substantial income tax credit on their federal income taxes for such payments as they have made under state laws toward the creation of unemployment reserves.

It is evident that the local conditions of each state vary to such a marked degree that it would be unwise, even were it possible at the present time, to frame a single model bill to be enacted in every state. It is possible, nevertheless, to set forth certain general fundamental principles and standards to which such state legislation should conform. The A. F. of L., after mature consideration and discussion, has formulated the following principles which should guide in the framing of state unemployment insurance bills:

Every unemployment insurance Act

should contain specific provisions to protect union members from being obliged to accept work contrary to the rules and regulations of their organizations or employment under conditions such as tend to depress wages or working conditions.

Unemployment insurance legislation in this country should be carefully devised to promote its two primary objectives: (a) the stimulation of more regular employment, insofar as possible, and (b) the payment of unemployment compensation to those who are temporarily out of work through industry's failure to provide steady employment for its working forces.

The A. F. of L. advocates a scheme of unemployment compensation made compulsory by law. Voluntary schemes are unlikely to pervade industry generally, and are frequently open to other serious objections. Only by compulsory legislation can workers be adequately protected.

Since unemployment is, to a certain extent, one of the inevitable incidents of production and must, therefore, be regarded as part of the inescapable cost of industry, it, like other costs of industry should be paid by industry itself. It, therefore, follows that, as a matter of principle, no part of the contributions to support unemployment insurance should be paid out of the wages of Labor, but the whole should be paid by management as part of the cost of production. The necessary funds should be raised as a charge on industry.

The amount of such contributions must depend upon the local conditions in each state. A minimum contribution must be required sufficient to cover (a) the building up of adequate reserves, (b) the cost of the benefits to be paid under the Act, and (c) the costs of administration. To cover these costs the A. F. of L. believes that the contribution rate should be not less 3% of the total pay roll. The exact percentage, however, must vary in different states, and will come to depend upon various actuarial data, which must be carefully collected as a basis for such determination from the experience gained both before and after the passage of the Act. The absence of complete data should not, however, prevent the passage of a law, since the liability of the fund is limited to the amount of the income provided by law. As experience is accumulated it will be possible to determine the income necessary to provide the benefits decided upon in the law.

At this time the A. F. of L. deems it inadvisable to take an irrevocable stand as between the plant reserves system or unemployment insurance embodied in the Wisconsin law and an insurance system such as is under consideration in Ohio and in operation in many European countries. Whatever plan is adopted, whether based on plant reserves or on a broader basis, we believe that it should be administered by the state and all reserve funds held and invested by the state. We are unalterably opposed to company-controlled unemployment reserves and believe that without state administration plant reserves will prove but another "company union" device. We are also of the opinion that, at least at the outset, it is advisable to have but a single unemployment insurance fund (with, if a plant reserves system is adopted, separate accounts for separate employers) and a flat rate of contributions by employers regardless of the industry in which they may be engaged. Later on, after more accurate data is obtained, the contributions in each industry, occupation, or enterprise may be scaled according to the hazard of unemployment, but sufficient data is not now available to warrant such classifications at this time.

Sound public policy requires that no insurance company in this country be allowed to invade this new field of unemployment compensation. No insurance company is allowed under present state laws to write this class of insurance. The Federation believes that this policy is wise and should in no case be abandoned.

All funds should be invested in federal securities or in the bonds of states or municipalities such as have never defaulted in the payment of principal or interest.

Insurance in general should cover temporary and involuntary unemployment. Unemployment means the conditions caused by the inability of an employee who is capable of and available for employment to obtain work in his usual employment or in another for which he is reasonably fitted. Nothing in the Unemployment Compensation Act should require an employee to accept employment, nor should any employee forfeit his right to benefits under the Act by refusing to accept employment under any or all of the following conditions:

(a) In a situation vacant directly in consequence of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute;

(b) If the wages, hours and conditions offered are less favorable to the employee than those prevailing for similar work in the locality, or are such as tend to depress wages and working conditions;

(c) If acceptance of such employment would abridge or limit the right of the employee either (1) to refrain from joining a labor organization or association of workmen, or (2) to retain membership in and observe the rules of any such organization or association;

(d) Workers who quit work without good cause or who are discharged for misconduct shall not thereby forfeit benefits beyond a reasonable period.

The coverage should be as wide as possible. It should include clerical as well as manual workers. There are, however, certain classes of employment which it may be necessary to exclude from the general operation of the Act, and these classes will vary according to local conditions. It would seem that the legislation should approximate, insofar as practicable, the coverage of state workmen's compensation acts. As time goes on the scope or coverage of the Act may well be broadened.

The claim of employees to receive unemployment compensation as provided under the Act should be clearly recognized as a legal right earned by previous employment within the state. Receipt of unemployment benefits shall in no way entail loss of suffrage or other civil rights. Persons not legal residents of the state and those not citizens of the U.S. shall not by reason of that fact be disqualified from receiving benefits.

The amount of benefits to be paid and the number of weeks during which they shall be paid must depend upon the local conditions in each state and upon the amount of contributions paid into the fund. We are informed, for instance, that under the conditions prevailing in Ohio, a contribution of 3% of the total payroll makes it possible after a waiting period of three weeks per year to pay benefits for a maximum period of 16 weeks in a year based upon 50% of the normal weekly wages, but not to exceed $15.00 a week.

It seems advisable to restrict the payment of benefits to unemployment occurring after a specified waiting period. The length of this waiting period will materially affect the amount of the benefits which can be paid and the length of time during which they can be paid.

(1934, pp. 78, 549) The sentiment in favor of unemployment insurance has grown rapidly in the last three years. Public men who had opposed this legislation have changed to its support.

During the first eight months of 1933 more than 60 compulsory unemployment insurance bills were introduced in 25 state legislatures. Bills passed one house in New York, Connecticut, California, Ohio, Minnesota, and Utah, but failed of enactment owing to congestion caused by various bills in the other house. New Hampshire, Maine, Oregon, Louisiana, North Carolina, Virginia, Illinois, and Colorado have appointed commissions to study the unemployment question.

It is definitely understood that Congress cannot enact a federal unemployment insurance law. In 1931, Senator Wagner secured the appointment of a committee to make a general study of the unemployment insurance systems in use by private interests in the United States and by foreign governments with a view to determine in what manner such systems were instituted and were being operated. In its report the committee said:

The subject of unemployment insurance is not within the sphere of Congressional action.

Based on the investigation made by the Senate Committee of which he was chairman, Senator Wagner introduced an unemployment insurance bill. It provided for a five per cent federal tax on the pay rolls of all employers of 10 or more persons with a proviso that any contribution that any employer had made to an unemployment fund under an approved state law would be subtracted from the five per cent federal tax. Farmers, employers of domestics and those in government service were excluded as in the various state bills that have been proposed. Our president appeared at the hearing held by the Ways and Means Committee of the House in favor of the Wagner-Lewis Unemployment Insurance Bill. The committee voted to report the bill favorably, but for some reason this was not done. No hearing was held in the Senate. Both Senator Wagner and Representative Lewis will reintroduce the bill in the next Congress.

(P. 119) In making provisions against the emergencies of unemployment, we ought to consider carefully the experiences of countries that have operated unemployment insurance systems—especially Great Britain and Germany.

Great Britain began with a plan that covered the highly seasonal industries and expanded the provisions to cover all industries in the hope thereby to meet the emergencies growing out of the transition from a war to a peace organization of production. The insurance fund had to be supplemented by grants from the national treasury.

The Unemployment Insurance Act has been repeatedly amended to meet existing need. The new Act of 1934 provides public assistance for those who have exhausted their insurance benefits as a separate group. Transitional benefits and also the administration of outdoor relief to the able-bodied unemployed, are placed in the hands of the Unemployment Assistance Board. There is set up a new national service to assist persons to whom this part of the Act applies who are in need of work and the promotion of their welfare, and, in particular, the making of provision for the improvement and re-establishment of the condition of such persons, with a view to their being, in all respects, fit for entry into, or return to, regular employment, and the grant and issue to such persons of unemployment allowances . . . in accordance with the provisions of this part of the Act.

This board will take over those whose insurance benefits are exhausted and who are receiving transitional benefits, and secondly the unemployed whose relief has been furnished solely by the local poor law.

The board will provide and maintain training courses to help the unemployed adjust themselves to new fields of unemployment.

This new provision apparently puts main dependence for relief in this public assistance provision.

Provisions for casualties of industrial and social forces are only supplementary to the reorganization of business on a stable basis, social planning for the adjustment of production to social needs and standards and job planning on an extensive scale. A federal public employment service is the national center around which much of our planning should develop. Employment trends constitute a basis for vocational training and counselling, rehabilitation and retraining. The employment service could well be the forecaster of new employment fields. It must not subordinate its economic and social functions to financial responsibilities.

(1939, p. 63) Since the Social Security Act was signed in 1935 a new and very technical angle has been added to what wage earners and union officials need to know. Both employers and employees are under that Act paying contributions into the Old Age Insurance Fund for the accumulation of incomes to be paid the workers after they reach 65 years of age. Every wage earner needs to know how to check up on his payments which the employer withholds from his pay envelope and after adding an equal amount from the firm's funds pays into the Federal Government. No worker can afford to take a chance on everything being all right and run the chance of poverty or dependency because he didn't check in time. Every union executive should be ready to tell workers what to do, whom to see or to whom to write. American Federation of Labor headquarters will help executives to get started on this responsibility.

Every worker ought to be able to anticipate what his monthly insurance will be if he reaches 65, what his wife and dependents might expect should he die, and should share this information with his family. The family should know what to do in case of the wage earner's death. Such information is readily available and is uniform throughout the country, for the law is federal in scope.

Every worker needs to know whether he is eligible for unemployment compensation if he loses his job. Unemployment compensation laws are state laws and differ widely. Every worker should know whether he is eligible for compensation and what his rights would be—what benefits should be and for how long. He should know in advance what conditions might disqualify him for benefits so as to avoid any loss if possible and at least be advised in advance.

Union executives can readily prepare to serve their members in the security field. All they need is to learn the facts—legal knowledge is quite unnecessary.

A somewhat more difficult field is appeal from administrative decisions denying benefits. Here again legal training is not necessary and there is no need for the union or its members to incur the expense of hiring a lawyer for presentation of appeals. A simple presentation of the facts is all that is necessary. The Federation will be glad to assist unions when advice on principle or procedure is needed.

More complicated and technical are the problems involved in proposed amendments to state unemployment compensation laws. Persons and groups interested in reducing the outlay by employers for social security are diligent in devising such "economy" formulae and proposals. Not infrequently they undertake to line up union representatives and present convincing arguments which only painstaking study and technical analysis can refute. For the protection of Labor locally against this propaganda which is organized nationally, we urge that decision upon unemployment compensation amendments be deferred until after consultation with American Federation of Labor headquarters.

(P. 188) A serious threat to workers' interests is present in the trend in many state laws toward increasing the severity of the penalties for voluntary quit, discharge for misconduct, and failure to accept an offered job. Under some laws the worker is barred from benefits entirely under these circumstances and his wage credits are cancelled so that even after he has worked at another job and has been laid off through no fault of his own, he is not able to receive benefits on the basis of those wage credits. There is no justice in these extreme disqualifications. They are evidence of the defect Labor has consistently pointed out in the "merit" or "experience rating" laws. In their efforts to get favorable rates employers wish benefit payments to be as small as possible and are therefore devising schemes to bar workers from benefits. The purpose of the unemployment compensation laws is thus defeated. Labor will continue to oppose all forms of merit rating and to work for a true sharing of risks in the straight pooled fund with equal tax rates on all employers.

In a few states the obvious complexity and cost of the merit rating provisions persuaded the legislatures to repeal their provisions and substitute instead a plan for study. Others may find it wise to abandon this costly and undesirable tax differential when they try to put it into operation. It has no place in an unemployment compensation system.

(P. 192) Labor believes that proper amendment of the Social Security Act relating to unemployment compensation can be made only on the basis of a thorough study of our present federal-state system and the need for more adequate standards. We need to develop our concept of the part unemployment compensation is to serve in meeting the problem of unemployment. It is clear that if unemployment compensation is to justify itself as a system distinct from relief it must pay adequate benefits promptly and for a long enough time to cover an appreciable amount of the unemployment normally expected in a year. It is equally clear that an unemployment compensation system based on payroll taxes cannot finance indefinitely prolonged periods of unemployment or care of the unemployable. The relation between unemployment compensation and relief and provision for persons temporarily and permanently disabled needs to be defined more clearly and the proper field for each delimited.

The American Federation of Labor supported an amendment to the Social Security Act providing for the appointment of an advisory council to study unemployment compensation and to recommend changes in the Social Security Act on the basis of its studies. Such a council should be composed of representatives of Labor, business and the public. This amendment failed to pass. We shall continue to urge the appointment of such a council to carry out this necessary study. We recommend particularly that such a study include careful consideration of the difficulties of harmonizing the many state systems now operating and the desirability of substituting a federal grant-in-aid system with appropriate federal standards of benefits for the present credit-against-federal-tax system for unemployment compensation.

Compensation for the man who is normally employed and is only temporarily out of work needs to be supplemented by a program for the worker temporarily or permanently disabled if we are to achieve a full measure of security. The man who is unemployed because he is ill needs as much or more compensation as the healthy unemployed man. Failure to provide a disability program is likely to lead to irregularities in administering unemployment compensation laws as some agencies attempt to cover persons really unemployable in order to keep them from seeking relief aid. The Advisory Council on Social Security found benefits for persons totally and permanently disabled to be socially desirable. The American Federation of Labor believes that immediate steps should be taken to provide for these benefits either through an extension of our system of old age benefits or in some other way. It believes that immediate attention should also be given to providing benefits for persons temporarily disabled, either under an extension of workmen's compensation laws, or as a supplement to unemployment compensation laws. It is important that we recognize disability compensation as a natural and logical complement to our unemployment compensation and old age programs.

Since the unemployment compensation laws relating to benefits are made by the states at present, the American Federation of Labor believes the important next steps in state legislation must be:

1. to decrease the waiting period to one week.
2. to increase the duration of benefits by establishing a flat period within which benefits would be paid. This should be no less than 16 weeks in any state. Twenty weeks is preferable.
3. to simplify the benefit structure by paying benefits in round amounts, with not more than five classes of benefit amounts.
4. to relate benefit amounts to the class in which the worker's full-time weekly wage normally falls, rather than to annual or quarterly earnings which cheat the worker of benefits he should receive.

5. to establish an adequate minimum payment, no lower than $5.00 in any state, in order that benefit checks may be for significant amounts.
6. to eliminate all forms of merit and experience rating from the laws in order that the administration may be kept simple and as inexpensive as possible and in order that there may be no incentive to the employer to block the payment of benefits which fairly should be paid.
7. to secure payment of partial benefits at least equal to the difference between actual weekly earnings and the worker's benefit rate for full-time employment.
8. to prevent the introduction of excessive provisions for disqualification of workers from receipt of benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled. No disqualification should take the form of cancellation of wage credits or charging off benefits as if they had been paid when they were withheld. No disqualification for voluntary quit, discharge for misconduct, refusal to take job, or any other cause should be more severe than an increase in the waiting period, not to exceed five additional weeks. The pressure to keep benefit payments low for merit-rating purposes makes it especially necessary for Labor to guard against increases in the grounds for or severity of disqualification provisions.

Coverage—(P. 198) . . . Labor in every state has the responsibility of getting state laws changed to cover all employees whether only one or more works for the employer, and the American Federation of Labor will continue to urge on Congress the necessity of making the definition of employer in the unemployment compensation provisions of the Social Security Act, the same as that for old age coverage.

There is need to extend the coverage of unemployment compensation laws and to define more clearly the degree of responsibility which constitutes "independent enterprise" in order to prevent chiseling by some employers who wish to escape their fair responsibility for the tax. In a number of cases employers have changed slightly the method of paying employees, hoping thereby to have them appear as independent contractors rather than employees. Labor must be alert to block such unfair treatment of workers. One way in which these practices could be rendered useless would be so to extend coverage of unemployment compensation over all employed persons and so to clarify the meaning of the employment relationship that no employer could avoid taxation by such a subterfuge. We have a task before us to see that the law operates for the protection of workers, as was intended, and is not rendered useless by the many exceptions to its application.

The American Federation of Labor believes coverage of unemployment compensation laws should be extended to domestic labor, to employees of non-profit organizations, to salesmen, and to all agricultural workers except, for the present, those who are truly "farm hands" on small farms whose type of work makes its difficult to define unemployment.

While the inequity of exclusion from unemployment compensation coverage is different from that under old age insurance because the worker pays no unemployment compensation tax and his equity is built up for one year only rather than over a period of years, there is no sound logic for most of the exclusions by occupation, and the system is rendered less effective because of them. Labor wants fair treatment and security for all who are normally employed and temporarily out of employment for no fault of their own. We will continue to urge enlargement of coverage. Particularly our next effort must be to secure federal and state legislation which will bring in the thousands of workers who are engaged in plants employing less than eight workers.

The problem of providing unemployment compensation for interstate workers was met for the railroad workers last year by the enactment of the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Law, setting up a separate system of compensation on a federal basis. The same problem exists, as yet unsettled, for the seamen. The American Federation of Labor worked with the seamen's unions in an attempt to get the same coverage for unemployment compensation as for old age insurance. Because the jurisdiction of the states over persons plying the inland waterways is limited and the status of workers whose work is partly on the vessel and partly on shore is so confused, most seamen are not covered by state unemployment compensation laws even though their employment is entirely on inland waters. The deep-sea officers and crews would in any case be outside the state jurisdictions. Only federal law can provide security for maritime employees.

(P. 201) Labor has worked for many years for legislation to protect some groups poorly equipped to bargain for their own rights, and more recently for security and protection of workers generally by legislation against disasters beyond the power even of organized groups to avert for their members. In all protective and security legislation, child labor laws, special regulations for labor of women, general wage and hour legislation and the whole field of social security, there has been a tendency to exclude some groups of labor from the laws. The theory, often unexamined, is that the relationship between employer and employee is particularly close, so that the worker does not need protection from a large, impersonal, exploiting corporate employer, and that these fields of work are such that administration of the laws would be particularly difficult. Farm and domestic labor are two fields traditionally excluded from protective legislation.

It is time that we examined the theories behind exclusions and exploded those which are hollow. It is time that we recognized the facts and met squarely the situation of the excluded workers. In the large-scale mechanized farms the term agriculture has taken on new meaning. The huge fruit and vegetable ranches, the large beet sugar farms, vast irrigated areas employing mechanics and ditchmen, packers and truckmen, on an industrial scale — these are "farms" whose laborers are exempt from protection of the laws. Social and economic problems are created by the monopolizing of land and the irregular demand for thousands of workers for short periods. Workers are attracted from long distances by misleading accounts of conditions, to be exploited with long hours and low wages during the working seasons and left destitute at its end. There is no justification for exempting the owners of these "factory farms" from the taxes and excluding their workers from the advantages of the various laws designed to bring some measure of social security to workers who have little opportunity to build security individually.

The competition of these industrialized farms, with their underpaid labor in practical peonage, drives down prices and puts small independent farmers out of business. Yet these same small farmers have often been mistakenly persuaded in the belief that their interests lie in opposing social security legislation for "agricultural workers." Labor should make vigorous efforts to show small farmers and small business men the truth of this matter and to enlist their help in extending the coverage of social legislation. The more stable markets which result from a sound program of social security widely extended, are of immeasurable value to small business men. Many such business men and small farmers would gain more by a broad extension of protective and security legislation even to include self-employed persons, than by helping some large business interests defeat the enactment or operation of such laws.

We must reexamine the exclusions from protective legislation in every field, and work to have these exclusions limited to those which are really necessary because of administrative difficulties too great for present solution and to those groups who can clearly be shown not to need the protection offered. We set as our goal justice and security for all workers as rapidly as it can be attained.

(Pp. 187, 631) The report of our Executive Council does not reflect progress in developing unemployment compensation equally satisfactory with that of old age insurance. We note that $19,000,000 was appropriated for administering the law in 1938-39 but that the average weekly unemployment benefit was $10.13. Such low benefits do not justify the administrative expenditure nor do they provide social security. Nor do state funds necessitate such low benefits. The standards written into state laws are too low. Substantial progress was not made in the past year in raising standards for the main legislative drive was toward administrative simplification. In addition the necessity for amending 49 different laws in order to effect betterment in dealing with the national problem of unemployment makes progress unnecessarily difficult. We recommend approval.

federal-state system of unemployment compensation. The meager benefits and excessive disqualification provisions of most states together with a period of rising employment have resulted in the accumulation of unnecessarily large reserves. Some employers' organizations, hopeful of large tax reductions have opposed reasonable measures of benefit liberalization. The various proposals for amendments to the benefit structure, administrative procedures, and taxes are so diverse that a thorough study of the whole unemployment compensation program is badly needed. The American Federation of Labor is supporting a resolution which calls for the appointment of a representative advisory council to make the necessary study and recommend amendments to the Social Security Act. The work of a similar council in studying the old age insurance program has been praised by every one who knew the part it played in securing the major amendments in 1939. We call on all friends of Labor in Congress to create such an advisory council without further delay."

(P. 560):

We heartily approve the efforts to secure legislation providing for a thorough study of the whole unemployment compensation system. The failure of the states to provide reasonable benefits in spite of large and growing unused reserve funds which would have been kept within bounds had adequate benefit standards been adopted, makes it clear that federal standards are necessary.

Pending the adoption of a federal unemployment compensation system or adequate federal standards for minimum benefits, maximum disqualification provisions and a reinsurance fund to assure benefit payments, we recommend endorsement of the Executive Council's proposals for an immediate program of state legislation:

1. A flat duration of at least 16 weeks in every state. In those states which can afford a better program, 20 weeks should be adopted.

2. A waiting period not longer than one week.

3. A reasonable minimum benefit—not less than $5 in any state and higher in industrial states.

4. A benefit calculated in a manner which will pay at least 50 per cent of the worker's normal full-time wage. If quarterly-earnings formulas are used, the normal full-time wage should be deemed to be not less than one-tenth the earnings in the highest quarter. In no case should an annual-earnings formula be accepted.

5. A maximum of more than $15 in industrial states in order not to depress so seriously the standards of the average worker.

6. The limitation of penalty disqualifications to an increase in the waiting period to a total of not more than six weeks. In no case should disqualifications cancel wage credits previously earned or charge off benefits as if they had been paid during the weeks of disqualification.

7. Benefits for partial unemployment in those states which still have no provision for such payments.

8. An elimination of experience rating.

We note with approval the A. F. of L.'s efforts to extend coverage of unemployment compensation to workers in small shops.

Merit Rating—(P. 428) Convention requested to endorse national legislation prohibiting employers' merit rating in connection with unemployment insurance, but to permit horizontal reduction of employer contributions in appropriate cases, after complete elimination of employees' contributions. A study of this problem was authorized with instructions to take such action as seems most advisable to secure the elimination of "Employers Experience Rating" plans without injury to the workers or the unemployed. . . .

State federations of labor urged to secure introduction in their respective state legislatures of bills for the repeal of any existing state laws providing for employers' experience rating in connection with unemployment insurance. The legal counsel of the A. F. of L. was to prepare a uniform law dealing with this subject for states to be furnished to the various state organizations.

(1942, pp. 80-82) Experience rating plans operate to reduce collections. Experience or merit rating plans vary from the individual reserves of Wisconsin to the Cliffe devices for reducing rates which ignore individual efforts to avert unemployment. These devices upset insurance principles and all other principles of thrift by reducing contribution rates during business prosperity and increasing them during depression. Merit rating focuses administrative machinery around reducing employers rates instead of paying adequate benefits to the unemployed—the purpose of unemployment compensation. In addition, it lays the foundations for competitive disadvantages between industries in the various states.

The result of merit rating has been to reduce employers rates quite without regard to the adequacy of benefit payments in proportions varying from 16 per cent of rated accounts in Kentucky to 90 per cent (Cliffe Plan) in Virginia. Some states have tried to safeguard rate variations by requiring reserves to be maintained within fixed ratios and in those states 41 per cent of all employers were allowed rate reductions. The Cliffe Plan which required that state funds be replenished only for the average disbursements of the preceding three years, has permitted 85 per cent of all employers to obtain rate reductions. The emphasis upon reducing rates has frequently impelled employers to oppose reasonable improvements in benefit provisions. . . .

Although unemployment compensation is intended to provide income for workers accustomed to supporting themselves until jobs can be found for them, in the fiscal year 1940-41 one-half of all unemployed persons were still without jobs when they had exhausted their benefits.

Obviously, benefit payments do not last until workers get new jobs. They must either use up reserves or seek relief. This situation would become serious in a real depression. . . .

. . . All variations in protection of workers are a most striking anachronism at a time when the national nature of the labor market and our economic structure are as crystal clear as they were in the economic depression of '32 and '33. Trade is geared to national markets which in turn feed into world markets. The only way to provide regulations for production and trade and to safeguard their employees against emergencies, is by federal legislation.

We are now in a period of drastic change occasioned by conversion of civilian production facilities to war needs. By the end of this year 50 per cent of capacities will be given over to war work. What additional conversions may be necessary only the exigencies of the war may disclose. We still have unemployment—even with peak employment. With dominance of war needs everything else is subordinated so that the really national basis of economic enterprise, the national basis of the labor market, and the national basis of industry and trade are plain even to those who could not see them in normal times. It became urgently important that we get our social security system ready to meet the emergencies of wartime change as well as conversion to post-war conditions. Social insurance is the only investment on which wage earners and their families can depend for security in either normal or abnormal conditions. But well-organized, adequate social insurance will enable wage earners to face change without fear, and be ready to adjust to new situations.

Reinsurance for Trust Funds—(1941, p. 474) Res. 11 called for amendment to the unemployment compensation provisions to the Social Security Act, as follows:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in Convention assembled in Seattle, Wash., urgently requests Congress to properly amend the Social Security Act so that it will provide adequate minimum standards of unemployment compensation, a longer period of benefit payments, a shorter waiting period, wider coverage and a sound federal system of reinsurance for state unemployment trust funds.

The convention referred the resolution to the Social Security Committee.

(1942, p. 79) The complexity of the administration of the unemployment compensation provisions of the Social Security Law were pointed out by the E.C. in its report to the convention. The report stated in part:

. . . In unemployment compensation we find a sharp contrast to the simplicity and uniformity of old age insurance. The federal law simply provided a charge-back tax feature to induce states to enact unemployment compensation laws. Representatives of the American Federation of Labor urged from the first that at least federal standards to which states should conform be incorporated. For political reasons this was not done.

That initial indecisiveness and failure to take the same constitutional chance on federalizing the laws as was done with old age insurance, resulted in the chaos and intricacy of 51 formulas for providing and determining unemployment with almost equally wide variations in coverage.

The federal Act failed to decide positively whether unemployment compensation should be provided to pay benefits to workers during emergencies or whether it should be used as an incentive to induce employers to regularize employment. This indecision was equally curious as it followed world-wide peak unemployment before which nations and employers were equally helpless, and during which time our Federal Government had to take responsibility for relief of a national problem. It was unfortunate in that it opened the door to competition in trickery and complicated formulas which required excessive record-keeping, increased the work of determining benefits and opened the way to so-called experience or merit-rating, which was seized upon as a device to reduce employers contributions to funds and give them a stake in opposing benefit payments. Some business enterprises, such as retail trade, are designed to follow regular patterns, while others such as mining and construction, agriculture and the garment industry, render their best service by irregularity in volume of employment. Yet every business enterprise is mutually interdependent upon all the rest and it is patently unfair to reward one at the expense of others for a characteristic that is inherent. While unemployment may be stabilized for a limited time in some plants of some industries, unemployment cannot be abolished. Seasonality and irregularity are the heart of some industries.

Employment security, therefore, follows two supplementary undertakings:

- (1) compensation during unemployment until new jobs are found, and
- (2) organization of the labor market so that workers can be quickly and efficiently put in contact with available jobs.

(P. 83) On four counts our present social security system violates sound principles for an unemployment insurance system:

- (1) We fail to utilize the solvency of the total fund because the effective base for each state is the state balance.
- (2) We decrease rates during prosperity and increase them during depression when employment is decreased.
- (3) We ignore the fact that the labor market is national in scope and that we need mobility in labor supply.
- (4) We ignore the fact that companies and units in national industries are geared to world markets.

After careful consideration on next steps, the Federation had a bill drafted which was introduced by Representative Eliot of Massachusetts.

The Federation believes that in view of gigantic conversion of our industries to war purposes the repercussions of the change-back will be so trying as to imperil our free economy unless it is adequately protected by social security for workers and initial capital for managements. Without economic independence assured by income, workers are in no position to maintain political and social freedom. Social insurance assures a minimum necessary to bridge over gaps between employment and protects workers against the devastating fear of loss of income with consequent dependence on doles.

Soldiers also need similar assurance of protection. Already enlisted persons are beginning to worry about what the future holds for them. Many of these enlisted persons are former wage earners and the sons of wage earners whose incomes do not allow for adequate savings against emergencies, nor can enlisted persons maintain insurance. The Federation has proposed these unemployment compensation benefits for demobilized soldiers while they hunt for jobs, to be paid from federal funds and administered by the Social Security Board, which will help them find employment.

(War Displacement Benefits)

As the size of the war conversion program became apparent there was widespread apprehension as to the distress that would be occasioned and of the adequacy of our unemployment compensation program. The Director of the Labor Division of the War Production Board proposed federal funds to supplement state provisions so that benefits would be paid amounting to 60 per cent of displaced workers incomes up to $24 per week.

The major purpose was to make it possible to hold skilled employees for companies converting to war production during the conversion process. Automobile companies were tooling up for aircraft production. It was in the interest of war production to keep skilled workers ready for the new production.

Unfortunately for the purpose, a number of state directors of unemployment compensation were in Washington at the time of the hearing, and sought to create the impression that the bill proposed Federalization, which it plainly did not. However, they anticipated growing dissatisfaction with the unemployment compensation situation would result in active demand for Federalization and sought to gain a temporary advance by confusing the issues involved in the war measure with states' rights and bringing in governors of various states in opposition to the bill. The main effort was to try to give Congress the impression that there was opposition to Federalization of unemployment compensation.

Their efforts did result in the defeat of the displacement benefits proposal. However, it was helpful in showing which state directors were willing to use their offices to defeat legislation which Labor thought necessary.

(P. 480) This portion of the Executive Council's report records the efforts made to provide adequate unemployment compensation when workers are displaced because of converting plants over to war production. It regrets to note that the failure of the legislation reported by the American Federation of Labor was due to the action of some of the directors. With this comment your committee recommends adoption of the Council's report.

(1944, p. 149) In its annual report, under the general caption of "Social Insurance" the E.C. included a subsection on Unemployment Compensation citing experience under the unemployment compensation title. The following are excerpts:

... even under the approach to full employment of 1942, unemployed workers had exhausted their benefit rights before getting jobs. Obviously provision for short duration of payments may defeat the purpose of the legislation. The benefit formulas of the state follow two patterns. One provides a uniform duration for all workers who meet the financial eligibility requirement. The variable duration relates payments of benefits to the amount of employment or earnings the worker had in a previous period with a specified maximum.

A study of duration of payments in 47 states for benefit years ending in 1942, showed that in 32 of 47 states, one-third of all beneficiaries exhausted their benefit rights before finding work; in 6 states with variable duration formula, more than one-half exhausted their rights, and in one state nearly three-fourths.

Present duration provisions are inadequate even for a period of high employment as in 1942.

We question whether a system should be called unemployment insurance when eligible claimants have less than four potential weeks of benefits as in 5 states and large numbers of workers exhaust benefit rights before securing jobs. Rate of exhaustion rises as the weekly benefit rate drops—that is, workers unfortunate in holding jobs are unfortunate in getting compensation.

The trend toward more rigid disqualification provisions is becoming pronounced. Unemployment compensation is intended to cover involuntary unemployment. Disqualifying provisions are intended to screen out persons voluntarily unemployed and they properly impose a longer waiting period. When in addition they cancel credits, they are amending eligibility—not merely penalizing voluntary unemployment.

There are many problems arising out of the legal provisions of disqualification and administrative decisions upon them. Decisions of appeal boards and courts should also be watched carefully. A bad precedent started in one jurisdiction tends to spread throughout the fifty-one. Unemployment insurance funds are not the property of employers and should not be administered as such. They are to pay compensation due workers under prescribed conditions and should be administered as a public trust for the benefit of workers.

Standards for state laws should provide benefits for at least 26 weeks and include provision for extension in emergency periods, with benefit amounts ranging from 65 to 75 per cent of full-time earnings.

Disqualifying provisions should carry no further penalty than delaying benefit payments.

Experience rating which has developed into a popular form of reducing employers' rate of payment, should be either abolished or safeguarded by increasing the rate of companies responsible for irregular employment so that an assured unemployment compensation fund would be available. When standards are raised so that the unemployment compensation system can perform its real function of enabling workers to maintain self-dependence between jobs, then adjustment of the rate of contribution paid by all can be reconsidered.

(P. 596) Convention approved committee report containing in part: Your committee accordingly recommends that the Committee on Social Security work with the President of the A. F. of L. in preparing and submitting to the Congress legislation which will provide a comprehensive system of contributory social insurance and social security designed to attain the following specific objectives:

(1) A national system of Unemployment Insurance providing compensation in the event workers become unemployed through no fault of their own or from temporary disability on a uniform basis to all workers not otherwise covered who are employed by private employers, with provisions for inclusion on their own election by the self-employed and employees of the states, their instrumentalities and political subdivisions; such compensation to be a proportion of previous earnings with minimum benefits sufficient to prevent destitution and maximum limits with respect to duration and amount of benefit.

Your committee further recommends that pending the enactment of such legislation every effort be made within the various states to improve the present State Unemployment Compensation Systems. The following specific proposals are recommended for submission to the state legislatures, forty-four of which will convene during 1945:

(1) That the present limitations existing in some states on coverage by the number of employees employed in an establishment or by an employer be removed;

(2) That maximum unemployment benefit payments be increased to $25 per week.

(3) That the maximum period for which benefits can be paid to eligible workers be raised to 26 weeks.

(4) That the restrictive disqualification provisions which prevent workers who are involuntarily separated from their employment from drawing benefits be modified so as to remove the penal provisions from the State Unemployment Insurance Systems and restore the traditional freedom of workers to change their employment.

(1944, p. 149) As part of the general report on Social Security, a section was devoted to Unemployment Compensation, and A. F. of L. recommendations dealing with the administration of this part of the Law

(P. 596) The convention unanimously approved the report of its committee setting forth specific objectives for needed legislation. The desired amendments to the law were outlined on page 596 (1944) under the general heading SOCIAL INSURANCE and included in this reference book under SOCIAL SECURITY (AMENDMENTS 1944).

(P. 540) Res. 137:

Whereas—Organized labor has officially voiced its approval of the Kilgore-Truman-Murray Bill, S. 2061 which, if enacted, would have among other things extended reasonably satisfactory unemployment compensation federally administered to employees of private industry and the Federal Government, who will be separated from their jobs in private industry or the federal service, as the case may be, following the cessation of hostilities in whole or in part, particularly during the reconversion period, and

Whereas—The second session of the 78th Congress saw fit to enact the so-called "States Rights" Bill S. 2051, which leaves the responsibility of providing unemployment compensation to the several states, many of which are either unable or unwilling to provide adequate unemployment compensation, and eliminates Federal employes from even these uncertain and meager benefits, and

Whereas—The Kilgore-Truman-Murray Bill, S. 2061, is still on the Senate calendar and can be revived and enacted if Congress chooses to do so, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 65th annual convention of the American Federation of Labor endorse the objectives and the principles contained in the Kilgore-Truman-Murray Bill, S. 2061, and direct its officers and legislative committee to make every effort to secure the enactment of this legislation with such amendment as may seem necessary after mature deliberation, including an amendment which would assure the presence of representatives of organized labor on the administration authorities set up under the Bill. Should it prove impossible to secure the amendment which seems advisable and the enactment of the measure during the remaining days of the present Congress, then to renew the effort in the next session of Congress to have measure enacted into law.

(1947, p. 555) Convention unanimously endorsed Res. 87 opposing efforts under way to disrupt existing federal-state arrangements for financing unemployment compensation in the states. The resolution follows:

Whereas—There is a well organized campaign afoot to disrupt the present federal-state arrangements for financing unemployment compensation administration in the states by substituting a 100 per cent offset against the federal tax for the present 90 per cent with the Federal Government furnishing all state administrative funds, and

Whereas—This proposal hits at the heart of the present federal-state system of unemployment insurance as provided in the Social Security Act of 1935 by greatly reducing the exercise of federal responsibility for an admittedly national problem, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has consistently supported the appropriate role of the Federal Government in establishing standards for the operation of unemployment compensation in the states, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 66th Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record as opposed to this proposal.

This resolution requests the support of the American Federation of Labor in opposing any proposal designed to disrupt present federal-state arrangements for financing unemployment compensation administration in the states.

(P. 608) It is our firm conviction that the evils that beset our present state unemployment compensation laws can be overcome only through the establishment of a single federal system and we therefore reaffirm our support of legislation designed to that end. Pending the adoption of such a federal program we urge the state branches and all their affiliated organizations to continue their efforts to improve the benefit structure, extend the coverage, relax the disqualification and eligibility provisions of their state laws, in order that protection against wage loss from involuntary unemployment may be afforded all wage earners.

It is recommended also that wherever possible the protection of unemployment insurance be extended to those whose unemployment is due to temporary disability. This would fill the present gap between the protection provided by our state workmen's compensation laws and the increasing protection against other risks connected with illness now being incorporated in many collective bargaining agreements. In this respect our long experience in this field of workmen's compensation provides clear evidence in support of a single state fund. The proposal supported by private insurance companies and representatives of some large industries to permit "electing out" by employers would if adopted only serve to weaken the system and result in disadvantage to the workers.

Your committee wishes also forcefully to call the attention of those of our membership responsible for state legislation to the current proposals of the National Manufacturers' Association and the Inter-State Conference of Employment Security Agencies to destroy the present federal-state responsibility in the administration of unemployment compensation. This proposal would substitute for the present 90 per cent offset against the federal unemployment compensation tax a 100 per cent offset, and thus place the responsibility for financing the administration of the state unemployment compensation laws and the state employment services completely within the hands of the state legislatures. This would not only destroy the national pool of administrative funds under which more favored states share the burden of the poorer states, but would remove from the Federal Government any effective control over standards. As these standards relate to prevailing wages and prevent the utilization of the unemployment compensation programs in breaking strikes, we strongly recommend that this dangerous proposal be vigorously opposed.

We have repeatedly called for the administration of the United States Employment Service to be placed within the U.S. Department of Labor. In view of the close tie between unemployment compensation and the employment services, we recommend that legislation be introduced providing for the transfer of both the United States Employment Service and from the Federal Security Administration to the U.S. Department of Labor.

(1948, p. 179) After relating the inadequacy of the unemployment compensation program, E.C. made the following statement: "Continuing experience bears out our judgment that the inadequacies and contradictions of our present unemployment compensation program will only be overcome through the enactment of a unified federal system."

The E.C. report continued with the following:

During the past year the threat to such minimum federal standards as are in effect with respect to the state unemployment compensation laws, which we noted in last year's report, was successfully met. Some of these standards are very important to Labor, such as those relating to personnel standards within the state agencies, the payment of benefits through public employment offices, the provision for opportunity for a fair hearing before an impartial tribunal for claimants whose claims for compensation have been denied, and that no unemployment compensation funds may be diverted to other purposes. Of more direct interest to workers is the federal standard that now provides that no state unemployment compensation law may deny benefits to an otherwise eligible individual for refusing to accept new work if the position offered is vacant due to a strike, lock-out, or other labor dispute; or if the wages, hours, or other conditions of the work offered are substantially less favorable than those prevailing for similar work in the locality or if as a condition of being employed the individual would be required to join a company union or resign or refrain from joining any bona fide labor organization. It is these minimum and basic standards from which a number of the state agencies are now wishing to be free. Under the guise of a tax simplification program employers and a number of state officials anxious to do their bidding would undermine the unemployment insurance program. Though a bill was introduced to remove the Federal Government completely from any effective participation in the unemployment compensation program, the American Federation of Labor, with the active assistance of our state federations exposed its purpose and prevented it from being reported out.

It is evident that some revision is needed in the method of financing the administration of the state unemployment insurance programs, but this should not be the excuse for undermining the federal standards applicable to the state laws. We recommend that a trust fund for administration should be established which would be impartially administered and provide sound budgeting procedures and elasticity in administration. None of the laws introduced in the 80th Congress on this subject, in our opinion, however, meet these requirements.

In February 1948, under the terms of the Reorganization Act, President Truman undertook to strengthen the unemployment insurance system by permanently placing the United States Employment Service in the United States Department of Labor. This proposal was not only annulled by Congress, but Congress included in the Federal Security-Labor Appropriations Act the Employment Service to the Social Security Administration, thus further emasculating the Labor Department and undermining the usefulness of the employment service at one stroke.

(P. 451) Pending enactment of a national system of unemployment insurance and temporary disability insurance, much can be done immediately to meet the deficiencies of the present state unemployment compensation programs. . . .

We favor federal standards which would prohibit the states from denying or cancelling earned benefit rights to claimants whose unemployment is a result of a quit for good cause or because it is not due to a cause "attributable to the employer." Pending adoption of such standards, the states should remove these and other stringent disqualification provisions.

Though there has been gradual improvement in benefit provisions of the state programs, the increase in living costs now makes it imperative that benefits be materially raised.

Federal Supervision Proposed — (1948, p. 260) Res. 78 favored "complete supervision of the unemployment compensation laws by the Federal Government."

(P. 465) The question of unemployment compensation laws includes some angles not presented by the resolution which require most careful consideration.

Your committee recommends that this resolution be referred to the Executive Council, with the request that the Executive Council appoint a special committee for the purpose of making a full investigation of conditions which have developed under the operating of existing unemployment compensation laws.

(1950, pp. 30, 474) Res. 25, proposing uniform regulation of unemployment insurance:

Whereas—The social and economic problems of our nation make our federal-state employment security and unemployment insurance program an indispensable government function, and

Whereas—Many substantial defects and inequalities exist in our present system that require immediate correction, and

Whereas—Some of the corrections most essential to an improved and satisfactory program are for a broader coverage, a more adequate weekly benefit amount, a more liberal duration of benefits, more prompt payments of benefits when the worker is out of a job, improved disqualification provisions designed to protect the worker as well as the employer, improvement in the present system of tax contributions which now encourages the states to compete with each other in establishing low contribution rates, and the establishment of uniformity of the system among the different states, and

Whereas—Organized labor in general has advocated the establishment of a single national system of employment insurance, while the general trend has been, and still is, toward a decentralized plan in order to speed up as much as possible the payment of benefits and the handling of appeals, and

Whereas—Very little progress has been made by Labor in improving the program, either through federal or state legislation, because of the lack of coordinated effort by Labor toward the same objective, and

Whereas—Many of the states, including Texas, are committed through statute to comply with federal laws covering the program, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention go on record favoring the direction of our efforts toward amending the federal statutes to establish uniform regulations and proper minimum standards to which all states must comply.

(Pp. 323, 485) Res. 95 proposed an amendment to the unemployment compensation laws of the various states as follows:

Whereas—Most states have set up weekly cash benefits which accrue to the worker's account, and

Whereas—These benefits earned by each individual worker may accumulate to as much as $1,000, and

Whereas—Said worker is justly and legally entitled to these benefits when unemployed, and

Whereas—In most states the amount due a worker goes into the general unemployment fund if not utilized or claimed in benefits by the worker within a specified time, and

Whereas—In most states no provision has been made under the law to make available to the dependents or beneficiary of a deceased brother the benefits which he had earned and were legally due to him at time of death, and

Whereas—In many cases the families of deceased brothers are left in dire need and want of financial assistance to tide them over the lean months that follow, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention endorse action to bring about changes in the existing unemployment laws of the various states, whereby a worker may designate his beneficiary on his state record, and in event of death, any and all monies due him shall be paid to his dependents in same weekly or semi-monthly amounts, and for such periods as may have been due him from his earned and accrued unemployment benefits.

(P. 224) The consistent failure of the state legislatures to meet the major deficiencies of the unemployment compensation program, together with the record of the persistent efforts on the part of the state agencies to work against the major objectives of a sound system of unemployment insurance support the contention of the American Federation of Labor that the only way in which an adequate and workable program will ever be developed is through the enactment of a unified national system of unemployment compensation. This is especially urgent now, as this nation is on the brink of a national emergency which will call for the mobilization and maximum utilization of the nation's manpower resources. As the workers of the nation are called upon to bend every effort to meet the new demands for production of materials necessary to defend our liberties against the threat of totalitarian aggression, they should be afforded a uniform and efficient system of insuring against the hazards of unemployment, coupled with a rational organization of manpower resources through a national system of public employment exchanges which can work in cooperation with the national and international unions.

(P. 225) It has been the consistent position of the A. F. of L. that unemployment compensation benefits should relate directly to the past earnings of the claimant and a needs concept should not be introduced into unemployment insurance. . . . We adhere to our firm conviction that ultimately the (unemployment compensation) program must be a single federal program. Until there is general recognition of this need, the A. F. of L. should support every attempt to improve the existing program such as that represented by H.R. 8059 and S. 3427, identical bills. (April 1950)

(P. 455) Convention approved committee recommendation:

1. Repeal the Knowland Amendment to the Social Security Act of 1950.

2. The critical international situation now requires again the mobilization and planned utilization of our manpower resources. As men and women are called on to work where their services are needed without regard to state lines and political boundaries a unified national system of unemployment compensation and public employment offices which can work effectively and cooperatively, with labor unions becomes imperative. Pending the development of such a national system we urge the state federations of labor to employ every effort to amend their state unemployment compensation laws to correct the major deficiencies cited in the Executive Council report. The time to make these needed corrections in our unemployment insurance program is during a period of high employment and not wait until the nation is confronted with large-scale unemployment.

(1951, p. 176) In its overall report on social security developments and problems, the E.C. submitted a comprehensive report on Title III (Unemployment Insurance). Embodied in this report was the following statement:

The broad attack to undermine and weaken the established labor standards, waged with increasing intensity during the past year, was directed toward the weakening of the standards of unemployment insurance.

Behind this drive, there was the increasingly evident purpose of reactionary employers to subvert the principles of unemployment compensation to a private operation. The various moves made in Congress and in state legislatures have been particularly designed to instill in the public mind the impression that the payment of unemployment benefits is directly related to the beneficence of the employer and that it is, in a sense, the employer's gift.

It is more important than ever, therefore, for the trade union movement to re-state and drive home to every American the fundamental proposition that unemployment insurance benefits are paid to workers not as a privilege but as a matter of right. Labor insists that unemployment compensation is the responsibility of the community to help meet one of the hazards confronting a wage earner—joblessness. A system of unemployment insurance is a part and parcel of a competitive enterprise system. It recognizes the fact that risk-bearing essential to an expanding competitive economy carries with it an element of economic insecurity to the individual worker which only a community-wide program can meet.

Our system of unemployment compensation is a limited one. It is not a cure against large-scale depressions. It is, however, the first line of defense against recession and the most important device for compensating wage loss due to unemployment under reasonably stable conditions. Its immediate objective is to provide for the unemployed worker, for a reasonable period, the opportunity to buy the essentials for living for himself and his family to the extent that his previous wages had enabled him to obtain. By this provision of purchasing power, unemployment compensation is designed to sustain the buying power potential upon which the production of the whole economy is based.

During the past year, the attack on unemployment compensation has been two-fold. One line of attack has been to cast doubt upon the efficacy of the system itself by creating a public impression that unemployment benefits are paid on a large scale to persons who in reality do not qualify to receive such benefits, or don't need them. In state after state, an attempt has been made to disqualify large numbers of workers through unreasonable changes in the disqualification requirements. In its desire to make sure that the system is demonstrably sound, the labor movement has set guard over the administrative procedures and has time after time revealed the spurious nature of the charges made.

Another important development has been the intensified attempt in the legislatures to entrench even more firmly the merit-rating systems benefiting large employers at the expense of small businesses. Pursuing the objective of shifting the costs from the employers best able to contribute to the system to the weakest employers, the attempt has been made to reduce even further the contributions of large firms. Concurrently, the emphasis has been placed to a growing extent upon the role of employer contributions and the alleged cost of these contributions to the employer.

It is important that there be a clear understanding of the extent to which the cost of employer contributions is passed on to the consumer and to which, in the final analysis, the cost is sustained by the community as a whole with the larger employers escaping their proportionate share of this cost.

We believe that in the coming year the groundwork must be laid for a concerted drive to raise the standards of adequacy in the benefit amount, in the duration of benefits, in eligibility and in coverage of unemployment compensation. The time to reevaluate the unemployment compensation system and thus strengthen the whole of the American economy lies immediately ahead. Our task, therefore, is especially urgent.

(P. 532) Convention approved following report and recommendation on Report of the E.C. under this subtitle:

We wholeheartedly approve the recommendations made by the Executive Council in its report for the correction of far-reaching deficiencies in our unemployment insurance system. The time for revision and strengthening of the system is now, when high employment prevails. We urge every state federation to lay groundwork in the ensuing year for comprehensive revision of state laws and for a renewed drive toward a national system of unemployment compensation.

We call again for the repeal of the Knowland Amendment of 1950. And, finally, we ask for the provision of benefits, equal to unemployment benefits, to all persons unemployed as the result of temporary illness or disability not covered under state workmen's compensation laws, and call for federal standards to provide such protection in each state.

(1952, p. 194) In its report to the convention under the subtitle The Hazard of Unemployment, the E.C. stated:

... We objected ... to the plan to distribute federal funds to the states on a basis proportionate to the distribution of state taxable wages as unsound and unrealistic. Neither was the Mills plan sound in putting relief to state funds in the form of repayable loans, placing a burden of repayment at the time when the state funds could ill afford it. No action was taken on these proposals in the last Congress, but they are likely to be pressed again in the coming year.

In the year ahead the problem of benefit financing must be reconsidered so that the system will be equipped to meet the possible burden of extensive unemployment, and at the same time provide for higher standards of compensation. Both the amount of benefits and their duration must be substantially improved.

It is equally urgent that coverage be extended to include employers of one or more employees and to bring into the system workers now left out, such as workers employed on the farms. A concerted drive should also be made to reinforce the true purpose of unemployment insurance as a part of the social security system. The recent trend of subverting unemployment compensation to the control and interests of employers must be reversed. . . .

(1953, pp. 181, 307, 640) The convention committee report was unanimously approved as follows:

As pointed out by the Executive Council, the foundations of the unemployment compensation system at the state level have been seriously undermined. As a result of the operation of experience rating systems and employer success in securing drastic eligibility and disqualification provisions in state laws which serve to unjustly deprive unemployed workers of benefits, the original purposes of the program have been perverted and its ability to perform in softening the impact of any future economic reverses has been greatly weakened.

The experience cited in the Executive Council's Report indicates clearly that the problem will never be fully solved as long as control over the provisions and administration of the unemployment compensation program remains so largely in the hands of the individual states. It is appropriate to reemphasize the view of the American Federation of Labor that control over the operation of the unemployment compensation program and the employment service system is properly a function of the Federal Government and should not be left to the separate and contending pressures operating within and among the individual states.

As long as the program continues to remain subject to individual state laws and administrators, however, Labor should devote its fullest energies in each of the states to the effort to remove the serious restrictions now contained in state laws and to improve their basic structure. The most important objectives which need to be accomplished in the revision of state unemployment compensation laws are: (1) a method of financing which does not include "experience-rating"; (2) the removal of harsh and unjustified eligibility and disqualification provisions which are serving today to deprive of benefits an ever-higher proportion of workers who become unemployed; and (3) an increase in benefits to a level of at least 50 per cent of wages, with benefits geared to wage-loss rather than a needs concept.

In the first session of the 83rd Congress, large corporate employer interests, working hand-in-glove with the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies, renewed their attacks upon all federal participation in the unemployment compensation program. The Mills-Mason Bills, which emerged from the House Ways and Means Committee as the Reed Bill (HR 5173) was the instrument of these attacks. This bill, which would effectively undermine participation of the Federal Government in the operation of the program and leave it entirely under the discretionary control of state administrators, passed the House and is now before the Senate Finance Committee. We strongly urge that the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions do all within their power to bring about the defeat of the Reed Bill in the forthcoming session of Congress.

(1954, pp. 287, 582) The Report of the E.C. contained an accounting of both developments and need for revision in the unemployment compensation program of social security. The convention committee submitted the following recommendations which were unanimously approved:

The most pressing need in the social security field today is a comprehensive overhauling and improvement of the unemployment insurance system. In the hands of reactionary state legislatures and in the absence of any effective standards governing the amounts and duration of benefit payments and qualification provisions, the system has completely failed to keep pace with present-day requirements.

The improvements that are most needed can be accomplished only through positive action on the part of the Federal Government. The only ultimate answer lies in the establishment of a single federal employment security system, in place of the 51 competing systems that now exist. The inability of state governments to maintain an adequate system of unemployment insurance in the absence of a strong federal role in the administration of the system and the enforcement of minimum standards has been proven by experience. The record of the past year further demonstrates the deficiencies and the failure of the "States Rights" approach to this issue. Not one state responded to the recommendations of President Eisenhower, embodied in Secretary Mitchell's letter to state governors, by conforming to the standards for benefit improvements proposed in that message. Yet, in the face of a compelling need for constructive federal action, the most significant measure enacted last year in the unemployment insurance field was the Reed Bill, which weakened still further the role of the Labor Department in the administration of the program.

The basic deficiency in the unemployment insurance system today, from which all other weaknesses flow, lies in the method of financing now provided and required by law, whereby reductions in the employer tax to support the program can be accomplished only through the insidious device of employer experience-rating. From experience-rating stem the destructive pressures that have undermined the strength and integrity of the unemployment insurance system. As a result of the experience-rating incentive, employers have conducted a successful continuing attack upon the program, seeking to hold benefits to a starvation level and to secure new and increasingly harsh disqualification provisions which unjustly deprive unemployed workers of benefits in order to minimize the employer tax rate.

These pressures have advanced to the point where in many—if not most states—the system is being administered as though its primary purpose were the reduction of employer taxes rather than the payment of insurance benefits to unemployed workers. The elimination of experience-rating and the substitution of a sound, and non-discriminatory system of financing which apportions the tax load in an equitable way as a social cost upon all business and industry must be the continuing objective of the American Federation of Labor. As a minimum feasible step in the direction of the elimination of experience-rating, the law must be changed so as to provide an alternative method of accomplishing reductions in tax rates where such reductions are justified by the condition of benefit funds.

As a further minimum step toward the reconstruction of the unemployment insurance system, a program of uniform national standards governing benefit amounts, durations and eligibility requirements must be adopted so as to remove from the shoulders of jobless workers the burden of cut-throat interstate competition which serves to hold benefits down to an inexcusably low level. Pending the establishment of a truly national employment security system, a reinsurance fund also needs to be established as a source of grants-in-aid to states whose benefit reserves are in danger of insolvency. The loan fund provided under the Reed Bill is inadequate and even dangerous since it unfairly penalizes those states confronted with the gravest unemployment problems and the greatest need for supplementary funds.

Federal legislation along these lines offers the best hope that the serious deficiencies of the present unemployment insurance program can be overcome and that adequate protection can be afforded the unemployed workers of the nation. It deserves the vigorous support of the entire trade union movement.

(P. 414) Res. 115 called for support for the establishment of a unified national system of unemployment insurance under the U.S. Department of Labor, and further

Resolved—That, pending the establishment of such a system, the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, urge the adoption by the Congress of legislation establishing minimum national standards to govern the level and duration of unemployment insurance benefits and eligibility for benefits, and an improved system of financing, as proposed in a bill introduced under the joint sponsorship of more than 80 members of the House and Senate in the last session of the 83rd Congress.

(P. 530) We regret that the 83rd Congress did not take steps necessary to strengthen our unemployment compensation laws. While progress was made by extending coverage to employers of four or more and federal employees, no positive action was taken to increase benefits or extend duration of payments.

The enactment of the Reed Bill (H.R. 5173) is a serious weakening of existing unemployment compensation legislation.

We recommend that every effort be made to substitute a genuine reinsurance bill for the weak loan provisions of this law.

Unfair Labor Practices (see: Norris-LaGuardia; NLRB)

Union Industries Show—(1952, pp. 350, 554) Res. 134-137, inclusive, called for full participation of affiliated national and international unions and fair employers in the Union Industries Shows, sponsored by the Union Label Trades Department.

Your committee is of the belief that no greater demonstration of practical Labor-Management relations has occurred in the northeastern section of the United States than the Union Industries Show, held May 17 through 24, 1952. This show was the greatest exhibition of any kind ever held in the New England area. Upwards of three-quarters of a million spectators marched through Mechanics Building in Boston to view this all-union spectacle.

While the Union Industries Show held earlier this year did not establish a new attendance record over prior shows, it did set a record in viewers of the show in cities of comparable size. The 1952 show did exceed all prior shows in the degree of participation and in variety and quality of exhibits. With an aggregate value of $20,000,000 involved in the colorful and educational displays, the quality of the show was greatly enhanced by an additional number of "live" exhibits; new exhibits employing the element of motion; and the special events held at intervals throughout the vast hall. The greater quality of the 1952 Union Industries Show is attested by the broader coverage given it by television, radio and the daily press than occurred in connection with any earlier show.

Your committee concurs in the belief of officials of the Union Label Trades Department that future Union Industries Shows should embody a greater number of "live" and "motion" exhibits as the most effective means of demonstrating and dramatizing the craftsmanship of American Federation of Labor members and the quality of the products and services which they produce and render. It is hoped that national and international unions and other exhibitors participating in future shows will benefit by the experience gained in such "live" and "motion" exhibits as the most effective method of impressing their message on viewers and in holding spectator interest. The special events held at the recent show in increased number over those provided in earlier shows were an effective augmentation to the show itself and can be used beneficially in connection with virtually all exhibits.

The growing success of these shows from the standpoint of public interest, and the increased cooperation and participation extended by management, fulfills the basic purpose of the show in effectively demonstrating existing Labor-Management relations to the American public. Your committee is confident that no greater demonstration of good Labor-Management relations can be found anywhere. The American Federation of Labor is indebted to those manufacturers, distributors and service industries which participated in the show and who joined with us in clearly and forcibly demonstrating to the public the extent to which private enterprise and free labor can work together.

It is noted that the Eighth Union Industries Show will be held in Minneapolis, Minnesota, April 18 through 25, 1953. Your committee concurs in the decision of the Union Label Trades Department to hold successive shows in a section of the country considerably removed from that of the prior show.

Whereas—The Union Industries Show sponsored and produced by the A. F. of L. Union Label and Service Trades Department each year impresses millions from coast to coast with the many benefits being derived from good relations between our A. F. of L. unions and their "fair" employers, and

Whereas—This annual exhibition now ranks as one of the greatest events of any description in this nation; and each year continues to grow in size and quality and gain more and more public acclaim, and

Whereas—Participation in this all-union display of A. F. of L. craftsmanship and service is limited to our A. F. of L. national and international unions and the employers whom they invite, and

Whereas—Benefits which accrue from participation in this annual exhibition are enjoyed by A. F. of L. members, their families and friends, therefore, be it

Resolved—That each national and international union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor be prevailed upon to make every effort to take part in each of these shows, and, be it further

Resolved—That each national and international union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor be urged to invite their "fair" employers to participate in these exhibitions.

(1954, p. 415) Res. 119 pointed out the public relations value of the Union Industries Shows, urging all national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. to make every effort to take part in these shows and to urge their "fair" employers to participate.

(P. 595) This resolution was submitted to this convention by the Union Label and Service Trades Department and urges that each national and international union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor be encouraged to make every effort to take part in Union-Industries Shows and to invite their fair employers to participate in these annual exhibitions.

Union Investments—(1927, pp. 40, 260) The assets of trade unions are considerable. A very incomplete summary of 1926, which covered reports of national and international organizations but not the funds of many local unions, showed assets amounting to $35,897,727.36. Some of these assets represent funds kept in cash; some represent real estate; a considerable amount is invested for purposes of revenue. Some unions have invested their funds in labor banks; others in investment companies; and others in stocks and bonds.

When unions embark upon business enterprises, they are entering upon undertakings that require a different type of information from what is required in managing unions and are incurring two-fold danger—financial risk and risk of union strength. Union finances are its sinews. If union funds are imperilled the union itself is in danger of disintegration.

The investment of union funds is a serious problem for the labor movement, for what is involved is the strength and future to the union itself. Results of labor banking experiments confirm the warnings that the A. F. of L. has repeatedly made. These banks should have the advice of banking experts, and should protect themselves by arranging to get the benefit of federal as well as state examinations. Some unions that have financed various undertakings have involved themselves in most embarrassing difficulties. It would be well to study the causes of failure in labor banks and investment undertakings.

Union Label Councils (Affiliation of FLU's)—(1954, p. 415) Res. 120 called upon each federal labor union affiliated with the A. F. of L. to affiliate and become a part of the union label council in its respective area.

(P. 595) Your committee recommends concurrence in this resolution and urges the executive officers of the American Federation of Labor to encourage directly chartered federal labor unions to subscribe to the intent of this resolution.

Union Label Trades Department (Affiliation With Urged)—(1954, pp. 416, 596) Res. 122:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, urge that all national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor affiliate with the Union Label and Service Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor.

Union - Management Cooperation (also see: War Production Board; Labor - Management Cooperation) — (1925, p. 35) Labor believes that the best interests of all participating in production are promoted by cooperation and that seeming conflicts of interests may be harmonized in the light of more comprehensive information and experience from cooperation itself.

The first function which the trade union seeks to perform is that of collective bargaining. The establishment of this practice enables the group of producing workmen to have a voice in determining standards of work and pay. The principle of workers representation is thereby established and opportunity is afforded to these representatives to become experts in their field. In addition to possessing expert information these representatives must have that independence of the group with which they are bargaining that gives bargaining equality. This basic feature in the relations between trade unions and the employing group makes a fundamental distinction between trade unions and company unions and discloses one of the reasons why company unions are not an adequate substitute for trade unions.

After collective bargaining becomes an established practice, it can provide methods and agencies for rendering continuous service in interpreting and applying the terms of the working agreement and in meeting new problems. By developing this continuous service the functions of the union become increasingly interwoven in plant procedure. The field to which bargaining procedure is applicable is limited, however, to matters to be decided by joint agreement and judgment.

There is a still more important service that the union can render—that of participating in finding better methods of production and greater production economies. A group of workers cannot enter into this type of cooperation unless they know the results of their work will not be used to their disadvantage. There must be mutual confidence and that stability that makes possible future planning.

A demonstration of the practicability and the value of this union function occurs in the Baltimore and Ohio development in union-management cooperation which has passed the experimental stage. Because of the success of the development of this road, the method is being applied to other railroads—the Canadian National, Chicago and Northwestern, and Chesapeake and Ohio. The development is the special contribution of the Railway Employees' Department to trade union methods and progress. It employs machinery and procedure developed from that used in the function of collective bargaining, and its prerequisites are strongly organized, well developed trade unions and dependable, competent, expert advisors. The development itself must be carried on in the spirit of an educational undertaking.

(P. 231) Most fittingly the A. F. of L. completes its discussion of new economic problems with a presentation of the constructive services of the union. After collective bargaining has been established, it is then possible to develop the procedure and technique for dealing with problems of mutual concern. The principle of collective bargaining is put to continuous service when confidence is established and there are agencies for doing equity to all groups. Efforts to improve production methods and eliminate waste must be accompanied by reasonable assurance of regularity of employment.

We endorse the satisfaction expressed in the principle of the Baltimore and Ohio development and recommend the pamphlet Union-Management Cooperation to the study and consideration of all trade unionists.

We also approve the recommendations that our National Headquarters keep in touch with technical experts and engineers in order that the experience of management-cooperation with trade unions may be put at the service of all concerned with production problems.

(1926, p. 51) Products of modern industry are not the work of any one individual but of scores of workers, each contributing something essential to the finished whole. If the entire work process is done most efficiently and most economically, the whole group operates like a perfectly synchronized machine. This comes through the will to cooperate working in accord with a predetermined plan.

The basis for cooperation is laid in the collective agreement negotiated by unions and management. Such an agreement establishes standards of equitable work relations and begets confidence that makes possible continuous cooperation in dealing with other problems arising out of the day's work. The union is essentially an agency for cooperation for service to the union members and to the industry in which its members are employed.

The union first of all injects order and stability in work relationships—achievements of value to industry and to the workers. It establishes more equitable standards of work and pay. It becomes responsible for group discipline. It maintains standards of craftsmanship. It makes possible opportunities for individual development. It is concerned to maintain and increase production standards, for increased productivity is recognized as a basis for wage increases.

The union establishes the practice of reaching agreements on joint relations by conferences in which both groups concerned present their views on problems and contribute to mutually acceptable conclusions. As soon as management agrees to adjust relations through conferences with representatives of voluntary organizations of workers, the way is open to intelligent, constructive solution of constantly developing problems in production and industrial relations. Such relationships make it possible for all engaged in industry to continue to develop and grow through the problems of the work they are doing.

The union with its traditions and accumulated group experience is the custodian of the craft skill of the industry. The management that seeks the cooperation of the union is taking a course that assures most intelligent production results.

Conflict and arbitrary management are poor production policies. Conference and cooperation lead to united work efforts.

Throughout all of industry where collective bargaining obtains, are more or less definitely developed undertakings in cooperation between management and unions for more efficient production. Major responsibility rests upon management for developing the machinery for getting the most benefit from this cooperation.

After all, industry embraces the investment of money included in a corporate unit of capital called company or employer and the investment of wage earners in the form of wages which in most instances total annually more than any other form of investment in a particular industry. This being true all have invested interest in industry. To safeguard and promote best that invested interest demands a greater degree of understanding and cooperation between employers and trade unions.

The trade union movement is ready and anxious to do its full share and looks to management to assume its prior responsibility. Cooperation can proceed no faster than the necessary technical provisions are provided.

Management has its distinctive functions. Management secures the finances, makes ready the plant, keeps abreast technical progress, purchases, plans and directs. To use the materials which management supplies, man the machines, and carry out plans, workers are employed. They bring to the factories creative ability and labor power necessary to supplement the preparations of management. Workers and management are reciprocally dependent. This is obviously a relationship that calls for cooperation, a cooperation that is to all intents and purposes a real partnership in a work undertaking.

Partnership implies joint responsibility and decision of matters involved—in the case of industry, for problems of production. The workers' group to function in such a partnership must have organized channels for developing decisions and carrying out undertakings. The organization must be a voluntary one.

As soon as an agreement is reached between workers and management, workers must assume definite responsibility not only for the terms of the contract, but for maintaining the spirit of partnership or cooperation. It is fundamental for efficiency in production that the spirit and method of teamwork be followed. In this as well as in developing agreements there should be joint participation through representative groups. The committee that is responsible for working out production problems should be a different agency from that concerned with grievances.

The fundamental principles that should underlie all industrial policies are:

Regularity of employment with a stable work group;

A low turnover which is advantageous to industry has an equal if not greater value to workers—to them it means continuous employment, a stable income;

Every worker has a right to be freed from all avoidable uncertainties of employment — both from those arising through poor labor administration and from mismanagement in production and effects of speculation in raw materials or finished products.

The A. F. of L. has consistently stood for justice to all workers, skilled or so-called "unskilled." We have maintained that there are no workers wholly unskilled and the distinction between wage earners is one of degree only. The so-called unskilled or common laborers are the backbone of industry. Low economic standards cannot prevail among these workers without injury to all. We maintain, therefore, increased efforts must be made to organize these and all workers in order that there may be established machinery for self-betterment and that the workers may take their rightful place in determining questions of life and work.

Every worker has a full right to a just portion of the wealth which he helps to create, a full right to earn out of his toil an opportunity for his children equal with that of any citizen, a full right that every just safeguard shall be afforded him for his physical safety, for his health and comfort while at work.

Every worker has the right to compensation for physical injury or disease occasioned in the course of production. Every worker who has been injured or disabled in industry has the additional right to opportunities for rehabilitation in order that he may receive the necessary assistance or training to enable him to be self-sustaining.

(P. 317) That modern industry is organized upon a basis of interdependence of process, makes it imperative that many groups work together in related processes. The ideal is cooperation between all in furtherance of definite plans. Cooperation comes through a common will. The differences between working together and cooperation are psychological but plainly manifest in concrete products.

Many "open-shop" managements in recognition of the interdependence of process have organized channels for employee representation and company unions, which it is alleged have some of the external aspects of trade unions. But they are essentially and fundamentally different in the potential spiritual and substantive forces that constitute the difference between merely working together and cooperation.

Labor recognizes to the full the necessary and natural and rightful functions of management. Management "secures the finances, makes ready the plant, keeps abreast of technical progress, purchases, plans and directs." But actual production, the carrying out of the plans, requires not only labor but the intelligent, voluntary and responsible cooperation of the labor force. Joint decisions must be reached and Labor must have its organized channels for reaching these decisions in cooperation with and not in subservience to the management.

The A. F. of L. believes that cooperation between all groups concerned with production results in a very genuine partnership that brings reciprocal benefits of the highest value: to the workers it means opportunity for creative expression, to the management it means achieving the purpose of industry under the best possible conditions. In view of the attention focused upon company unions, shop representation plans, American plans and the like, at this time your committee recommends that the President of the A. F. of L. arrange for a comparative study of the results of union-management cooperation and employer-controlled unions and like schemes. After analyzing and classifying the results of these two policies we shall be in a position to let facts speak for themselves.

(1928, pp. 42, 236) When the union is accepted as the method by which workers shall participate in industry and collective bargaining is established the workers have a real contract that gives them status in the industry. This status makes possible a sharing of interest in production that is the essence of partnership. Interest brings a desire to contribute and hence a release of creative initiative. Sometimes this happens among the workers as individuals and sometimes in an organized way through the union. The latter, of course, brings the more valuable results. The form that this concern takes varies greatly; sometimes it is a joint educational project to provide skilled workers for the trade or industry, sometimes an employment service that connects these workers with employers who need workers, sometimes a contribution to administrative problems, or participation in improving production standards, the regular adjustment of misunderstandings and difficulties that come in all live situations, and finally systematic cooperation with management to make production effective.

These various constructive relationships recognize the fact that workers have creative ability and can and do make valuable contributions to industry from an experience that otherwise is closed to management. There are definite things that can be done only by workers, which cannot be done by management for workers. Many of those with the responsibilities of management fail to grasp that workers can think as well as obey orders. This thinking can be utilized by the industry if the right methods are employed. Industry can expect to have the cooperation of employees only when voluntary agencies are the channels. Employers' substitutes will not serve the same purpose. Cooperation assumes equality in the undertaking. The trade union is the only agency which workers themselves have created to conduct their relations with employers and it is the only agency that gives them equal footing with management or other representatives of the corporation.

(1940, p. 549) The importance of the extension of union-management cooperation in the production of materiel of defense was projected in Res. 181 unanimously adopted by the convention. The creation of a special committee to plan for a service agency to counsel union-management cooperation undertakings was authorized by the convention.

Union Membership (Interest in)—(1927, p. 41) The union has its administrative problems which are similar to those of all other cooperative undertakings. First among these problems is that of maintaining a stable, active and efficient membership. To accomplish these purposes, the members must realize that the union is an agency permanently necessary to them as a business agency and as a medium for expressing their needs and wishes as workers. The union must, therefore, do effective publicity. It is not enough just to get results. It is necessary to show union members what the union has accomplished in order that they may appreciate the need of promoting the major agency. The workers should have the evidence to help them realize they need the union just as much as the union needs them. It is the function of the various trade organizations to give their members information of the achievements of their unions and it is the function of the federated labor movement to give to all interpretations and facts of most significant happenings. It also devolves upon the federated movement to help employers and the general public to understand what unions are and do. Good will and understanding provide opportunities for unions to perform their duties to industry and to society.

All people are interested in undertakings that give them an opportunity to do something. It is important that unions maintain active work that will afford each member an opportunity to make a personal contribution of service. When a few people do all the work, the others soon lose interest. This fact leads to the next thing a union must do to maintain its members: Provide the means for educational development.

If all union problems are treated as opportunities to get additional information in order to solve new problems; if each new achievement is regarded as new vantage ground for still further development; if we look upon life as well as industrial progress as constant unfoldment, the union becomes an agency for growth and education and a part of the individual growth of each member.

The union should not overlook the fact that pleasure is also a necessary factor in wholesome living and good health. Some social feature should be a part of each meeting and special meetings should be wholly social or with a social background. The spirit of friendliness is one of the strongest ties the union can foster. Many a union provides its members with the advantages and benefits of a club. In order to hold its membership the union must continually provide service and benefits. The union should be inseparably a part of progress—social and industrial.

In addition to these tangible cohesive forces, the union must consider practical services and benefits—such as insurance, investment advices and opportunities, employment service, old age pensions, unemployment aids, opportunities to improve craftsmanship. The union which provides such services in addition to promoting better working conditions and higher wages will have most genuine loyalty and support.

(P. 318) The affiliated national and international unions, state federations of labor, city central bodies, local unions and other units of our American labor movement should give earnest attention to the problem of awakening the membership to a greater interest in the work of the unions.

Lethargy may lead to disaster. Interest to be lasting must be based upon understanding. Inclusion of social activities in trade union affairs is helpful in promoting pleasant and agreeable contact between the members and their families. Insurance benefits and unemployment aids are also useful in arousing interest. The discussion and promotion of definite plans to improve craftsmanship should be given more attention. Through it all, extreme care should be used that the membership is given an understanding of the underlying philosophy and aims of the trade union movement. We request the E.C. to take steps to arrange for an exchange of opinions on this subject between the various units of our labor movement through the medium of official publications and the general labor press.

Union Records—(1929, p. 65) The A. F. of L. feels that it cannot emphasize too much the value of accurate yearly reports from local labor movements. They show progress made during the year, and the methods of work which have produced results; they point out matters needing particular attention where immediate action may forestall difficulties. They enable the labor movement to profit by the experience of thousands of local leaders. We need especially an accurate record of local membership. And here the reports are far from satisfactory. Central unions often have no accurate account of membership in affiliated locals and must rely on estimates. Large inaccuracies occur from this method of reporting, as our two years' experience with these reports has shown.

The A. F. of L. feels that for the report next year each central body, at least six months in advance of the end of our fiscal year, should ascertain the exact membership of all locals affiliated, either by letter or by personal interview with the officers.

Labor Conference Proposed—(1942, p. 628 (Res. 22 favored the convening of an international conference of all the labor unions of the United Nations. In lieu of the proposed resolution the convention adopted the report of its committee on the subject of Anglo-American Trade Union Committee.

"An Epochal Year"—(1945, p. 20) Closely following the end of the war in Europe was the San Francisco World Conference to determine the final form of the Charter of the United Nations. The American Federation of Labor had been preparing for service in this conference through the work of our Postwar Planning Committee and the recommendations of our Executive Council for amendments to the charter.

The American Federation of Labor was denied direct representation in the San Francisco Conference but accorded opportunity to submit its proposals. We urged inclusion of a bill of rights assuring basic personal freedoms under the United Nations as essential to human progress, stability of government and peace between nations. We urged principles of equity between nations and acceptance of the Chapultepec Agreement for unity in the Western Hemisphere. We urged inclusion of the International Labor Organization with the changes in its charter to adapt it to function under the United Nations Organization. We urged provisions for representation of great national functional groups so that our citizens would be kept informed on problems and able to register their experience and judgment. Such representation would assure national support for United Nations Organization.

Although the Charter is not perfect, it makes agencies available through which the nations of the world can discuss international problems and work out ways of dealing with them. Orderly conference and adjustment are provided as alternatives to use of force. The American Federation of Labor strongly urges full participation in the United Nations Organization and acceptance of responsibilities under it.

We believe all members of the United Nations Organization should have the same rights and the same responsibilities and that even-handed justice in accord with moral standards should characterize its work...

(1946, pp. 57, 608) Early in 1945 when arrangements were in the making for a world conference to act upon the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, the officers of the American Federation of Labor requested representation of President Roosevelt. We assumed that our experience would be helpful in deciding upon world institutions as would that of employers and farmers. However, the President decided otherwise and appointed only government representatives along with a few individual citizens. The basic functional groups were not included as advisors as was done in the Pan-American Conference. Several score organizations were invited to send representatives, not with the duty of advising, but only to be available should official representatives seek advice.

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor prepared recommendations for amending the Dumbarton Oaks draft and authorized President Green to present them to the United States representatives in the conference.

The proposals urged the inclusion of a United Nations Bill of Rights guaranteeing civil rights to all individuals throughout the world; a statement embodying the democratic objectives in support of which the United Nations combined for war; and principles which underlie justice between nations formulated under the Pan American Union.

The American Federation of Labor urged the type of representation utilized in the I.L.O., the only League of Nations organization that weathered the war, be followed for the policy-making agency of the United Nations, the General Assembly, and for the Economic and Social Council authorized to deal with social and economic matters.

We recommended that in addition to a government representative in the General Assembly, a representative from each of the functional organized groups—employers, farmers and workers be added and that the Social and Economic Council be comprised of twelve government representatives and four each from these functional groups.

We urged that the International Labor Organization be made an agency of the United Nations with its work expanded, and recommended that the Philadelphia Declaration be made the preamble to the constitution.

The spirit of some of our recommendations with respect to basic principles was included in the preamble and the purposes and principles of the charter approved by the San Francisco Conference, but our recommendation upon the principle of including functional representation was not accepted.

The Charter provides that the General Assembly shall consist of all member nations with not more than five representatives. Each member have one vote. The Assembly will have annual sessions and special sessions when need may require.

The Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purposes of:

- a. promoting international cooperation in the political field and encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification;
- b. promoting international cooperation in the economic, social, cultural, educational, and health fields and assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

It may consider general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security.

It elects eighteen members to constitute the Economic and Social Council, the non-permanent members of the Security Council and the members of the Trusteeship Council. It shall admit new members, suspend or expel members. It shall consider and approve the budget; receive and consider reports from agencies constituting the United Nations.

The Security Council shall consist of eleven members, six selected for a term of two years and not immediately eligible for reelection. Permanent members shall be the Republic of China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America.

The Security Council has executive authority to take action in the interests of peace and to stop aggression. The Security Council shall determine the existence of a threat to the peace and may recommend action to the parties concerned. The Security Council may use economic as well as military force.

Each member has one vote. An affirmative vote of seven members determines procedural matters. Decision on other matters is by an affirmative vote of seven provided the permanent members concur. Any member whose country was party to the dispute under consideration shall abstain from voting.

All member nations shall undertake to keep armed forces and the necessary facilities available to the Council. The Council shall have a Military Staff Committee consisting of the chiefs of staff of the permanent members of the Council.

The United Nations will undertake international economic and social co-operation to promote:

- a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and developments;
- b. solutions of international economic, social health, and related problems; and international culture and educational cooperation; and
- c. universal respect for, and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Specialized agencies may be established by inter-governmental agreements in economic, social, cultural, educational, health and related fields. Responsibility for the agencies shall lie in the General Assembly. They would report through the Economic and Security Council which may furnish information to the Security Council.

Chapter S-XI-XIII added to the Dumbarton Oaks draft provides for the Trusteeship Council to deal with non-self-governing nations.

Chapter XIV added by the San Francisco Conference contains the provisions for an International Court of Justice which is now in process of organization.

The Secretariat will consist of a Secretary-General and staff. The Secretary-General will be designated by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council. The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council.

Staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General in accord with the regulations approved by the General Assembly and assigned to the various councils and organs of the United Nations. The Secretary-General shall make annual reports to the General Assembly on the work of the organization.

Amendments become effective when approved by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly and ratified by two-thirds of the members through their constitutional channels, including the permanent members of the Security Council.

A general conference to review the charter may be held at any time and place determined by a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly and a vote of seven members of the Security Council.

Regional arrangements consistent with the purposes of the United Nations, dealing with matters related to the international peace and security, shall keep the Security Council advised of activities.

Though there are provisions in the charter which do not conform to democratic principles and which fall below levels of procedure in effect in the more democratic countries, the Charter represents the level and degree to which agreement could be reached by the fifty nations represented in San Francisco. In view of existing war tensions, national differences, differences in political experiences and thinking, the Charter represents substantial progress in trying to propose ways and means to deal with the causes of war and to promote the arts and procedures of peace.

We urged our Senate to ratify the Charter and make it possible for our Nation to assume its responsibilities in the United Nations—our greatest hope for security against future wars.

The American Federation of Labor will continue to press principles of representation that will give basic functional groups within each nation participation in and responsibility for the success of the organization.

(P. 608) We note with gratification the constructive efforts our Executive Council made while the Charter of the United Nations was in the process of formulation. Some of the recommendations of our Executive Council were incorporated in the final draft or, as in the case of our proposal, for an international bill of rights, a commission has been authorized to draft recommendations.

Although our recommendations of principles of representation for member nations in the General Assembly and on the Economic and Social Commission were not approved, we believe it basic for the effectiveness of these organs that functional citizen groups share representation with the Government of each member. Only such representation can make wise and authoritative decisions and secure for the United Nations the national support of its members. We recommend that the Executive Council watch for the opportune occasion to urge again the adoption of provisions for representations which will enable the citizens of member nations to participate directly in the responsibilities of the United Nations.

The United Nations Charter was a series of compromises necessary to meet the practical problems of 51 States with diverse progress toward democratic institutions and even with diverse definitions of democracy. Accordingly, it provides for limited co-operation and even allows veto right to privileged nations. While democratic countries might concede limitations on majority rule in initial stages of world organization, it is unthinkable that such limitation be continued indefinitely as the international organizations take on the functions and responsibilities of world government which should exist only through the will of the governed. We have seen the veto power used not to protect rights but as a sanction for obstructive tactics and as a smokescreen for acts of aggression and violence.

We wish to voice a solemn warning that we will not continue to support international organization blindly for we hold human liberty as a priceless heritage which should not be sacrificed for any international co-operation that does not respect national self-government based on civil rights for individual citizens. Unless aggression and totalitarian government can be curbed, the United Nations cannot assure the peace and there is more security for human liberty in a federation of countries believing in democracy. But such federation would necessarily be on a defensive basis, because of the war risks entailed by progress in the techniques of atomic fission. There are, however, conditions which make peace more perilous than war.

We urge that no effort be spared to make the United Nations an effective agency for world peace and when necessary that constitutional changes be made, we urge with equal emphasis that we safeguard human liberty and civil rights as the basis of a life worthy of free human beings.

(P. 59) Under the title "Toward World Order," the E.C. submitted a comprehensive survey of the development of the United Nations to date. The following are excerpts from E.C. Report:

Labor finds serious problems in the structure and the procedures of the United Nations. Membership in the United Nations is confined to nations and each nation is free to determine its own representation. Obviously the functions of some agencies can best be performed by persons with official status and responsibility. Equally obvious is the conclusion that the decisions of agencies dealing with our economy and our culture can best be made by persons representative of the citizen groups accustomed to determining similar matters in our democracy.

At present we can only vaguely foreshadow developments from the operation of forces which, if successful, will grow into world government. The American Federation of Labor is concerned to preserve the ideals and the guarantees that have afforded us democratic opportunity. We believe that direct representatives of citizen groups should represent our nation in the General Assembly, not only to present our views but to develop and maintain in all our citizens a sense of personal responsibility and interest in what eventually may be world legislation. We believe that our representative in a world agency considering world trade and employment should be selected by organizations responsible for those functions at home—organized employers, agriculture and labor. Government, whether local, national or world in scope—whether administered by public or private representatives—is a service which must promote not only immediate objectives but must advance the welfare of all. With the privilege of representation must go responsibility of service.

(P. 63) From this sketchy and incomplete record of the work of United Nations agencies, it is obvious that its decisions and work in international fields will vitally affect developments and agencies in our own nation. It is also obvious that if we would retain democratic institutions in our own country we must extend principles of democratic representation to our interests and activities in the international field. For example, our Government has proposed an International Conference on Trade and Employment which looks forward to the establishment of a permanent agency in this field. If these non-government agencies which control free enterprise in this country do not have proportional representation in the international agency their authority at home may be minimized.

These principles of representation include:

1. The right of an organization to select its representative or to name a panel from which selection is made.
2. The right to such representation in connection with agencies dealing with matters affecting our welfare.
3. The right to advisory relationship in connection with agencies dealing with matters affecting our welfare but where regulations provide or make possible only government representation.
4. The right to free access of information needed for representative service.
5. Congress should require Administrative agencies of the Federal Government to observe such rights of representation in making official appointments.

(P. 609) In these sections, the Executive Council records progress in setting up the various organs of the United Nations and other international agencies which will be coordinated by these agencies. One of the most important of these is the Commission on Human Rights which, in addition to drafting an international bill of rights, will consider civil liberties, status of women, freedom of expression, rights of minorities and prevention of discrimination. The work of this Commission will deal with the basic concepts of liberty which constitute the democratic way of life.

These sections summarize steps which the officers of the American Federation of Labor should take to secure for the A. F. of L. the right to consultative relations with the Economic and Social Council under Article 71 of the Charter. The United States delegation approved our request, while Senator Connolly sponsored our cause in the Committee on Advisory Relations of the General Assembly.

Our acceptance was opposed by members of the World Federation of Trade Unions, but it was obvious that our free trade unions had a distinctive experience to contribute for which the other international labor organization was in no way competent.

Security Council—(1946, p. 533) Res. 96:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled in Chicago urgently recommend the immediate strengthening of the United Nations Organization by the adoption of three amendments to the United Nations Charter to provide for:

1. Reorganization of the United Nations Security Council and the World Court to give fair representation to all nations and to decide by majority vote all matters involving aggression, or preparation for aggression. There must be no veto to protect aggressors.

2. Delegation to the Security Council of the powers to suppress aggression and control heavy and scientific weapons. The powers to be delegated should be strictly limited and well defined and these powers must be interpreted by the World Court. Aggression should be defined as an attack with weapons of violence by a sovereign state or its citizens against the territory of another sovereign state, or the production of specified weapons of violence by any sovereign state beyond quotas set by the Security Council, or by refusal to permit inspection by duly authorized representatives of the Security Council.

3. Establishment of a strong International Police Force. Such a force must be established to impartially support the powers of the Security Council.

The details of these amendments and the methods of procedure under them should be in accordance with the Quota Force Plan, and be it further

Resolved—That we urge the acceptance of the proposal of the United States Representative on the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, for the creation of an International Atomic Development Authority. We further urge the incorporation of that proposal into the Quota Force Plan, and be it further Resolved—That until such time as the above measures, or similar ones, go into effect, we urge the maintenance of the armed forces of the United States at levels recommended by the Chief of Staff, United States Army and the Chief of Naval Operations, United States Navy.

Referred to Executive Council.

(1947, p. 179) The E.C. devoted a section of its annual report to discussion of U.S. Foreign Policy. The following excerpt is from that report

... Our foreign policies are made by Congress and the Executive Branch of the Federal Government and by ambassadors and ministers and all in the foreign service, and by our representatives in the United Nations. Foreign policy is effective only as we support it by public opinion and by power to enforce.

Practical experience has taught us that unless citizens keep representatives advised of their wishes and their judgment on policies, those representatives are guided only by government policies and their own experience. A national representative can take a strong position when he knows he has national backing. The American Federation of Labor is in some measure meeting this need through the work of the Committee on International Labor Relations. This committee should be directed to keep all unions advised on the work of the United Nations, the problems handled by our representatives in United Nations agencies, and specific problems in our nation's foreign policy. While our unions can depend upon the metropolitan press for general information, they look to the Federation for aid in knowing the labor implications. If foreign policy is to be democratically determined, not only must our labor movement be prepared and alert to keep its membership advised, but those basic functional groups—Labor, Industry, and Farmers—should have opportunity to aid in shaping official foreign policies—national and international.

We note with approval a proposal in Congress to urge amendment of the Charter of the United Nations to abolish the veto power of the five nations and to substitute majority rule for all determinations. We urge that to this amendment be added those presented by the American Federation of Labor through our national delegation in the San Francisco Conference which took final action on the Charter. The work of the United Nations has confirmed the wisdom of those recommendations. There is need for direct citizen participation in the United Nations to prevent its development as a bureaucracy responsible only to the governments of member nations.

Our first recommendation is:

That Chapter I, Article 9, paragraph 2 (which reads—"Each member shall have not more than 5 representatives in the General Assembly") be amended by adding: "two of whom shall be government representatives and the other three selected from nominations from the most representative organizations of farmers, industrial employers, and wage earners".

That Chapter X, Article 61, paragraph 4, be amended by inserting (just where these words follow in the paragraph)

"who shall have as official consultants representatives of Industry, Labor, and Agriculture chosen from nominations by the most representative organization in these functional fields."

The Charter should be further amended to carry out the purposes of Chapter I, Article 2, paragraph 1: "The Organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its Members." Accordingly amendments should be adopted to eliminate the privilege of permanent membership by any member in an agency, and the right of veto.

The American Federation of Labor believes that the work of the United Nations should be kept close to the people of all nations through participation of such national functional groups. Such participation would replace existing provisions, giving consultative status to non-governmental agencies, for the experience of such groups would be considered in the formulation of national policies.

(1947, p. 465) The convention approved the position of the Executive Council by adopting the following committee report:

... the A. F. of L. severely condemns all forces and governments that refuse to cooperate and even put obstacles in the path of nations striving to speed world reconstruction and the organization and maintenance of lasting peace.

Your Committee, therefore, recommends approval of the position of the Executive Council urging "amending of the Charter of the United Nations to abolish the veto power of the five nations and to substitute majority rule for all determinations." The deteriorating international situation makes it more urgent than ever for the A. F. of L. to work with redoubled energy for the acceptance of the amendments it proposed to the United Nations Charter during the UN Conference held in this city. All the sad experiences and shortcomings revealed by the UN in its functioning to date underscore the correctness of the Executive Council in stressing the "need for direct citizen participation in the United Nations to prevent its development as a bureaucracy responsible only to the governments of member nations."

A. F. of L. Role—(1947, p. 179) The Executive Council submitted a general report of the participation afforded the A. F. of L. in the United Nations through UNESCO (United Nations Economic and Social Council). The convention unanimously adopted the report of the committee as follows:

(P. 564) The Economic and Social Council has a potential power to promote human welfare and world peace that is far greater than the Security Council whose performance has been so futile. When the United Nations began to organize, the American Federation of Labor urged the General Assembly to include the A. F. of L. among the voluntary organizations selected to advise the Economic and Social Council. The A. F. of L. is the rally center of the free trade unions of those countries struggling against totalitarianism. Our international duties and services in this capacity have rapidly multiplied.

Our A. F. of L. consultants have performed two services of outstanding importance: (1) the submission of a Bill of Human Rights which has aroused the workers of many lands to the significance of the work of the United Nations and (2) in substituting a counter-proposal to the U.S.S.R. assault on the I.L.O. to weaken that organization and transfer its functions to the Council, so that the I.L.O. emerged strengthened and with specific duties to conserve free trade unions.

We recommend approval of their work and look forward to its expansion as the Economic and Social Council develops into a functioning agency under peace conditions. The Council through the agencies for which it is responsible will make policies to promote economic welfare and will deal with causes of economic friction.

Human Rights, International Bill (U.N.) (also see: UNESCO (1948))

(1948, pp. 84, 486) The most fruitful results of the work of the American Federation of Labor consultants has come from the working out of an International Bill on Human Rights. We were the only non-governmental labor organization that took part in all stages of this work, from the drafting sub-commission through the working group to the full Human Rights Commission.

The World Federation of Trade Unions took no part whatsoever in this struggle for human rights (which includes trade union rights), obviously avoiding any commitment in the East-West clash that was a constant occurrence in these Commissions. The American Federation of Labor alone urged the inclusion in the draft of the demands of organized labor. Results of this contribution are many, especially in the Draft Declaration on Human Rights which came out from the last Commission meeting as a good document. The preamble, upon our instigation, reaffirms faith in the need for the "promotion of social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom."

(P. 71) In its report to the convention, dealing in general with international problems, the E.C. deplored the fact that the U.N. "had been unable to deal effectively with problems basic for world peace." The report further states:

The Atlantic Charter, the United Nations and its machinery, were born out of the purposes and experience of a Western European civilization. They seek more personal freedom and government with the consent of the governed. The U.S.S.R. under the guidance of a philosophy that imposes authority and out of experience only with a police state, seeks, as a powerful nation, to divert the United Nations to serve totalitarian purposes.

Contracts are the device of Western European peoples for determining the conditions under which they work together. As they are mutual agreements, both parties make concessions for reaching the widest area of agreement. Order results from faithful fulfillment of contracts.

When nations, disciplined to abide by agreements, find they are dealing with other nations which exact the maximum in concessions, only to disregard their obligations under contracts, orderly relations do not develop. When groups place a premium on facility in making the benefits from contracts unilateral, efforts at cooperation lead to futility.

This background highlights present-day diplomacy and sustained joint efforts through the United Nations to make adjustments that will forestall resort to force. War can now unleash such terrifying forces and destructive weapons, that it means annihilation of populations.

We find the way forward blocked by the inability of the Security Council to perform functions under the Charter.

We find planned abuse of the veto power accorded to permanent members of the Council.

We find intolerant and aggressive use of the veto denying membership in the United Nations.

We find refusal of member states to cooperate with investigating agencies.

We have seen the smaller countries of Eastern Europe, unprotected by federation or collective defense, brought one by one under subjugation by armed force, secret police and Communist agents within their nations.

Though beset by many critical and disillusioning situations, the United States continues to struggle for action through the United Nations on matters and situations involving war potentials.

Our government, together with France and Great Britain, is trying to bring order through adherence to joint agreements with respect to Austria and Germany. U.S.S.R. violation of the four-power control has resulted in the Berlin crisis. World situations are made more involved and difficult by divergencies in basic philosophies, and conflicts in wills.

These facts throw a greater responsibility for constructive progress on efforts for European recovery and cooperation between non-governmental organizations. Economic recovery in Western Europe will bring to those nations opportunity for political freedom. To prevent further advancement of the Iron Curtain westward, Germany and Austria must be included in recovery plans. The industrial resources and know-how of the German people are essential to revival of European economic self-dependence. Even with the handicap of boundaries fortified by customs duties, there has been an approach to a European economy resting on diversification of natural resources, transportation facilities, and varying technical skills of workers. The intra-European commerce between countries formerly equaled that with their trade with the rest of the world. To restore this economic inter-relationship is the purpose of the Economic Cooperation Administration which works with the European organization created by countries participating. We hope an integrated European economy will result.

Forced Labor—(P. 83) The E.C. pointed out, in its report to the convention, that forced labor was one of the foremost among the basic issues in the East-West conflict in the U.N. during the preceding year. A. F. of L. consultants sustained our item on forced labor before the Agenda Committee of the Council (Economic and Social Council) and succeeded in having it put on the agenda for the July, 1948, meetings. Through a series of manipulations, however, a postponement was gained on the forced labor item until the succeeding session.

In the meanwhile, the World Federation of Trade Unions maneuvered to block the American Federation of Labor's item on forced labor by submitting a proposal to investigate alleged violations of trade union rights in eleven countries—all outside of the Iron Curtain. Immediately the American Federation of Labor's consultants responded by welcoming, on the one hand, any investigation of the violations of trade union rights, but demanding, on the other hand, that such an investigation be a general one referring to all countries with an industrialized economy and a trade union movement, and certainly including the countries behind the Iron Curtain. A long and impressive list of such violations of trade union rights in Soviet Russia, Poland, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia was added to make our case a strong one.

(P. 443) The following committee recommendations and report were unanimously adopted by the convention:

The Executive Council report on this subject points out that the U.S.S.R. has used its veto power to prevent the United Nations from performing its functions. We do not believe that the situation would be remedied by abolishing the veto. The difficulties in the United Nations go much deeper than can be remedied by legislative action. The U.S.S.R. would continue its policy of aggression in order to communize all nations, regardless of any change in the Charter. Its philosophy of life and its objectives to be attained by government are absolute contradiction to those of the democratic way of life. The Kremlin is determined on conquest of the world whether by cold war or atomic bombs. Peace with democracies has no place in the Kremlin's plans.

The time has come when we should seriously consider as defense strategy a world union of democratic nations to promote our general welfare and to defend our way of life against enemies.

We recommend that the Executive Council study various proposals for changing the Charter of the United Nations and report to the next convention.

(1950, p. 21):

Whereas—Peace is the fruit of justice, justice is the product of law, and law is rooted in government, and

Whereas—Conflicting governmental units have always ceased their warring when united in a common government, as evidenced by our own thirteen colonies, and

Whereas—Representative federal government is America's discovery and America's contribution to the society of man and has been adopted in principle by the great majority of nations, and

Whereas—Labor has long recognized a need for a world united under law such as visualized by Samuel Gompers in 1914 when he called for "a world federation competent to do justice between nations and able to maintain the peace of the world," therefore, be it should be called as soon as possible for the purpose of building the United Nations into a true federation of nations, with a code of international law, a bill of human rights, adequate international police force, and any other machinery not otherwise inconsistent with the sovereignty of nations but found to be necessary for the maintenance of world law and order, and be it further

Resolved—That a Charter Review Conference of the United Nations

Resolved—That should Russia abstain, our nation should proceed to unite with other like-minded nations in a partial world federation, thus taking a realistic step toward realizing man's dream of a united world and, at the same time, giving to the democratic nations a strength through unity so great as to deter further Russian armed aggression, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor be requested to use whatever means are at their disposal, including education, political action, and publicity mediums of radio and newspaper for carrying out the purpose of this resolution so that, in this year of centennial remembrance of Samuel Gompers, we can stride forward to the realization of his goal, freedom and security for all men under world laws.

(P. 459) The convention referred this resolution to the International Labor Relations Committee for study.

A. F. of L. Consultants—(1950, p. 122) The slight downward trend noted in world economy at the close of 1949 evoked new hopes and an invigorated spirit of aggression among the representatives of the U.S.S.R. and its satellites in the United Nations. This new aggressiveness was also reflected in the conduct of the Soviet Government-controlled agency and auxiliary calling itself the World Federation of Trade Unions. Our consultants took the offensive and maintained the initiative against W.F.T.U.

We exposed this later as destructive in its aims and actions.

During the past year, A. F. of L. consultants energetically pressed the issue of slave labor in the U.S.S.R. and its satellites. In this endeavor, our consultants have had but one aim: to rouse the civilized world against the barbarous and degrading treatment of millions of human beings with a view to eradicating every expression of this pernicious evil, no matter where it might be manifested. They gathered unimpeachable evidence to show that the slave labor camps operated by the Russian Secret Police (M.V.D.) were an organic feature of the entire Soviet economy and its highly publicized system of "social" planning. In some economic sectors, this M.V.D. production is predominant; in others it actually monopolizes the field.

Among the other activities of the consultants, their intensive work in the Human Rights Commission deserves special mention. During the past year this Commission has drafted a Covenant on Human Rights. The covenant, in contrast to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, is a treaty which has legal binding power after ratification by the respective nations. It is first in a series of others to follow in the future. The Russians, who were absent, never accepted the idea of such a treaty, and they also opposed the proposal of implementation.

As everyone knows, the legally binding power of a treaty is only real when the means of enforcement exist. The American Federation of Labor will have to continue its efforts to have implementation made more effective in order to have enforcement become a reality.

In this connection it must be noted that the World Federation of Trade Unions did not feel it appropriate to cooperate in the endeavor to guarantee the rights of man. The W.F.T.U.

representatives were absent on all the Commissions where constructive work was to be done.

With the establishment of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the American Federation of Labor decided to assist the I.C.F.T.U. in getting consultative status of Category A and to withdraw after the acceptance of the I.C.F.T.U. by the Economic and Social Council. The I.C.F.T.U. appointed four persons to act as its consultants to the United Nations.

... (P. 505) ... As a result of the continued initiative and positive approach of the A. F. of L. in this highly important UN agency, the American Federation of Labor has won worldwide recognition and esteem for its broad vision, genuine and effective humanitarianism, and determined championing of human rights and the cause of free labor.

Your committee notes with approval and recommends your endorsement of the decision of the Executive Council to turn over to the I.C.F.T.U. its representatives and personnel in the Economic and Security Council. We are confident that the I.C.F.T.U. will maintain the same leadership and pursue the same vigorous course of constructive proposals, while at the same time unmasking and resisting the W.F.T.U., which in the United Nations, as elsewhere, serves only as a menial agency of the Kremlin's Foreign Office and its worldwide Communist conspiracy.

(1951, p. 83) The American Federation of Labor was among those who strongly urged adherence to a new world organization to deal collectively with problems affecting world peace and in promoting the well-being of all peoples of the world. We urged amendments to the Charter of the United Nations to provide more adequate representation for labor and industry in those problems which directly concern them. But instead of providing direct representation for wage earners and employers, an advisory and consultative relationship was provided for international non-government economic agencies. The American Federation of Labor secured the consultative right to represent free trade unions when the World Federation of Trade Unions was the sole global labor organization. When the I.C.F.T.U. was organized, the A. F. of L. automatically gave up this consultative status and right to independent representation in favor of the I.C.F.T.U.

Our relinquishment of that status in and relationship to the U.N. now places the duties and responsibilities of defending labor's rights and those of the free trade unions, as well as promoting the hopes and aspirations of free workers throughout the world, upon the shoulders of the I.C.F.T.U. To that end the Secretary Treasurer has appointed two Vice-Presidents of the A. F. of L., together with two officers and representatives of the C.I.O. as representatives of the I.C.F.T.U. In addition, a branch office has been created in New York City to facilitate and enhance the work involved.

The American Federation of Labor has long abhorred war and all that it involves in human loss and material destruction. We, therefore, condemned the unwarranted full-scale invasion of the Republic of Korea by the Communist armed forces of the so-called People's Democratic Republic of Korea abetted and now aided by the Chinese Communist regime and encouraged and supported by Communist Russia. We are in complete sympathy and accord with the Security Council of the U.N. in declaring this invasion a breach of the peace and pledge every assistance to the U.N. in bringing to a successful and victorious close the war now in progress.

ress and forced upon the free nations of the world.

Developments since the Korean war have tested existing machinery of the United Nations. Unfortunate differences in the United Nations among various countries over policy in pressing military action against aggression to success and victory have raised problems of great significance. Some of the more important of these problems have grown out of our Constitutional provision that treaties become the law of the land upon ratification of the Senate. Already one state law has been declared unconstitutional because of a United Nations proposal ratified by Congress.

The right to declare war by the executive branch of government without consent of Congress, the sending of drafted citizens to serve under U.N. command, where political decisions rest with the U.N. and the extent to which the United Nations actions and decisions may limit determination of our own foreign policy, these and similar problems have arisen and require our careful study in order to determine policies, changes or amendments that may be required and be effected to increase the efficiency of the United Nations and, at the same time, avoid infringing upon our constitutional provisions and safeguards. The Executive Council is fully alert to these and like problems.

(P. 469) Your Committee on International Labor Relations has gone thoroughly into this section of the Executive Council Report dealing with the UN. We recommend it to you for endorsement and further propose that:

1. The convention greet the progress made by the UN—despite certain short-comings — in its rallying the forces of peace and freedom to resist the Russian-instigated and directed wanton aggression against the Republic of Korea and its defenseless people.

2. The convention welcomes the initial steps taken by the UN-ECOSOC on the basis of the proposal first made by the A. F. of L. and subsequently by the ICFTU, to which we relinquished our consultative status, to survey and stop the spreading menace of slave labor emanating primarily from Soviet Russia and its satellite areas.

3. The convention notes with intense indignation the widespread and increasingly frequent kidnapping of political opponents resorted to by the Soviet Government and its secret agents. This outrageous violation of elementary human rights and barbarous aggression by the Soviet dictatorship and its Quisling regimes have assumed especially grave proportions in Germany, Austria, Hong Kong, and various countries in Asia where dissident artists, intellectuals, helpless refugees, and even members of Parliament have been kidnapped and rushed off into Soviet slave labor camps or murdered. The convention calls upon the ICFTU to make a special investigation of this anti-human practice and to place the entire question of Soviet kidnapping before the ECOSOC with a view of exposing this dreadful terror weapon and abhorrent assault on human decency and devising practical measures to halt this cold-blooded violation of the essential human rights of personal freedom and the generally accepted principles of civilized relations among nations.

4. We commend our government for the various measures it has taken in behalf of the liberation of the American newspaperman, William Oatis, from the clutches of the Czechoslovak tools of Soviet despotism. We strongly urge our government to take all effective measures to speed his release and to call upon the UN to take similar action.

5. The experience in the Korean crisis and the continued refusal of the Moscow government to participate in the various agencies and subdivisions of the UN demonstrate the crying need for improving and strengthening this body as an agency for world peace and human betterment. We propose that our government take increasing initiative in this direction.

Labor Representation — (1952, p. 145) As soon as the Charter of the United Nations was made public, representatives of the American Federation of Labor studied it carefully and urged several amendments. The most fundamental amendment we proposed was for representation of economic functional groups on those agencies dealing with economic matters. We also proposed that pending the adoption of this amendment, the Administration include as consultants our representative on the Economic and Social Commission and its subdivisions, a representative of management and a representative of Labor. The decisions of this agency should be guided by persons with practical experience.

The inclusion of representatives of Labor in national delegations requires no amendment.

The President of the United States appoints the delegation and can accord Labor this recognition by our Government, as has been done in other industrial countries.

We recommend that efforts be renewed to get action on these proposals from the administration to be elected in the November election.

(P. 548) The convention endorsed the report of the E.C. on this subject and approved the following committee recommendations:

Realizing the vital need of building the U.N. into a powerful force for preserving peace and promoting human well-being, we urge that, toward the furtherance of these objectives our government delegation in the U.N. should give favorable consideration to the following proposals:

1. In association with our democratic allies and through our own initiative, our government should strengthen and improve the efficacy of the U.N. not only as an instrument for preserving peace but also as an organ for systematically advancing and applying policies calculated to eliminate every vestige of colonialism and every imperialist course—whether it be the old type of nineteenth century imperialism or the new type of totalitarian Communist imperialism.

2. The U.N. countries administering trust territories should include representatives of the native populations from the territories on their delegations to the Trusteeship Council. Wherever possible, these representatives should be democratically elected by the native populations themselves, as a step on the road toward their attainment of national freedom and democracy.

3. To demand a thorough-going investigation of the role of Russia in instigating and arming North Korea and the so-called Chinese volunteers for waging war against the United Nations and the Republic of Korea.

4. To oppose all measures aimed at curtailing effectiveness of the consultative system and the rights of the Non-Governmental organizations (Category A) therein.

Byrnes, James F., Appointment Protested—(1953, pp. 409, 650) Res. 44 called attention to the discriminatory attitude and official actions of James F. Byrnes, and condemned his appointment as follows:

Resolved—That this Seventy-second Convention of the American Federation of Labor, assembled in St. Louis, Missouri, September, 1953, go on record as condemning the appointment of Governor Byrnes as a delegate of the United States to the United Nations because his record as champion of the doctrine of white supremacy and the inferiority of peoples of color, is certain to earn and win the opposition and sharp condemnation of the darker races, representing two-thirds of the population of the world, since he cannot, in conscience, wholeheartedly oppose imperialistic colonialism or Apartheid of Malanism of South Africa or support the great issues of human rights, which is the proper and logical and moral responsibility of the representatives of a democratic society, authorize and instruct the president of this Federation to make known the position of this convention to the President of the United States.

Approval (UN) Reaffirmed—(1953, pp. 410, 650) Res. 45 reaffirmed established endorsement and support of U.N. and its various special agencies.

(1954, p. 465) Res. 20. The convention unanimously adopted this resolution.

Whereas—Strong tides of opposition are running high in the United States and throughout the world against the United Nations despite the achievements of this young institution in the field of international affairs in connection with serving as the agency for collective action against Communist aggression in Korea; keeping the flames of nationalistic conflict between Pakistan and India from bursting into a war; as well as maintaining the mechanism for continued negotiation in the interest of peace between Israeli and the Arab states; together with its many social, economic, agricultural, labor and educational agencies to achieve good will and the advancement of world literacy, health, science and peace and plenty, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Seventy-third Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, assembled in Los Angeles, California, September, 1954, go on record as reaffirming its support of the United Nations and call on the United States Government to utilize the United Nations in the future to a greater degree than it has in the past, in order that it may develop the prestige, position, power and place to fulfill its mission as expressed in its charter which will also serve to concentrate the free world in one common agency, in order that it may fight for world peace, the alternative of which can only be atomic and hydrogen warfare which is certain to encompass destruction of modern civilization.

Opposition to Admission of Red China—(1953, pp. 396, 668)

Whereas—The mere halting of open aggression by Communist military forces in Korea under the terms of a truce, leaving a million Chinese Communist troops in undisputed possession of North Korea, hundreds of miles closer to the Japanese industrial bastion of free world than in 1950, has resulted in renewal of both the Soviet Communist drive and the suicidal echo in the free world of the demand for admission of the so-called "Chinese People's Republic" to the United Nations as the purported only true representative of the Chinese People, and

Whereas—The charter of the United Nations dedicates that Organization to insuring peace and ending the curse of aggressive war on mankind by promoting human freedom and respect of human rights, and subordinates the admission of States to membership in the organization to their willingness and ability, in the judgment of the already member nations, to carry out these aims and obligations of the U.N. Charter, and

Whereas—The fraudulently entitled "Chinese People's Republic" has, for over two years, openly waged aggressive war on the forces of and against the very decisions of the United Nations, and

Whereas—Since its advent to power, after more than twenty years of foreign supported civil warfare, this Communist fraudulent "Chinese People's Republic" has systematically disregarded every human right and violated every human freedom in murdering literally millions of helpless Chinese people, especially non-Communist trade unionists, and subjugated the Chinese labor organizations to its totalitarian control, and

Whereas—The organic law of the so-called "Chinese People's Republic" states in Article I that its government is a dictatorship and in Article II that its government is based on "democratic centralism," which is the double talk principle of Communist totalitarianism, thus making this Communist government unable, as it has proven in practice, and unwilling to accept the aims and perform the obligations of a member state under the U.N. Charter, and

Whereas—The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in 1951 at the Milan Congress utterly condemned the subjugation of the labor organizations by the totalitarian political power in the Communist Satellite countries of Eastern Europe, as in Red China, which suppression of the freedom and rights of labor itself makes the Chinese Communist government ineligible to membership in the United Nations, and

Whereas—The Chinese and North Korean Communist High Command violated the minimum humanity of the laws of war by mistreating, torturing, and even murdering prisoners of war, and

Whereas—The United Nations refused, after World War II, to have relations with the War Criminals of the Nazi-Fascist Axis except in trying them as such, and

Whereas—The Congress of the United States, by unanimous vote of both houses, has expressed its opposition to the admission of this Communist totalitarian alleged "Chinese People's Republic" to the United Nations, and

Whereas—The admission of another and additional aggressive slave state to the United Nations, to join those inevitably affiliated at its foundation before the revelation of the aggressive intent of the Communist powers, would disastrously undermine the support of the United Nations by American public opinion, required for continued usefulness of United States affiliation and United Nations organizational survival, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor assembled in its Seventy-Second Annual Convention unqualifiedly opposes the admission of the Communist totalitarian government of the so-called "Chinese People's Republic" into the United Nations, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor counts upon the government of the United States to continue to uphold the principles and maintain the Law of the United Nations by continuing to oppose such admission, and, be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor calls upon all the free labor organizations of the world of every nationality to aid American Labor in barring the entry of an avowedly totalitarian and proven aggressor state into the United Nations, in order to preserve the United Nations which was devised for and can survive only by serving its declared purpose of eradicating totalitarianism and its accursed product of aggressive war from the world.

(P. 668) We have given most careful consideration to this resolution expressing firm opposition to the admission of Communist China into the U.N. We heartily concur with it as fully in accord with A. F. of L. policy on this vital issue and recommend its adoption by the convention.

(1954, p. 601) The convention approved the recommendations of its Committee on International Labor Relations containing the proposals concerning the United Nations as follows:

REVISION OF UNITED NATION'S CHARTER

We deplore the tendency in some diplomatic quarters to relegate the U.N. to the background as an institution for preserving peace and to bypass it as a channel through which important issues like Korea and Indo-China can be settled. It is most regrettable that some statesmen see in the U.N. only an instrument of the cold war. Moreover, international peace and human decency are undermined by the disdain for the Principles and Purposes of the United Nation's Charter manifested by the Moscow-Peiping aggressors in Korea and in the extent to which this calculated contempt has been taken right-heartedly in certain democratic countries.

As trade unionists who cherish freedom and democracy, we are especially disturbed by the decline of efforts to insure the protection of fundamental human rights so vigorously proclaimed as a goal of the U.N. when it was founded in 1945. International relationships and events have not developed as hoped for by the founders of the United Nations.

On the basis of nearly ten years of U.N. experience and, in line with Article 109 of the Charter which provides for its review in 1955, it should be amended with a view of enhancing the role of the United Nations as a force for enduring peace. In this spirit, we recommend that the convention endorse the following amendments to the U.N. Charter. We urge that these proposals be sent to the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee now studying the problems of U.N. Charter review and revision.

No. 1—Clarification of Qualification for U.N. Membership

Since the foundation of the U.N.

there have arisen a number of disputes as to the admission of new states into its membership and in regard to the eligibility of certain governments to be represented in the United Nations. Some countries entitled to membership in the U.N. have been unjustly denied membership. In other instances, frantic efforts have been made to smuggle into the U.N., governments which have no place in the world body dedicated to the preservation of peace and the promotion of human rights. These disputes have served to aggravate international tension. Toward removing this source of world friction through securing clarification to facilitate the admission of countries qualified and toward safeguarding the U.N. against the entrance of governments not entitled to admission, we propose that the U.N. Charter be so revised as to prohibit the admission into the United Nations of any regime which (a) has been imposed on a nation by a foreign power; (b) which exercises effective control of the country by denying its people the fundamental human rights specified in the U.N. Charter and (c) which is engaged in war or has been found guilty of aggression against the United Nations.

No. 2—For World Peace and Human Rights

The paramount purpose of the U.N., the maintenance of world peace, is today gravely threatened by the totalitarian powers. In order to be able to continue, without domestic popular restraint, their policies of aggression and offensive war preparations, these Communist dictatorships have been systematically robbing their own people of their democratic and human rights. Communist police terror and aggression against their own people at home are unmistakably bound up with Communist subversion and aggression, with the Soviet drive of conquest and enslavement against other people abroad.

In view of this organic connection between the threat to human rights and the threat to world peace, we propose that our government should seek to have the U.N. Charter revised so as to provide for the establishment of A Permanent Commission On the Preservation and Promotion of Human Rights. This commission shall be empowered to designate United Nations Human Rights Observation Committees charged with the same rights, powers and duties (investigations, surveillance, reports, etc.) in respect to the threat against and the need for the preservation of fundamental human rights which the present U.N. Peace Observation Commissions now have in regard to meeting and developing measures to thwart the threat against world peace.

No. 3—Promoting Security Through the Pacific Settlement of Disputes

The U.N. Charter should be so amended that the veto shall be abolished in respect to measures adopted for fostering a specific settlement of any particular issue in instances where these disputes between nations have not taken on the character of a military conflict.

In this connection, the Charter should be so amended that no veto could be cast against the carrying out of investigations by U.N. Commissions and their making recommendations for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

In line with the above proposal the U.N. Charter should be so amended as to incorporate the provisions of the Resolution on "Unity For Peace", adopted by the General Assembly in October 1950.

No. 4—U.N.-Supervised Plebiscites for Promoting and Protecting Peace

In view of the acute danger to world peace in various parts of the world as a result of steps taken after the last war (arbitrary partition and multiple occupation of countries, etc.) and in view of the intense international civil war (cold war) now being waged on a global scale, it is most urgent that the U.N. improve its machinery and set up permanent means for relieving world tension emanating from areas under dispute and to settle such disputes through peaceful democratic processes. Toward this end, the Charter should be revised so that it should provide for the holding of U.N. supervised democratic plebiscites in such strife-torn areas in order to insure the constructive and just settlement of such vital issues with serious international implications — through the use of the ballots rather than through the bullets, through peaceful means and not through war.

No. 5—Abolish Discrimination Against Former Enemy Nations

Nearly ten years after the foundation of the U.N. it is no longer just or sound to continue the discriminatory clauses (against former enemy nations) inserted provisionally in Chapter XVII of the U.N. Charter. The Charter should be so amended as to strike out these provisions. We particularly urge that the U.N. Charter be so amended as to abolish the provision permitting the taking of measures against these countries without the authorization of the Security Council. In effect, this provision hurts the authority of the U.N. for it puts these countries at the mercy of the big powers, despite the existence of the United Nations.

No. 6—Permanent Commission on National Freedom

The present Charter of the U.N. declares that "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom" and to prevent and remove "threats to peace" are basic aims of the United Nations Organization.

The U.N. experience to date with various efforts to aid the people of the economically underdeveloped countries to improve their living standards and with the efforts of the colonial peoples to achieve national freedom calls for Revision of the Charter: to provide for the establishment of a Permanent Commission on National Freedom which shall be charged with the task of mobilizing the moral and material resources of the U.N. for the purpose of aiding these peoples, their conditions of life and labor, achieve increasing self-government, and fix a definite time within which their aspirations to national freedom are to be fulfilled in a peaceful manner, in a way which shall not lead to developments that might be exploited by aggressors in the furtherance of their plans for world war and imperialist conquest.

This Commission shall be further charged with the task of reporting to the Security Council annually, or more frequently as the situation may require, about any threats to the maintenance of national freedom—especially threats to countries which have gained their national independence only recently—since such threats are a menace to the maintenance of world peace.

United Nations Economic and Social Council (also see: International) (1948, pp. 83, 487) The Executive Council submitted a comprehensive report on the participation of A. F. of L. Consultants and their success in getting the A. F. of L. item on forced labor before the Agenda Committee of the Council despite the blocking tactics of the World Federation of Trade Unions. The following excerpt is taken from the E.C. Report, and is followed by official convention action on the report on UNESCO.

The most fruitful results of the work of the American Federation of Labor consultants has come from the working out of an International Bill on Human Rights. We were the only non-governmental labor organization that took part in all stages of this work, from the drafting sub-commission through the working groups to the full Human Rights Commission.

The World Federation of Trade Unions took no part whatsoever in this struggle for human rights (which includes trade union rights), obviously avoiding any commitment in the East-West clash that was a constant occurrence in these commissions. The American Federation of Labor alone urged the inclusion in the draft of the demands of organized labor. Results of this contribution are many, especially in the Draft Declaration on Human Rights which came out from the last Commission meeting as a good document. The preamble, upon our instigation, reaffirms faith in the need for the "promotion of social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom."

We also fought successfully for the insertion of the prohibition of slavery and forced labor. Against the opposition of the U.S.S.R. and satellites, the Right of Asylum for Political Refugees, as well as Freedom of Movement (including the right to leave one's own country) were inserted. We also insisted on the inclusion of a special chapter on Economic and Social Rights in the Bill; among them are the right to social security, the right to form and join trade unions, the right to work for just and favorable conditions of work and pay.

It will require continued efforts before this Declaration, and still more, before the planned Convention on Human Rights, will become effective. Great emphasis will then have to be given to the implementation of the Bill.

The U.S.S.R. also opposed the endorsement by the Human Rights Commission of the Draft Convention on Genocide, which makes the mass execution of racial or religious groups a crime, and includes the execution of men for reasons of their political beliefs.

The Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press was prepared by Commission meetings in which the American Federation of Labor had a very active part. Much of this preparatory work was embodied in the three conventions adopted by the majority of Western Countries in that Conference.

Due to the American Federation of Labor initiative, the protection of migrant and immigrant labor was brought before the Council and referred to the International Labor Organization. An international convention may be prepared in the course of the year.

Pending this comprehensive convention, the Social Commission, upon the instigation of the American Federation of Labor, recommended that member governments be guided by the principle of equality of treatment as between native and foreign workers.

Another step taken by the Council was the setting up of the Economic Commission for Latin America. The American Federation of Labor's Latin American Representative participated in the preliminary work on this matter, and it may be expected that the American Federation of Labor, together with its Latin American friends, will enjoy a position of considerable prestige in the work of this body.

With the present tense world situation, and with foreign affairs determining many of our domestic issues, the American Federation of Labor's consultants have responsibility for representing free trade unions in world conferences. They will have to raise the voice of democratic labor in the concert of nations.

(1948, p. 486) We note the recognition and approval of these endeavors in behalf of world labor and mankind. We draw to the attention of the convention the Council Report's emphasis on the fact that:

"... The most fruitful results of the work of the American Federation of Labor consultants has come from the working out of an International Bill of Human Rights. We were the only non-governmental labor organization that took part in all stages of this work, from the drafting sub-commission through the working group to the full Human Rights Commission."

"... With the present tense world situation and with foreign affairs determining many of our domestic issues, the American Federation of Labor's consultants have responsibility for representing free trade unions in world conferences. They will have to raise the voice of democratic labor in the concert of nations."

As a result of its varied and persistent activities, the A. F. of L. has won wide recognition inside and outside the U.N. for the merit of its measures as well as for the quality and continuity of its interest.

It is indispensable that the A. F. of L. consultants continue to make the voice of democratic labor heard in this world parliament of nations and to safeguard with undiminished energy the ideals and needs of unfettered trade unionism throughout the world.

The initiative and constructive contributions developed to date will have to be continued and expanded so that the promises of the Charter of the United Nations will be realized. By helping in the solution of the economic problems, our consultants have been really helping in the establishment of a firm foundation for peace. Toward the ever more effective application of this course, we, therefore, propose the following:

(1) To strive for the extension of the Rights of Category A (non-government) organizations, in which the American Federation of Labor finds itself, so as to enable the A. F. of L. and similar organizations to participate in the work of the sub-committees of the Economic and Social Council.

(2) To urge the United States Government to do what other democratic governments have already done: to include labor advisers (representing the trade union movement in our country) in its official delegations to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations.

(3) To call upon our government for much more active support of the A. F. of L. demand for a thorough-going investigation of the growing danger of forced labor so as to put an end finally to the whole series of postponements of the consideration of this question in the Economic and Social Council.

(4) To foster the closest collaboration with the I.L.O. particularly in surveying and working out practical programs and meeting such issues as the protection of Health and Life of the Worker in Modern Industry.

Worker Representation Urged— (1949, p. 146) The American Federation of Labor has urged that United Nations agencies that have policy-making functions, should provide for representation for those groups directly concerned, and that national delegations in the General Assembly should represent functional citizen groups including Labor as well as the Government. Our representation in the Economic and Social Council should come from Industry, Agriculture, Finance (Labor as well as Management) preferably direct, but at least as technical advisers. Only when these groups participate will international relations rest on practical standards which make acceptance of human rights, human freedom, and human welfare in the production of goods conditions for admission to world markets.

(P. 448) The convention committee report, unanimously adopted, contained the following:

We have thoroughly considered the Executive Council Report section dealing with the active participation and contributions of the A. F. of L. consultants to this highly important committee of the United Nations. We find that your consultants have been energetic and effective in carrying out the policies of the A. F. of L. for human rights, decent labor standards and world peace.

We note particularly the headway the A. F. of L. consultants have made in getting increasing attention to the pernicious menace of slave labor which is spreading eastward and westward from Communist Russia. It was the A. F. of L. that first placed the issue before the U.N. and which finally succeeded in putting a scorching spotlight on this cancerous core of International Communism and its imperialist Russian fatherland.

We recommend that our consultants continue their vigorous efforts to secure the unstinted assistance of all democratic nations in the U.N. for a vigorous struggle against forced labor as an expression of 20th century slavery. In this connection, we draw your attention to and urge the widest circulation of the book published by the Executive Council: "Slavery in Russia—The case presented by the American Federation of Labor before the UN." as a powerful indictment and an arsenal of weapons against the Communist plague.

Your committee recommends that the convention strongly urge our government to drop its hesitation and finally, to come around as it did in the case of our resolution on slave labor, to support the A. F. of L. proposal before the U.N. to ban all fifth column activities by any member nation against another member nation. The tragedy now gripping China as a direct result of the Fifth column activities financed and organized on its territory by another member nation "Russia" should certainly convince even the most hesitant of democratic delegates to the U.N. of the urgency and soundness of our proposal.

In this regard we emphasize that our anti-Fifth column resolution, first presented to the U.N. about a year ago, is fully in accord with Article 22 of the Rights and Duties of the state which declares:

"Every state has the duty to refrain from fomenting civil strife in the territory of another state and the duty to prevent the organization within its territory of activities calculated to foment such strife."

Your committee also takes note of the fact that the scope of U.N. activities in the economic and social field is increasing. New assignments, like the problem of economic assistance to under-developed countries and economic survey mission to the Middle East have been given to the ASOSOC. We, therefore, recommend that our consultants be empowered to take the necessary steps through the appropriate U.N. channels to change the status of the ECOSOC from a commission meeting only twice a year to permanent body like the Trusteeship Council.

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) (also see: Teachers)—(1946, p. 183) The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor in 1943 recommended support for an international organization to effect cooperative work in education and other cultural pursuits in order to promote international understanding and good will. The peace of the world rests upon fulfillment of moral obligations among men and among nations. These obligations must be inherent in the cultural pattern of each nation and all nations together must seek to attain this high moral goal. For this purpose U.N.E.S.C.O. was conceived.

The A. F. of L. was the first large national organization to urge such an agency. The charter was drafted in London, November, 1945. Congress this year considered legislation to authorize participation in the U.N.E.S.C.O.

While strongly endorsing the principle of the charter of organization, the American Federation of Labor did not favor the proposals contained in the Enabling Act through which United States participation in the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization was to be authorized.

The Enabling Act proposed provided that the Department of State should select the persons to serve on the National Commission which was authorized in the Charter to represent the educational, scientific and cultural organizations of this country. The Federation demanded that the voluntary organizations of this country should have the right to select their own spokesmen rather than delegate that right to the State Department. In spite of active opposition from the Division of Cultural Relations of the Department of State, the American Federation of Labor won its point. The Bill as it passed Congress provides that national voluntary organizations have the right to select their own spokesmen to represent them on the National Commission.

The enactment of the Charter itself and the modification in the Enabling Act are a victory for democratic principles.

(P. 616) While the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization is in accord with the 1943 declarations of the American Federation of Labor, the enabling legislation proposed an unsound practice in connection with representation—namely, that the State Department and not the agency represented should select the representative. We succeeded in securing an amendment allowing voluntary organizations to choose their spokesmen.

(P. 622)—In connection with this portion of the Executive Council's report, your Committee calls specific attention to the recent action, September 25th, 1946, of the National Commission on International Education, Scientific and Cultural Cooperation in directly recommending to the American Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference the scrapping of those provisions in our copyright law which protect the job opportunities of some 75,000 American Federation of Labor printing trades workers, without any consultation with or notice to the representatives of those trade unions, is to be deplored.

We recommend that this convention formally advise the U.N.E.S.C.O. that we bitterly protest such recommendation, and renew our demand that these provisions of the Copyright Act, so essential to safeguarding the work opportunities of the Printing Trades Workers, remain intact.

Further, the action of the U.N.E.S.C.O. in by-passing the President of the United States, the officials of the Department of State, and the Congress of the United States, and its ignoring of those trade unions vitally affected by its activities, warrants this convention on insisting that henceforth, if U.N.E.S.C.O. values the support of the A. F. of L., on any contemplated action affecting the interests of the workers, that the representatives of such workers be consulted before definite action is taken.

(1947, p. 563)—The following committee report was unanimously approved by the convention:

Your committee notes the continuing interest in U.N.E.S.C.O. We recognize the tremendous importance of having a full appreciation of the work of U.N.E.S.C.O. developed throughout the country. We urge that the Workers Education Bureau in cooperation with the International Relations Committee of the A. F. of L. engage in a program through which to give to every trade unionist a thorough knowledge of the organization and its program.

Your committee would, however, submit that even though we must continue to support the project and the ideal back of it that we should carefully evaluate the method by which the program is to be administered and that we should call upon the Department of State to scrutinize with the greatest possible care the personnel employed to carry out the program. Your committee would call attention to the fact that the ranking officials in the Division of Information and Culture of the Department of State were severely criticized publicly on the floor of Congress and specific charges were made which, if true, would disqualify these persons from functioning in this work. Such charges undermine public confidence in this work unless refuted.

(1948, p. 97)—In reporting on U.N.E.S.C.O. the Executive Council expressed disappointment in the Organization work up to that time. The report stated in part:

When the first General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization was held in Paris in December 1946, great hope was held out to the peoples of the world that there would be provided through this international agency a means whereby, through their common interests in the non-political areas of education, science, and culture, they could be brought together in mutual understanding to help build the defenses of world peace. This hope is still alive among the people, but it must be frankly stated that it has been somewhat dimmed not only by the unhappy events that have taken place since that time, but by the administrative failures of the U.N.E.S.C.O. itself, and by the infiltration of political purposes in the conduct of its program. . . .

The possibilities of future usefulness of U.N.E.S.C.O. will largely be determined at the third General Conference scheduled for Beirut this fall. There must be a change in the leadership of the organization if it is to avoid becoming a tool of the foes of democracy in the world-wide struggle in which we are engaged. We are informed that steps have been taken to avoid the United States delegation being left in the hapless plight in which its members found themselves when the present Director-General was chosen. We deplore the fact, however, that at this important conference the American Federation of Labor will not be represented on the delegation of the United States and we support President Green wholeheartedly in the protestations he has made to the Department of State with respect to this failure. We feel that it is more than a failure to recognize the interests that our unions have in this field: it represents a failure on the part of the State Department to recognize the nature of the issues that will confront the United States delegation in Beirut.

(P. 448) The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has now completed two years of existence as a full-fledged member of the family of specialized agencies within the United Nations. The worthy purposes of this organization which are to build in the minds of men the defenses of lasting peace through cooperation and mutual endeavor of men through their common interests in the non-political areas of education, science and culture continue to receive the wholehearted endorsement and support of the American Federation of Labor. In the light of the two fateful years in which the program and organization of this agency have developed there now emerge more clearly than ever certain requirements that must be met if these lofty aims are to be fulfilled.

Foremost among these is the undeniable fact that there can be no free intercourse between those nations devoted to preserving the freedom of education, the free development of science and the unhampered expression of their peoples' creative instincts in cultural pursuits and those nations whose educational systems, scientific endeavors and cultural expressions are looked upon as instrumentalities of an all-powerful State to enslave and regiment the minds of men and to mold to their purposes the character of their youth. We call upon those in the Department of State responsible for the formulation of our government's policy in the councils of this international agency to develop a realistic and firm policy in this regard. Such a policy must be explicit in its requirements in connection with the development of program and selection of personnel for this organization.

The program of UNESCO must be devised with a view to more direct participation by the common people. For example, we support the program of international exchange of university professors and students but we urge that the program be enlarged to provide also for exchange of workers union representatives and students and teachers in workers education and vocational training.

The belated decision of the State Department to provide for representation from the A. F. of L. in the U.S. Delegation to the Third General Conference of UNESCO will help in meeting these objectives. . . .

Your Committee notes the continuing public interest in the program of UNESCO here and abroad. The organization and work of the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO is particularly to be commended as it provides for direct representation of voluntary organizations of people devoted to the aims of peace. We call upon the officials of State Federations of Labor and City Central Bodies and of our affiliated national and international unions to cooperate fully with the National Commission in its efforts to bring to the people of our country a positive program and the means of expressing to peoples of other nations our desire to maintain world peace.

We urge the Workers Education Bureau to continue its program in cooperation with the International Relations Committee of the American Federation of Labor to acquaint the members of our affiliated unions with the purposes and program of UNESCO.

(1949, p 152)—The conclusion of the report of the E.C. to the convention on this subject contained the following: "While there remains much to be done to make the UNESCO program meaningful to the working people of this and other nations we are pleased to report that the last year has indicated progress in this direction. We urge the active support for the program and participation in it on the part of all our affiliated unions having an interest in educational, scientific and cultural matters."

(P. 449) The convention unanimously approved the report of its committee which contained the following proposals and recommendations:

... Your Committee recommends approval of this policy. We are glad to report that this policy has, in the past year, been translated into deeds—through active practical participation by our representatives.

The new leadership provided UNESCO in the election of the Director-General, gives it the vision and courage required for its positive role in advancing social reconstruction. This is especially encouraging because of the multiplying attempts of totalitarian Communism and other brands of reaction to enslave the minds as well as the bodies of man. On the basis of the life-long philosophy and practice of the Director-General, we are confident that UNESCO will henceforth be increasingly effective in the fulfillment of its great mission.

Your Committee notes that a Labor Secretariat has been created in UNESCO. We propose that the American Federation of Labor representative to this body secure full clarification of the relations between this Secretariat and other UN agencies—particularly the ILO.

The Executive Council reports that the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO has conducted special labor conferences but no special sessions for agriculture, the consumers, industry, or other social groups. We are not clear as to the why and wherefore of this course, especially since there are only three trade union representatives on a commission of 100. Your Committee calls for greater labor representation on this commission in order to insure an adequate voice for the working people in the formulation of UNESCO policies.

Your Committee notes with interest that the State Department has agreed to have the A. F. of L. designate its own representatives to the Paris Conference of UNESCO. This is in line with our insistence from the very foundation of the UNESCO Commission. We strongly urge that our affiliate, the American Federation of Teachers, as the biggest voluntary, national organization of teachers in the United States, be given much more adequate recognition. Your Committee cannot emphasize too strongly that the effective implementation of the ideals of UNESCO demands a far greater realization of the vital importance of our public schools.

Your Committee also requests that the A. F. of L. seek a clearly defined statement of the specific items of the program of UNESCO and the U.S. National Commission on UNESCO.

In reaffirming our deep interest in promoting the purpose of UNESCO, your Committee recommends that the Executive Council be empowered to take the necessary steps to secure the support of the State Department for the proposals herein indicated.

(1950, p. 120)—There is now evidence that this agency of the United Nations is coming to accept the hard facts of a divided world. UNESCO was organized to implement the ideal utilization of the forces of education, science and culture to bring together the peoples of the world in common understanding and thus make world peace secure. Its leaders and those who represent the member nations in its policy-making General Conference are reluctantly coming to accept the fact that in the present world these very forces which could provide the foundations of a lasting peace are being harnessed to instruments of ideological warfare. Totalitarian forces are using the agencies and facilities of education, science and culture not to build the peace but to carry on their aims of world-wide aggression.

Any unwillingness on the part of the representatives of the member nations to accept these stern realities was in large degree overcome by the actions of the member nations from the other side of the Iron Curtain at the Fifth General Conference of UNESCO held in Florence, Italy, during May and June, 1950. Poland failed to send a delegation. The delegations of Czechoslovakia and Hungary left the Conference when Nationalist China representatives were seated in an early session over their protest. Yugoslavia alone abstained on the resolution approved by the 59 members, expressing their conviction that the 1951 program constitutes a "more direct and important contribution to the cause of peace than the programs of previous years."

The program adopted at the General Conference in Florence reflects the growing conviction that the approaches to the minds of men made through education, science, and culture must not be surrendered to the totalitarian forces. These approaches must be used not only to bind together those nations which still believe in freedom of the mind and freedom of the arts but also to equip the peoples of those nations better to meet the obligations required of citizens in democratic governments.

The following 10-point program as finally approved by the Conference at Florence was proposed by the U. S. Delegation.

1. To eliminate illiteracy and encourage fundamental education.
2. To obtain for each person an education conforming to his aptitudes and to the needs of society, including technological training and higher education.
3. To advance human rights throughout all nations.
4. To remove the obstacles to the free flow of persons, ideas and knowledge among the countries of the world.
5. To promote the progress and applications of science for all mankind.
6. To remove the causes of tensions that may lead to wars.
7. To demonstrate world cultural interdependence.
8. To advance through the press, radio and motion pictures the causes of truth, freedom and peace.

9. To bring about better understanding among the peoples of the world and to convince them of the necessity of cooperating loyally with one another in the framework of the United Nations.

10. To render clearing house and exchange services, in all its fields of action, together with services in reconstruction and relief assistance.

The American Federation of Labor finds this program consistent with its objectives in the field of international cooperation. The implementation of each one of the points adopted needs to be worked out carefully in order to maintain consistency between the declared aims and the actual program.

The 10-point program is a most ambitious one to be undertaken within the limited means of UNESCO. The most this organization can hope to do is to stimulate activity within the member nations to carry it out.

There was one action taken by the 1950 General Conference which should not have been taken at least until such time as its possible effects upon labor standards relating to production of the items in question had been given more careful study. This was the approval of an international agreement which would remove customs duties on books, scientific research instruments, music, works of art and similar materials. The decision to put this item on the agenda of the General Conference was made at such late date that proper consultation with representatives of the industries and the trade unions which might be affected was not possible.

When first notified of the decision, the A. F. of L. stated its objection to the action being taken at this session of the General Conference. It may well be that no adverse effect on labor standards in these fields will result but it is our opinion that the action should not have been taken until this was determined to be the case.

We note with approval that provision has been made within the Secretariat for a more active representation of the interests of trade unions. A program for the exchange of persons also makes provision for participation on the part of wage earners in the member nations.

(P. 505)—In reiterating our keen interest in the work of UNESCO we stress the urgency for the improvement of its functioning.

We cannot emphasize too strongly that in order to secure the full and effective participation and cooperation of vital forces like organized labor, it is imperative that we be adequately apprised in advance of all conference agenda. Moreover to lend life to the primary aim of the commission, it is most urgent that it serve as a powerful means of enlightening the people of the world about the basic aims, aspirations, and actions of the UN. A splendid opportunity is at hand for UNESCO in the present world crisis aggravated by Soviet imperialist aggression against the Republic of Korea and the UN to counteract the misrepresentation of the position and policies of the UN in this conflict.

In the Far East it is especially urgent for the UNESCO to bring to the peoples of Asia a true and full understanding on the historic role of the UN in rallying freedom-loving mankind against aggression and war.

In the competent and timely discharge of such vital functions the UNESCO can render invaluable service to the enhancement of world understanding, cultural cooperation, unity and peace.

(1951, p. 85)—As indicated in our report of a year past, UNESCO was organized to implement the forces of education, science and culture, and bring into common understanding the peoples of the world in the hope of making for world peace. It was designed primarily to further the conviction that in the present world the forces that can provide the foundations of a lasting peace are being harnessed to instruments of ideological warfare. It is most unfortunate that totalitarian forces are using the agencies and facilities of education, science and culture to further their aim of world-wide aggression and domination and not to advance the principles and benefits of peace.

We find ourselves in complete accord with these objectives of UNESCO and the measures of implementation adopted and designed to carry out these declared aims and objectives.

We, however, direct attention to the fact that in the 1950 General Conference an action was taken contrary to the principles and ideals of the structure and founding of UNESCO and which, if carried to success, would have infringed upon the right of our government to deal with problems of custom duties on books, scientific research instruments, music, works of art and similar objects as they affect our economic, industrial and social well-being. Protest was made on behalf of the printing trades to the Department of State to this proposal on the grounds that this method of dealing with matters of tariff and copyright legislation by removing printed matter from the limitations imposed by our laws was a circumvention of our constitutional processes and that the agreement involving these questions had been drawn up without proper hearings and consultations and quite out of the purview assigned to UNESCO.

As a consequence, the State Department until now has withheld submission of the agreement to the Senate, but the subject is still under consideration. It is to be hoped that the State Department, as well as UN-ESCO will fully observe the original intent and purpose of the founding of UNESCO and thus preserve an organization of the U.N. well designed to render an invaluable service in the cold war now in progress throughout the world for the control of the minds of peoples everywhere.

In these undertakings we will want to render every possible service, but will be equally watchful that no measures are adopted that may infringe upon our constitutional safeguards and economic well-being.

(P. 470)—Never before in world history was there greater need for better understanding and closer cooperation among free nations and the peoples of the world. UNESCO has already rendered great service, even with its limited facilities, in furthering better international understanding.

The programs of UNESCO, intended to lessen tension, are of primary importance at this time when Communist propaganda is used to increase such tensions and destroy the faith that free nations have in one another.

In the field of Fundamental Education also, UNESCO is pioneering with significantly splendid results. This work merits the encouragement of our people and our nation.

Your committee would, however, again recommend that the programs of each of the Special Agencies of UN be more exactly defined in principle and scope and in practice; especially so when, for example, both UNESCO and the I.L.O. are working in the same field.

Your committee would also further point to the questions raised in the Executive Council's Report in regard to the Florence Agreement of 1950. The Department of State has now formally notified us that this agreement dealing with the importation of audio-visual education, scientific and cultural materials "has no implications with reference to the manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act or any other copyright provisions or copyright relations between the governments which become parties to the agreement. It covers only a small highly restricted list of audio-visual materials, principally educational films." The Department, however, then frankly and honestly states: "The Florence Agreement, on the other hand, must remove customs duties from broad categories of educational materials, including books."

Referring to our position, the Department forthrightly states, "There has been some apprehension in the A. F. of L., particularly among the allied printing trades, that if this agreement were to come into force, and if the Manufacturing Clause of the Copyright Act were removed, there would be no protection against importation of foreign made books."

Presenting the many aspects of this highly complex problem, the Department frankly states its official position in support of repeal of the "Manufacturing Clause" in regard to the importation of printed matter, and frankly explains the reason for its position.

However, we are very happy to report that in a splendid spirit of co-operation the Department has officially informed our recognized spokesmen that "Pending full study of the implications of the Agreement, the Department has neither signed nor submitted this Agreement for ratification."

Your committee recommends that this convention commend the proper leaders in the Department for their desire to give full study to this complicated question; and further recommends that a special qualified committee be appointed which would confer with the proper leaders in the Department of State, on this subject, and seek to evolve a program which would best protect the interests of our members in the printing trades, and at the same time help further the high ideals and purposes of UNESCO to which we pledge our hearty support; and that pending the outcome of such conference we call upon the Department of State to take no further action on the pending proposals of interest to the workers in the printing trades.

(1952, p. 148) The Executive Council in its annual report included a section on the activities during the preceding year of UNESCO. The following excerpts were included:

Since UNESCO was established, we have actively supported its ideals and objectives. We have cooperated heartily to help implement the programs through which the achievements of all peoples in education, science and culture might be utilized to further peace and good will among all men and all nations.

However, we have not always found it possible to accept the methods which have been used for implementing the objectives of UNESCO to which we subscribe. . . .

We have watched with great interest the development of the Fundamental Education Program. Through this program we hope there will come to countries, not yet enjoying modern development, an appreciation of the use to which knowledge may be put to enrich the lives of all the people. However, this knowledge, which would probably affect greatly the lives of these people, must in itself be an expression of each people's traditional cultural pattern.

We believe that fundamental education must be education and training for a way of life—a way which recognizes spiritual, moral and aesthetic values as well as the more material gains which such training may produce. . . .

We are in hearty accord with the efforts of UNESCO to assist every nation desiring assistance in establishing and extending free public education. However, we insist that at no time should any pattern of formal education be implanted on a nation or imposed on its people—each nation must itself be free to determine its own methods of furthering the education of its people in keeping with its own social objectives. . . .

We recommend continued and active support of UNESCO and full participation in the UNESCO activities which would further its objectives.

(P. 548) We further propose that American participation in UNESCO be directed toward having it function much more dynamically and consistently in propagating and promoting the ideas of the U.N. charter. Such UNESCO educational work should be stepped up regardless of any opposition it may incur on the part of U.N. member governments that are totalitarian in character.

In further comment on the proposed treaty affecting copyright provisions, we would emphasize a fundamental principle of the A. F. of L. that no group of workers should profit at the expense of any other group. Hence while we shall continue to protect the copyright of all creative workers in the liberal and the fine arts we shall also protect the production rights of the workers in the graphic arts.

Further, while we shall insist on protection of the basic right of the free flow of ideas from land to land, we shall not accept the destruction of labor production standards in our country by allowing goods produced by cheap labor to be imported into our country and thereby destroy the worker standards of our printing trades. The free flow of ideas is not synonymous with the free competition of goods produced by cheap labor and by labor living under American standards.

We shall support a copyright treaty only if and when such treaty does not include a provision for destroying American wage standards.

(1953, p. 319) The programs of UNESCO which interest us are the Workers Education Programs, noted elsewhere in this report; the significant work of the educational missions to countries having less developed educational systems; and the establishing of the first public library in India. These programs are educationally and socially sound and should help in the development of appreciation for democratic ideals and practices.

Apart from any just criticism, there have been ill-informed, as well as malicious, attacks on personnel and on materials involved in these programs. We believe that while a careful and critical evaluation of both personnel and material is essential to the purpose and life of the program, the method used in making such an evaluation should in itself be sound.

Education is the key to the human mind. It must not fall into the hands of those who would use the much needed educational aids to subvert loyalties and distort facts. Personnel connected with UNESCO projects must be selected with utmost care. We urge most careful clearance for all persons in any way connected with UNESCO work in our government and also for all those serving on the the UNESCO Commission and on any panel or committee established by UNESCO.

(P. 542) . . . the Executive Council discusses the work of UNESCO and states that many of the attacks on UNESCO have been malicious and based on false information. The Council recommends, however, that UNESCO personnel should be carefully screened and selected with utmost care.

The attention of the Committee was called to the fact that the American Federation of Labor was one of the first groups in the United States to advocate some kind of international educational organization. The A. F. of L. was the first organization to recommend that such a program of international education include a program of adult education and workers education. UNESCO, although not a perfect organization, is the only existing international educational program which carries out, at least in part, the recommendations of the A. F. of L. in this field of education.

(1954, p. 327) We reaffirm our support of the ideals of UNESCO. We must, however, also again call attention to the need for changing the machinery of the United States National Commission on UNESCO and certain administrative practices of the commission. At present, the Executive Committee appoints the Nominating Committee which in turn nominates the Executive Committee. Labor must fight this undemocratic procedure and if necessary have the statute creating the UNESCO National Commission amended to modify such practices as the one referred to above. Other similar deviations from democratic procedure and even departures from the law itself which have seriously injured the operation of the program should, in the interest of the program, be discontinued.

(P. 562) The convention committee submitted recommendations on this subject which were unanimously approved as follows:

Your committee would emphasize the importance of these sections of the Executive Council's Report, recommending continued support and urging improved administration of programs, relating to international educational activities, through UNESCO and other governmental agencies. It calls particular attention to the Executive Council's recommendation that labor representatives on boards directing the policy of international exchange programs should be increased. It would urge that all affiliates actively concern themselves with programs involving the interchange of students and workers for travel, study, and work experience in this country and abroad on both a short and long term basis.

We would also urge that all affiliates place particular stress on an increased understanding of the history, purposes and programs of the ILO and ICFTU and our relations as trade unionists to them.

U.S. Steel Corporation and National Erectors' Association—(1928, p. 293)

The anti-union attitude of the U.S. Steel Corporation and the National Erectors' Association is well known. The International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, whose members are engaged in the work of handling and erecting structural iron and steel, are constantly subjected to the unfair tactics of these two powerful antagonists. Not only are efforts constantly being made to destroy the union by seeking to prevent the members from obtaining employment unless they surrender their memberships, but contractors employing union men are frequently hampered in securing the necessary materials and supplies. In other words, the union and contractors which employ the members of the union, are frequently subjected to a boycott by firms which loudly proclaim that they are against all boycotts. Every effort should be made to make this fact known to the public.

The International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers is entitled to and should receive the earnest and wholehearted support of the entire trade union movement in its efforts to expose the nefarious practices which are now prevalent in the industry. The International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers is also entitled to and should receive the hearty support of all trade unionists in the effort which that organization is making to extend union conditions throughout the industry. The great and powerful steel corporation gives its support to the National Erectors' Association in the fight against the International Assn. of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers and that organization therefore must be aided and encouraged by the affiliated national and international unions of every craft in order that it may survive and make progress against the onslaught of its enemies, who are also the enemies of all other trade unionists.

Included among the unfair tactics used against the union are not only the practices of attempting to prevent its members from obtaining employment, and preventing union employers from obtaining contracts and materials, but injunctions and other means of litigation are resorted to in order to harass the union and its members. It is a matter in which all unions affiliated with the A. F. of L., and, indeed, all liberty loving citizens must be vitally interested. The International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers will continue to remain firm in its stand for justice and a square deal to all concerned.

Unity (Labor) (C.I.O.) (also see: United Mine Workers)—(1939, p. 75) A detailed report of all efforts which had been made to bring about a settlement of the conflict in the ranks of organized labor in the United States through the formation and functioning of the C.I.O., was submitted to the convention. The E.C. report included all official correspondence which had passed between the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O.; official statements issued by the C.I.O.; correspondence which passed between the President of the United States and the chairman of the C.I.O. In an attempt to set up an effective peace committee to iron out differences between the two labor federations; the proposal which was submitted by the head of the C.I.O. as a condition under which his group would agree to a peaceful adjustment of the differences; the statement issued by the Peace Committee of the A. F. of L., and other important policy-making statements, etc. Attempts at unity with the C.I.O. were preemptorily ended by the chairman of the C.I.O., excerpts from which follow:

The Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations held its regular bi-annual Board Meeting in Washington, D. C., June 13, 1939. At this meeting reports were had from the various affiliated national and international unions of the C.I.O. and its executive officers on the state of our union.

Among the many problems discussed at length was the question of unity and it has been clearly demonstrated that peace with the A. F. of L. is impossible, except upon their terms and conditions. This would mean the stripping of many of our new unions and the abandonment of organizing the unorganized in industrial unions. This, the C.I.O. will not do. We must go forward! We must expand our movement! By doing so, we will build an instrumentality that will be most effective in guaranteeing peace in the labor movement.

The following statement was prepared in answer to the challenge of the chairman of the C.I.O.:

"The statement issued by Mr. Lewis, ostensibly in the name of the executive board of the C.I.O., blasting all hope of peace and unity in the labor movement, came as a shock to all who had hoped that the negotiations initiated by President Roosevelt would lead to a positive conclusion.

"Mr. Lewis's statement, marking an abrupt termination of the negotiations, was discourteous to the President in that the Chief Executive had requested the representatives of both the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. under no circumstances to terminate negotiations without first consulting with him. Mr. Lewis's action is, however, in keeping with his conduct in this situation on previous occasions.

"Negotiations between our committees had not collapsed. At the request of President Lewis, addressed to me during his recent bituminous negotiations, when he was pressed for time in the emergency then confronting the United Mine Workers, it was unanimously agreed to recess our negotiations until such time as Mr. Lewis was ready to resume the discussion. We had every reason to believe that the negotiations would be resumed. Mr. Lewis has now seen fit to terminate them without cause.

"This is the second time he has deliberately wrecked efforts to restore peace in the family of Labor. The first occasion was in December, 1937, when committees representing the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. had reached a unanimous agreement, which was vetoed at the last moment by Mr. Lewis. At that time, too, efforts were made to becloud the issue and misrepresent the agreement that had been reached. Nevertheless, subsequent events had demonstrated that an agreement had actually been reached.

"Mr. Lewis now repeats his performance of December, 1937. In blasting the present negotiations he has swept aside the issues upon which the C.I.O. has supposedly been waging its battle with the A. F. of L. and reveals that these issues were widely fictitious.

"Concealing the very substantial concessions made by our committees on questions of jurisdiction and so-called craft versus industrial unionism, and other problems raised during the discussions of the past three years and more, Mr. Lewis now falls back upon statements that have no basis in fact and upon irrelevancies.

"He seeks again to sow confusion by attacking the leaders of the A. F. of L. who enjoy the confidence of the millions of its members.

"As to who is pursuing a rule-or-ruin policy, is only too clear from Mr. Lewis' conduct. Mr. Lewis now says that it is to be a 'fight to a finish.' This certainly will be a grievous disappointment to the millions of workers in both the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. who have been hoping and praying for peace. It will certainly be a disappointment to the general public of progressive and socially minded citizens.

"Mr. Lewis now says that peace is 'secondary' to him, that the primary purpose of the C.I.O. is the organization of the unorganized and the building of what he terms a progressive labor movement. Without arguing about the definition of 'progressive,' it may be asked how the interests of the labor movement can possibly be conserved and promoted without peace and unity.

"Peace and unity in the labor movement remains the issue. The workers in the American Federation of Labor will now see more clearly than ever who has made attainment of this objective impossible. The workers in the C.I.O. will now, likewise, perceive the truth, and unable to obtain peace and unity through the C.I.O., will turn to the American Federation of Labor, under whose roof they will find what they want."

The Executive Council report on this subject concluded with the following:

Thus, the Executive Council submits in chronological order the developments which took place in the relationship of the American Federation of Labor to the dual, rebel C.I.O. movement, and in all the efforts which have been put forth to conclude a peace with the C.I.O. which would provide for a return of the C.I.O. organizations to the American Federation of Labor. The facts set forth in this report are supported by the records which have been made. We must leave to the honest, sincere and calm determination of the membership of the American Federation of Labor and of working men and women of the nation, the question as to who is responsible for the origination of the division within the ranks of Labor and for its continuation in a most aggravated and destructive form.

Our committee still stands, clothed with authority to function, ready to resume negotiations when it is accorded an opportunity to do so. We have opened the door of the American Federation of Labor wide and completely. We have invited those who left the American Federation of Labor to return; we have urged them to come back home and settle differences within the family of Labor in a sensible, honest and fair way. In doing this we have been inspired by a genuine desire to establish here in America a solid, united, labor movement through which the economic, social and industrial interests of the workers of the nation can be fully and completely served.

(P. 401) The Committee on Resolutions, which considered the subject of unity proposals between the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. as related in the E.C. Report, made the following report to the convention, and received unanimous approval thereof:

Your committee has had before it for consideration the letter addressed to this convention by the President of the United States, in which he urged the American Federation of Labor to again meet with representatives of the C.I.O. for the purpose of endeavoring to bring unity in the American trade union movement.

We also have the reply made to that communication by the President of the American Federation of Labor.

It was impossible for your committee to consider these two important communications without keeping in mind the detailed and historic record covering the efforts of the American Federation of Labor from the beginning to bring unity into effect.

The record presented to this convention by the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. is exhaustive. It is a record of the facts, a record which indicates that from the time the C.I.O. was organized, continuous efforts were made by the American Federation of Labor to heal the breach.

The record indicates that before the President of the United States took official notice of the breach, a conference was held between duly appointed representatives of both organizations, and that the conference referred to was able to reach an agreement as to the principles involved in establishing unity, and the methods by which those principles would be applied.

The record further indicates that after the representatives of the C.I.O. had agreed on these principles and methods, that they were vetoed by the chairman of the C.I.O., his action, in substance, being a repudiation of what his own representatives had agreed to.

The President of the United States appealed to the Houston Convention last year to take immediate steps to heal the breach which existed, a similar communication being sent to the representatives of the C.I.O.

The convention by a unanimous vote complied with the President's request.

Although the American Federation of Labor placed itself publicly on record as favoring a conference with the representatives of the C.I.O., the response from that organization was the immediate calling of a conference in Pittsburgh, Pa., for the purpose of setting up a permanent established C.I.O. movement.

On February 23, 1939, the President of the United States addressed a letter to the President of the American Federation of Labor and the Chairman of the C.I.O., calling attention to the necessity for unity in the American trade union movement, and urging that peace conferences between the two organizations be resumed.

As a result duly appointed representatives of both organizations did meet, their conferences adjourning so that the Chairman of the C.I.O. could give his attention to negotiations between the United Mine Workers of America and the coal operators.

Conferences were postponed upon the request of the Chairman of the C.I.O., and with the definite understanding that they would be resumed, and that he would notify the representatives of the A. F. of L. immediately it would become possible for him to take part.

Although the committee of the A. F. of L. has held itself in readiness, it has failed to receive any further information as to when the conferences would take place.

On the other hand, public announcement was made in the interim by the Chairman of the C.I.O. that peace as such was secondary to the objectives of that organization.

Shortly after, in a communication addressed to officials of the C.I.O., reporting on the meeting of its Executive Board, he wrote:

Among many problems discussed at length was the question of unity, and it has been clearly demonstrated that peace within the A. F. of L. is impossible except upon their terms and conditions. This would mean the stripping of many of our new unions and the abandonment of organizing the unorganized in industrial unions. This the C.I.O. will not do.

This communication was shortly followed by another public statement announcing the determination of the C.I.O. to invade the jurisdiction of the building trades, thus clearly indicating that instead of considering peace negotiations, the C.I.O. was arbitrarily preparing for an intensified campaign of antagonism.

In full appreciation of the President's efforts to be helpful in bringing unity within the American trade union movement, and appreciative of the efforts which he has made, we submit that the record from the time the C.I.O. was organized contains continuous efforts on the part of the American Federation of Labor to make unity a fact, that all of these efforts have been thwarted by the Chairman of the C.I.O.

We recognize that under the unhappy condition created by the division in the ranks of Labor, it was appropriate that the President of the United States should address a similar appeal to both organizations.

Your committee calls attention to the fact that further appeals would be more fittingly directed to the C.I.O., for from the inception of the C.I.O. the American Federation of Labor has been ready and most willing to confer with representatives of the C.I.O. so that unity could be established, and your committee is of the conviction that this will continue to be the policy of the American Federation of Labor.

Your committee read with approval President Green's reply to the President of the United States, and recommends that this communication receive the approval of the convention.

(P. 409) Upon that portion of the Executive Council's Report, C.I.O. and Peace Negotiations, your committee approves of the thoroughgoing, carefully prepared statement of our relations with the C.I.O. and of the continuous efforts of the Executive Council to reestablish unity.

Your committee, realizing the widespread misinformation which exists relative to the actions of the American Federation of Labor, and the necessity that our own membership, that of other labor organizations, and the public as well, should be given a complete record, recommend that the Executive Council have prepared in pamphlet form a history of the position taken by the American Federation of Labor from the time when the C.I.O. was first conceived and organized.

Your committee expresses its confidence in the membership of the committee appointed by President Green to continue negotiations with representatives of the C.I.O.

Your committee furthermore recommends that the present committee of the American Federation of Labor be continued, and that it hold itself in readiness to meet with representatives of the C.I.O. whenever that organization will indicate a willingness to resume conferences.

Your committee, feeling that the Executive Council has prepared a most important document in its report, recommends the adoption of the report by this convention.

(1940, pp. 312, 314) In a letter addressed to the 1940 Convention, President Roosevelt requested full support of Labor in government's defense program, and very frankly called for a united labor movement. In a telegram sent in reply, the full support of the A. F. of L. was pledged in the defense effort. Responding to the part of the President's message dealing with a united labor movement, the following statement was made:

"We deeply appreciate the suggestion you make that 'an unselfish, a far-sighted and a patriotic effort be made to bring about a just and honorable peace with the now divided labor movement.' Fortunately we can officially make answer to your suggestion in a most definite and sincere way. The Executive Council included in its report to the 60th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor the following recommendation: 'The Executive Council fully understands the need of unity and solidarity within the ranks of Labor. It entertains a full and deep appreciation, as well as a complete understanding of the value of united action and of the mobilization of the full strength, power and influence of the workers of the nation into one united American labor movement. The Executive Council is firmly of the opinion that Labor in America can be solidified and united through affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. In order to accomplish this purpose and realize this objective, the Executive Council reports to the 60th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor that it has endeavored to reestablish unity within the labor movement through conferences with representatives of the C.I.O. and has endeavored to bring about a settlement of existing differences during the past year. The committee representing the American Federation of Labor stands ready and willing to meet with a committee representing the C.I.O. for the purpose of negotiating a settlement, anywhere, any time, any place.'

"Your suggestion, therefore, that when men of honor and good intentions sit down together they can work out a solution which will restore the much needed harmony either by unity or by a sensible working arrangement is coincidental with this recommendation of the Executive Council to the convention now in session.

"I am confident the convention will concur in the recommendations of the Executive Council by officially authorizing the committee representing the American Federation of Labor to meet with a committee representing the C.I.O. around the conference table for the purpose of negotiating an honorable peace and the reestablishment of unity and solidarity within the ranks of Labor.

"I repeat, Mr. President, that these assurances will be carried out in good faith and with all sincerity whenever opportunity for the American Federation of Labor to do so presents itself."

(Pp. 11, 59-63, 554) Need for united labor movement reflected in keynote address of President of A. F. of L., which said in part:

"Now I want to discuss another question in which we are deeply interested. I refer to the necessity for unity and solidarity within the ranks of Labor. All of us deeply appreciate its value and its importance. We know that if we have one asset that is more valuable than another it is unity and solidarity within the ranks of Labor. We are not responsible for the division that was created. We disavow responsibility for it, because we maintain that any differences over policy or administration arising within the ranks of Labor can be settled at a convention of the American Federation of Labor by a majority vote, and we maintain that when the majority registers its will after mature deliberations upon any question presented, it becomes the duty and the obligation of every member who participates in the convention to abide by the will of the majority. That is the democratic principle upon which we stand."

A. F. of L. accepted invitation of President of U.S. to confer with C.I.O. committee in effort to iron out differences. Invitation was not accepted by C.I.O. and President of A. F. of L. reported to 1940 Convention of failure of Presidential efforts as follows:

"We have tried, my friends, to heal the breach within the ranks of Labor ever since the rebel, rival movement was formulated in 1935. We responded to every request made by the President of the United States to meet with the representatives of the rebel group for the purpose of trying to work out an agreement. Our committee, made up of distinguished members of the American Federation of Labor, has waited patiently for an opportunity to sit around the conference table with the representatives of the C.I.O. for the purpose of working out an agreement. For more than one solid year they have been waiting, waiting patiently, and the reason they have not met with the committee representing the other side is because the leader of the rebel movement refused to allow a committee representing the rebel movement to sit down with the American Federation of Labor committee. There is the story.

"The President of the United States has served in every possible way. He has endeavored to bring the groups together, and he believes that the only way to settle our differences is by representatives of the two groups sitting around the conference table, dealing with the differences in a definite, concrete way, men of good faith willing to sit around the conference table and in the American way, and in accordance with American fashion, find a solution of our differences."

(P. 12) Plan for unity between A. F. of L. and C.I.O. outlined by President of A. F. of L. in keynote address in which he said:

"We will meet and we will endeavor to settle our differences in an honorable way. And may I outline to you a constructive plan which I believe can be applied. First of all, let the committees meet, honorable men meeting in good faith and in all sincerity. Let them agree that the original unions that left us shall be admitted and occupy the positions they held with us when they left, adjusting such difficulties as may have arisen since they left us in 1935. Then let them stand by while the committees representing conflicting groups, those representing clashing unions in the American Federation of Labor covering jurisdiction in a field that is now claimed by unions chartered by the C.I.O., agree upon a plan of amalgamation, a plan of merger, the blending of these groups into one union, so that we will have in the House of Labor a fair degree of peace and tranquility. Let these committees work diligently until they have accomplished their purpose, and then if there is some collateral question that cannot be settled, let some tribunal be set up by mutual agreement to which these collateral questions might be submitted for final decision, the basis of it all to be a complete understanding that the jurisdictional rights of the American Federation of Labor unions shall be protected and preserved.

"The President of the United States is willing to help us and assist us, and he has asked, if these committees can be assembled and put to work, that they meet with him first of all and explore the situation with him at the White House in Washington, there to receive his assurances and good will and cooperation. And it appears to me the moral strength of such a beginning would naturally reflect itself all through the honest and sincere negotiations.

"There, in a simple way, I have outlined the plan that the committee representing the American Federation of Labor presented before. It is not new. An agreement was worked out on the basis of that plan by committees representing both sides, and the Chairman of the C.I.O. repudiated the agreement after it had been reached. I cannot say more, because the convention itself will have the report of the Executive Council on this dispute that arose within the ranks of organized labor. There is one great reason why we should have unity in the ranks of organized labor, particularly because through unity and solidarity we can advance a constructive legislative program best of all. Do you recall how the American Federation of Labor secured the enactment of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act? Labor was united then and it was the unity of Labor brought to bear upon the members of Congress that enabled us to secure the enactment of these progressive measures. It was the American Federation of Labor that sponsored these measures and included in it the National Labor Relations Act as well. There was no C.I.O. in existence when these measures were introduced and enacted by the Congress of the United States. We proudly claim full credit for the enactment of these measures to which I have referred, and every man connected with the American Federation of Labor knows the importance and value of this legislation. Now when we go before Congress we find the efforts of the American Federation of Labor counteracted by the dual groups. If we are for it, they are against it, and a Congressman seeking a way out of the difficulty follows the way of least resistance and declines to do anything. As a result, our legislative program is hampered very badly because of this disunity within the ranks of Labor."

(Pp. 59-63, 554) Detailed report submitted on efforts made during preceding year toward negotiations with C.I.O. providing for united labor movement. Negative attitude of C.I.O. officers deplored in detailed report on attempts made to adjust controversy. Committee of A. F. of L. continued to meet on call with C.I.O. if opportunity is provided for such meeting:

The Executive Council fully understands the need of unity and solidarity within the ranks of Labor. It entertains a full and deep appreciation, as well as a complete understanding of the value of united action and of the mobilization of the full strength, power and influence of the workers of the nation into one united American labor movement. The Executive Council is firmly of the opinion that Labor in America can be solidified and united through affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. In order to accomplish this purpose and realize this objective, the Executive Council reports to the 60th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor that it has endeavored to reestablish unity within the labor movement through conferences with representatives of the C.I.O. and has endeavored to bring about a settlement of existing differences during the past year.

The committee representing the American Federation of Labor stands ready and willing to meet with a committee representing the C.I.O. for the purpose of negotiating a settlement, anywhere, any time, any place.

In connection with the subject of peace negotiations, attention must be called to the large number of wage earners who are still unorganized and unable to advance their wages and improve their conditions of employment. Regardless of the trend taken by peace negotiations, it is mandatory that the American Federation of Labor make use of all of its agencies so that trade unionism may be brought to the assistance of those who are at present unorganized. This is a duty and a responsibility which we cannot and must not evade.

(1941, pp. 59, 60, 627) The report of the E.C. contained the following:

The record made by the American Federation of Labor ever since the C.I.O. was formed clearly shows that all efforts possible have been put forth on the part of the American Federation of Labor to create unity, establish solidarity, and promote harmony within the ranks of Labor. We have responded to every appeal made by the President of the United States to meet in conference with representatives of the C.I.O. for the purpose of negotiating a settlement. Our peace committee representing the American Federation of Labor is a standing committee, awaiting an opportunity to meet and negotiate a settlement.

We have repeatedly warned the workers of the destructive results which will inevitably follow from a continuation of the division that exists within the ranks of Labor. The Executive Council reaffirms its position in favor of peace negotiations designed to bring about a settlement of the differences which exist within the ranks of Labor. The responsibility for failure to meet and renew negotiations for the purpose of reaching a settlement rests squarely and definitely with the leaders of the rebel, rival, dual, C.I.O. movement.

Resolutions presented to the convention calling for labor unity were approved.

(1942, p. 10) In his keynote address to the convention, the President of the A. F. of L. made the following report on the rival C.I.O. organization:

"I want to refer just a moment to the situation that has arisen on our continent within the ranks of Labor. It is unnecessary for me to dwell upon it in detail, because you know about it, but the American Federation of Labor is the parent body. It was formed more than three quarters of a century ago. It rests upon a sound and secure foundation. The economic philosophy which it expounded and initiated has proved to be sound and adaptable to the needs of the free people of the United States and Canada. We have maintained a fraternal relationship with our friends across the sea, an unbroken and fraternal relationship during this entire three quarters of a century. Each year we exchange delegates, splendid fraternal delegates, coming from Great Britain to the United States, who bring us a message from the workers of that great democracy, Great Britain. We in turn have sent representatives from the American Federation of Labor to carry greetings and fraternal assurances to the workers of Great Britain. In the same manner we have maintained a friendly, sound, solid, fraternal and economic relationship between the workers of Canada and the United States. We do not know or recognize any dividing line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America. We are truly members of a great fraternal brotherhood, and we have endeavored to cultivate that friendship. I think it is fortunate indeed in that we have been permitted to function in that way for so many years upon the American Continent.

"But for some reason or other a group within our movement decided to leave us, walk out of the House of Labor and establish their own independent dual movement. We have regarded them as a part of us ever since they left. We do not entertain enmity, ill will or hatred toward them. Instead, the hand of welcome has been presented to them continuously ever since they left the House of Labor in 1935. Some of them have come back.

We welcomed them home. They were accorded a place within the House of Labor and there they have lived and dwelt with us in harmony and in a beautiful relationship. Perhaps others will come. It is reported that there are some, one or perhaps two distinct units of the dual movement that have about reached the point where they will come back again to the front door of the House of Labor and ask us for the privilege of coming back home. The chances are that some interesting developments may take place in that direction.

"It is my opinion that the definite policy pursued by the American Federation of Labor toward those who erred and who left us will be followed, but in addition to that we have sought through peace negotiations to settle the division which exists within the family of Labor and within the ranks of Labor. We maintain the chief asset of Labor is its economic strength. Rob Labor of that and it is poor indeed, completely stripped. Magnify, strengthen and develop it to its maximum strength and it is powerful beyond comprehension. It has never been the purpose of Labor to use that economic strength unwisely. It has been the fixed policy of the American Federation of Labor to use it for the purpose of lifting the standard of life and living among working men to high and still higher levels, to make citizens of a democracy the kind of men and women who are not slaves, but who will develop democracy by creating decent conditions under which to live and work. If we mobilize the strength of millions and millions we are more powerful. If we are split into fighting camps we are weakened. The interests of the worker who serves in the mill and the factory call for unity within the ranks of Labor both in the United States and Canada.

"You delegates sitting in this convention as representatives of a great constituency cannot disregard or ignore the rights and needs of the one who digs in the trenches, or who serves in the mill, the factory and the mines of our nation. Their interests must be upheld up here, high, and we must respect them and endeavor to protect them. So we have appealed to those who have left us to come back home, to sit around the conference table and work out a settlement of our differences.

"The report of our Executive Council makes clear how we have appealed and how we have taken the initiative—the American Federation of Labor with 6,000,000 members—and have asked them to come back home. Fortunately, after a long interval and after much time has elapsed, steps have been taken for the purpose of resuming peace negotiations. I can report to those in attendance at this convention that it is expected that a committee, a distinguished committee representing the American Federation of Labor and a committee representing those who left us, will sit around the conference table in a friendly atmosphere, within the near future, for the purpose of trying to find a basis of accommodation and settlement of our differences. I know that I speak your sentiments when I say we wish them Godspeed in their efforts, and we will do everything that lies within our power to make it a full and complete success.

"My heart is in this movement. Every fiber and sentiment of my being is deeply touched. The need for unity within the ranks of Labor is profoundly impressive. I will give all I can in order to promote the realization of that purpose and of that objective, and if I could reach that objective, and realize it within the life of my official service to you I would feel then that I had practically completed my work as your representative. I pray and hope and trust that we can all sit down, ultimately feeling that we have achieved the greatest outstanding objective that Labor has set for unity, solidarity, harmony and fraternity within the ranks of Labor."

(P. 52) A comprehensive report on peace negotiations with the C.I.O. was presented to the convention in which a series of communications between the President of the C.I.O. and the President of the A. F. of L. was put into the record.

(P. 499) The convention considered Resolutions 7, 9, 15 and 18 (all calling for renewed efforts to secure unity in the labor movement) in connection with the report of the Executive Council on steps being taken toward that objective. The convention adopted the following report of the committee:

In connection with the Executive Council's report on "Resumption of Peace Negotiations with the C.I.O.," your committee has considered Resolutions Nos. 7, 9, 15 and 18.

The report of the Executive Council reproduces correspondence between President William Green, A. F. of L.; Mr. John L. Lewis and President Philip Murray, C.I.O., relating to resumption of peace negotiations.

There has been a growing desire that unity in the American trade union movement should become an established condition. That such unity should be brought about is the sincere desire of many of the leaders in both organizations and the membership which they represent.

Your committee must call attention to the fact that negotiations for a peaceful adjustment of the differences between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, were initiated by the Denver Convention of the A. F. of L. in 1937, a committee representing the A. F. of L. being appointed as a result of the convention's instructions. These negotiations, unfortunately, failed.

Following this failure the President of the American Federation of Labor, on numerous occasions, requested a resumption of the conferences and also extended an appropriate invitation to those who had left the American Federation of Labor to return to the fold.

Your committee most heartily approves of the resumption of negotiations with the Congress of Industrial Organizations, so that organic unity can be reestablished under the banner of the American Federation of Labor. We are convinced that there are those in the Congress of Industrial Organizations who have a sincere desire to reestablish unity, and your committee sincerely hopes that this desire will be translated into a practical accord.

Your committee recognizes that the problems which the unity committee must consider are various and some of them difficult. It seems evident that the most important groundwork to successful negotiations is the reestablishment of a better relationship between the membership of both organizations. We are convinced if these negotiations are to be successful, bitterness of feeling must be eliminated and hostilities come to an end.

Your committee believes that it would be difficult indeed for the unity committee to make satisfactory progress if in the meantime hostile raiding tactics continue. We therefore, urgently recommend that this convention approve of an immediate armistice as an essential evidence of good faith and sincerity.

(1943, pp. 39, 210, 232, 509) The convention committee considered the report of the E.C. on peace negotiations with the C.I.O., together with 2 resolutions on the subject, and submitted the following recommendations which were unanimously adopted:

The Executive Council in this portion of its report, relates the activities of the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. Peace Committee in connection with the joint effort made to establish unity between the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O.

The convention last year reaffirmed its earnest desire that every effort be made to establish unity between the two organizations. The joint conference held December 2nd, 1942, did not reach any understanding on the cessation of "raiding" during the period of negotiations. An agreement was reached for the establishment of a joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Committee to hear and decide any disputed jurisdictional differences which might arise between the two organizations, and to submit to arbitration such disputes as they were unable to adjust.

This agreement was approved by the Executive Council at its meeting January 18-27, 1943. At that time the Executive Council directed that it be the policy of the American Federation of Labor not to undertake to raid C.I.O. unions where they held collective bargaining rights, and that the C.I.O. similarly agree.

Later on at the meeting held March 31-April 1, 1943, at the meeting of the joint unity committee the representatives of the American Federation of Labor proposed that preliminary to a discussion of organic unity, a no-raiding agreement be entered into between the two organizations. The representatives of the C.I.O. were unable to agree to a no-raiding plan. This meeting of the joint unity committee resulted in a disagreement, and adjourned without making provisions for holding future meetings. None have since been held.

It is the conviction of your committee that the A. F. of L. Unity Committee be continued so that no opportunity which presents itself to establish unity may be overlooked.

The convention last year while discussing the necessity for unity, expressed the conviction that a thorough-going and open-minded discussion of unity would be difficult if not impossible if raiding tactics were to continue. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to sit around a conference table to seriously discuss peace while the armies of the respective parties were engaged in active warfare.

Your committee submits the thought that in peace time, raiding the membership of another organization is at best questionable, and in many cases a dishonorable activity. During war-time such raiding is as reprehensible as it is truly unpatriotic.

Your committee is advised that the membership of the Typographical Union are to shortly take a referendum vote on the question of re-affiliating with the American Federation of Labor. We sincerely hope that this vote will result in bringing this great union back into the fold! That the Typographical Union is assured that in returning, their autonomous rights will be fully observed, and protected; that they are further informed by this convention that the conditions previously agreed to by a committee of the Executive Council, A. F. of L. and the officers of the International Typographical Union will be fully observed, and carried into effect.

(1944, p. 119) The E.C. reported on the disunity existing between the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. as follows:

Since the Executive Council last reported to the Sixty-Third Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, no meetings have been held between the committees representing the American Federation of Labor and the C.I.O. for the purpose of discussing the question of labor unity and the establishment of labor solidarity on a nation-wide basis.

The committee representing the American Federation of Labor has been ready to meet with the committee representing the C.I.O., but no indication of a willingness to meet and confer was shown by the committee representing the C.I.O. during the past year.

In the meantime, division, discord, and disunity prevail within the ranks of Labor. The situation has grown worse; confusion, distrust and bitterness have increased. We fear that if this situation continues, the working people will pay heavily and suffer greatly, because unity, solidarity, and cooperation have always been the chief assets of Labor.

The C.I.O. continues its pursuit of a raiding policy and seeks to destroy American Federation of Labor unions and establish instead C.I.O. organizations. Tactics resorted to in many instances by representatives of the C.I.O. in their efforts to raid well established American Federation of Labor unions are reprehensible. Deception and fraud are practiced by representatives of the C.I.O. in their attempts to raid well established A. F. of L. unions.

The cause of Labor will not be well served if we face the post-war period divided, disunited and fighting each other. It is reasonable to conclude that we will be forced to meet a severe test when the war is over. No doubt the enemies of Labor will unite against us. That means we will be compelled to face united opposition on the part of our enemies and changed economic conditions which will seriously affect our efforts to maintain American wage standards and conditions of employment.

It is the opinion of the Executive Council that the leaders of the C.I.O. who are responsible for the division within the ranks of Labor should face the facts, abandon the destructive policy which they have followed for years, and unite with the representatives of the American Federation of Labor in a sincere and constructive effort to establish unity, cooperation and solidarity within the ranks of Labor.

The convention committee considered the E.C. Report on this subject and related resolutions, Nos. 44, and 48. The following report, incorporating the resolutions, was approved:

Under the caption "Peace Negotiations With The C.I.O." the Executive Council reports that during the year there was no conference between the committee representing the American Federation of Labor and the committee representing the C.I.O. for the purpose of finding a basis for unity. In the meantime division, discord and disunity has existed in the ranks of labor; the situation has grown worse, confusion, distrust and bitterness have increased; that the C.I.O., in addition to organizing the unorganized has devoted much of its effort toward raiding organizations of the American Federation of Labor. The Executive Council voices the opinion that the leaders of the C.I.O. are responsible for the confusion and bitterness which has developed.

Regardless of the attitude of the leaders of the C.I.O., your committee is convinced that our responsibility to the labor movement of the United States and Canada is such that we should unceasingly explore every avenue which would lead toward unity within the American labor movement. We are aware that a large portion of the rank and file of the C.I.O. deplore disunity as much as we do, and we owe it to these men and women to continue, despite rebuffs that may be encountered, to work steadily for conferences leading to the consummation of unity. . . .

Your committee, in view of all the facts concerning these negotiations, recommends that the President of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to renew the invitation to the United Mine Workers to reaffiliate, for the practical reason that the reaffiliation of the United Mine Workers should strengthen the American Federation of Labor while proving helpful to the United Mine Workers. We believe that in connection with such invitation to the United Mine Workers, full consideration should be given to the directions and authorizations given to the President of the American Federation of Labor and the Executive Council by the Boston Convention, 1943.

With these comments your committee recommends approval of the Executive Council's report.

Res. 44

Whereas—The 87th Convention of the International Typographical Union held at Grand Rapids, Michigan, August 19 through August 25, 1944, passed the following resolution:

Resolved—That the 87th International Typographical Union Convention meeting in Grand Rapids, August 19 to 25, 1944, request that the two "peace" committees of the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. begin immediate conferences to unite these two great labor organizations.

Whereas—The differences between the A. F. of L. and other organized labor groups have continued for a period of time making it unlikely that unity in the ranks of labor will be achieved without some concrete indication of a practical basis on which the A. F. of L. is willing to approach the problem, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the A. F. of L. Peace Committee and Executive Council prepare a statement for the benefit of all A. F. of L. affiliates and members, containing the following information:

1. Those points on which there is a fundamental disagreement with the C.I.O. and/or other labor groups outside the A. F. of L.

2. The basis on which the A. F. of L. would be willing to settle such controversial points, and

3. Present plans for bringing about a meeting which has for its purpose the exploration of possible avenues of reaching an understanding with these outside labor organizations.

Res. 48

Whereas—Unity of the trade union movement, for many years a matter of paramount concern to all keenly interested in the welfare of organized labor, is today more than ever desirable and urgent, and

Whereas—This division in organized labor is bound to offer its enemies even greater advantage for attack in the post-war period, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention of the American Federation of Labor instruct the sub-committee of the Executive Council, charged with the duty of negotiating with the Congress of Industrial Organizations, immediately upon the adjournment of this convention, to invite the representatives of the Congress of Industrial Organizations to meet and explore again every practical possibility for bringing about unity within the labor movement, and be it further

Resolved—That the sub-committee of the Executive Council appointed to negotiate with the United Mine Workers of America for the reaffiliation of that organization with the American Federation of Labor, be similarly instructed to take the initiative in renewing conferences with the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America in an effort to find a basis of adjustment and reaffiliation with the American Federation of Labor, and be it further

Resolved—That the President of the American Federation of Labor be given broad powers to summon the aforesaid sub-committees and to take part with these sub-committees in further conferences with the representatives of the C.I.O. or the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America whenever, in his judgment, resumption of such conferences is advisable or opportune.

Your committee recommends concurrence in Resolutions Nos. 44 and 48.

(1947, p. 163) The E.C. reported on efforts to bring about unity between the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. during the preceding year. The statement closed with the following declaration of intentions to continue efforts toward unity:

The committee representing the Executive Council, as well as the Executive Council itself, conscious of the solemn obligation and the pledge it made to establish organic unity within the ranks of Labor in the United States, stands ready to meet with representatives of the C.I.O. for the realization of this objective and the achievement of this purpose. We believe that this is the first and primary requirement which should be met. All other things are incidental. We can not have peace and war at the same time. We can not pretend to work together in the legislative field while engaged in fighting and raiding each other in another field. We believe the rank and file in both the American Federation of Labor and the C.I.O. favor the establishment of organizational unity immediately, and the termination of strife, division, hatred and bitterness.

The Executive Council stands ready to carry out the commitments it has made in favor of organizational unity within the ranks of Labor, and to join in laying the foundation for the establishment of such a united movement and to honestly and sincerely work out the details incidental to the creation and establishment of such a united labor movement.

(P. 595) Resolutions 13, 60, and 131 were introduced into the convention, all calling for a united labor movement. The convention unanimously adopted the committee report as follows:

We recommend whole-hearted approval of the principles followed by the Committee of the Executive Council in their conferences with the C.I.O. The two organizations cannot work together in the political field while they are fighting over control of unions. When basic unity has been achieved through a united labor movement, unity and cooperation in all other fields and interests follow automatically.

Now in the world crisis involving the future of Western Democracy, free trade unions should put their full strength in support of our Government as well as in support of free trade unions of other countries. The American Federation of Labor has made its decision and taken its stand. We cannot endanger that purpose by alliance on any front with groups which are not with us on fundamental issues.

We recommend approval of the position of the Executive Council that it stands ready to carry out commitments made to lay a sound foundation upon which a structure of organic unity within the labor movement can be erected. (No separate action on the resolutions was required.)

(1948, p. 234) Res. 4 instructed the A. F. of L. Executive Council "to extend every endeavor to establish a national labor board consisting of representatives of all labor groups to plan and work toward the objective of a united labor movement."

Creation of Labor Board Proposed—(P. 242) Res. 4, 31, and 79 proposed that the American Federation of Labor support the principles embodied in the resolution adopted by the conventions of the American Federation of Musicians and the International Typographical Union, to-wit: that a National Labor Board be created of representatives of all American labor groups to plan and work toward the objective of a united American labor movement.

(P. 455) The convention acted jointly on Res. 4, 31, and 79 and unanimously adopted the committee report as follows:

The necessity for greater unity between the groups of organized labor has never been more necessary than today. Unity of purpose and of action has always been one of the ideals of the American Federation of Labor. The fact that unity does not exist, is not evidence that it cannot be brought into existence.

Since this convention has already expressed itself definitely and clearly, adequately and forcibly on this subject, further comment and direction is quite unnecessary. However, your Committee strongly approves and heartily endorses the proposal for unity between the organized trade union groups in our country. Issues having formerly divided the organized labor movement have largely, if not completely, disappeared. Whatever differences may remain are overshadowed by the far more fundamental and serious problem and tasks confronting all of Labor; indeed the problems of today are world-wide and in which the workers of our land must play an important part if we are to safeguard and operate throughout the world the spirit and doctrine of freedom, justice and democracy.

Your Committee, supplemental to declarations and directions already approved, recommends that the Executive Council constantly apply its efforts, through conferences with representatives of other organized groups of labor, to the end that unity be achieved in the American trade union movement, in spirit and in substance and at the earliest possible opportunity.

(1949, p. 340) Res. 112 called upon the A. F. of L. to "go on record as urging the C.I.O. to return to the A. F. of L., and that the A. F. of L. further go on record as appealing to the responsible leadership of the C.I.O. to answer this call for labor unity in America and that the necessary procedure to bring about a genuine united labor movement which will contain all organized labor in one strong organization be set in motion.

(P. 480) The convention acted jointly on Res. 13 and 112 and approved the following committee recommendations:

In considering Resolution No. 13, your Committee was advised that conferences have been held during the year between officers of the Federation and the International Association of Machinists looking to the reaffiliation of that organization to the American Federation of Labor. While no final decisions have been reached, neither have these conferences ended. Indeed negotiations are pending looking to further conferences. It is the sincere hope of the Committee, and we are confident of the affiliates, that these conferences may result in the early reaffiliation of this organization.

Your Committee has considered Resolution No. 112 in connection with the foregoing and records itself in favor of the proposal submitted. This resolution deals with the subject of reaffiliation. Your Committee is more than ever impressed for the urgency for a greater united labor movement of trade unions pledged to the principles upon which our nation is founded and dedicated to the safeguarding and advancing of ideals of liberty, of freedom, of democracy; a labor movement not dominated, guided or controlled by foreign governmental influences or ideologies in conflict with those that have made for the greatness of our people, enrichment of our free trade union movement and the attainment of the conditions of life and work we are at present enjoying.

As indicated in our report of a year ago, "the necessity for greater unity between all groups of organized labor has never been more necessary than today. Unity of purpose and of action has always been one of the ideals of the American Federation of Labor. The fact that unity does not exist, is not evidence that it cannot be brought into existence."

Then, too, we repeat, as then, that issues having formerly divided the labor movement have largely disappeared and that whatever of conflict may remain is overshadowed by far by the fundamental and serious problem confronting labor, not only here at home but in other lands as well. Now that we are about to unite on the labor front of free trade unions and enter the theatre of world labor affairs, the road to cooperation and unity is considerably smoother and should lead to the ultimate union and the merging of all our separate divisions of labor here in our land under the banner of the American Federation of Labor.

To this end we recommend and approve, as we did a year ago, that the Executive Council constantly apply its efforts, through conferences with representatives of other organized groups of labor, to the end that unity be achieved in the American trade union movement, in spirit and in substance at the earliest possible opportunity.

(1950, p. 82) The E.C. reported little progress toward effecting unity with the C.I.O. One conference was arranged but due to illness of President Murray of the C.I.O. the meeting was recessed until such time as he could attend.

(P. 433) The following committee report unanimously approved:

It is with mingled feelings of satisfaction and frustration that your Committee has reviewed this section of the Executive Council's Report.

We are encouraged in the fact that conferences and negotiations have been entered into with the representatives of the C.I.O. for the purpose of effectuating organic unity between our respective organizations. We are likewise pleased with tentative agreements reached thus far. But we do entertain some apprehension regarding the undue delay experienced in carrying forward these negotiations.

It is our sincere hope the delay thus far encountered will in no way retard, defer, or derail the ultimate objective of organic unity between our respective organizations.

We are mindful of two previous experiences had of this nature and of harmful consequences that followed their failures. It is our earnest hope and desire that success will crown this third attempt.

We commend the Executive Council for the excellence of their response and limitations imposed as to organizations to be embraced in those negotiations. We are likewise pleased to note the early, willing and unqualified acceptance by the C.I.O. of the nature and character of our response.

We fully concur in the limitations imposed and procedure agreed to as best designed to realize an early consummation of organic unity between the American Federation of Labor and the C.I.O. and with hope of ultimately bringing into accord and affiliation the several unaffiliated and independent groups and trade union organizations.

We are fully aware of the difficulties that have and may present themselves in these negotiations. We are confident, however, that our officers and representatives will approach these problems in the spirit of fairness, of fraternal regard and with an eye single toward the greater accomplishments of a united labor federation. Where there is a will, there is a way.

But a short time past it was inconceivable, considered much less impossible that our respective federations of labor could and would unite in the field of international labor relations. Yet our diverted views and, in instances, conflicting activities soon gave under impact of world requirements for security of freedom and democracy to a spirit of unity and of cooperation. This was impressively manifested in the conference of the free trade unions held in London, England, December last and at which the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions was founded. Unity of purpose and harmony of activity prevailed amongst the representatives of our respective organizations, throughout all meetings and conferences, and at no time then or since has there been the slightest division of opinion much less in action. To the contrary, as a result of the unity between our respective organizations a world united labor movement has been founded, and it would not have come into being without unity of purpose and action between the C.I.O. and the American Federation of Labor.

Need we point out the spirit of cooperation and of unity which, at present, prevails in our legislative and political activities here at home and made possible by the deliberate, cunning and dangerous attack made upon the foundations of the very structure of our trade unions by those whose authority to direct the destiny of the well-being of our people is now being challenged in the political area. Surely if we can find accommodations to live in peace and harmony and unite in the legislative and political field, like accommodations and understandings may be perfected to unite our forces into an organic body in the field of economic activities here at home.

We are confident our officers, members of our conference committee and of the Executive Council are fully alert to the importance of the rewards at stake. We are equally confident they will so conduct themselves that, should perchance failure again attend their efforts, that blame or fault may not be attributed in any way to our organization, its officers or representatives.

Never before in labor history and in the national and world crisis has there been greater necessity for unity in the forces of organized labor in America. Never before have our military needs been so desperately dependent upon unity of labor service to our nation and its people. Never before, since the leadership of our nation in world development and relations, has it been so urgent for us to forego strife and friction, bitterness and division.

Defense of our freedoms, our democratic ideals, defense of free peoples everywhere and the emancipation of the millions upon millions living in a state of slavery, of serfdom, of enforced labor in altogether too many parts of the world—all these requirements demand we give way to the spirit of unity and of cooperation.

By our example here in America, let us encourage divided movements in other free lands to unite. By our unity let us bring hope and encouragement to those workers of nations subjected constantly to the tyrannic and despotic rule of those who would profess communal interest, but manifest that interest by enslavement of the masses, body, soul and mind.

The goals to be achieved by organized labor in America today are greater than mere control of separate labor forces here at home. These greater goals are to maintain and perpetuate our rights and liberties and blessings of democracy and to extend these rights, privileges and blessings to the millions upon millions who have been denied these fundamental rights of man and who are living in the shadows of the valleys of the oppressed and the depressed.

For these and other considerations, your Committee commends the officers and members of the Executive Council for the wisdom and good judgment manifested and recommends approval as well as continuance of their efforts and as reported on in this section of the Executive Council's Report.

We hope, too, that the consummation of this reunion in the family of organized labor may presage an early and favorable consummation of a still greater concentration of organized labor within the folds of our Federation and that this event is but a prelude to the greater hope and dream we sincerely trust will be realized within the very near future.

(Pp. 324, 485) Res. 97:

Whereas—Reactionary forces in the United States are united with the National Association of Manufacturers to weaken the labor movement, and

Whereas—These forces are responsible for the crippling of price control, the legislative battles to install anti-labor laws, the blocking of progressive legislation such as the Fair Employment Practices Committee, the Anti-Poll Tax bills and the Full Employment Bill, and the Wagner-Ellender-Taft Housing Bill, and

Whereas—All centers of the labor movement, A. F. of L., C.I.O., and the Railroad Brotherhoods, have by parallel action organized their forces to fight against the attack of our living standards and our labor organizations, and

Whereas—This struggle to protect our democratic gains is weakened by lack of coordinated action by the entire labor movement, there, be it

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record as favoring labor unity and to cooperate with all organizations and in all communities for: (1) Improvement of working and living conditions for all workers; (2) Safeguarding and extending our democratic rights to promote progressive legislation; (3) For unified political action by labor.

(1951, p. 529) . . .

The A. F. of L. has repeatedly urged all bona fide trade union organizations outside its fold to join with it and unite the ranks of Labor. To the A. F. of L., the organic unification of Labor has never been a pious wish or a maneuver through which to seek advantage over trade unions outside its membership. To the A. F. of L., the full unity of Labor is a goal which can and must be realized as speedily as possible in the interest of every working man and working woman in the land.

It is in this spirit that we have, on a number of occasions, pleaded with the C.I.O. to unite its ranks with ours. It has always been our firm conviction that such real unity would greatly strengthen the ranks of Organized Labor, insure the defeat of the Taft-Hartley reactionaries, and enhance the constructive influence of our great trade union movement in Congress, at administrative levels in Washington and in the nation as a whole.

In the negotiations which ensued after the letter addressed by President Philip Murray on April 4, 1950, real progress toward organic unity was being made when suddenly the conferences between our respective representatives were halted. It is not the purpose of your committee to explore the reasons for the obvious reluctance of the C.I.O. to act on this vital problem.

It is now more than a year since these organic unity negotiations were discontinued upon the initiative of the C.I.O. president. This cessation of negotiations was not of our choosing. The A. F. of L. has always been prepared to resume them. We believe it is both essential and timely that this convention go on record as to the basic principles and policies involved.

The need for a united labor movement in America is evident to all trade unionists and progressive-minded citizens in our country. The need is urgent. There can be no substitute for organic Labor unity. Functional unity, as frequently proposed by C.I.O. representatives, is no substitute and cannot be accepted by the A. F. of L.

With our country's assumption of leadership of the democratic world, new and heavy responsibilities fall upon American Labor. These responsibilities and tasks must be fulfilled by Labor with the utmost energy and effectiveness. Otherwise, our nation will be unable to fulfill its great mission of leading in the preservation and protection of peace, freedom, and in the promotion of social justice and human well-being. But experience has shown beyond a shadow of doubt that American Labor cannot fully meet these new and urgent obligations as long as its ranks are divided.

Today, there is no reason whatsoever for any bona fide free trade union organization remaining outside the ranks of the A. F. of L. Today, there is no difference at all over organization structure or form dividing the labor movement into two national federations. With the exit of the C.I.O. from the WFTU and its joining with us in forming and building the ICFTU, with the C.I.O. having purged its ranks of Communists, even this obstacle to organic unification has been removed.

Fully mindful of our special responsibility, as the parent and the predominant organization of American Labor, especially in this hour of crisis, the A. F. of L. will welcome the C.I.O. to unite organically with the A. F. of L. Such complete American Labor unity will prove a great boon to the American people and vastly strengthen the ICFTU as the dynamic leader and galvanize the forces of free Labor in the vanguard of the fight for freedom, peace, and social justice. We, therefore, urge a revival of negotiations with the C.I.O. looking to an early consummation of organic unity between these two organizations.

We cannot urge too strongly the present urgency for organic unity of all Labor organizations today not in our ranks.

In this sense we propose to empower the incoming Executive Council to implement this declaration of policy to the end that organic unification of American Labor may soon be realized as an achievement of and for our labor movement, our nation, and the entire international free trade union movement.

(P. 308) Res. 84 called attention to the apparent pending dissolution of the Labor Unity Committee and requested that officials of the A. F. of L. use every possible means of preventing such dissolution, by extending to all other labor groups an invitation to join with the A. F. of L. in the establishment of a permanent Committee from these groups to further the cause of labor unity and united labor action on all fronts.

(P. 531) Your committee commends the course followed by your Executive Council in participating in the formation and work of the United Labor

Policy Committee designed to seek greater participation for Labor in the government's defense program. A. F. of L. representatives rendered invaluable service in the work of this committee which consisted of representatives of the American Federation of Labor, the C.I.O., the International Association of Machinists, the Railway Labor Executives Association.

Inasmuch as the objectives of the United Labor Policy Committee had been realized the representatives of the A. F. of L. withdrew on August 28th and the United Labor Policy Committee ceased to exist.

In this connection your committee also considered Resolution No. 84, designed to prevent the dissolution of this committee. Since the United Labor Policy Committee is no longer in existence, your committee in lieu of this resolution recommends approval of the Executive Council's action and of this section of the report of the Executive Council.

(1952, p. 521) The convention approved the report of the Committee on Resolutions as follows:

The American Federation of Labor has been steadfast in its efforts to heal the breach in the ranks of organized labor and to reestablish a united trade union movement in our country.

Mindful of the urgency of achieving complete labor unity, the American Federation of Labor has on a number of occasions initiated negotiations and conferences toward this end. But we must regretfully report to the convention that these negotiations have been interrupted and discontinued by the C.I.O.

The American Federation of Labor is prepared to resume these negotiations designed to achieve organic labor unity. We have a committee charged with conducting such negotiations to a successful conclusion. This committee will welcome the reopening of the negotiations for full organic unity of American labor when the C.I.O. is ready to resume the deliberations.

Developments at home and abroad have made it increasingly urgent that such organic unification be attained at the earliest date. Once again, we appeal to the C.I.O. to respond to the need of the hour and join with us in building a united labor movement in the United States.

No Raiding Agreement—(1953, p. 82) In conformity with the decision of the Executive Council, a committee which had been appointed to negotiate with the C.I.O. was reactivated, with representatives of the A. F. of L. named to enter into conferences with a parallel committee from the C.I.O. and to report the outcome of the discussions to the E.C. at its next following meeting. Following the first meeting of this committee on April 7, 1953, a statement was issued:

We met today in good faith to try to achieve labor unity. Both sides came into the meeting with no prior conditions. Both sides agreed to explore all the matters involved on their merits.

There was a general discussion of all phases of the problem. In particular, the conferees gave consideration to the problem of "raiding," which, it was agreed, is not conducive to unity.

The conferees decided to appoint a subcommittee of six—three from the A. F. of L. and three from the C.I.O.—to study the possibility of eliminating raiding between affiliates of the two organizations, as a prerequisite to achieving labor unity.

The six-man subcommittee will also study the problems inherent in the structure and jurisdictional lines of the affiliated unions of the two organizations.

The subcommittee was empowered to prepare a factual report and recommendations, as well as an agenda, for the next joint meeting of the full committees. This meeting will be held in Washington, D. C., during the first week of June.

The Executive Council made report on subsequent meetings, and the results therefrom, as follows:

On May 4, 1953 the subcommittee met to study the statistical data of all representation cases that were filed with the National Labor Relations Board for a two-year period, covering 1951-52. The subcommittee found, upon examining the statistical data, that an overwhelming majority of the raids initiated by A. F. of L. or C.I.O. unions failed and the net result of the total number of raids brought about a change of affiliation of less than two per cent of the total number of workers involved. It was decided that the subcommittee prepare the text of a no-raiding agreement to be presented to the next meeting of the full committee.

The A. F. of L. and C.I.O. committees again met on June 2, and after examining the statistical data submitted to it by the subcommittee, it determined that the principle of no raiding should be submitted to the executive councils of both organizations for their consideration and then submitted to the conventions of both organizations.

The committees then approved the principles outlined for a no-raiding agreement and instructed the subcommittee to prepare the text of a no-raiding agreement.

The subcommittee met again on June 17 and developed a no-raiding agreement in which it fully incorporated the provisions and principles as laid down by the full committee.

The text of this agreement, which has been approved by the Executive Council, follows:

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations appointed representatives to a joint committee to explore the possibilities of organic unity between the two organizations; and

Whereas—This committee unanimously agreed upon the following Interim Report and Recommendations:

"INTERIM REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON LABOR UNITY

"The joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee is composed of nine representatives representing the A. F. of L. and 11 representatives representing the C.I.O. The members of the Committee were authorized by the respective federations to meet for the purpose of exploring the possibility of achieving organic unity between the two federations.

"The Committee met on April 7, 1953, in Washington, D. C. There was a general discussion of all phases of the problem. The Committee gave particular consideration to the problem of 'raiding' between the federations—attempts by unions affiliated with one of the federations to organize and represent employees as to whom a union affiliated with the other federation was already recognized or certified as the collective bargaining representative. It was unanimously agreed that the elimination of raiding constitutes a necessary first condition to the achievement of unity.

"At the meeting of April 7, the Committee appointed a subcommittee of six—three from each federation—to study the elimination of raiding between affiliates of the two federations as a prerequisite to the achievement of organic unity, and also to study the problems created by the structure and jurisdictional lines of the unions affiliated with the two organizations. The members of this subcommittee were

President George Meany, Secretary-Treasurer William F. Schnitzler and Vice President Matthew Woll, for the American Federation of Labor, and President Walter P. Reuther, Secretary-Treasurer James B. Carey and President David J. McDonald of the United Steelworkers of America for the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

"The subcommittee undertook a statistical study of all representation cases filed with the National Labor Relations Board within the last two years in which a collective bargaining relationship already existed with an A. F. of L. or C.I.O. union at the time a petition for certification as a representative was filed by a union from the other federation. Detailed data was collected as to each such case and a statistical summary prepared.

"On June 2, 1953, the statistical study prepared by the subcommittee was submitted to a meeting of the full committee. The study covered a total of 1,245 cases over a two-year period—1951-1952—involving 366,470 employees. In the labor board representation cases involving these 366,470 employees, the petitioning union was successful in gaining certification as the collective bargaining representative for approximately 62,000 employees, or only 17 per cent of the total number of employees involved. Of these 62,000 employees, approximately 35,000 were won from a C.I.O. union by a union affiliated with the A. F. of L. Approximately 27,000 were won by a C.I.O. union from a union affiliated with the A. F. of L. The net change, therefore, of these raids involving 366,470 employees was 8,000 or only approximately 2 per cent of the total number of employees involved.

"The results of the study made by the subcommittee, as well as the experience and knowledge of the members of the full Committee, compel the conclusion that 'raids' between A. F. of L. and C.I.O. unions are destructive of the best interests of the unions immediately involved and also of the entire trade union movement. In addition to the antagonisms between unions created by such raids, the welfare of the workers and the public is damaged. The overwhelming majority of such attempted raids fail, creating unrest, dissatisfaction and disunity among the workers involved. Even in the small proportion of cases where such attempts are successful they involve a drain of time and money far disproportionate to the number of employees involved. They create industrial strain and conflict and they do nothing to add to the strength and capabilities of the trade union movement as a whole.

"There are still millions of working men and women who do not have the benefit of organization or collective bargaining. The members of all unions affiliated with both federations would be benefited if the energies devoted to raiding were devoted to the organization of those yet unorganized.

"For these reasons the representatives of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations who constitute the Unity Committee have agreed that the elimination of raiding between unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations would contribute to the strength of the unions affiliated with both federations, would materially benefit the entire nation by eliminating a source of industrial unrest and conflict and would remove a serious barrier to ultimate organic unity between the two federations. They have therefore further agreed to recommend to the governing bodies of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations that the following specific steps be taken to eliminate 'raiding' between themselves and between their affiliates:

"(1) Both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations should adopt as a fundamental policy of both federations this principle: No union affiliated with either federation shall attempt to organize or to represent employees as to whom an established bargaining relationship exists between their employer and a union in the other federation.

"(2) This fundamental policy should be incorporated into the 'no-raiding' Agreement, attached hereto, entered into between the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates and the Congress of Industrial Organizations and its affiliates.

"(3) Each federation should urge that its affiliated unions subscribe and become parties to this 'no-raiding' Agreement."

(Proposed No Raiding Agreement)

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations have each accepted the report and recommendations of the Joint Committee and have each recommended to the unions affiliated with it that they subscribe to this no-raiding Agreement, which shall be enforceable by and against any union signatory thereto; and

Whereas—The parties hereto accept these recommendations, recognizing that definite, tangible and valuable advantages will accrue to each of them through the elimination of raids on their established jurisdictions;

Now, therefore, the parties signatory hereto, in consideration of the matters set forth above and the mutual promises set forth below, do hereby agree as follows:

1. As used herein the term "federation" means the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations; the term "union" means any national or international union affiliated with either the American Federation of Labor or the Congress of Industrial Organizations which is signatory hereto and each of the federations; the term "local" means any local union, council, joint board, or other organization engaged in the representation of employees, which is a part of, subsidiary to or chartered by a union as herein defined, and also includes any Federal labor union, department, local industrial union, organizing committee or council engaged in the representation of employees which is chartered directly by either of the federations; the phrase "established bargaining relationship" means any situation in which a union or a local, as herein defined, either (a) has been recognized by the employer (which for this purpose shall include any governmental agency) as the collective bargaining representative for the employees involved for a period of one year or more, or (b) is certified by the National Labor Relations Board or other Federal or State Agency having jurisdiction, as the collective bargaining representative for the employees.

2. The American Federation of Labor and each union signatory hereto affiliated with it, and each of them, agrees that neither it nor any of its locals will, directly, or indirectly, (a) organize or represent or attempt to organize or represent employees as to whom an established bargaining relationship exists with the Congress of Industrial Organizations or with any union which is signatory hereto affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (including any of the locals of such union); (b) seek to represent, or obtain the right to represent, such employees or to disrupt the established bargaining relationship; or (c) engage in any cessation of work or refusal to transport, install or otherwise work on or with materials or any other form of concerted activity in support of an attempt to organize or represent such employees by a union other than the union which has the established bargaining relationship.

3. The Congress of Industrial Organizations and each union signatory hereto affiliated with it, and each of them, agrees that neither it nor any of its locals will, directly or indirectly, (a) organize or represent or attempt to organize or represent employees as to whom an established bargaining relationship exists with the American Federation of Labor or with any union which is signatory hereto affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (including any of the locals of such union); (b) seek to represent, or obtain the right to represent, such employees or to disrupt the established bargaining relationship; or (c) engage in any cessation of work or refusal to transport, install or otherwise work on or with materials or any other form of concerted activity in support of an attempt to organize or represent such employees by a union other than the union which has the established bargaining relationship.

4. Each of the parties signatory hereto agrees to file with the Secretary-Treasurer of the federation with which it is affiliated the name and address of a representative who is authorized to receive all complaints of violation of this Agreement. The Secretary-Treasurer of each federation shall transmit such names and addresses to the Secretary-Treasurer of the other contracting federation, who shall make distribution of such information to each of the unions signatory hereto affiliated with his federation. If any party shall fail to comply with this provision, the president of that organization shall be deemed to be such representative.

5. Each of the parties hereto agrees to settle all disputes which may arise in connection with this Agreement in accordance with the following procedure:

(a) Any union a party hereto which claims that any other union a party hereto (including any local of such a union) which is affiliated with the other federation has violated the provisions of this Agreement shall immediately notify in writing the representative of the union complained against, designated in accordance with paragraph 4 of this Agreement, and shall also notify the Secretary-Treasurer of the federation with which that union is affiliated.

(b) The authorized representatives of the unions involved shall make every effort to settle the dispute.

(c) In the event the dispute is not settled within 15 days after the mailing of the notification provided for in paragraph (a), the Secretary-Treasurers of the federations, or their designated representatives, shall meet to attempt to achieve compliance with this Agreement.

(d) In the event that the authorized representatives of the unions involved are unable to settle the dispute within 15 days after the mailing of the notification provided for in paragraph (a), either union or the Secretary-Treasurer of either federation may, not earlier than five days thereafter, submit the dispute to the Impartial Umpire herein provided for.

(e) In any dispute submitted to him in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph, the Impartial Umpire shall have jurisdiction only to determine whether the acts complained of constitute a violation of this Agreement.

(f) A complaining union may withdraw its complaint of violation of this Agreement at any time prior to decision by the Impartial Umpire, in which event the pending proceeding shall terminate.

6. The parties hereto agree that that the Impartial Umpire under this agreement shall be jointly appointed by the President of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the President of the American Federation of Labor. The Impartial Umpire shall decide any case referred to him within 30 days unless an extension of time is agreed to by the parties to the dispute or is requested by the Umpire and agreed to by the parties. The decision of the Impartial Umpire in any case referred or submitted to him under the terms of this Agreement shall be final and binding.

7. Each of the parties signatory hereto agrees that, in any case in which it is found that it, or any of its locals, has violated the provisions of this Agreement, it will cease such violation and will not, directly or indirectly, during the term of this Agreement, represent or seek to represent the employees involved, and that it will, in addition, take the following remedial action upon request of the complaining union:

(a) Any petition for representation rights filed with the National Labor Relations Board, or any other appropriate federal or state agency, shall be immediately withdrawn.

(b) Any claims for recognition which may have been submitted to the employer will be withdrawn immediately.

8. Each union signatory hereto agrees to be bound by the provisions of this Agreement with respect only to such unions affiliated with the other federation as are then signatory hereto or which may thereafter become signatory hereto. The parties further agree that any party to this Agreement to whom they are so bound shall have the right to institute such actions or proceedings as may be necessary to compel compliance with the terms of this Agreement only after exhausting all of the steps provided herein.

9. (a) The American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations agree that this Agreement will be submitted for approval to their respective conventions next forthcoming.

(b) All of the parties signatory hereto agree that this Agreement shall not become effective unless both of such conventions approve the Agreement and that, if so approved, the Agreement shall then become effective on January 1, 1954, as to all parties then signatory to it; the Agreement shall become effective with respect to parties who become signatories to it subsequent to January 1, 1954, on the date of their signature.

(c) This Agreement shall not apply to disputes in which representation proceedings are pending before the National Labor Relations Board, or other appropriate federal or state agency, on January 1, 1954, and so long as such proceedings are pending. Both organizations will exercise their best efforts, in the interim, to minimize such disputes.

10. This Agreement shall expire on December 31, 1955.

11. This Agreement, and its faithful observance is the first and essential step toward the achievement of organic unity between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, a goal to which both organizations wholeheartedly subscribe. It is the intention of both parties to continue their joint meetings in the endeavor to achieve this objective.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto by the authorized representatives, have hereunder set their hands and seals.

After fully considering the benefits and advantages to be gained through a no-raiding agreement, the Executive Council recommends the approval of this agreement to the convention.

(P. 635) Convention unanimously approved recommendations of its committee as follows:

Your committee has given a careful review of the foregoing recommendations of the Executive Council. We firmly believe that the proposed agreement is the first and indispensable step toward the achievement of organic unity between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations; that its terms and purposes are in the best interests of the American Federation of Labor, its affiliates and the labor movement as a whole; and that its adoption would be in the public interest and to the benefit of our entire country.

Accordingly, your committee strongly recommends to this convention the approval of this portion of the Executive Council's Report and the adoption of the proposed no-raiding agreement in the form approved and set forth by the Executive Council.

(P. 605) Your Committee on Industrial Relations has given full study and consideration to the problem of industrial relations as it will affect the laboring men and women of our country, not only for the coming year, but for many years to come.

Mindful of the industrial setup of our country, with particular emphasis on the fact that 225 corporations employ more than one-fifth of all of the wage earners of America; taking into consideration the special interests now in control of our government and favoring those 225 corporations which dictate industrial relations through the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chambers of Commerce; taking also into consideration that for the year of 1952 we had 41,800 cases of infringement and violations of the poor wage and hour law as presently constituted and providing for only 75c per hour. Yes, we are mindful because of the foregoing and of other economic factors which govern industrial relations between labor and industry in the United States, that Labor is in for a tough deal, dictated by the mercenary group in control of industry and in control of the government.

The National Association of Manufacturers and the proponents of industrial cycles of boom and bust are talking more and more about a "creeping depression" which will make itself felt more and more because of a slow-down of defense orders. The money changers and industrialists of the country would love to see an economic depression because economic depression plus the Taft-Hartley Enslavement Act will make for that kind of union-busting and will change the entire picture of industrial relations in the United States.

Your Committee on Industrial Relations is cognizant of the fact that the American way of life and present day labor standards and conditions enjoyed by the wage earners of the country are the result of collective bargaining relations at the conference table and mutually agreed upon in co-operative action between Labor and management. We know that the policy of the American Federation of Labor is just that; mainly harmonious Labor-Management relations.

Your Committee on Industrial Relations therefore hails with joy the move for unity within the House of Labor, for only a united house of Labor may at this time, in face of creeping depression, in face of special favoritism given to the special interests or our millionaire and billionaire corporations, in face of growing indication on the part of the judiciary to shackle Labor by the weapon of injunction, yes, in face of all the foregoing, a united labor movement will create the kind of atmosphere, will create the fundamentals so essential to give Labor a chance and an opportunity to bargain collectively and effectively under the most trying conditions.

We call attention to and commend President Meany's clear cut enunciation of basic principles necessary for the full realization of such unity:—"That there is a tradition in this organization, that in union there is strength, and that it is the duty of the strong union, if it can possibly do so, to help the weak union in another trade—not to destroy the weak union."

We cannot emphasize too strongly that collective bargaining and industrial relations by your united Labor movement is one thing and collective bargaining and industrial relations with the House of Labor divided is another.

Your Committee on Industrial Relations recommends unanimous approval on the part of the 72nd Convention assembled in the City of St. Louis, of the action of President Meany and the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to pursue to a successful conclusion the merger of all of our unions within the United States so that Labor may truly enjoy the kind of industrial relations which will make for a better America and a successful trade union movement.

A unified labor movement would make possible the wide use of the union label, the union button and the union card, which if used by the wage earners of the country would revolutionize industrial relations between management and Labor, reduce strikes to a minimum and raise labor standards and conditions.

(Pp. 82, 634) Division in the ranks of organized labor in America is detrimental not only to the strength and effectiveness of the trade union movement, but also to the economic well being of men and women who work for wages throughout the land. For the past 18 years the American Federation of Labor has sought, sincerely and diligently, to resolve differences and establish a basis of agreement on which organic unity within the American trade union movement could be reestablished.

Such organic unity has been and continues to be the objective of the American Federation of Labor. So long as the ranks of Labor are divided, Labor will continue to be weakened. Only the enemies of Labor benefit from the lack of Labor solidarity inevitably resulting from the split. There is no trade union reason for the division in Labor ranks. Nor is there an obstacle to unity that could not be overcome by earnest and dedicated men intent on repairing the long and costly rifts and bringing about organic unity of American labor.

During the past year, fresh, firm and rewarding steps have been taken by the American Federation of Labor for the purpose of bringing about an agreement with the Congress of Industrial Organizations which would pave the way toward eventual unification.

The Executive Council, acting at the special meeting held on November 25, 1952, appointed a committee headed by President Meany to renew discussions with an official committee of the C.I.O. The two committees met on April 7, 1953, both sides entering the meeting with no prior conditions and exploring all phases of the problem. They gave joint consideration to the problem of "raiding" as one of the first obstacles to be overcome.

A subcommittee of six, with three members from each organization, was authorized to study the problems involved in the structure and jurisdictional lines of the two federations. A joint study was undertaken by the subcommittee of all representation cases filed with the National Labor Relations Board over a two-year period covering 1951-52, in order to ascertain the extent of raiding and evaluate its results. It was found in 1,245 cases, involving 366,470 employees, the net change as the result of the raids was confined to only 8,000 employees, or only about two per cent of the total number involved in these cases. The facts revealed in this study point up the disproportionate drain on the time and money of the unions concerned in relation to the negligible results. They highlighted the need to extend union organization to millions of workers yet unorganized as the area to which all energies of the labor movement should be directed instead of the costly fraternal strife involved in raiding.

At a joint meeting of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations committees on June 2, it was agreed to submit a draft of a no-raiding agreement to the executive councils of both organizations for their consideration, followed by its submission to the respective conventions of the two federations.

At a meeting on June 17, 1953, the subcommittee drew up the draft of the text of a no-raiding agreement incorporating the provisions and principles agreed upon and laid down by the full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Committee.

The proposed no-raiding agreement would be binding upon national and international unions only upon signing this agreement, and will then become applicable to all local affiliates of such national and international unions. The agreement will also apply to all local unions, councils and departments directly chartered by the American Federation of Labor. The agreement, upon approval, would go into effect, on January 1, 1954, and extend over a two-year term, expiring on December 31, 1955.

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, at its meeting held in Chicago last August, gave thorough study to the terms of the proposed A. F. of L.-C.I.O. no-raiding agreement. After fully considering the benefits and advantages to be gained through such an agreement, the Executive Council recommends that this convention give this agreement its approval.

In devising the terms of the proposed agreement, we were conscious of the need to establish a workable procedure whereby jurisdictional differences could be resolved within the trade union movement itself, and without opening a way to the infringement by the governmental bodies of the principles and prerogatives of self-government within the structure of organized labor.

Your committee has given a careful review of the foregoing recommendations of the Executive Council. We firmly believe that the proposed agreement is the first and indispensable step toward the achievement of organic unity between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations; that its terms and purposes are in the best interests of the American Federation of Labor, its affiliates and the labor movement as a whole; and that its adoption would be in the public interest and to the benefit of our entire country.

Accordingly, your committee strongly recommends to this convention the approval of this portion of the Executive Council's Report and the adoption of the proposed no-raiding agreement in the form approved and set forth by the Executive Council.

(P. 54) In its annual report on this subject, the Executive Council referred to the report on labor unity to the 72nd Convention submitted by the convention Committee on Executive Council's Report. Because of its vital importance in the history of the American labor movement, the 1954 Report of the Executive Council on this subject is included in its entirety:

Division in the ranks of organized labor in America is detrimental not only to the strength and effectiveness of the trade union movement, but also to the economic well being of men and women who work for wages throughout the land. For the past 18 years the American Federation of Labor has sought, sincerely and diligently, to resolve differences and establish a basis of agreement on which organic unity within the American trade union movement could be reestablished.

Accordingly, your committee strongly recommends to this convention the approval of this portion of the Executive Council's Report and the adoption of the proposed no-raiding agreement in the form approved and set forth by the Executive Council.

Early in December, our President was advised by the President of the C.I.O. that the C.I.O. Convention had endorsed the proposed No Raiding Agreement, and arrangements were made for an A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee meeting on December 16, 1953, in Washington, D. C.

The A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met on December 16, 1953, and decided that the officers of both organizations would secure as many authorizations as possible from their affiliated international unions to become signatory to the No-Raiding Agreement.

On June 9, a further meeting of the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee was held in the City of Washington, at which time the officers of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations officially signed the No-Raiding Pact in behalf of 65 international unions of the American Federation of Labor and 29 international unions of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, after which the following statement was issued:

This is an historic day for American labor.

The first constructive step toward labor peace and a united labor movement since 1936 has been taken here this afternoon.

Unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (65) and with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (29) have signed a two-year no-raiding agreement.

This agreement represents a cease-fire. During the two-year truce, the Joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O.

Unity Committee will go to work on the manifold problems involved in bringing about a merger of the two major labor federations into a single, united labor movement.

Some of these problems are relatively simple. Others are extremely intricate and difficult, because of jurisdictional over-lapping, long-standing animosities and structural differences in the various industries and unions affected. All such obstacles, however, can and should be overcome, by negotiation in good faith and a common determination to achieve labor unity.

We are confident that this goal, so beneficial to the workers we represent and to the nation as a whole, can be accomplished before the truce expires.

Our confidence is based upon the expectation that the successful operation of the no-raiding agreement will usher in an era of good feeling and cooperation in the labor movement; that the signatory unions will gain substantial benefits from the cessation of hostilities, and that they never again will want to go back to fighting and raiding each other.

We are mindful of the fact that during the past 18 years repeated efforts to heal the breach in the labor movement have ended up in failure.

In each instance, continuing hostilities made the task of the peace-makers impossible.

This is a new and more practical approach. For the first time it permits the negotiation of labor unity in an atmosphere of peace.

The no-raiding agreement signed today remains open for further signatures by unions from both parent organizations. This committee is not disappointed because we do not have 100 per cent subscription to the plan at the outset. We anticipate that virtually every union involved in jurisdictional strife will come in within a reasonable time. A special subcommittee will proceed at once to attempt to iron out minor differences which at present stand in the way of securing a substantial number of additional signatures to the agreement.

Labor in modern America can no longer afford to be divided. We cannot waste our strength and substance in civil war while the enemies of human progress step up their attack on us on the economic, political and legislative fronts.

Ours is a growing country and Labor must grow with it. We have a solemn duty to organize the unorganized, instead of raiding each other's members. The signing of the no-raiding agreement today will permit us to concentrate our energy and our effort on the basic trade union goal.

Pursuant to Section 6 of the No-Raiding Agreement between the American Federation of Labor and the President of the A. F. of L. and the President of the C.I.O. jointly appointed Mr. David L. Cole as official umpire under the No-Raiding Agreement, effective the 9th day of June, 1954, with all of the rights, powers and duties prescribed therein and subject to the terms of the agreement to be entered into between the presidents of the respective federations and their affiliates signatory to the No-Raiding Agreement and Mr. David L. Cole.

It was further decided that a joint dinner would be held on June 29, 1954, in the City of Washington, at which time the signatories to the No-Raiding Agreement would have an opportunity to meet each other, and invitations were extended as well to organizations that had not signed the No-Raiding Agreement.

At the time this report was written, four additional A. F. of L. international unions had signed the No-Raiding Agreement, and are listed with the following:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

GEORGE MEANY, President

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

WALTER P. REUTHER, President

(1954, pp. 405, 488) Res. 89 directed attention to the attacks being made on the labor movement through Taft-Hartley, Right-to-Work laws and other means, and

Resolved—That the 73rd Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, meeting in Los Angeles, California, endorse the objective of continued discussion and consultation of the A. F. of L., the C.I.O. and the independent unions to facilitate the progress of united labor action in behalf of this program of Labor.

(P. 525) In the year that has passed since our 1953 Convention, the two major federations have taken great strides forward toward the goal of a united labor movement.

The major achievement has been the ratification and signing by a substantial majority of the affiliates of both federations of a two-year non-raiding agreement. This pact became effective on June 9, 1954.

The detailed provisions of this historic agreement were fully reported at last year's convention. Basically each A. F. of L. union signing this agreement agrees that neither it nor any of its locals will

- “(a) organize or represent or attempt to organize or represent employees as to whom an established bargaining relationship exists with the Congress of Industrial Organizations or with any union which is signatory hereto affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (including any of the locals of such union);
- “(b) seek to represent, or obtain the right to represent, such employees or to disrupt the established bargaining relationship; or
- “(c) engage in any cessation of work or refusal to transport, install or otherwise work on or with materials or any other form of concerted activity in support of an attempt to organize or represent such employees by a union other than the union which has the established bargaining relationship.”

The agreement provides for the following four-step procedure in the event of any alleged violations: (1) notification of the alleged violation to the other union concerned, as well as to the secretary-treasurer of the federation with which the first union is affiliated; (2) direct consultation between the unions directly involved; (3) consultation if necessary between the respective secretary-treasurers of the two federations; and (4) if necessary, submission of the dispute to an Impartial Umpire whose decision shall be final and binding. In accordance with the provisions of the agreement, Mr. David L. Cole has been selected as Impartial Umpire.

A total of 70 unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and 29 unions affiliated with the C.I.O. have already become signatories to this historic pact. Many of the remaining unions are in industries and trades which do not bring them into any direct conflict with unions of the other federation. We have every confidence that as experience demonstrates its value, the remaining unions will affix their signatures to this pact.

This committee wishes to point out that the signing of the agreement represents only the start of a union's responsibility on this issue. Each union must now make certain that the new agreement is clearly understood by its entire membership. Each union must be willing to utilize and abide by the pact's enforcement machinery.

The test of this agreement will come in the event that alleged violations occur. Up to this moment, our attention has not been called to a single alleged violation of this agreement.

The agreement itself is of tremendous value, even though it is only a first step. Our goal is a united labor movement. This has always been the goal in the hearts and minds of all trade unionists. The cost of division in the ranks of Labor is immeasurably high. It is evident every day in the wasted time, efforts, and activities of one union which rival or duplicate those of other unions.

It has long been evident that the present division in Labor's ranks serves the interests of only one group, the enemies of Labor. A united labor movement would mean more effective action, both at the bargaining table, and in the federal and state legislatures.

Your committee reaffirms the American Federation of Labor's deep-seated desire to cement a united labor movement. Now, for the first time in many years, the road has been opened toward this goal. The more peaceful atmosphere resulting from the no-raiding agreement should permit negotiations for unity to move forward with dispatch.

The no-raiding agreement was negotiated by the respective unity committees of the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. These committees remained constituted to work out the necessary steps for organic unity. As an indication of the growing feeling for unity, your committee heartily welcomes the precedent-making letter of fraternal greetings which the President of the Congress of Industrial Organizations has sent to this Convention.

By its terms, the no-raiding agreement is to be in operation for two years. This period expiring June 9, 1956, represents a truce during which negotiations for organic unity will be conducted.

When the new agreement became effective, the joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. statement included the following: "We are confident that this goal, so beneficial to the workers we represent and to the nation as a whole, can be accomplished before the truce expires."

Your committee expresses the earnest hope that future events will confirm this confidence in Labor unity.

(1955, p. 56) Since the 1954 Convention, the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. No-Raiding Agreement has fulfilled the primary purposes for which it was designed. The threefold purpose of the pact was:

1. Both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations should adopt as a fundamental policy of both federations this principle: No union affiliated with either federation shall attempt to organize or to represent employees as to whom an established bargaining relationship exists between their employer and a union in the other federation.
2. This fundamental policy should be incorporated into the "no-raiding" agreement, entered into between the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates and the Congress of Industrial Organizations and its affiliates.
3. Each federation should urge that its affiliated unions subscribe and become parties to this "no-raiding" agreement.

On June 9, 1954, 65 national or international unions of the A. F. of L. and 29 national or international unions of the C.I.O. were signatories to the No-Raiding Agreement.

From June 9, 1954, to October 14, 1955, 15 additional A. F. of L. national or international unions and three additional C.I.O. national or international unions have ratified the No-Raiding Agreement. One A. F. of L. national union, the National Association of Postal Supervisors, which was an original signatory to the pact, has since withdrawn from the American Federation of Labor. Three C.I.O. unions who were original signatories have since merged with other C.I.O. organizations. There are now 79 A. F. of L. unions and 29 C.I.O. unions signatory to the No-Raiding Agreement.

The A. F. of L. Executive Council in its report to the 1954 Convention summarized the necessity for the No-Raiding Agreement in these words:

"A subcommittee of six, with three members from each organization, was authorized to study the problems involved in the structure and jurisdictional lines of the two federations. A joint study was undertaken by the subcommittee of all representation cases filed with the National Labor Relations Board over a two-year period covering 1951-1952, in order to ascertain the extent of raiding and evaluate its results. It was found in 1,245 cases, involving 366,470 employees, the net change as the result of the raids was confined to only 8,000 employees, or only about two per cent of the total number involved in these cases. The facts revealed in this study point up the disproportionate drain on the time and money of the unions concerned in relation to the negligible results. They highlighted the need to extend union organization to millions of workers yet unorganized as the area to which all energies of the labor movement should be directed instead of the costly fraternal strife involved in raiding."

From June 9, 1954, until October 14, 1955, 63 cases involving A. F. of L. and C.I.O. unions have been handled under the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. No-Raiding Agreement. Of these 63 cases handled under the Agreement, 46 cases have been settled by mutual agreement between the parties involved.

Ten cases have been submitted to the Impartial Umpire.

Two of these cases were settled by mutual agreement between the parties before hearings were actually heard.

The parties in one of these cases are presently meeting in an endeavor to reach a mutual agreement. Six cases were determined by the Impartial Umpire and one decision is pending.

There are seven active cases presently pending.

A comparison of the remarkable achievements of the No-Raiding Agreement as weighed against the joint study of the subcommittee of six, clearly shows that the hopes and aspirations of all signatories have been fulfilled to a great degree.

The lessening of strife between the two federations and their respective affiliates, as evidenced by the small number of cases referred to the No-Raiding Pact gave further impetus to the achievement of an agreement that provides the basis for organic unity between the two federations.

(P. 50) After the official signing of the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. No-Raiding Agreement, the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee arranged for a dinner at the Mayflower Hotel, June 29, 1954, to which all signatories to the No-Raiding Agreement, all departments, and all affiliates were invited to be present.

On October 15, 1954, the full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met for several hours, during which organic unity was stressed by all present. As our next objective, it was decided that a subcommittee be established comprising George Meany, William F. Schnitzler and Harry C. Bates for the American Federation of Labor, and Walter P. Reuther, James B. Carey and David J. McDonald for the Congress of Industrial Organizations, to fully explore all of the problems that would be involved in an organic merger, and to make a full report of their findings to the committee as soon as possible.

The full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met again on January 4, 1955, at the Mayflower Hotel and further explored some of the problems of organic unity that had confronted the subcommittee, and after fully discussing some of the methods in which organic unity can be accomplished, the subcommittee was directed to proceed with its work.

The A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Subcommittee met on February 8-9, 1955, at the Roney Plaza Hotel, Miami Beach, Florida. . . .

. . . The subcommittee arrived at an agreement in principle on organic unity and made preparations to present their findings to a meeting of the full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee the following day.

The full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met on Wednesday, February 9, 1955, at 12 m. for lunch at the Roney Plaza Hotel, Miami Beach, Florida, with the following representation present: from the A. F. of L.—George Meany, William F. Schnitzler, Harry C. Bates, Charles J. MacGowan, William C. Doherty, Matthew Woll, David Dubinsky, William J. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, Daniel W. Tracy, General Counsel J. Albert Woll; from the C.I.O.—Walter P. Reuther, James B. Carey, Jacob Potofsky, Frank Rosenblum, Emil Rieve, Joseph Curran, L. S. Buckmaster, David J. McDonald, John Riffe, R. J. Thomas, General Counsel Arthur Goldberg.

The subcommittee presented the following report and recommendations of the subcommittee before the full Unity Committee, which was unanimously adopted.

After reading the report and recommendations of the subcommittee, the full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee unanimously approved the report and recommendations and further decided that each group would recommend its adoption to their respective federations.

The A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee then adopted the following joint statement for release by A. F. of L. President George Meany and C.I.O. President Walter P. Reuther:

The agreement reached today by the A. F. of L. and C.I.O. Unity Committee sets the course for the attainment of a merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations into a united trade union movement.

This agreement—if accepted by the executive bodies of our two organizations, as we hope and expect—will mark the end of the division in the free trade union movement of our country that has existed for almost 20 years.

It is our belief that a united labor movement will be able to devote the talent and strength of our trade unions to greater service to the people of the United States.

At this time in our history, when this country and all the free world are beset by the challenge of Soviet Communist totalitarianism, a united labor movement will best be able to mobilize the working men and women of this country toward the defense of our free institutions, and toward the development of full employment and greater security for all the people.

We pledge that, as unity develops, labor in America will place itself at the service of the American public; and will, by its responsibility and sense of dedication to our democratic ideals, help build a better nation and a stronger free world.

This agreement will preserve the identity and integrity of the more than 140 trade unions now affiliated with the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. They will continue, under this plan, to conduct their own individual collective bargaining with employers, as in the past. The agreement provides a mechanism for voluntary—not compulsory—merger of individual trade unions in the same field. Through arrangements to be worked out, the members of all affiliated trade unions and the general public can be assured that the swift progress made during the past two years toward the elimination of “raids” and “jurisdictional disputes” will be continued.

This agreement will be submitted to the A. F. of L. Executive Council for ratification on Thursday, February 10, at Miami Beach, Florida, and to an early meeting of the C.I.O. Executive Board, a date for which will be announced soon.

If both these bodies ratify the agreement reached today, committees from the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. will begin the task of writing a constitution for the merged organizations. That draft constitution will be referred for ratification to the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. and the Executive Board of the C.I.O. later this year.

When and if they ratify the new constitution, it will then be submitted to the conventions of the two bodies for their approval. Then, a joint convention of the new organization will be called.

We are setting no time schedule for this process. We are hopeful that if the agreement and the draft constitution are ratified, the merged new organization can be established before the end of the year.

The members of the joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee express their pleasure that an honorable agreement, in a complex and difficult field, was so speedily obtained.

We pledge our support to its ratification by our respective trade union organizations.

We feel confident that merger of the two union groups, which we represent, will be a boon to our nation and its people in this tense period. We are happy that, in our way, we have been able to help bring about unity of the American labor movement at a time when the unity of all the American people is most urgently needed in the face of the Communist threat to world peace and civilization.

The A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Subcommittee met again early on May 2, 1955, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., with all members of the subcommittee present together with A. F. of L. General Counsel and C.I.O. General Counsel. Considerable discussion took place concerning the proposed constitution for the newly merged federation, after which it was decided to recommend the constitution as presently prepared to the full unity committee.

The full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met later on May 2, 1955, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., and heard the proposed constitution read, and then an opportunity was given to all to carefully examine it in its entirety.

After carefully considering the entire proposed constitution in its present form, it was decided that it would be presented to the A. F. of L. Executive Council and the C.I.O. Executive Board, and if any suggestions or changes were to be offered, they would be referred to the full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee. The motion carried unanimously with the exception of a contrary vote by a C.I.O. vice president.

It was further recommended by the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee that the A. F. of L. and the C.I.O. hold parallel conventions starting Deember 1, 1955, in the City of New York, with the merged convention convening on December 5, 1955. Each federation was requested to take such formal action as would be required by its present constitution to bring this about.

The full A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee met again on July 20, 1955, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C. . . .

The full committee carefully examined the numerous policy matters that must be dealt with as we approach the first merged convention and considerable time was also spent discussing the name for the newly merged federation. It was then decided that the A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee would recommend to their respective federations that the full name for the newly merged federation shall be the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and the abbreviated name to be AFL-CIO.

A lengthy discussion took place concerning the method in which a convention call for the merged convention would be issued. It was also recommended that the present A. F. of L.-C.I.O. No-Raiding Agreement be extended for two years.

A special conference was held at the Conrad Hilton Hotel, Chicago, Illinois, on August 12, 1955, to which all executive officers of all affiliated organizations of the American Federation of Labor were invited to attend for the purpose of discussing the proposed merger with the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the draft constitution for the newly merged federation.

A full outline was given of the merger agreement and several suggested changes were announced for the new draft constitution, after which everyone desiring to discuss or ask questions was given an opportunity to do so.

The conference lasted two and one-half hours, after which President Meany announced that the several suggestions that were made would be presented to the Executive Council for their consideration.

(P. 349) The conclusion of the final A. F. of L. Executive Council Report contained the following:

In concluding this report to the 74th Convention of the American Federation of Labor, the Executive Council wishes to emphasize one vital point. Unity in the labor movement cannot be fully achieved merely by merger at the top level. It must also encompass amalgamation of state and local bodies and, wherever possible, the voluntary integration of national and international unions operating within the same jurisdiction.

If we can accurately appraise the spirit prevailing in the labor movement today, there will be a sincere effort to bring this about. There is a strong disposition on all sides to get together and end needless strife. When this process is completed, our trade union movement will be immeasurably strengthened and we will be able to make our most effective contribution to the security and progress of the free way of life.

The Committee on Resolutions presented the following report and resolution which was adopted by the convention:

The Resolutions Committee has met and has considered that portion of the Report of the Executive Council to this convention dealing with labor unity. It has also considered the Supplemental Report of the Executive Council to this convention, dated November 30, 1955, also dealing with this subject matter.

The Resolutions Committee notes with approval the various steps taken by the American Federation of Labor Unity Committee and by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to bring about honorable organic unity between the two federations. It commends the members of this committee and the officers and members of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor for their industrious, able and conscientious endeavors which have made possible the submission to this convention for its ratification, approval and adoption, the Agreement for the Merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, a Constitution for the combined Federation, the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations," and the Implementation Agreement dated November 30, 1955.

In considering the Report and Supplemental Report of the Executive Council on the subject of Labor Unity, the Resolutions Committee also gave consideration to Resolution No. 28 which seeks to amend the constitution for the combined federation, "The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations."

Also considered was Resolution No. 47 which also seeks to amend the Constitution of "The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations." . . .

The Resolutions Committee believes that the Agreement for the Merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the Constitution of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" and the Implementation Agreement of November 30, 1955, which have been formally approved and submitted by the Executive Council to this convention for its ratification, approval and adoption, will bring about honorable organic unity between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

This committee realizes, of course, that this Constitution of "The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" is not a perfect document in all respects and that time, and experience under its governing provisions, may demonstrate the need for subsequent amendment.

It, and the Agreement for Merger are the result of frank, honest and sincere negotiations between free and, in some respects, competing groups motivated by an honest desire for unity. Consequently, some allowances have to be made for some give-and-take on each side. These documents represent a negotiated understanding. Neither the Merger Agreement nor the Constitution of "The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" can be altered or changed by this convention without the approval and agreement of the other party.

With this in mind the Resolutions Committee recommends and moves that Resolutions numbered 28 and 47 submitted by the Sleeping Car Porters and by the International Typographical Union, respectively, be referred by this convention to the Executive Council of the combined Federation, "The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations." This referral to be with the recommendation of this convention that such Executive Council, in the ensuing two years, consider these resolutions in the light of experience gained by the combined Federation and make such recommendations to the Second Constitutional Convention of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" with respect to these two resolutions as it shall deem to be necessary and proper.

In conclusion, the Resolutions Committee further recommends to this convention and moves that this convention accept the recommendations of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, as contained in its Supplemental Report on Labor Unity, and that it adopt the resolution on the Achievement of Labor Unity, which has been distributed to the delegates in attendance at this convention and reads as follows:

Resolution on the Achievement of Labor Unity

Whereas—The combination of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations into a single labor federation is a long-cherished goal of the trade union movement of this country, and

Whereas—On February 9, 1955, the Joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee agreed upon and recommended to the two federations the adoption of the "Agreement for the Merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations" attached hereto as Annex A, and

Whereas—The Agreement of February 9 was ratified by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor on February 10, 1955, and by the Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations on February 24, 1955, and

Whereas—Pursuant to the provisions of the Agreement of February 9, 1955, a proposed constitution for the combined federation was drafted by the Joint A. F. of L.-C.I.O. Unity Committee for submission to the two federations, and

Whereas—The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor and the Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations reviewed this draft constitution on several occasions, and made various changes therein, and

Whereas—The "Constitution of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" attached hereto as Annex B was approved by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor on November 30, 1955, and by the Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations on November 30, 1955, and

Whereas—The Agreement of February 9 provides that upon approval by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor and the Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations of that Agreement and of a Constitution for the combined federation, that the Agreement and the Constitution, and any other agreements necessary to accomplish the combination of the two federations, shall be submitted to the separate conventions of the American Federation of Labor and of the Congress of Industrial Organizations; and that upon approval by the separate conventions of the Agreement and of the Constitution of the combined federations, a joint convention shall be held, and

Whereas—The Implementation Agreement dated November 30, 1955, attached hereto as Annex C, was approved by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor on November 30, 1955, and by the Executive Board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations on November 30, 1955, and is necessary and appropriate to dispose of various matters arising out of the combination of the two federations, and

Whereas—The "Constitution of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations," attached hereto as Annex B, provides in Articles XIX and XX that it shall become effective upon approval by the separate conventions of the two federations and shall govern the joint convention of the combined federations,

Now, therefore, be it resolved:

1. The "Agreement for the Merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations," attached hereto as Annex A, is ratified, approved and adopted.

2. The Constitution of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" attached hereto as Annex B is ratified, approved and adopted as the Constitution of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations," and as an amendment to and substitute for the Constitution of this federation heretofore in effect.

3. The Implementation Agreement dated November 30, 1955, and attached hereto as Annex C, is ratified, approved and adopted.

4. The adoption of this resolution by this convention is conditional upon the adoption of an identical resolution by the present separate convention of the other federation; provided, however, that this resolution, the Agreement for Merger, the Constitution of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" and the Implementation Agreement shall become effective upon the opening of the initial convention of the "American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations" on December 5, 1955.

Note: The resolutions referred to and not acted upon by the A. F. of L. Convention are not included in this history. They will be found in the complete official proceedings of the final convention of the A. F. of L.

Utility Operators Association—(1935, p. 593) Public utility corporations, including the Illinois Power and Light Company, engaged in interstate commerce, have entered contracts with an association identified as the Utility Operators' Association.

The served purpose of the Utility

Operators' Association, in combination with the enforced intent of the public utility corporations, constitutes conspiracy to defeat the objects included in the Wagner Disputes Act, and the right of employees to bargain collectively for wages through a voluntary organization of their own choice.

The E.C. is hereby instructed to formulate and pursue such further methods of protecting the rights of such employees to bargain collectively as free citizens as are determined upon by the council.

Vacations—(1937, pp. 91, 338) As modern industrial techniques shorten work time, vacations with pay should become part of the program for shortening work hours. Also, they may lessen seasonal unemployment by substituting paid holidays for a layoff in dull seasons.

In this day of automobiles, well-paved roads, trailers, inexpensive bus tours to national parks and places of interest, a vacation of one or two weeks has more to offer than ever before. A working man and his family may step out of their daily routine into a life full of new interest, mentally stimulating, with a chance to learn something of the world outside the shop and home. Such an opportunity is of immense value to wage earners; it gives perspective and sends a man back to his work with a new outlook. Now that workers are organizing and, as union members, are taking a more responsible part in the affairs of their industry, such a broadening of outlook is particularly important. A weekend is not long enough to give it.

The year 1937 appears to mark the beginning of a movement for vacations with pay for wage earners. Until recently, such holidays were confined with few exceptions to salaried workers. Several of our international unions note this new trend. Many unions are including vacations in their agreements this year for the first time, and it is reported that employers in increasing numbers are granting this benefit voluntarily. In foreign countries also a move is on foot to extend the vacation privilege to wage earners. The British Trades Union Congress is trying to establish vacations with pay by Act of Parliament.

We heartily endorse the efforts of our member unions to win vacations with pay, and urge them to include a vacation clause in their agreements wherever possible.

A questionnaire sent to our international unions shows that 746,893 union members already have vacations with pay (1937). Of these, 383,000 are employed by federal or state governments, and 363,900 are in private industry.

(P. 338) In view of the clear need for fewer hours of employment, vacations with pay contribute in a practical way. The past year has seen much progress in this direction. Many union agreements contain a clause calling for one and two weeks vacation with pay each year.

We are informed that this innovation in industry is not confined to the U.S. and Canada. The British Trade Union Congress is trying to establish vacations with pay by Act of Parliament.

The 52 weeks work year has become as outmoded as the 60-hour work week. Under our present surplus economy there is no justification for denying vacations with pay to all workers.

The extension of this principle will tend to avoid the vacations without pay known as unemployment.

Your committee recommends that the publicity department of the A. F. of L. and all affiliated unions promote an extensive educational campaign in the interest of establishing vacations with pay as an accepted principle of employment in industry.

(1938, p. 93) A questionnaire sent to our international unions shows that 589,818 union members already have vacations with pay. We heartily endorse the efforts of our member unions to win vacations with pay, and urge them to include a vacation clause in their agreements wherever possible.

(1946, p. 529) Res. 77. Convention adopted the following resolution after amendment:

Whereas—Technological progress was undoubtedly responsible for a large portion of pre-war unemployment, and

Whereas—It is reasonable to believe that this trend will be accelerated in the post-war period, and

Whereas—A 26-day vacation period would increase employment, both directly and indirectly, and

Whereas—Time and means for extended travel would create a more homogeneous nation, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor declare in favor of the progressive lengthening of the vacation period.

(1947, p. 530) Res. 94, unanimously approved by the convention, together with the recommendations of the convention committee thereon, follow:

Whereas—Many industries throughout the nation, in order to spread the work, give employment to more individuals, and more leisure time for employees, are now establishing the principle of 26 days' annual leave with pay, and

Whereas—Such leaves are not only conducive to better physical condition for employees but tend toward an improved mental and morale condition, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in regular convention assembly, hereby endorses the principle of 26 days' annual leave for employees in all branches of industry regardless of who the employers are and that local unions, central bodies and representatives be instructed to endeavor to have same included in contracts, and be it further

Resolved—That in pursuit of successful conclusion of the purpose of this resolution, immediate efforts be directed by the international officers toward placing all governmental employees on 26 days leave with full pay.

Resolution No. 94 endorses the principle of 26 days annual leave for employees in all branches of industry, directs that local unions, central bodies and representatives be instructed to endeavor to have same included in contracts, and that immediate efforts be directed by the international officers toward placing all governmental employees on 26 days leave per year with full pay.

Veterans Bonus (also see: Post-War Financial Aid for Veterans; Apprentice Training; Reinstatement After War; Post-War Planning; War and Reconversion Controls; Housing)

Pensions—(1927, p. 137) Bills for the pensioning of veterans of the Civil War and widows of deceased veterans were supported by the A. F. of L. Both Houses passed a bill for this purpose but, for some unexplained reason, it failed to reach the President for his signature before 12 o'clock, March 4, 1927.

(P. 247) The E.C. was directed to continue to support the bills.

Discharge Compensation—(1942, p. 559) The following resolution was considered by the convention and referred to the Committee on Post-War Planning:

Whereas—As a result of the dastardly and despicable attack of the Japanese upon Pearl Harbor and the alignment of the anti-religious forces of the world against our great democracy, our young men have responded to the urgent call of their nation to give their all, if necessary, in defense of all that we hold dear, and

Whereas—Without thought of self, these young men left their civil employment with no assurance of their rehabilitation at the close of the war, this causing them much uncertainty and insecurity, regarding their future, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor assembled in convention call upon the Congress of the United States to provide that, immediately upon the discharge from active service, each member of the armed forces of the United States, from the position of army captain (or its equivalent) and all those of lesser salary schedule, shall receive the equal of six months' pay, in six equal monthly instalments, as an expression of appreciation of the services rendered and to fortify them against the hazards of unemployment and insecurity.

Post-War Financial Aid—(1942, p. 593) The following resolution was considered by the convention and referred to the Committee on Post-War Problems (Res. 98):

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has gone all out for the war effort, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor has been conducting a fight for the working peoples of the United States, and

Whereas—The greater percentage of all men bearing arms for the United States are from the working class, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this convention go on record as furthering legislation to provide all service men up to the grade of major with a minimum sum of money equal to not less than the average rate of pay of such men for a period of six months in order for them to be financially able to readjust themselves, and be it further

Resolved—That this shall apply to all men within these classes who receive honorable discharges from the United States forces, who have served not less than 90 days during the period of the war, and who do not have a disability that entitles them to greater pay than the sum otherwise provided.

Rehabilitation of Disabled—(1942, p. 681) Res. 130 requested approval of general rehabilitation plans for disabled service men and women. The convention unanimously adopted the recommendations of the committee as follows:

Whereas—It became necessary for the United States of America to declare war against the Axis Dictator Powers on December 8, 1941, immediately following the treacherous attack that was made upon the United States of America at Pearl Harbor by the Japanese Government, and

Whereas—Men and women from all walks of life have been inducted into the armed military forces of our government to wage active combat against Axis aggression, and

Whereas—It is inevitable that many of our young men and women who now serve our country to preserve for us the principles of democracy upon which our country was founded will be wounded and disabled by reason of the heroic sacrifice that they are making, and

Whereas—It is just as inevitable that these men and women, after they have been returned to our communities, must immediately be rehabilitated in order that they may maintain their self-respect by sustaining themselves and carrying on a useful life, and

Whereas—Existing facilities in the public schools make such immediate rehabilitation possible, irrespective of what the endeavors of these disabled ex-service people may be, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor recommend that boards of education throughout the states at once set up machinery and inform every person who has been disabled in the service of our country of the existing facilities now available for rehabilitation training to all who have suffered disabilities in this war, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention likewise recommend that all local state and government educational agencies be required to immediately organize and operate training centers throughout the states to teach these disabled veterans the trade or occupation to which they are best adapted, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor request our Congressmen and Senators to petition the Congress of the United States of America to appropriate the necessary monies to put such training programs into operation on a nation-wide scale, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor petition the Congress of the United States of America to pay a reasonable amount of money to all people who have been disabled in the service of their country to the extent that they will be allowed to completely rehabilitate themselves.

The committee agrees with the general objectives of this resolution—to make available to ex-service men and women extensive rehabilitation services and whatever financial support is necessary to make possible such rehabilitation. The committee therefore recommends that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-War Problems and that this committee take such action as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the objectives of the resolution.

Training and Rehabilitation (Post-War)—(1943, p. 108) Training and rehabilitation of workers and soldiers for the post-war period is one of our most important problems. It involves a critical evaluation of existing training programs, of proposed programs, and a knowledge of the general economic and social structure of the community in which and through which the training program must operate.

Existing training programs include the long established federal vocational program (Smith - Hughes - George - Dean), the additional defense training programs (including training within industry, and up-grading), the federal apprenticeship training program, state supported vocational programs, continuation schools at all levels, both publicly and privately supported. In addition, there are the various programs of the armed forces, some academic, some military, some vocational. We realize that the job of the armed forces must be the training of men for war, hence the type of mechanical and other vocational training given in the armed forces is to supply or train a soldier for war. That is not the civilian's job, but the form of training given to fit the soldier for return to civilian life is definitely the concern of the civilian agencies. This is not a responsibility which military authorities are competent to perform.

When the Congress of the United States enacted legislation which put youths from 18 years on into the army, the President of the United States by Executive Order created a commission to plan the training and rehabilitation of these young men to return them to civilian life. That commission, of which General Osborne is chairman, has developed a program. We do not know, however, what the training program has planned for readjustment of young workers to civilian life. The American Federation of Labor was not one of the agencies at any time consulted by the President's commission and was denied advance information of the commission's findings. Labor must, therefore, proceed to develop its own program for retraining and rehabilitation and present it to the Congress and to our fellow citizens.

The retraining program must be considered as an integral part of the military demobilization plans and of industrial demobilization and remobilization plans. The type of training must be determined by a consideration of: which industries will continue in the peace economy; which wartime industries can readily and speedily be converted into peacetime industries (new and old), and which will require a long time for conversion; how many workers will be needed for each kind of industry; what kind and amount of training will be needed to qualify workers for their old or new jobs; what peace industries will expand; what new industries will get into production.

Guiding the use of such industrial engineering must be the knowledge of the rate and form of military demobilization. A definite plan for training and rehabilitation should embody the following principles:

1. Every possible aid must be given the returned soldier (of whom over a million include our own members), to rehabilitate him physically and economically to assure his development and personal adjustment.

2. A national employment service should be provided to assist the war workers in finding employment with the necessary occupational training and unemployment compensation when needed.

3. Curricula should supplement training. There must be cooperation between publicly supported training programs, the training programs of organized labor and industrial organizations and establishments, the U.S. Employment Service and federal and state public works programs. The rate and method of military demobilization should be considered in relation to the interrelated programs of these agencies, and their programs in turn must be conditioned by military demobilization. Education must be recognized as experience far beyond formal class work for "credit."

4. All plans for rehabilitation, retraining and reemployment for civilian life should be predicated on specific legislative authority and not be simply "allowed" or authorized by informal agreements or administrative directives. These plans are too important to the very life of our nation to be left to the whim or caprice of administrators. They must have their foundation in law.

The only bases at law at present for a program of rehabilitation and retraining is to be found in the Selective Service Act in which: "The Director of Selective Service herein provided for shall establish a personnel division with adequate facilities to render aid in the replacement in their former positions of, or in securing positions for, members of the reserve components of the land and naval forces of the United States who have satisfactorily completed any period of active duty, and persons who have satisfactorily completed any period of their training and service under this Act."

The functions of employment placement and training for placement are distinctly a civilian and not a military function and should be placed by law under civilian administration. We repeat, proper legislative authority for the entire program of retraining and placement should be provided through law, at the earliest possible time.

(Industrial Rehabilitation)

The enactment of the LaFollette Vocational Rehabilitation Act renews and extends the provisions of the original Industrial Rehabilitation Act. State and local labor bodies should look into the administrative features of this law.

(P. 580) The Executive Council discusses problems of training and rehabilitation which are vital to organized labor. Your Committee on Education agrees with the position taken by the council that education for reconstruction should be a civilian rather than a military task. The armed forces, although highly competent in training for the skills of war are not experienced in educational problems of reconstruction. It has been the contention of the A. F. of L. over the years that all educational matters should be controlled by the agencies of government established for that purpose. With these regularly established agencies the A. F. of L. has cooperated for many years. The council's report relates that the President of the United States, by Executive Order, has created a commission on training and rehabilitation headed by General Osborne. The American Federation of Labor is not represented on this important committee despite the fact that the A. F. of L. has had a wider experience in vocational education than any other large group in the nation. In fact, information is not available as to the work of the committee and its findings. The American Federation of Labor has, therefore, been compelled to conduct its own research and develop its own program for training and rehabilitation of workers and soldiers. Your committee recommends that the position of the American Federation of Labor in this matter be called to the attention of the President of the United States together with a request that the A. F. of L. be represented on all committees dealing with the government's plan for training and rehabilitation. The rich experience of the A. F. of L. in the vital field of specialized vocational training should not be neglected or disregarded.

(P. 366) Res. 106, referred to the Post-War Planning Committee, called for amendment of existing compensation laws to aid ex-servicemen. The resolution follows:

Whereas—After the cessation of hostilities the members of the armed forces will be looking for re-employment, and

Whereas—Due to curtailment of war production, the manpower problem will no longer exist, and

Whereas—Management will again resort to pre-war conditions of not hiring men over the age of 40 and increase the physical requirements prerequisite to employment, and

Whereas—Many members of the armed forces will not be able to meet the requirements brought about by the state insurance fund and other private insurance funds in relation to workmen's compensation benefit, now, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor at Convention convening at Boston, Massachusetts, go on record during the enactment of federal legislation supplementing existing laws relating to compensation insurance fund, etc., thereby, making it possible for the members of the armed forces to meet their post-war requirements.

(P. 464) Res. 2:

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor, through its affiliated organizations, has voluntarily, willingly and unstintingly aided the war effort by the purchase of war bonds and stamps; by all-out production of essential war materials, by contributing its man power to both the fighting and home fronts, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor realizes its obligation to these brave young men who are fighting the battle for democracy, and

Whereas—Many of these young men are suffering wounds in battle which render them unable to continue in actual combat and which necessitate hospitalization and rehabilitation, and

Whereas—These honorably discharged young men deserve the opportunity to find a place in industry which will enable them to earn a livelihood, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor as further testimony of its desire to give 100% all-out cooperation, believes that many of these young veterans possess the ability to become skilled craftsmen after a period of apprenticeship, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor supports the national program of apprenticeship which has for its aim and purpose the proper training of apprentices; therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor initiate and develop a method and program among the skilled trades affiliated with the American Federation of Labor whereby these young veterans will be afforded a deserving opportunity to become skilled craftsmen and to thus be able to find employment in industry so that a decent livelihood could be earned for them and their families, and be it further

Resolved—That the method and program be promptly initiated by this body and that this body work jointly with the skilled trades, with the representatives of the veterans' organizations, the Veterans Bureau, representative employers and representatives of the apprentice-training service, in order to achieve through their mutual efforts the aims and purposes of this resolution, which aims and purposes are in line with the patriotic desire of the American Federation of Labor in support of the war effort.

Your committee submits the following as a substitute for this resolution:

Your committee is in complete accord with the necessity for providing adequate provisions for industrial training. Those who had already had partial training in their respective skills and occupations must be accorded every opportunity of completing their training and preparing themselves to earn their living at some gainful occupation. Those who had previously had no opportunity of acquiring skill, must be afforded that opportunity.

Your committee, however, is definitely of the opinion that all of this training should be under the direction of the two federal agencies, the establishment of which was one of the accomplishments of the American Federation of Labor in the field of training—the Federal Bureau for Vocational Education, and the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training.

Your committee would be negligent of its responsibility if it did not call attention to the conflicting and overlapping agencies for training which have been established in recent years, and we therefore recommend that the American Federation of Labor use its influence to have all federal activities in connection with training, centered exclusively in the Bureau for Vocational Education and the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, and that these agencies shall be charged with the responsibility of training those from the armed service.

Workmen's Compensation Amendment—(P. 366) Res. 106, referred to the A. F. of L. Committee on Post-War Planning:

Whereas—After the cessation of hostilities the members of the armed forces will be looking for re-employment, and

Whereas—Due to curtailment of War Production the manpower problem will no longer exist, and

Whereas—Management will again resort to pre-war conditions of not hiring men over the age of forty and increase the physical requirements prerequisite to employment, and

Whereas—Many members of the armed forces will not be able to meet the requirements brought about by the State Insurance Fund and other private Insurance Funds in relation to Workmen's Compensation Benefit, now, therefore be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor at Convention convening at Boston, Massachusetts, go on record during the enactment of Federal Legislation supplementing existing laws relating to Compensation Insurance Fund, etc., thereby, making it possible for the members of the armed forces to meet their Post-War Requirements.

This resolution deals with the question of re-employment and rehabilitation after the war of the men returned from the armed forces.

Your Committee recommends that it be referred to the Post-War Planning Committee of the American Federation of Labor for appropriate action.

Training and Retraining (and War Workers)—(1944, p. 223) The GI Bill interests all of us for it affects the men in uniform in whom all of us have a deep personal interest. We are mindful of the fact that several million of these men are trade unionists, and are continuing their active interest in their trade unions. We know, too, that practically every one of our members has someone in his own family in uniform. So, for personal as well as national reasons, the well being of the serviceman is an intimate concern.

It is good to know that the Veterans' Bill is called a Bill of Rights, for the American serviceman has rights regardless of the amount of formal education he had before entering the service; regardless of what any so-called psychosocial test may show; regardless of his social status, his race, his creed. We fought for the recognition of this principle in regard to training rights.

The bill as originally drafted provided that only those servicemen selected, shall be given such education as the economic situation may demand. The government's own apprenticeship program in which Labor participates, was not recognized, but business firms were to be paid for training the man on the job. The serviceman himself was, under this bill, merely a robot, with no say as to his own interests or desires.

Due to the efforts of the American Federation of Labor these provisions were changed.

Certain objectionable features, however, still remain in the law.

The man who was over 25 when he entered the Service has not the right to a year's education at government expense, unless his education was "interrupted by the war." This clause, if closely interpreted, would deny one-third of the servicemen their rights. We hold this limitation to be unjust. We contend that every serviceman's life and education has been interrupted by the war.

The bill does not now closely define the type of education which a serviceman may have. This is left to his choice, provided he takes it in an "approved institution."

We should recognize that thousands of servicemen on being returned to civilian life will want an education unlike that which is now offered in most of the accredited educational institutions in this country. Thousands will wish to learn or train for life and for enriched living, and not simply for "credit". Yet because our educational system is for the most part so constructed that a student must enroll on a credit basis to be a "full time" student, many servicemen may be denied what they actually want—a real education.

The entire training and retraining program for our returned soldier can be made more valuable to him and for the nation if it is conceived in terms of knowledge and social values and not merely in terms of "credit".

The retraining of the war worker for a peacetime job and his rapid reabsorption into industrial enterprise is vitally essential to the establishment of a stabilized economy. We cannot plan for the economic readjust of 10 million veterans without at the same time planning for the reemployment of the workers who supplied the materials of war. A universal, coordinated sound training program is essential for each citizen seeking post-war employment if any citizens are to be helped in effecting their adjustments.

Industrial training must be done on the job. The trainee should be adequately compensated during his training. Provision should be made for coordinated part-time private and public employment with training wherever that is desirable and practicable. Civil and cultural subject matter which is to be taught every trainee should be planned at the adult level, and should enable the worker to understand more fully his own rights and privileges and his duties and responsibilities in our society.

We recommend that the Standing Committee on Education formulate definite plans for training and programs in keeping with our principles and seek to have these programs implemented and adopted by the necessary governmental and private educational and training agencies.

(P. 610) Your committee congratulates the officers and representatives of the American Federation of Labor upon the significant part they played in securing the enactment of the GI Bill of Rights and especially for their success in democratizing the bill so it will better serve all veterans eligible to its benefits. We agree with the position of the Executive Council that retraining and rehabilitation should be available to veterans who were over 25 years of age at time of enlistment as well as those under 25.

Because of organized labor's long interest in vocational education and rehabilitation we urge that the staffs of local, state and national agencies of the Veterans Administration include persons familiar with the problems of organized labor. We urge that wherever possible, the Veterans Administration make use of advisory committees of management and Labor which have proved so successful in the Smith-Hughes vocational program.

Your committee further recommends that the President of the American Federation of Labor appoint a special committee on veterans' affairs to consult, from time to time, with the chief of the Veterans Administration, regarding veterans' problems. It is the considered opinion of your committee that such a committee will be of significant value to the millions of members of organized labor who are now in the Armed Forces.

Rehabilitation—(1944, p. 535) The following resolution, No. 55, was unanimously adopted:

Whereas—Federal Public Law 16 provides for the rehabilitation of service-connected disabled veterans, and

Whereas—Under this law rehabilitation can be in the form of apprenticeship training for a maximum of four years (or 48 months) during which time the government pays the veteran a monthly subsistence allowance for the full term of training, and

Whereas—It is against the policy of the Veterans Administration to place a veteran in training and in an apprenticeship which cannot be completed in four years' time, and

Whereas—The term of training in many trades is fixed by law and by agreement between employer and Labor as more than 48 months, and

Whereas—The consequent result may be that either a veteran cannot be placed as an apprentice in these trades or attempts will be made to shorten the term to four years by allowing credit for one reason or another; therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled in New Orleans, Louisiana, November 20, 1944, go on record as being opposed to attempts to shorten the apprenticeship term, except in cases where the practical experience and training is actually related to the trade for which time credit is allowed, and be it further

Resolved—That the officers of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to attempt to secure either a more liberal interpretation of Public Law 16 from the Administrator of the Veterans Administration to permit disabled veterans to commence an apprenticeship in these trades or take immediate action to sponsor legislation which will amend the law as interpreted today.

(P. 617) The Convention Committee on Resolutions submitted the following statement which was unanimously adopted:

Establishment of friendly and co-operative relations between organized labor and the veterans of this war is essential to the future welfare of America.

The achievements of American workers on the production front have served to defeat attempts to arouse animosity among servicemen against Labor. The eagerness of Labor to back up the fighting forces with everything they need to crush the enemy is appreciated not only by the commanding officers of our army and navy, but by the men in the ranks as well.

While Labor is proud of its own contributions to the cause of victory, all of us recognize that the greatest sacrifices and the greatest responsibilities have fallen upon the millions of men in uniform who are doing the actual fighting.

These men are going all-out for us. We must do all in our power for them.

Labor's obligation to the servicemen is two-fold. We must, first of all, produce in ever increasing quantities the weapons of war needed to hasten the day of victory and save needless death and suffering. This convention already has served notice of the determination of the seven million members of the American Federation of Labor to fulfill that immediate obligation.

But above and beyond this, we must also make every possible effort to provide for the economic and social security of our fighting men when the war ends and they come back home to resume civilian life.

The least America can do is to assure a good job at decent pay to every demobilized serviceman so that he can get a new start in life and make up for lost time.

This is a program for which Labor, industry and the veterans' organizations can and must work closely together, along with the agencies of the government.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the officers of the American Federation of Labor confer with representatives of all these groups and agencies at the earliest opportunity in an effort to bring about agreement on essential objectives and the steps necessary to carry them out.

The American Federation of Labor and the unions affiliated with it already have taken steps to protect the seniority and job security of their 1,500,000 members now serving in the armed forces, who have been exempted from paying dues while in the service. In addition, a large number of our unions have taken action to admit qualified and honorably discharged servicemen into membership without payment of initiation fees. These are steps in the right direction.

Furthermore, the American Federation of Labor has given unqualified support to the "GI Bill of Rights" and other legislation seeking to provide postwar security for servicemen.

Your committee urges this convention to commend these policies and activities and to direct the officers of the American Federation of Labor to explore every new avenue of cooperation with veterans' groups that presents itself. Only in this way can we hope to discharge even a part of our obligations to the men who are defending the American way of life and to cement them with us in future efforts to improve that way of life when peace comes.

Readjustment ("An Epochal Year") —(1945, p. 10) One of the special problems of reconversion is the readjustment of veterans into civilian life. Congress has enacted legislation to meet the needs of servicemen in this period of readjustment and rehabilitation for the victims of war injuries. Our national purpose is to enable those citizens who have sacrificed civilian adjustments in order to render service to our country to overcome any handicaps resulting from this cause. We feel it is the duty of the nation to return these citizens as members of our society and our civilian economy, prepared and able to assume their responsibility for their own lives like all other citizens. We believe that everything possible should be done to eliminate handicaps which would prevent veterans from being integrated into normal life. We believe our public and our private agencies should give assistance and encouragement to policies and programs that would tend to minimize or eliminate barriers that might separate veterans from other citizens of our democracy. Our program is outlined in the pamphlet "Veterans Welcome Home!"

Our affiliated organizations have maintained the union status of their members in the armed services, so that they may return to their unions with their rights protected, without interruption or additional expense. This is an important gain, for the union members concerned will thus be kept eligible for valuable union benefits and rights. Our unions also are generally admitting veterans without initiation fees and have expressed willingness to consider army work experience in estimating seniority and trade classification.

The readjustment of veterans will be facilitated or made more difficult in accord with the degree of our success in achieving maximum production and employment.

Subsistence Legislation—(1946, pp. 493-497) Res. 12, 15, 28, 63, 80, 81, 110, 119, 149, 151, 159. All of the listed resolutions requested remedial changes in subsistence legislation for veterans and related to apprenticeship allowances, etc. Convention recorded sympathy with intent and referred the resolutions to the Executive Council with request for thorough investigation and such legislation as will be most helpful in establishing the objectives sought by the resolutions.

Housing—(1946, p. 590) Res. 100, unanimously adopted:

Whereas—Veterans of the armed forces have returned from World War II and, having fought for home and country, now have no home in which to live, and

Whereas—A housing program has been inaugurated to build one-family homes for these veterans, and

Whereas—A program of one-family homes of this magnitude will exclude a large number of our building trades workers from the opportunity for employment, thus weakening the building trades unions and eventually the whole union movement, and

Whereas—These one-family homes will cost more than the average war veteran can pay for in his remaining years of life, thus causing foreclosure and the loss of his home, and

Whereas—That as the majority of veterans do not want to be tied to the responsibility of paying off a long-term mortgage and do not wish to be forced to buy one of these homes in order to house himself and family, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the 65th Convention of the American Federation of Labor assembled in Chicago, Illinois, also sponsor action that apartment type housing in central locations be constructed, thus employing all branches of the building industry, creating a living setup that will be within the veteran's spending means causing him more contentment, and be it further

Resolved—That as this is both a state issue as well as a national issue, the American Federation of Labor Convention in Chicago is urged to go on record insisting that the National Housing Expediter enter a program of this type in the Veterans Emergency Housing Program.

In the midst of a critical shortage of all types of housing, shortage of rental housing has been especially severe. The rental housing provisions of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft General Housing Bill, which are designed to encourage large-scale rental housing within the means of families of moderate incomes and low incomes, deserve special consideration in the fight for the early enactment of that bill. In order to serve best the extreme need for rental housing on the part of our veterans and to alleviate the widespread lack of good homes at moderate rents, all sound programs for rental housing, conforming to the standards and policies of the American Federation of Labor, deserve our urgent support, whether such programs be federal, state or local. With these recommendations, your committee urges concurrence with the objectives and purposes of this resolution.

Public Relations Bureau—(1946, p. 535) The convention unanimously adopted Res. 105, which set forth the anti-labor campaign which had been waged among veterans and veterans organizations, and recommended remedial measures to offset the effects of the anti-labor propaganda:

Whereas—There can be no doubt that one of the spearheads used by the National Association of Manufacturers against the organized labor movement is the veteran and veterans' organizations, and

Whereas—There is a definite move involving returning service men and women in labor disputes as part of this well-planned program, and

Whereas—There is already clear evidence that some so-called "veterans' organizations" have been created to sponsor and work for anti-labor legislation, and

Whereas—There are many hundreds of thousands of A. F. of L. veterans within the locals affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and

Whereas—The A. F. of L. veterans have proven themselves loyal trade unionists, and are not in accord with any anti-labor legislation involving veterans against Labor, and

Whereas—There is specific evidence that poisonous propaganda levelled against the labor movements was part of a program forced upon many veterans during their period of service in the armed forces, and

Whereas—This propaganda was well planned and was used as a base to get the veterans hostile to Labor, and in particular to the organized labor movement, and

Whereas—It is a most important phase in the trade union activity to correct this evil, and to educate the veteran along the educational lines of the labor movement, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 65th Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record as favoring an intensified educational program for service men and women who have returned to civilian status in order to offset the vicious anti-labor propaganda which was given them while they were in the service, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor Executive Council in its wisdom, take under advisement the necessity of this educational program and the establishment of a public relations bureau for veterans to offset all the unfair propaganda levelled at the organized labor movement.

Special Programs and Benefits—(1946, p. 625) In order to increase and extend its services to veterans, the Veterans' Committee of the American Federation of Labor recently made a survey of the special programs and benefits provided for veterans by our affiliated unions. This survey covers the provisions contained in union agreements relating to employment rights, vacation eligibility, job assignment, pay and promotion, special consideration for disabled veterans and apprenticeship training programs of all the international unions which have had time to answer the Veterans' Committee's questionnaire. It also covers union policies with respect to the application to veterans of union fees and dues.

Approximately 1,800,000 A. F. of L. members are veterans of World War I or II. World War II veterans constitute 1,500,000 or 21 per cent, and all veterans 25 per cent, of the total A. F. of L. membership as of August 31, 1946.

Union Fees and Dues

The great majority of A. F. of L. affiliates have taken the initiative in reducing the financial burden on returning servicemen whether the veterans are joining one of our internationals for the first time or resuming their former membership. Almost 60 per cent of our affiliates have completely waived initiation fees for new veteran A. F. of L. members while 15 per cent have cut these fees. Only 25 per cent maintain their normal initiation fee.

In order to help prewar A. F. of L. members maintain their good standing while in the service, over 90 per cent of our international unions maintained servicemen's membership without any payment of dues. In many cases, the veteran's own local undertook to pay his dues. If a veteran was not in good standing when drafted, 90 per cent of the unions permit his return, in good standing, without any reinstatement fee. Most of the others limit back payments to three or four months.

Job Rights for Veterans
Perhaps the most crucial question for union members who entered the service is job protection—protection of his employment rights based on the individual worker's length of service or seniority on his job. With the extension of seniority rights through collective bargaining, arbitrary layoffs and favoritism in promotion are reduced and workers' morale raised. The American Federation of Labor led in the fight to incorporate in the Selective Service Act the principles of retained seniority and job rights for all union members while in the service. The Selective Service Act, as passed, stated that any discharged serviceman was entitled to his former position or a position of "like seniority, status and pay."

Two difficulties inherent in this provision of the draft law were immediately evident. First, while veterans could bring court action against employers who denied them reemployment, the procedure was too lengthy and expensive for the individual veteran. So our local unions undertook the task of placing their support behind each individual veteran's fight for reemployment. The second, and major difficulty, was the "super-seniority" interpretation given by the Director of Selective Service. This "super-seniority" principle leads to chaos. It undermines the very equity of the seniority system. It constitutes "class legislation," in clear violation of the constitution.

Labor's fight against this "super-seniority" misinterpretation was based on our determination to safeguard the job rights of all workers, veteran and non-veteran. Without union organization and collective bargaining agreements, seniority has no meaning and the provisions of the Selective Service Act could not be genuinely effective. The U.S. Supreme Court, in a recent decision, supported the A. F. of L. position when it rejected the "super-seniority" interpretation.

Labor's deep concern for aiding the readjustment and reintegration of veterans into civilian life is shown by the benefits we have obtained for servicemen which go far beyond the requirements of the Selective Service Act—benefits which include numerous pay, promotion and vacation rights.

Vacation Eligibility

All A. F. of L. unions have fought for the most liberal application of vacation clauses for veterans in union agreements. In practically all contracts, military service is counted as "time employed" in determining the vacation time due to individual veterans. In addition, special determinations of time "at work" preceeding vacation rights are provided in a large number of contracts so that veterans' vacation rights can accrue as soon as they enter employment.

Job Assignments, Pay and Promotions

The Selective Service Act failed to answer many of the specific questions confronting a veteran when he applies for his old job: is he entitled to promotion? to increased pay? to a comparable job if his old job has been cut out?

In helping individuals answer these questions, our affiliates have not only insisted on the legal rights of veterans, but also demanded justice based on the equities of the individual case. Most A. F. of L. contracts have special clauses protecting promotion rights of veterans, stating specifically that he will be employed in the position and at the pay in the classification or at the same seniority to which he would have been entitled had he remained on the job. These contracts frequently provide that if a job formerly held by a veteran is discontinued, he will have a preferential status when new openings become available.

Disabled Veterans

The provisions for disabled veterans in A. F. of L. contracts have also gone far beyond the legal requirements of the Draft Act which makes no distinction between veterans who are physically handicapped and those able to resume their former jobs.

There can be no general rule for re-employment of disabled veterans, but a majority of our unions give seniority credit for those disabled during their recuperation period and extend the 90-day deadline for reinstatement after discharge.

Apprenticeship Training

Veterans are encouraged and aided to take part in all apprentice training programs our affiliates maintain jointly with employers. At present, veterans account for nearly 85 per cent of an estimated 100,000 apprentices. In addition, skilled trades are making a special effort to speed up apprentice training to assure a sufficient supply of journeymen trained to meet the heavy demands of reconversion, especially in the extensive housing program.

The rapid increase in the number of veteran apprentices is helped by the joint union-management apprenticeship committees which set up standards of pay and working conditions to protect apprentices and assure them of sound training. These committees now cover over 41,000 establishments—a 66 per cent increase over the past eight months.

Accelerated training of veterans is facilitated by the special considerations incorporated in the apprentice training agreements. These include specified priority in employment (in 70 per cent); credit for previous experience, including that in the armed services (in 88 per cent); maximum age exemptions (in 48 per cent); special considerations due to unusual qualifications, physical handicaps or veterans status (in 53 per cent); and provision for paid class instruction in related subjects (in 14 percent).

Hundreds of local building trades unions, faced with special local problems, have worked out new methods to speed and facilitate apprentice training, such as increasing the ratio of apprentices to journeymen, arranging to use public school facilities for classroom training to cut down the time required for "on-the-job" training, etc.

Thus each veteran apprentice receives not only the benefits won in the building trades unions' long fight to improve apprenticeship pay and other standards, but also the protection won by unions of veterans' rights under the GI Bill of Rights. Unscrupulous employers have used the government-paid monthly subsistence payments under this bill as a wage-cutting device and have put veterans on unskilled and unproductive jobs. We have insisted upon clearly defined standards which employers must meet before their training programs can be approved. Under a recently enacted bill (Public Law 679) standards are established which, if properly enforced, can eliminate malpractices in veterans' training programs. A. F. of L. will continue to fight for the rights of veteran-trainees by eliminating the limitations, also written into this bill, on the amount of allowance these trainees may receive.

The Veterans' Committee is pledged to continue its work in helping servicemen as they return to their homes, their jobs and their unions. In this way Labor can repay a part of the debt all Americans owe to veterans for the services they have rendered in the defense of freedom and their nation.

(1947, p. 268) The concern which the A. F. of L. has always manifested for the welfare of the nation's veterans was reflected in the report of the E.C. and the convention action thereon, as follows:

The American Federation of Labor has always felt a keen responsibility for the welfare of the nation's veterans. Even before the passage of the Selective Service Act unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor were making contractual arrangements to protect the employment and seniority status of its members who had volunteered for military service.

The Federation took the initiative in preparing for reconversion early in the war years. A postwar planning committee of the A. F. of L. was appointed which gave special attention to the problems that servicemen would face as they returned to their homes and their jobs. In a series of recommendations, the committee framed a broad, constructive A. F. of L. program for veterans based upon these two fundamental principles:

1. Full job security for the veteran can be attained only insofar as this country is able to maintain an economy of high production and employment. Only when the nation can solve the problem of providing employment opportunities for all who wish to work will the veteran achieve real job security.

2. The veteran is entitled to every consideration that will enable him to become more easily integrated in civilian life. By devoting a crucial portion of his life to the service of his country, he has been seriously handicapped in his life-work. The community is therefore obligated to provide him with every available means to make up for his lost opportunities.

The American Federation of Labor Committee on Veterans translated these objectives into specific policies and procedures adopted by virtually all of our unions. Initiation and reinstatement fees have been waived or drastically reduced, membership in good standing maintained without dues, benefits paid, apprentice training requirements relaxed, and special contract clauses written in order to make the transition period easier for the veteran and to give him better protection on his job.

Through the mechanism of the collective agreement, the veteran's right to his job and all improvements in terms of employment secured by the union in his absence have been protected. Special provisions regarding promotions, vacations, and disabilities have been incorporated into agreements. These go far beyond the temporary and limited protection afforded veterans by the reemployment provisions of the Selective Service Act.

Union contracts protect the veteran's job with full seniority rights, not on the one-year limited basis of the Selective Service Act, but for the length of his employment. This means effective and lasting security instead of the uncertain protection that would have been given by the "super-seniority" interpretation of the Selective Service Act. Labor imposed the "super-seniority" doctrine because, in order to gain a temporary, one-year protection for veterans, it would have pitted veterans against non-veterans in the fight for jobs and would have served to disrupt and destroy the very basis of seniority. In practice, the veterans themselves were given to recognize as crucial, the simple truth that seniority rules were devised and built up by unions and that without unions seniority is replaced by the whim of the employer.

Despite these many activities of unions on their behalf, many servicemen returned to civilian life with newly acquired prejudices against organized labor. These prejudices stemmed largely from the wartime press and radio campaign of misinformation which magnified each work stoppage and gave Labor no credit for its part in the winning of the war.

In order to counteract these prejudices, the A. F. of L. Committee on Veterans published during the past year the pamphlet entitled, "What Every Veteran Should Know About Labor." This booklet was favorably received and widely distributed. Another pamphlet, "Jobs for the Handicapped Through Collective Bargaining," urging the employment of handicapped workers, dealt particularly with the problems of displaced veterans. These publications and intensive veterans' information services maintained by our headquarters staff have done much to win the good will of veterans toward our movement.

The so-called "veterans problem" involves a very large number of our citizens. At the present time the Veterans Administration estimates that there are over 18 million veterans in the United States. A. F. of L. estimates indicate that over 1,800,000 of these are members of unions affiliated with the Federation. In manufacturing alone, veterans now comprise over 20 per cent of the total work force.

These veterans constitute an important force in the life of the nation. They have been voicing many demands for special treatment in such fields as employment, education, and housing, many of which have been actively supported by the A. F. of L.

To this we feel it is important to add a warning. While it is imperative that the legitimate demands of veterans for preferential treatment be effectively met in order to compensate them, as much as possible, for the time they spent in the service of their country, it is also important that steps be taken to break down barriers of animosity between veterans and non-veterans. The objective toward which all public policies concerning veterans should be directed is not only to adjust the legitimate grievances of veterans, but also to create an atmosphere of good-will in which veterans and non-veterans are treated equally, as citizens. Veterans and non-veterans alike must realize that this country will prosper only if all groups are prosperous.

For the American Federation of Labor, we urge that every possible action be taken to cement friendly relations between veterans and organized labor. Although much progress has been made in this, it is important to realize that any substantial drop in employment is likely to create new tension. A return to the era of unemployment and job competition will be disastrous to all workers. But the veterans will look upon it as their betrayal. If this nation neglects its responsibility of maintaining full employment, the "bonus marches" of 1932 are certain to be repeated on a greatly magnified scale. Soldiers and sailors of yesterday are workers and citizens of today. As workers and as citizens, they must make common cause with organized labor in furthering policies which would avert another depression and help build a nation strong in peace, able to yield a better life to all.

We urge that all affiliated unions continue to give special attention to the veterans' problems. We ask in particular that central labor unions formulate community-wide programs to acquaint veterans with the work of the American Federation of Labor. Union members and local union officials who are veterans are urged to participate actively, as individuals, in their community veterans' affairs, and, through their unions, keep the American Federation of Labor Committee on Veterans informed of their activities.

(P. 565) Convention unanimously adopted the following:

We recommend approval of this section which recounts the well-planned and effective program for veterans, in the adoption of which the American Federation of Labor has been instrumental. This program has sought to compensate veterans for handicaps due to military services as well as to help them to take up the responsibilities of civilian life.

We endorse the suggestion that all central labor unions participate in community programs or help to initiate programs where they do not already exist, to assist veterans to become integrated into the community. We urge each central labor union to appoint union committees to advise veterans as well as all young persons wishing to learn trades or enter industrial vocational training. Such committees should also advise potential workers of the services which unions provide.

Apprenticeship Training—(1947, p. 658) Res. 58 requested A. F. of L. support for amendments to Public Law 679 to meet the "intent and purpose of the GI Bill; and for the creation of a National or Statewide Joint Labor-Management Committee to advise with the Veterans Bureau on on-the-job training," etc. The resolution was referred to the Executive Council.

(P. 555) Protest against provisions contained in Public Law 679 relating to Veterans Apprenticeship Training, was unanimously voted in Res. 90, as follows:

Whereas—Public Law 679, relating to Veterans Apprenticeship Training, was recently passed and enacted by Congress at the last week of its 1946 session without a hearing or due consideration and deliberation, and

Whereas—The said Public Law 679 in its present form imposes a hardship upon trainees because it fails to adequately compensate trainees and their dependents during their training period, and

Whereas—Public Law 679 presently tends to discourage eligible veterans from accepting the advantages of apprentice training and on-the-job training programs, to which benefits veterans are entitled and which they rightfully deserve the benefits of, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, assembled at this, its 66th Convention, take all necessary action to induce Congress at its next session, to restore to veterans all the benefits which they received prior to the passage of Public Law 679.

(P. 664) The convention unanimously adopted Res. 144 as follows:

Whereas—Under the GI Bill of Rights, Public Law 346, when it was first enacted a discharged veteran was given the assurance that he would receive the difference in wages on the progressive rate between an apprentice and a journeyman and at no time was he to receive above the ceiling wages of journeymen of any given craft or trade, and

Whereas—With this assurance the average veteran seeking to reestablish himself in civil life obligated himself to the fullest extent of his wages as guaranteed by Public Law 346, and

Whereas—The enactment of Public Law 679 placing a ceiling whereby a maximum of $175 per month for a single man and $200 a month for a married man was instituted, and

Whereas—This lowering of a veteran's wages reduced his living standards placing him in the position of not meeting his financial obligations, and

Whereas—The Veterans Administration, waiting for authorization to enforce Public Law 679, overpaid a great many veterans and have notified the veterans that not only will the subsistence pay be cut off but they will be denied any further training under the veterans' program unless refunds of the overpayment is made immediately, and

Whereas—This will work an extreme hardship upon the veterans and will compel them to work at any job they may be able to secure with no chance of learning a skilled trade, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor goes on record as seeking to correct this injustice and use its influence to cause this law to be amended.

Legislation—(1947, pp. 253, 524) All support possible was given by the E.C. to measures favorable to veterans in the Congress. The convention directed that the E.C. continue its policy of supporting legislation introduced in the interests of the veterans.

(1948, p. 142) A brief but comprehensive report on legislation of particular interest to veterans, was included in the report of the E.C. to the convention.

(P. 472) Convention urged the continued support by the E.C. of all just measures for benefits to the veterans of all wars.

(P. 145) The council reported to the convention that the A. F. of L. had given full support to all measures favorable to veterans and "although the legislation enacted in the 80th Congress does not meet fully the proposals of the A. F. of L. . . . remarkable progress is being made in behalf of the veteran."

Certificates to Accompany Medals—(1948, pp. 235, 457) Res. 11:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in its 67th Convention, held in the City of Cincinnati, Ohio, which convenes Monday, November 15, 1948, petitions the War Department of the United States Government to again issue to these heroes of World War II, these engraved and plate printed certificates at the same time they are presented with "The Air Medal," "The Purple Heart," "The Bronze Star Medal," for Meritorious Achievement in Ground Operations Against the Enemy, or "The Bronze Star Medal" for Heroism in Ground Combat.

(P. 277) In his response to the Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, President Green made the following remarks concerning parallel service of armed forces and "soldiers of production":

"I was just thinking when the distinguished commander-in-chief was delivering his message of the wonderful teamwork that was developed during World War I and World War II between those who served on the battlefields of Europe, as represented by the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the great army of production which we have the honor to represent here in the United States of America. I recall with a feeling of genuine pleasure and satisfaction the manner in which the membership of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars served on the battlefields of Europe and other places, and I also remember the great service rendered by the army of production here at home in the mill, in the mines, in the factories and on the transportation lines of the nation. Those who served in both armies gave their lives. Men were killed on the battlefields of Europe and men were killed in the mines and in the mills and in the factories at home. In fact, I think the record will show that about as many were killed at home as were killed on the battlefields of Europe.

"All gave their lives, all sacrificed, all suffered for the preservation of American principles and our form of government. I can truthfully say that if another war comes in which the same principles are at stake, this great army of production here at home will rally again and serve just as they did in World Wars I and II.

"I recall that we made a solemn pledge and promise to the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, that for the duration of the war the members of the army of production of America would place the strike weapon behind the door and leave it there until Hitler and Mussolini were defeated. We did, and our people refrained from engaging in strikes. We carried out that pledge 98 per cent during the war, so that the armies abroad would not suffer for a single moment for anything they needed to win the war.

"It is that kind of teamwork that counts. It is that kind of cooperation that wins wars, and we are all happy in that we participated in the development of that character of teamwork and in that kind of service during the war.

"Little minor differences that might arise between us are of no consequence. These differences arise even in families, in churches, in fraternal organizations, and in all groups of society. But the important thing is that we stand together in defense of fundamentals, of vital principles, of our form of government and of America for American institutions. That is what we need to place emphasis on and that is what we will place emphasis on in the days to come.

"I want to thank you again for your visit to us and to assure you of our cooperation and support. We will stand with you in the fight you make for legislation for veterans, the armies, members of the Legion, or members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and we together will work in the future as we have in the past."

Veterans Hospital Employees—(1948, pp. 333, 476) Difficulties in attracting and holding efficient help in veterans hospitals because of low grades and classifications, was the subject-matter of Res. 130. A. F. of L. requested to "give its full support to legislation requesting a change in the titles of the (said) employees giving them a semi-professional title which will allow them higher salaries under the Classification Act and that adequate appropriations be granted to take care of the raise, and to relieve the annual leave situation which has accrued because of the lack of employees."

Sick Leave, Accumulated—(1949, pp. 52, 389) Res. 51:

Whereas—Many postal and federal employees were called to active duty with the Armed Forces of the United States during World War II, and

Whereas—No provision has been made granting accumulative sick leave for the time spent in the Armed Forces, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record as favoring granting accumulative sick leave to all federal employees for the period of time spent in the Armed Forces during World War II and in any future national emergency equal to that which they would have been entitled to, had they remained in continuous service in the Federal Civil Service, and that we urge the officers of the A. F. of L. to do all in their power to secure the enactment of legislation designed for this purpose.

Subsistence for On-the-Job Training—(1949, pp. 49, 387) Res. 38 requested legislation allowing the payment of full subsistence for veterans in on-the-job training programs where a standard work week of less than 36 hours per week has been established as a result of bona fide collective bargaining between employers and employees.

(1951, pp. 305, 513) Res. 79:

Whereas—There was established by the Veterans Administration a regulation known as Technical Bulletin 7-98 which is so written as to deny the payment of subsistence allowances to veterans who are serving apprenticeships as printers, and other trades such as pressmen, stereotypers, photo-engravers, plumbers, pipefitters, patternmakers and die sinkers, which would be paid to them under identical circumstances if they would select some other trade, and

Whereas—The Veterans Administration has flagrantly ignored the rights of such apprentices and has adamantly refused to recognize the journeyman rate as the objective rate of the apprentice and refuses to correct this discrimination against the trades named and the veteran apprentices therein, and

Whereas—Bills have been introduced in the Congress known as S. 801 and H.R. 2683 to correct by law the discrimination being invoked by the Veterans Administration through its regulation, and

Whereas—The Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget, has recommended to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare that it not give favorable consideration to S. 801, therefore, be it

Resolved—That it protests with full vigor this unfair action by the Veterans Administration of the United States and views with great surprise the fact that this office would so lightly brush away the rights of a specific group of veterans who fought as valiantly for the preservation of freedom as did any other group of veterans, and, be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor urge the President of the United States to reverse the action of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and immediately request the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and the House Committee on Veterans Affairs to enact without further delay S. 801 and H.R. 2683, to the end that the aforementioned discrimination of the Veterans Administration may be terminated and full rights restored to apprentices who suffer under said discrimination . . .

Trainee (Opposing Home Construction, By)—(1949, pp. 119, 501) Res. 119 opposed legislation pending which would permit veterans who are pursuing full-time institutional trade courses to build homes for veterans, buildings for charitable organizations, veterans' organizations and tax-supported institutions, and also to authorize veterans to construct, improve and repair public buildings for which work the veterans would receive no pay.

Apprenticeship Training — (1950, pp. 19, 456) Res. 1 unanimously adopted:

Whereas—The Veterans Administration has approved fees and subsistence pay for veterans qualifying for training under the GI Bill of Rights, who do not possess a college degree, or who do not have sufficient credits to enter a college, and

Whereas—The Veterans Administration has established a program of 18 months' duration for the training of veterans in skilled trades, and this is not adequate for a person to learn any skilled trade properly, and

Whereas—He upon graduation not being a competent mechanic is not qualified for membership in the craft union having jurisdiction in the field in which he has received his training, and as a result is usually found accepting positions under the regular established rates and thus undermining the trade union movement, and

Whereas—Our unions have constructive apprenticeship programs which would provide adequate sound training for the veterans, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor take such action as is deemed necessary to have the Veterans Administration extend the period of GI training to a period comparable to those established by the bona fide unions in their respective fields, and be it further

Resolved—That the Veterans Administration also provide, in addition to regular apprenticeship training with bona fide employers, that the services of the public school system be made available to the students.

(Pp. 329, 498) Res. 112 directed attention to a regulation of the Veterans Bureau which in effect was discriminatory against trades requiring more than four years apprenticeship training, and calling upon the convention to strongly support H.R. 7809 and S. 3485 and seek passage thereof.

Postal Service (Benefits)—(1950, p. 153) Perhaps the most active legislative campaign for a large number of government employees in which we participated was for enactment of H.R. 87, the bill to grant credit for military service of veterans who entered the postal service after discharge from the military branches. Long hours were spent, both in House and Senate to get passage of this far-reaching measure. Every step of the way was contested by those who did not want the bill to get through.

Finally the bill was vetoed. The President gave as his reason that it was "class legislation" designed to affect only a select group of government employees. Other reasons included the cost factor. The bill actually would have been the forerunner to further legislation to include veterans in the non-postal service at a later date.

The House promptly overrode the veto, 213-72, after which some delay was met in having the motion made in the Senate to bring about the same effect.

Training (Labor Representation Sought)—(1950, p. 236) Under the GI Bill of Rights, and subsequently enacted legislation to further implement the program, no provision was made for Labor representation in the planning of training programs. No administrative provision was made for Labor advisors in policy-planning and training.

As a result, the training program for GI's has been most unsatisfactory. Abuses, involving thousands of dollars of public money, have been reported. Men have been registered in trade schools which have little or no connection with a craft for which the worker allegedly is being trained. There has been little consideration given by counselors of the potentialities for employment in the crafts in which they have been advising veterans to take training. On the whole, there have been practically no functional relations between veterans' training and the trade union movement, or between veterans' training and the Federal Apprenticeship Training Program. We can now foresee an extended period of veterans' training. Hence, it is of greatest importance that special attention be given immediately to this suggestion.

In the interest of the veterans and to assure the use of public funds for properly conducted programs, provision must be made immediately by law or by administrative ruling for Labor advisory committees at the national, state, and local levels to participate in developing programs for veterans' training. These committees should be given express authority to help formulate policy and then to assure the observance of the policies agreed to.

(P. 428) This section of the Executive Council's Report calls attention to the fact that no provision has been made for Labor advisory committees in relation to the education and training programs under the GI Bill of Rights. As a result there have been grave difficulties in the vocational training program of this important educational service for veterans. Not only has counseling in relation to job training been inadequate, but in many instances "racket" schools have urged veterans to enroll in courses which gave training for non-existent jobs.

The American Federation of Labor was one of the agencies which worked actively for enactment of the GI Bill and the liberalization of its educational and vocational provisions. The American Federation of Labor recognizes that literally millions of veterans have been constructively and honorably trained under the GI Bill. The absence of Labor advisory committees, however, in relation to vocational training, has resulted in inefficiency and exploitation.

For more than two-thirds of a century the American Federation of Labor has battled against exploitation of children in unfair child labor and against exploitation of workers in the name of vocational education. Organized labor should be equally concerned about the exploitation of the men and women who have served their country in the armed forces in time of war. Exploitation of veterans through deceptive educational programs is one of the most damnable practices in the whole field of education.

Conference of Union Labor Veterans—(1950, pp. 326, 491) Res. 104:

Whereas—There are thousands of war veteran members of the American Federation of Labor who are not affiliated with any veterans' organization resulting in the fact that labor veterans are not playing a maximum part in establishing the policies and programs of such veterans bodies, and

Whereas—Veterans' organizations suggest and help to determine many policies and much legislation of both our state and federal governments pertaining to veterans affairs and other matters affecting not only veterans but other members of organized labor as well, and

Whereas—There has been established a veterans organization known as The National Conference of Union Labor Veterans to provide for a collective voice of labor war veterans in veteran affairs and to help promote a unified voice of Labor and veterans in politics and government, and

Whereas—Membership in the National Conference of Union Labor Veterans is open only to honorably discharged war veterans, who, where eligible, are members of recognized labor unions, and who subscribe to the aims and purposes of the conference, and

Whereas—The purposes of the National Conference of Union Labor Veterans as set forth in the organization's constitution and by-laws are in accord with the principles of the American Federation of Labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor commend the National Conference of Union Labor Veterans and recommend membership and participation in this excellent veterans' organization by all members of the American Federation of Labor who are eligible for membership.

Preference (Post Office Carriers)—(1950, pp. 34, 480) Res. 28 directed attention to the possible results to non-veteran postal carriers if super-seniority is imposed without regard to service of the postal carrier.

Whereas—In the event of a reduction in force of a federal agency, no veteran may be separated while there is a non-veteran on the rolls, and

Whereas—It is conceivable that under the terms of this law, an employee who has given many years of valuable and faithful service to his government could be displaced by a veteran with very little service, and

Whereas—This is a grave injustice and a menace to the security of hundreds of faithful and loyal employees who, because of their age, family conditions or physical handicap have been unable to serve in their nation's armed forces, and

Whereas—The recent curtailment order issued by the Postmaster General again brings into focus the need for legislation to protect carrier employees, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, go on record as favoring an early enactment of legislation to correct this situation, and give the veteran super-seniority only to the extent that his seniority is similar to that of a non-veteran whom he is to displace.

This resolution was referred to the Executive Council.

Health Care to Dependents—(1952, p. 267) The E.C. reported active support for proposed legislation as follows:

To provide for the national defense by enabling the states to make provision for maternity and infant care for wives and infants, and hospital care for dependents, of enlisted members of the Armed Forces during the present emergency, and for other purposes.

This proposal concerns the American GI—the enlisted man in the Armed Forces of the United States.

To servicemen whose wives become expectant mothers, nothing is more important than the assurance of proper medical facilities to see the mother and the child safely through. Yet, the great majority of them are confronted with an enormous economic obstacle: inability to meet the heavy financial burden of proper pre-natal medical care, of maternity hospitalization and of proper medical care of both the mother and the infant.

(P. 493) The convention authorized continued support of legislation referred to under this title.

Insurance—(1952, p. 23) Res. 5 proposed an amendment to the Insurance Act governing veterans' insurance, whereby beneficiaries may elect method of payment instead of having to accept monthly payments.

(P. 457) The recommendation of the convention committee were unanimously approved as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that the desires and instructions of the veteran owner of the insurance policy should be respected, and therefore recommends non-concurrence in the resolution, and with these comments the committee further recommends that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Social Security.

Review Court on Claims—(1952, pp. 22, 457) Res. 3:

Whereas—Many of our membership are veterans of World Wars No. I and II, and

Whereas—A large percentage of our members are now enlisted, enrolled, drafted, inducted or appointed into military or naval forces of the United States, and

Whereas—Many veterans are of the opinion that the Veterans Administration has not given them just consideration in their claims for benefits available under existing veterans' law, and

Whereas—Section 5 of Public Law No. 2, 73rd Congress, now states that all decisions rendered by the Administration of Veterans Affairs under the provisions of this title, or the regulations issued pursuant thereto, shall be final and conclusive on all questions of law and fact, and no other official or court of the United States should have jurisdiction to review by mandamus or otherwise any such decision, and

Whereas—This law is unfair and dictatorial, and

Whereas—These veterans desire to have their case reviewed by court of the United States in order to determine if they have received a fair decision, and

Whereas—Under existing law this privilege is denied, therefore, be it

Resolved—That a special court be established for the purpose of reviewing claims of veterans, who have been denied benefits by the Veterans Administration, and be it further

Resolved—That the court shall have only the power to review the claims after the request has been made by the veteran or his representative, and be it further

Resolved—That the court shall be empowered to review any other question of law, concerning laws coming under the Administration of Veterans Affairs, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention requests the American Federation of Labor to secure the enactment of legislation to revise the law now in effect, Section No. 5 of Public Law No. 2, 73rd Congress.

The convention referred the subject matter of the resolution to the officers of the A. F. of L.

Vice President of U.S., Duties—(1948, p. 331) Res. 125 called upon the A. F. of L. to officially go on record favoring an expansion of the duties and broadening of responsibilities of the Vice President; and further that the A. F. of L. call upon all labor organizations in the United States to use their utmost influence to bring about the realization of this objective.

(P. 470) Resolution referred to Executive Council by convention "for study and consideration."

Vigilantism—(1936, p. 571) Vigilantism is becoming more prevalent each year and more vicious in its attacks on organized labor with the aim of destroying trade unions and subjugating Labor to the will of the employers. Law enforcement bodies frequently have failed to cope with vigilantes, and in some cases have condoned and encouraged their lawless actions. Therefore, the A. F. of L. goes on record as condemning the activities of such terroristic organizations that take the law into their own hands.

Virgin Islands—(1925, p. 314) Resolution requesting the President of the U.S. to transfer the official government business of the Virgin Islands from the Bureau of Insular Affairs to the Interior Department was adopted. The E.C. is also requested to petition Congress to enact legislation that will place the people of the Virgin Islands under a civil form of government and grant to them rights of citizenship.

(1954, pp. 148, 584) Although the Virgin Islands have a population of only 25,000 in an area of 133 square miles, these islands have had a very cumbersome system of government. Under a 1936 law, three separate local governments were established to rule on the islands, a system which obviously produced a great deal of duplication and confusion.

The recent session of Congress, however, revised this arrangement and provided a new Organic Act, under which the islands will be governed by a single legislature and a single executive government of not more than nine departments. The Governor of the Virgin Islands will be appointed by the President of the United States and the island government will be somewhat supervised by the Interior Department. The enactment of this legislation, which represents a real advance in government for the islands, was supported by the American Federation of Labor.

Vocational Rehabilitation, Office of—(1949, p. 182) In all training programs, we have urged the integration of the worker with his community. The need for integrating the handicapped worker with his community is especially important.

Largely through the efforts of the American Federation of Labor, the LaFollette Act was passed. Under its provisions, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation of the Federal Security Agency stimulates and aids the states in helping the handicapped become self-reliant citizens again. Such a program has been in operation for some time. To make the program work effectively, it is necessary that our state federations and our local central bodies and the leaders of our internationals actively cooperate with and counsel with the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation on the national and state level. Actually many of our members do not know of the opportunities open to them under this program. The Committee on Education has appointed a subcommittee to aid in improving and developing this essential program. We believe that the recommendations made by this subcommittee at the close of its study, should be presented to the American Federation of Labor and fully employed by our organization.

(P. 356) The Executive Council calls special attention to the opportunities for assistance to handicapped workers through the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation. The permanent Committee on Education has appointed a special committee to aid in improving this important service. All affiliated organizations of the American Federation of Labor are urged to take advantage of the services which are available for handicapped workers.

Voluntarism — (1926, pp. 37, 304) American trade unions are founded fundamentally upon principles of voluntary action. They seek to negotiate agreements with employers which provide specific, definite terms and conditions under which work shall be done. Trade agreements rest upon the principle of voluntary action. It is upon this same fundamental principle of consent of the governed that our nation is built. Thus the principles and practices of American trade unionism are in full accord with the principles and practices of our great republic.

With the growth and development of American industry and the organization of ever larger units of industrial enterprise in corporate form there is the imperative need for a parallel form of organization of the workers in those industries so that the employment contract may retain the value and virtue of equality of opportunity and assure all a fair measure of mutuality and exercise of free will in the making of employment agreements.

When these principles of mutuality of participation and exercise of free will are denied in the making of employment contracts there develops a feeling of resentment or an indifference because of the lack of initiative which arbitrary management fosters. Protest against lack of mutuality expresses itself in many forms; in the desire of complete domination either by employers, by workers, or through the instrumentality of the state. Any one of these extremes is undesirable and harmful to the general community as well as industry. The trade unions of America are a helpful and constructive force in maintaining and perpetuating Americanism and its free and democratic institutions.

Because American trade unionism is founded upon these great principles the American wage earners have progressed and prospered more than the workers of any other nation.

Trade contracts or collective agreements between organized wage earners and employers have therefore embraced in the main, standards for compensating workmen for services rendered and setting forth conditions under which that service is to be rendered. Therefore agreements have embraced in the main wages or returns that shall come to workers. Collective bargaining establishes a relationship between management and employees that affords an opportunity for organized wage earners to interest themselves in the problems of the industry and to give the benefit of their experience for the development of better methods of work and in the solving of production problems. A decided forward step has been taken in this direction by some of our national and international unions. This development and tendency should meet with favor and support from all organized labor. We are of the opinion that trade union agreements should include provisions providing plans for the establishment of permanent machinery for interpretation of agreements and for dealing with new incidental problems as they arise. We urge also careful consideration of additional provisions whereby the union may cooperate with management. There is a vital basis for cooperation between workers and management in their interdependent interests in the success of the industrial undertaking in which they are employed. Progress and efficiency in either group bring reciprocal benefits to the other.

In this regard this convention is in full accord with the expression of the last as well as previous conventions of the A. F. of L. to the effect that existing anti-combination or anti-trust laws have been so construed judicially as to create great uncertainty regarding the legal status of trade unions and to restrict, hamper and hinder the expansion and activities of organized labor. These legislative and judicial restrictions and limitations are an attempt to prohibit necessary and normal development and a curtailment upon the principle of freedom of contract advanced under guise of promoting the public welfare and preventing public exploitation. While stated in terms of purposes of human welfare the actual operation of these restrictive laws so far as wage earners are concerned has been to deny and limit their opportunities for organization and in constantly narrowing their field of operation.

This subject is one that is highly complex and requires considerable research and study. It may also prove essential that affirmative legislation may be required in addition to legislation intended to remove existing legislative restrictions and limitations.

As directed by the last convention of the A. F. of L., the E.C. has given study to this subject. It is the hope that during the coming year substantial progress may be made in securing the cooperation of other interested groups to remove unjustified restrictions upon industry and organized wage earners and thereby enable organized workers and employers to enlarge upon the functions of trade union agreements which will lead to a more constructive form of relationship to and participation in industry.

Under an existing legal economic system those investing their capital in industrial or commercial enterprise are accorded advantages and opportunities not accorded to Labor. The investors of capital are free to organize into corporate associations and in turn these industrial units unite in various forms of associations, federations and combinations. They exercise rights and principles which they seek to deny to their employees and other wage earners. Hence, such unlimited power and opportunity of organization tends to make Labor subservient to organized capital. We hold that the test of validity of organized power is not in the grant of power but in the manner in which such power is exercised. The right of employers to organization should be made dependent upon equal opportunity for organized powers and rights on the part of Labor. It is therefore recommended that efforts be directed toward making the grant of corporate power of capital dependent upon freedom of like power of organization upon the part both of the workers as well as the consuming public, thus reestablishing a fair degree of freedom of play to all economic, industrial and social factors and elements in industry.

Supplemental to this general proposal we have caused the subject of declaring the provision in employment contracts against joining a trade union as being contrary to public policy and therefore unenforceable at law, to be investigated, and as was directed by the Atlantic City Convention of the A. F. of L., considerable information has been obtained on this subject. There appears to be considerable doubt as to the validity or constitutionality of such proposed legislation. Then, too, there is embraced in this proposal the possible danger of such proposed legislation being used against organized labor.

While attention is directed to the elements of danger contained in this proposed anti-"yellow dog contract" legislation, nevertheless we are not yet fully prepared to submit a final recommendation on this subject. Instead, it proposes that the subject be further inquired into and that it be authorized to take such further action as its continued study and consideration may warrant.

The attempt to delay unnecessarily or to deny the workers organized and unorganized their right to cease work and to compel them to submit their grievances or adjustment of terms of employment and of compensation to arbitration or for decision to an industrial court, has practically ceased. It is recognized everywhere that an attempt made to fix terms of employment and to regulate remedial relations between employers and workers is a clear denial of freedom of contract and creates instead a condition of status. It is further recognized that for the state to fix the terms of the employment contract either through force of compulsory arbitration or industrial courts, will eventually lead to a complete domination of the state over industry itself.

What at first appeared as Labor's contest aroused the interest and support of all fair-minded citizens and even employing interests hostile to organized labor. Perhaps the only elements in our society favorable to such a state proposal were those solely engaged in trading and not manufacturing and those hoping to profit politically.

Because of the foregoing the Colorado law, which seeks to hold in check cessation of work with the thought in mind of developing compulsory arbitration, the Kansas Industrial law which is now merely a shadow and without substance, have ceased to merit any further public support and remain merely as exhibits of an abortive attempt to enslave industry to the state.

In addition to the foregoing, the former Canadian Industrial Disputes Investigation Law has been amended as a result of a decision by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declaring this law ultra vires. This amended law is in substance a compulsory investigation law and intended to restrain cessation of work either at the instigation of employers or workers until the dispute in question has been inquired into and an effort made to secure an agreement. Therefore the parties to the dispute are free to do as they will unless both parties have agreed beforehand to abide by the decision of the industrial board. This amended law is largely modelled after the Colorado law and it is firmly believed will prove as ineffectual as the Colorado law.

Perhaps the most pronounced progress made this year in eradicating the most subtle form of denial of the right of freedom to collective agreements is evidenced in the enactment of the Watson-Parker Law. This law has abolished the Railroad Labor Board and instead has set out in clear and unmistakable language the right of the railroad and transportation workers to voluntary collective bargaining.

Thus to all practical intents and purposes the long, trying, as well as bitter campaign of the trade union organizations and the A. F. of L. for the right to collective bargaining and freedom from domination of the state in the form of compulsory arbitration or through industrial courts, has come to a successful ending. Again, organized labor in America has vindicated its course and demonstrated the wisdom of its judgment. In addition, it has rendered a great public service and has blazoned the way for more constructive policies and helpful procedures both to industry as well as the general public good.

(P. 304) The principles which the A. F. of L. sets forth in its report determine those distinctive qualities and practices of the American labor movement which gives it personality and character. The American labor movement has developed within a democratic environment and expresses the ideals of wage earners who believe in an essential equality of opportunity for all without restrictions of an artificial nature. Because our movement is directed by these principles, we are not handicapped by consideration of class restrictions but feel that by utilizing principles of voluntary initiative and association we can best discharge our responsibility for promoting our welfare individually and as members of groups with which we are associated. We wish specifically to emphasize the reciprocal effects of progress in promoting the welfare of any one group in society or industry.

We wish also to emphasize the statement that trade agreements and collective agreements must rest upon a basis of mutuality. Any other basis would be out of harmony with American institutions and with the architectural principles of our national institutions. It is necessary to guard against both legislative and judicial restrictions upon voluntary association.

Organized labor and industry must be free voluntarily to work out their problems through group action.

It is further pointed out that industrial relations and individual or collective agreements for service are in no sense nor should such agreements be considered either in law or equity as contracts for the sale of commodities or articles of commerce and be governed by the same legal standards or judgments. Human considerations are emphasized in agreements for service, while in contracts of sale material considerations are embraced in the main. Because service agreements embrace a personal and human relationship we set out specifically that machinery for the interpretation, construction and application of trade union agreements should be provided in such trade union agreements and that the courts of law or equity should not be permitted to intervene in such trade union agreements.

Under our existing legal economic system, capital is accorded advantages not accorded to Labor and Labor is thereby placed to great disadvantage with organized capital. Reference is made in particular to those artificial creatures of the law known as corporations and to industrial and commercial associations and combinations.

The conclusion is reached that the grant of corporate power to corporations and organization of corporations should be made conditional. The purpose is to provide clearly and distinctly that corporations shall have no right under corporate charter or otherwise to deny or attempt to deny the right of workers or of the consuming public to unite into associations, organizations, or trade unions of their own choosing, voluntarily created, maintained and administered.

The Federation's frequent endorsement of publicity of corporation accounts and especially of periodic statements of the costs of production may be regarded as a first step to put organizations of Labor and consumers on a level with organizations of capital and would make possible and facilitate other remedial and constructive steps.

The A. F. of L. holds that industry and Labor should be free to work out their problems without undue intrusion on the part of government.

Voting Registration—(1931, p. 418) We call upon all city central bodies to take the lead in establishing committees in all cities whose duty shall be the registration of non-registered voters, these committees to be composed only of those who will devote to this all-important task the necessary time and effort, and that all local unions be asked to cooperate with such committees, to the end that within the radius covered by every city central body there shall be a thoroughly organized effort to secure registration of those who are or can become eligible to vote.

Every city central body is required to report within 30 days the name of the secretary and chairman of the citizenship committees appointed pursuant to these resolutions and that monthly reports of work done be rendered monthly thereafter, upon blanks to be provided by the Secretary of the American Federation of Labor, who shall see to it that such reports are filed at the specified times.

War Workers—(1942, p. 586) The problems regarding voting status of war workers who were deprived of their franchise when living on government property, was set forth in Res. 78 which was referred to the E.C. "for the purpose of securing administrative action or such legislation as may be required."

Whereas—Due to housing shortages resulting from the expansion of war industries in many localities, the government has had to lease substantial tracts of land from the state and private parties to accommodate the influx of workers, and

Whereas—Because of antiquated and ambiguous federal regulations restricting the right to vote of those residing on federal property, and

Whereas—Such antiquated restrictions are now depriving hundreds of thousands of citizens of the right to vote and threatening many more with the same consequence, and

Whereas—The said federal restrictions were never intended to victimize the citizens in this way, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record to petition the appropriate executive departments of our government to make the necessary adjustments to reinstate the voting status of all citizens living on government property, and be it further

Resolved—That if the executive departments of the government lack the authority to make the necessary adjustments that this matter be submitted directly to Congress for its immediate action.

Residents of Trailer and Government Camps—(1942, p. 589) The problem of franchise for residents of trailer and government camps without permanent residence was submitted to the convention through Res. 87:

Whereas—Citizens of our United States are now denied the right to vote because they have no permanent residence and because they live in trailer camps and in government camps, and

Whereas—This denial to American citizens of their fundamental right to vote is both un-American and contrary to every fundamental principle of democracy, and

Whereas—This denial to vote is one that affects primarily working people and to that extent is class legislation, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor be and he is hereby directed to cause to be prepared and introduced at the forthcoming legislature appropriate legislation to correct this evil and put an end to this un-American practice.

The objective of the resolution was approved by the convention and referred to the E.C. to secure the required legislation to implement the resolution.

Hours, Extension—(1943, p. 366):

Whereas—The reactionary and anti-labor forces are conducting a nationwide campaign, through their kept press and radio and through their powerful lobbies in Congress to discredit labor unions, defeat through legislation, Acts favorable to Labor and enact in their place restrictive laws unfavorable to Labor, and

Whereas—In our last Congressional election, great numbers of workers were unable to vote on account of their working long hours and far from their homes, making it difficult to get to the polls in time, and finding the polls crowded, and

Whereas—The most critical time in our nation's history is before us, with the interest of the common man at stake, we must see that all who want to vote shall have that opportunity, and that all organized labor work collectively to elect our friends and defeat our enemies, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor petition Congress to pass a law making it mandatory to keep the polls open between the hours of 5 a.m. and 10 p.m. at election in November, 1944, and be it further Resolved—Should Congress fail to enact such a law organized labor should declare a nationwide labor voting holiday for its members.

Your committee is in full sympathy with the end sought by this resolution but is of the belief that the method proposed is impracticable.

We recommend that the resolution be referred to the Executive Council with instructions to use every means at its disposal to insure every citizen of the United States an opportunity to vote at each election.

It is also recommended that state federations and city central bodies be urged to cooperate in securing modification of voting laws or regulations in order that all workers may have free access to the polls.

It is further recommended that the Executive Council, the state federations, the city central bodies, and all national and international unions urge all workers to make full use of the right of franchise at all elections.

Workers Duty—(1944, p. 473) Two resolutions, Nos. 17 and 18, both dealing with the importance of getting out Labor's vote, were approved by the convention. The resolutions were "referred to the Executive Council for study so that practical plans may be worked out and recommendations made to the affiliated bodies." The "resolves" of the two resolutions are given herewith:

No. 17:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor develop permanent, complete and concise plans for getting out this vote, a plan to include all details to encourage Americans to use the privilege of the ballot, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor transmit this plan to all central bodies, state bodies, as well as international unions, so that full voting strength will be mustered for all county, township, village, school, judicial, municipal, state and national elections.

No. 18:

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor recommend to all international unions that there be included in their constitutions, as well as in the by-laws of their respective local unions, a clause which shall read: "It shall be the duty of every eligible member of this union, as proof of his love of liberty and democracy and an expression of his desire to be a good citizen, to register, to vote and be properly registered for all elections, and at all times to make the most intelligent possible use of the ballot in all elections."

Condition of Membership (Proposed)—(1947, p. 648) A proposal was submitted to the convention through Res. 36 that trade union membership be conditioned by voting qualification. Convention non-concurred in the resolution, which follows:

Whereas—The enactment in 1947 of vicious, anti-labor legislation by Congress and various state legislatures, has pointed out the urgency of every member of the American Federation of Labor being qualified to vote so as to be able to elect candidates favorable to the struggles of the wage earners, and to defeat those politicians who have proven themselves enemies of the aspirations and programs of the American Federation of Labor, and

Whereas—There are unions at the present time which require as a condition of membership, that all members be qualified voters, which is a union law this body would like to see adopted by, and put into, every national and international constitution, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, goes on record urging all unions to make it a mandatory condition of membership that every member be a qualified voter.

While your committee strongly favors having all members voters in their respective counties, and urge upon them the necessity of their participating in the election of all public officials, your committee cannot approve the mandatory conditions for trade union membership contained in the resolution, and therefore recommends nonconcurrence.

Use of Franchise—(1948, p. 234) Res. 5 called upon the A. F. of L. to "take such steps as may be possible to secure national legislation making the exercise of the franchise a 'must' of citizenship and prescribing such penalties as may be needed for its non-observance."

(P. 455) Convention non-concurred in the resolution with the following statement: ". . . in sympathy with the objective of the resolution but the resolve is out of line with the spirit and principles of freedom and democracy."

Proportional Representation—(1954, pp. 384, 521) Res. 33:

Whereas—The proportional representation method of voting is a European system, and does violence to the American plurality system of voting, and

Whereas—Proportional representation destroys the bipartisan, or two-party system, and

Whereas—Proportional representation is unAmerican, undemocratic, and leads to dictatorship, and

Whereas—Under a dictatorship unionism, as a protection for the worker, withers and dies, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled at Los Angeles, California, voices opposition to proportional representation and believes that any cities or towns operating under proportional representation should by legislative enactment return to the American system of majority or plurality elections, and be it further set forth that the object of this resolution is to insure the preservation of those rights, liberties, and freedoms proclaimed by the founding fathers in the Declaration of Independence.

Referred by the convention to the officers of the A. F. of L. for inquiry.

Wages (also see: Bankers and Wages; Employment, Hours and Wages; Living Standards; Defense (Labor Policy, Production); Fair Labor Standards; Wage Stabilization Board; National War Labor Board; WPA—The A. F. of L. conventions approved resolutions progressively raising the federal minimum wage. These will be found in the proceedings of A. F. of L. Conventions.

(1925, p. 36) The textile industry has raised the issue of wage reductions. That industry confronted by the problems of technical changes and over-expansion, has resorted to the expedient of wage reductions for the purpose of reducing production costs despite the innumerable demonstrations that high wage expenditures do not produce high costs.

High production costs usually indicate inefficient management and inadequate production records. The assay of industrial waste made by the Federated American Engineering Societies charged 50 percent of industrial waste or misuse to management and only 25 percent to workers. Obviously here is the big field for changes that will reduce production costs with benefits to all concerned.

On the other hand while wage reductions may reduce the total costs chargeable to that one item, the probabilities are that other items may be increased so as to more than counterbalance the effect of wage reduction on the total costs. The loss in morale may diminish production output. Lower wages mean lower living standards in turn reflected in loss of physical and mental well being of workers.

Wage reductions diminish purchasing power of the group of workers in the textile industry which is reflected in the business of the whole community and extends out into the industrial fabric of the nation.

Wage reductions are a powerful factor in the vicious combination that initiates a period of business depression. The most prosperous and best managed production establishments do not attempt to meet industrial difficulties through wage reductions. It is the industry that is unable to solve its management problems by eliminating wastes and bad practices, and by finding the way to secure from every employee the most valuable service that he can contribute, that resorts to wage reductions.

The lowest production costs can be reached only through intelligent co-operation based upon full understanding of the work done. Workers competent to perform good work with commensurate wages, the best technical equipment with the use of power machinery wherever possible under efficient management, will contribute to the maintenance of production costs at the lowest possible figure.

The labor movement is economically sound in its protest against wage reductions and it is socially correct in opposing conditions that would lower the social standards of our nation. We urge upon wage earners everywhere that they oppose wage reductions.

(P. 231) We hold that the best interests of wage earners as well as the whole social group are served, increasing production in quality as well as quantity and by high wage standards which assure sustained purchasing power to the workers and, therefore, higher national standards for the environment in which they live and the means to enjoy cultured opportunities. We declare that wage reductions produce industrial and social unrest and that low wages are not conducive to low production costs.

We urge upon wage earners everywhere: that we oppose all wage reductions and that we urge upon management the elimination of wastes in production in order that selling prices may be lower and wages higher. To this end we recommend cooperation in study of waste in production which the assay of the Federated American Engineering Societies covering important industries has shown to be 50% attributable to management and only 25% attributable to Labor, with 25% attributable to other sources, principally managements in industries producing commodities for any single industry under consideration.

Social inequality, industrial instability and injustice must increase unless the workers' real wages, the purchasing power of their wages, coupled with a continuing reduction in the number of hours making up the working day are progressed in proportion to man's increasing power of production.

(1926, p. 316) There is no simple formula to which wage theory can be reduced. High wages is the American policy. An additional problem with which organized labor must deal is that of adding wage increases in proportion to increased production and indicating the sources from which such increases may and should be paid. As one of the means to this end we recommend study of the organization of business and of accountancy and of all essential factors and considerations related to and involved in this subject. To this end the cooperating service of the Workers' Education Bureau can be made of great service.

The industry that cannot pay high wages is an industry self-convicted of inefficient management and wasteful methods. Organized labor may help to indicate the sources of waste and inefficient methods so that management may make the necessary changes. Cooperation in this field will lead finally to consideration of the conditions under which work orders should be formulated.

In addition to the perfecting of production technique there is the development of units of measurement so that industrial output may be evaluated per individual and per plant. For help in this field we must turn to technicians. This work is now being undertaken by the United States Department of Labor. It is hoped this will form a permanent service in addition to that now rendered in the gathering of cost of living and other forms of essential data. We earnestly commend these various problems to our unions for study. They are problems that demand our intelligent consideration.

Because we seek to settle wage problems at the conference table where we must deal with experts in various fields rather than on the industrial battlefield, we must check their data with data drawn from Labor experiences. Such data could be accumulated regularly and made available when needed at the minimum expense. We commend to unions provisions for the cumulation and compilation of this information.

With increasing mechanization of industry and perfecting of the assembling of materials for fabrication, articles to supply existing and probable demands can be produced in much less time than formerly. It has become of utmost importance that wage earners be organized into trade unions in order to protect their rights and interests in changing situations. With improvements in production technique hours of production must be reduced in order to prevent surplus of products, wages must increase so that wage earners may benefit from the material wealth which they help to create and that financial depression may be avoided.

Progress in these material standards will open opportunities for wage earners for beauty and pleasure in living and for that development essential to the production of a higher citizenry.

(P. 46) American wage earners are the highest paid workers in the world. A number of factors have contributed to wage increases for our workers: our wealth of natural resources, our use of power and machinery, our high productivity per worker, a trade union movement that has steadfastly insisted that economic benefits were its immediate concern. The standards set by trade unions have lifted wages for all workers. Through the activity of the trade union movement, wage earners have participated in the benefits of our most remarkable industrial progress.

American methods of production and efficiency are the subject of study by employers, technicians and wage earners of many countries. The American labor movement has been foremost in recognizing the interdependence of the interests of all concerned with production and in declaring that increased productivity is essential to permanent increases in the standards of living. On the other hand American labor has pointed out that workers must have wage increases if there is to be sale for the increased output of industries and agriculture.

Though many wage earners who share in the benefits secured by trade union activity have not contributed to the support of the movement, let them not imagine that present high wage rates could have been secured without well-directed organized activity, or that present progress would continue without a trade union movement. We know that fundamental to sustained participation in industrial progress through wage increases is skill in taking advantage of the ability of business to pay more.

Our understanding of wages has advanced from the various stages when we thought that supply and demand, the iron law of wages, labor-costs theory, or cost of living basis, contained the whole story of wage determination. Knowledge of economic principles enables us to use them for better results. Our progress is reflected by the larger ideal expressed in the successive epithets applied to our objectives—the living wage gave way to a saving wage and that to a cultural wage.

The technique of collective bargaining has steadily increased in complexities as industry has increased in its scheme of production and its financial requirements. Representatives of the workers must know the finances of the particular establishment, every detail of production, the comparative efficiency of its management, wage standards and work conditions in competitive areas and a wealth of other detail.

The results of organized labor's activities benefit the whole of the general public. High wages and shorter working hours are recognized as national assets. The public generally is coming to understand that with the great tendency of mass production continuing in the future to the same degree as has been experienced in the past there must of necessity be created an ever enlarging buying power or else our productive processes will spell their own ruination and prove a public calamity. The wage earners and their dependents constitute such a large proportion of that consuming power, it is therefore essential that the income of the wage earners must of necessity increase.

It is pleasing to note that economists, employers, men of professional occupation as well as those in all other walks of life are fast coming to realize the validity of the economic wisdom and necessity that have heretofore prompted American organized labor in its wage policies and in its efforts to reduce the working hours. Labor's endeavors find approval and endorsement not alone upon a purely economic basis but also upon sound and ethical consideration.

American organized labor has held steadfastly throughout its history for voluntary group action expressed through collective bargaining and trade agreements. It has rejected efforts to promote a state control of Labor and industry presented under any guise. It adheres only to principles of freedom from domination of the state and believes the only true course of a free people is to solve their problems of life and work through voluntary group action.

The record shows that the American workers are fully vindicated in this understanding by the progress made and the success which has attended their efforts.

(1927, p. 87) The Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, in the case of Holliday vs. Elkhorn Piney Mining Company, held that the issuance of script to employees for labor performed, redeemable in cash on pay days, otherwise in merchandise only, and non-transferrable, was a violation of the statute relating to the issuance of script as amended by the West Virginia Legislature in 1925. Holliday, a merchant, had accepted at face value from employees of the company script issued by it and had presented this script to the company for redemption after same became due on a regular pay day. The company refused to redeem the script, whereupon this action was brought, with judgment for Holliday.

An action was brought in New York to restrain the award and execution of subway contracts because the contracts provided for the payment of "the prevailing rate of wages" which was claimed to be unconstitutional for uncertainty. The motion for an injunction was denied and a motion to dismiss the complaint was granted. The court held that such a provision was constitutional and under the labor law it was the duty and right of the public authorities to ascertain the prevailing rate of wages and to determine wages to be paid to persons employed on public work accordingly. It was held that any objection to the unfairness of making "locality" co-terminous with the City of New York because the work was confined to 53rd street between 2nd and 8th avenues was without merit. The court held that the expression "locality" means a political subdivision and it was entirely within the spirit of the statute to set these limits as the bounds of the City of New York in connection with the contract in question. This decision was rendered by the Supreme Court of New York County in the case of Morse vs. Delaney.

Standard High Wage Policy—(1927, p. 36) The two primary objectives of trade unions are higher wages and shorter hours, for they are the keys to opportunities. For years organized labor has struggled to raise wages. It has been a rare experience to find an employer who voluntarily raised wages. It is a regrettable commentary that the principle of higher wages had to be established largely by force. Our unions have been generally successful in preventing wage reductions in the past year and quite a number have negotiated wage increases. Where collective bargaining is in effect, wages have increased in amount and in purchasing power. However, there has been a decided increase in productivity. Our studies of the relation of productivity to wages have only just begun. However, they warrant us in saying that wage increases for union workers have paralleled increased productivity much more closely than in the case of the unorganized or the less effectively organized. After we have the facts of the share which wage earners contribute to value added by their labor to manufactured articles, union representatives will be able to present even stronger cases. The employer has his production records, his cost accounts, and other sources of information. These, of course, he interprets from his own point of view. The opinions of any one interest may need modification when checked against the facts and understanding of other interests. Organized labor has been able continuously to submit convincing reasons why wages should be sustained or increased. In past periods of depression we have been successful in inducing employers to see the importance of maintaining the purchasing power of wage earners. Industries are based upon the purchasing demands of the masses and, hence, reduction of wages results in industries being unable to dispose of their product—this in turn brings curtailment of markets and the forces of industrial depression are set in motion. In the period of rapidly mounting prices, higher prices constituted an argument for wage increases. The period of expansion and increased production sharply brought out the need for wider groups of consumers and more markets, and furnished additional argument for higher wage standards. By using its experience effectively, the American labor movement has succeeded in raising wage standards for organized workers and thus enabling wage earners to participate in social progress. That our movement has been successful in maintaining and advancing standards is an achievement that benefits not only all wage earners (organized and unorganized), but industry and all society.

Union rates have been the standard that have lifted rates even for the unorganized. The results of organized labor's efforts constitute what is called by outside observers "The American Policy of High Wages." However, there are still thousands of unorganized workers working for wages that are far below wages necessary to maintain American standards of living. We regret the impression carried abroad by some reporters and commissions that high wages prevail generally. There are unskilled and unorganized workers receiving less than is necessary to maintain decent standards of living. These workers the unions would gladly help and we invite them to join our ranks for higher wages and shorter hours.

The A. F. of L. has been for years battling for higher wages. With the development of collective bargaining has come greater need for sustaining demands for higher wages by marshalling of facts. This is made markedly apparent by development of accounting methods and resulting availability of statutes. Thus far the statistical field has been developed for the use of employers. Unless workers are to be put at a disadvantage in maintaining and advancing wages, unions must gather their own statistics and make their own interpretations of the statistics compiled by statistical bureaus and employers.

We have been publishing in the American Federationist a series of studies on wages, discussing the relation of wages to prices and productivity. These studies indicate that wages have generally increased in amount and with reference to prices. With reference to productivity wage movements are not so regular and it is evident that there is need of data to show the way to wages that will provide a purchasing demand proportionate to increases in production. Our present plan is to utilize statistics of the manufactures census and to make the results available by industries. The studies will be published in the American Federationist. This undertaking, we feel, is a distinct step forward. For the first time Labor is exploring the field of government statistics to ascertain whether its share in national income is equitable and whether wages paid to wage earners will enable them to share in advances in material civilization.

That the idea of higher wages has gained in popular acceptance and that the Federation has begun studies of wages, mark a definite stage in progress toward clearer understanding and discussion of wages.

Wage determination is one of the pivotal issues in industrial relations because it is the foundation for morale in industry and the key to opportunities in the life of the wage earners. Wages must be satisfactorily determined before there can be cooperation in the problems of production. If wages are adequately discussed in collective bargaining, there can be no concealment of industrial records. Full and public accounting by all industries would help to eliminate many non-social practices. Here again the interests of the workers are in harmony with general welfare. Higher wages are an aid to industry and the buying power of workers guarantees active growth of trade.

(1929, p. 256) Under the leading title, "Wage Earners' Progress," and sub-titles relating to employment, incomes and wages, the E.C. presents a mass of statistical information with which trade union officers and members will do well to become acquainted. First, under the sub-title "Employment," we present figures to show that in the first half of 1929 there were approximately 500,000 fewer wage earners employed in the manufacturing industries than during the year 1919, and approximately 790,000 less than in 1920. This, notwithstanding the fact that the number of wage earners employed in manufacturing industries during the first half of 1929 was 362,512 more than the number employed during the year 1928 and 144,498 more than in 1927. Here, therefore, we have another indication of unemployment. While the number of workers in manufacturing industries has decreased very substantially, the production of those industries has very greatly increased. The downward tendency in employment is due to the increasing use of machinery. It is undoubtedly true, of course, that some of the displaced workers have found employment in other industries, notably in personal service occupations, hotels, etc. But they are not all accounted for, by any means. Any one who mingles among the working population can find evidence of unemployment on every hand. An instance of the present trend is to be found in the intrusion of machinery into the field of music made possible by sound amplifiers attached to phonographic mechanism of one sort or another. Here we have a development that not only affects incomes and employment, but which tends to restrict that which is often referred to as the most creative of all arts. This is a phase of so-called mass production which, in the course of time, may tend to a limitation rather than an increase of supply. At any rate, the present effect is unemployment among musicians.

Everywhere we turn, the increasing use of machinery, which in the course of time will, in most instances, prove beneficial, is at the present causing unemployment and thus is ushering in human want and suffering. Surely this is a problem to which the thoughtful citizen should give earnest consideration.

We point out, very pertinently, that when the employment of the worker ceases his income is cut off. To that we might add that when his income is cut off his purchasing power is diminished and eventually ceases. And when his purchasing power is lost, not only is industry without a customer in his case, but he and his family may, and sometimes do, become public charges, thus resulting in tax increases to which industry must contribute.

Why should it be necessary to go into detail with reference to a situation that must be obvious to every intelligent observer. Is it possible that intelligent men who have shown their capacity for successful organization in the establishment and developing of tremendous industrial establishments, great transportation systems and enormous financial institutions are unable to understand that their own continued prosperity and success is entirely dependent upon the purchasing power of the masses of the people. It is true that in recent years there has been an awakening among them to some extent and that there has been an increase in the number who understand that it is to their own interest to frankly and openly admit that steady employment and high wages are not only beneficial to the workers but to all other classes in society.

The A. F. of L. is in full accord with the proposal that "efforts be made to stimulate study of the displacement problem and to urge conferences between workers, employers and other concerned groups prior to the introduction of the changes and thus provide against avoidable hardships."

The convention approves the recommendation for the authorization of an effective federal employment service and the establishment of municipal employment bureaus, and also its recommendation that the promotion of federal and state employment agencies be made one of the major projects of the Federation for the coming year.

Under the sub-title, "Comparison With Union Wages," we present some interesting figures which show that the earnings of union members, 1927-1928, are substantially higher than the average earnings of all workers. In determining the average rate of all workers, those who receive the union rates of pay have, of course, been included. A comparison between the average wages of unorganized workers and the average wages of organized workers would show an even greater discrepancy in favor of the union rate, notwithstanding the well-known fact that any advance by the organized workers always has a favorable influence upon the wages and conditions of the unorganized. These figures are evidence of the value of trade unionism in raising the income of those who work for wages.

(1931, pp. 64, 399) Wages are more than compensation for Labor. In the field of wages, Labor has also helped industry to realize the interdependence between the various factors in the economic structure. Employers argued that lower wages meant lower labor costs and higher profits. Labor has shown employers—some against their will—that higher wages meant more efficient, higher grade workers and lower labor costs per unit of production. Our efforts have succeeded to the extent that American employers now acclaim with pride our American high wage principle.

There are industrial areas and new industries that refuse to learn from the experience of the older business undertakings. They will be a drag upon progress for all until they learn the principles of associated activities which characterize the present age. Wages are something more than the price of labor. They represent the credit upon which retail markets depend and all business undertakings are ultimately dependent upon these retail markets. With the trend to mass production, production is geared for mass buying. For mass buying there must be wage rates that provide workers with adequate consuming power. Experience has proven that installment buying and other forms of deferred payment are not a substitute for higher wages. Industries must make sure that retail buying power is adequate.

(1933, pp. 110, 278) The need for minimum wage laws for women and minors has become so necessary that seven states enacted such legislation this year. The publicity given to sweat shop wages has alarmed the legislators, and they more than ever believe that women and minors should have proper protection.

Sixteen states now have minimum wage laws.

(1934, pp. 85, 357) Every effort should be made in the states where such laws are not in effect to have similar legislation enacted.

Very important action was taken by seven states in a meeting at Concord, New Hampshire, on May 29. The states represented were: Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. They declared that:

No employer shall pay a woman or a minor, under twenty-one years of age, an unfair or oppressive wage.

A bill was introduced in Congress to authorize the several states to negotiate contracts or agreements to promote greater uniformity in the laws of such states affecting Labor and industries. The state which has enacted laws for the betterment of working conditions, eliminating sweatshops, setting maximum hours of labor, etc., finds itself handicapped in competition if its neighboring states have lower standards. During the depression the struggle for business has been keener and standards are consequently relaxed. Improvements which have taken many years to accomplish have been swept away. It is to remove these obstacles to fair competition that the compacts are being recommended.

(1935, p. 145) The sentiment in favor of minimum wage legislation for women and minors has developed rapidly in the last few years. Sixteen states have enacted such legislation into law.

While we favor the enactment of minimum wage legislation for women and minors as a step toward progress, it is the avowed purpose of the A. F. of L. to fight to secure for women the same rate of pay as paid to men engaged in relatively the same occupation.

In states where minimum wage laws for women and minors have not been passed officials of state federations of labor are urged to sponsor and secure the introduction of such proposed legislation in the state legislatures.

(1936, pp. 138, 466) June 1 the Supreme Court of the U.S. declared the New York minimum wage law for women and minors unconstitutional. October 12, by the same vote, 5 to 4, the Supreme Court refused a rehearing. Justice Butler, who delivered the opinion, held that the principles of law involved had been established by the court in 1923 when a District of Columbia minimum wage law was held invalid by a 6 to 3 ruling.

At the same time the court granted a review of the Washington state minimum wage law which is very similar to the New York statute which was declared unconstitutional. The Washington law was declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of that state. New York was joined by Massachusetts, Illinois and Washington in appealing for the rehearing. The appeal was refused.

Three weeks after the Supreme Court declared the New York law unconstitutional, Massachusetts amended its minimum wage law by declaring:

Oppressive and unreasonable minimum wages for women and minors seriously impaired their health, lowered their morale, compelled public contributions to enable them to exist, and seriously threatened the stability of industry by creating unrest among the affected employees.

Another state that has a similar law to that declared unconstitutional is New Jersey. This law was enacted in 1933. Since then it has not been enforced until this year when an advisory council of 12 members met to provide for enforcement. The state labor commissioner declared that because of the decision of the Supreme Court, New Jersey State would proceed cautiously in enforcing the measure.

Until a decision is made as to the constitutionality of the State of Washington law, the future of such legislation is problematical. Fifteen states have minimum wage laws.

In addition to New Jersey, the Colorado and Utah laws have remained inoperative through lack of appropriations. In all states but one the minimum wage laws are applicable to women and minors of both sexes, though in Minnesota the law was held unconstitutional in its application to adult women and is in effect in respect only to minors.

(1937, pp. 177, 310) The Supreme Court in 1935 declared minimum wage laws unconstitutional. After minimum wage laws were declared unconstitutional, they became inoperative in more than a dozen states. This year, the Supreme Court changed its opinion and declared the Washington State Minimum Wage Law constitutional. This reversal of the opinion of the Supreme Court brought hope again to the women and children employed in industry.

Twenty-three states and the District of Columbia now have such laws in effect. The District of Columbia law was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1923, but as a result of its latest decision was made constitutional. Therefore, a board was appointed and is now engaged in carrying out the provisions of the Minimum Wage Act for Women and Minors. The following states and possessions have these laws:

Arizona	New Jersey
Arkansas	Minnesota
California	Nevada
Colorado	New Hampshire
Connecticut	New Jersey
Dist. of Columbia	Rhode Island
Illinois	South Dakota
	Utah
	Washington
	Wisconsin

Massachusetts
Minnesota
Nevada
New Hampshire
New Jersey

Rhode Island
South Dakota
Utah
Washington
Wisconsin

The laws of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, and Wisconsin have been revised. Those for Arizona, Nevada, Oklahoma, and Pennsylvania are new. The rest are revived.

All but four of these laws apply to women and minors: Nevada, Puerto Rico, and South Dakota cover only females, while Oklahoma covers men, women and children. In the Nevada, South Dakota, Puerto Rico, and Arkansas laws, the minimum wage is specified but in Arkansas it is subject to modification by the commission.

The Supreme Court in ruling upon the Washington minimum wage law upheld as constitutional the law to protect women and children against employment at wages below a minimum fixed by requirements of health and right living. The court went back to the opinions of Chief Justice Taft and Mr. Justice Holmes in the Adkins case which are quoted as follows:

(1) Legislatures which adopt a requirement of maximum hours or minimum wages may be presumed to believe that when sweating employers are prevented from paying unduly low wages by positive law they will continue their business, abating that part of their profits, which were wrung from the necessities of their employees, and will concede the better terms required by the law; and that while in individual cases hardship may result, the restriction will enure to the benefit of the general class of employees in whose interest the law is passed and so that of the community at large.

(2) This statute does not compel anybody to pay anything. It simply forbids employment at rates below those fixed as the minimum requirement of health and right living. It is safe to assume that women will not be employed at even the lowest wages allowed unless they earn them, or unless the employer's business can sustain the burden. In short the law in its character and operation is like hundreds of so-called police laws that have been upheld.

The court thus held:

We think that the views thus expressed are sound and that the decision in the Adkins case was a departure from the true application of the principles governing the regulation by the state of the relation of employer and employed.

In fixing minimum wages two considerations must be held in mind: Minimum requirements for health and decent living and value of services performed.

(Kick-Back Law)—(1934, pp. 74, 728) For months complaints were made in Washington and other cities that contractors on public works, financed in whole or in part by grants from the United States, were not paying the prevailing rate of wages as specified by the Davis-Bacon Law.

Employees were compelled either to return part of their wages or to accept a much lower rate. This is known as the "kick-back." Public No. 324, an Act to effectuate the purpose of certain statutes concerning rates of pay for labor, by making it unlawful to prevent anyone from receiving the compensation contracted for thereunder, and for other purposes, will give wage earners hereafter protection.

The law provides that whoever shall induce any person, employed in the construction, prosecution, or completion of any public building or public work financed in whole or in part by loans or grants from the United States, to give up any part of the compensation to which he is entitled under his contract, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior jointly shall make reasonable regulations for contractors or subcontractors on any such building or work, including a provision that each contractor and subcontractor shall furnish weekly a sworn affidavit with respect to the wages paid each employe during the preceding week.

(Cost of Living Basis)—(1934, p. 400) The A. F. of L. again goes on record as opposing the use of a cost-of-living standard as a basis for determination of wages or salaries, and further opposes (so long as a cost-of-living standard is in effect) the present inequitable system of determining the cost of living.

Opposition to fixing of wages on subsistence standards is a fundamental principle of the organized labor movement. Continuation of application of this principle to government workers is not only a gross injustice to these workers, but it is a transgression by the government itself of the principles of industrial recovery advocated by it. By the application of the Economy Act concerning reduction in wages and prescribing restoration only upon a cost of living basis, the government not only fails to fulfill its declarations for higher wages and shorter hours, but actually reduces standards formerly existing.

(1936, pp. 142, 435) In August of this year, according to the Federal Reserve Board, production in manufacturing industries was six per cent above the level of 1923-25, and only 12 per cent below the 1929 level. Not only did manufacturing production fail to register a seasonal decline last summer, but, in fact, attained higher levels than at any time since the beginning of recovery. A sharp rise in freight carloadings, sustained increases in the output of steel, automobiles, lumber and electric power, as well as such consumers goods as cotton and shoes, these and other factors combined to indicate that business activity was approaching pre-depression levels.

What has been Labor's share in recovery in terms of employment, wages, hours and purchasing power? To answer these questions in a general way, without the bias of seasonal changes, year to year comparisons of the available data will be made.

In 1935, industrial recovery was in full progress. Although in that year manufacturing production was still 24 per cent short of 1929, it already exceeded 1932, the worst year of the depression, by 43 per cent. In this development, the fact most significant to Labor was that manufacturing employment failed to keep pace with the increases in production. In 1935, employment in manufacturing industries was only 28 per cent above 1932, while production was 43 per cent above that year.

In the period of decline, between 1929 and 1932, Labor suffered from an even more drastic cut in total wages than in the number of jobs. During this time, employment in manufacturing industries declined 39 per cent, while weekly payrolls fell 58 per cent. Weekly payrolls after 1932 recovered at a greater rate than employment but they recovered from lower levels.

Underlying these trends were significant changes in hours and wages. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in June, 1936, the average hours worked in manufacturing industries per week were 39.2. The National Industrial Conference Board figures for 25 manufacturing industries indicate that in August of this year the average actual hours per week in those industries were 40.

Lagging production, and, to some extent, share-the-work plans in many industries, cut the working hours considerably between 1929 and 1932. In the latter year, they were at an average of 37.9. In June, 1933, the hours were further raised to 42.6. In August of that year, the President's Reemployment Agreement went into effect bringing about a steady decline in the length of the work-week during the balance of the year. By 1934, the average work-week in manufacturing was shortened to 34.7. Beginning with May, 1935, the average work-week was slowly increased to an average of 40 hours. This lengthening of hours sharply curtailed the rate of reemployment in the latter part of 1935, and in 1936, eliminating a large number of job opportunities for those still unemployed.

The average hourly earnings in manufacturing industries began their recovery in the last months of 1933. In 1934, hourly earnings in these industries increased by 16 per cent over 1932. A still further rise occurred in the following year so that in 1935, hourly earnings were 20 per cent higher than in 1932. By 1936, however, the rate of increase had leveled off and hourly earnings remained about stationary through August of this year.

Average weekly earnings were reduced much more drastically during the depression than the hourly wage rates, registering a decline of 31 per cent between 1929 and 1932. Recovering by only 19 per cent between 1932 and 1935, the weekly earnings still remained 18 per cent below 1929.

In 25 manufacturing industries covered by the National Industrial Conference Board similar trends in weekly earnings are apparent. From $28.55 in 1929, the average dropped to $14.53 in March, 1933, a fall of 49 per cent. In June, 1936, weekly earnings were $24.45, or 68 per cent higher than in March, 1933, but still 14 per cent below 1929.

Much of this increase, however, was offset by a marked increase in the cost of living in the past three years. Since March, 1933, the cost of living has increased 18.5 per cent, so that the real weekly earnings in June, 1936, were only 42 per cent higher than in 1932. In other words, the average weekly wage of $24.45 in June, 1936, had the buying power of only $20.56 in March 1933 dollars.

At the same time, technological improvements and expansion in the volume of output resulted in increased productivity per worker per hour. In 1935, a worker produced on the average 13 per cent more goods in one hour than in 1932. This, however, was not a new development. Productivity of Labor had already been greatly increased between 1929 and 1932. It is estimated that between 1929 and 1935, productivity per man per hour increased about 40 per cent. This means that if a worker made 100 units in one hour in 1929, in 1935 he had to produce 140 units.

This fact is important because it explains why it required increasingly fewer man-hours to manufacture more goods. Between 1932 and 1935, total man-hours in manufacturing increased only 26 per cent, while production increased 43 per cent.

Since it requires less time to produce the same volume of goods, a proportionately smaller number of workers is employed to turn out these goods unless the hours of work are still further curtailed. The fact that employment lags behind production more and more gives striking evidence of the need for a shorter work-week. Industry cannot and will not absorb the unemployed unless it creates more job opportunities by limiting weekly and daily hours of work.

The shorter work-week and the six-hour day furnish the real solution to the insistent problem of unemployment. It is the responsibility that private industry must accept in order to give the necessary balance to economic expansion.

Economic stability cannot be attained by government spending. Industry's obligation to bring about such stability is more imperative in these crucial days of transition than ever before. We know only too well that unless this is done current recovery will end in a greater disaster than we have yet known.

Shortening of the hours of work is the correct answer to the problem we are facing today.

(1937, pp. 95, 229) Records of wages in the first half of 1937 are striking evidence that workers must depend on union organization to increase their income. So far reaching has been the effect of the organizing drive this year that average hourly earnings in all recorded industries rose from 59 cents in December 1936 to 64 cents in June 1937, according to figures calculated from Labor Department records. This is an average gain for all workers of 5 cents an hour or more than $2.00 per week. In the previous two years, hourly earnings rose only 2½ cents—from 56½ cents in December 1934 to 59 cents in December 1936.

Thus workers won for themselves in six months of union organization twice as great a gain as private industry had given them in two years. At no other time since depression, except the first four months of NRA, have such large gains been made.

Union organization has also been effective in shortening work hours this year by half an hour per week. There has been a tendency during recovery from depression, for employers to lengthen hours as production increased. Particularly striking was the increase in hours which followed the termination of NRA, when in six months two hours were added to the average work week, in industry generally, raising it from 37½ to 39½ hours. Until the organizing drive this spring, employers continued to lengthen the work week so that by January 1937 the average was 41 hours.

This increase was checked by union action in the first half year, and by June 1937 hours were reduced to 40½ per week, a gain of one-half hour's leisure. This contrasts sharply with last year when one hour was added to the work week during the same period.

These figures show clearly, however, that even the 40-hour week is not yet won in industry generally. Since the average week is 40½ hours, probably more than half the wage and small salaried workers in the U.S. still work over 40 hours a week. Only by strong organization can we prevent further increases and work toward a universal work week of 40 hours and less.

Measuring progress over a longer period, we find that wage gains since the start of recovery in March 1933 have in large part been cancelled by rising costs of living. Cost of living in the period March 1933 to June 1937 rose 24 per cent, and a 33.5 per cent increase in weekly wages only raised the average living standard eight per cent. Average earnings per hour of 64 cents in June 1937 compare with 46 cents in March 1933.

The average work week today is one-half hour shorter than it was in March 1933 when hours averaged 41 per week. During NRA the work week was shortened to a 37¾ hour average, then lengthened again after NRA, and finally checked from further increase by union activity.

Comparing the worker's position today with that of 1929, we must take into account the 25 per cent increase in production per worker per hour in manufacturing industries from 1929 to 1935, and the estimated 10 per cent increase in production per worker per year in all industries in this period. What the increase since 1935 has been we have no figures to show, but we know that production per worker has not stopped increasing, and that productivity in 1937 is higher than in 1935.

With higher productivity and a larger working population, it is estimated that production must reach a level 20 per cent above 1929 before unemployment can be reduced to the 1929 level. This estimate was made by the Labor Department and WPA in their joint study on productivity.

To raise production by 20 per cent requires a corresponding increase in workers' buying power. In the first half of 1937 the buying power of the average worker's weekly income was only four per cent above 1929, and buying power of all workers in recorded industries was five-tenths of one per cent below 1929. (These figures are from the Department of Commerce, brought up to 1937 by Labor Department indices and adjusted for changes in living costs by the National Industrial Conference Board index.) In terms of dollars, without adjustment for living costs, which are still 11 per cent below 1929, the average wage is still nine per cent below 1929 and workers' total income is 13 per cent below the 1929 level.

The average work week of 40½ hours in June 1937 is considerably below the average of about 49 hours in 1929.

Since 1929, workers have gained on the average 8½ hours leisure by shortening of the work week; but with the present 40½ hour week, wages and workers' buying power are still far short of the level necessary to put all the unemployed to work.

(Pp. 164, 500) The Black-Connery Wages and Hours Bill, sponsored by the administration and passed by the Senate, will come up for passage in the House when Congress convenes again. Its purpose is to eliminate sweatshops and compel employers who do not pay a subsistence wage to meet the requirements that will be fixed by a board. The board is to consist of five members, one of whom shall be a representative of employees and one a representative of employers.

At the Cincinnati meeting of the E.C., held on May 23rd, the Hours and Wages Bill as submitted by the administration, was considered and discussed. It was ordered that the same be accepted as a basis for approval, subject to the adoption of amendments, to safeguard collective bargaining and to limit the scope of governmental regulation to those fields wherein collective bargaining machinery is ineffective or difficult of functioning and only until collective bargaining has substantially covered the field.

These suggestions were submitted to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor by the President of the A. F. of L. at hearings on the bill.

But when the bill was reported by the Senate committee, it did not contain these collective bargaining amendments. But it contained provisions subjecting governmental contracts theretofore under the Walsh-Healey Act to the provisions of the new bill. As the wage scale had an upper limit of 40 cents per hour and the hour scale a lower limit of 40 hours, the new bill would destroy the effectiveness of the Walsh-Healey Act.

The discussion on the Senate floor took place after the Supreme Court Reorganization Bill had been lost. At that time there was also pending the Housing Bill in which the A. F. of L. was vitally interested. A movement was on foot in the Senate to recommit the Wages and Hours Bill to the Senate committee, thereby killing the legislation for the session. Such defeat would have resulted in the adjournment of Congress and the loss of housing legislation as well.

A confidential survey disclosed to us at the same time that:

1. A drive by us would secure the adoption by the Labor Committee of the House of the amendments we desired for collective bargaining.

2. The Senate Labor Committee was prepared to eliminate provisions referring to the Walsh-Healey Act from the Senate bill, and the House Labor Committee would accept such amendment.

3. The administration was prepared to lend its support to have our program carried into effect in the House, if the Senate bill were adopted in the Senate, subject to amendment in the House and also to resist any other amendments not satisfactory to us.

A crisis was reached in the Senate when Senators, opposing the Senate bill as submitted, or who were skeptical, demanded a statement of our position which would determine its recommittal or passage.

With the above assurances from the administration and in order to save the housing bill, we advised the Senate that rather than recommit, it would be better to pass the Senate bill over to the House, where we hoped to improve it, and that then in its final form we could determine our position whether to finally accept or reject the legislation.

The Senate bill was so passed. The House Labor Committee approved the amendments which we submitted by an almost unanimous vote. Their character and effect appear from the statement which we issued, which is as follows:

"The House Committee on Labor accepted certain provisions embodied in the Wages and Hours Bill passed by the Senate, but it also adopted amendments submitted by the President of the A. F. of L. which reduced the specific limits of the board's jurisdiction over wages and hours to slight significance. Through the adoption of these amendments the Wages and Hours Bill is made a practical and constructive measure. It reduces government control over industry to a minimum and confers upon the board power only to deal with chisellers and those employers who through company unions or through the use of fake collective bargaining agencies maintain sweatshop conditions of work and starvation wages.

"On the other hand, the amendments to the Act will provide protection to employers of Labor who engage in legitimate collective bargaining, from cut-throat competition by chisellers, preserve prevailing rates of wages in each community as established through collective bargaining, and prevent the imposition of wage and hour schedules by the board which adversely affect prevailing schedules in other communities established by collective bargaining. It provides for the exclusion of governmental action in any industry or class of work which is substantially covered by legitimate collective bargaining. Through the adoption of these amendments, the differentials between North and South are preserved but the prevailing wage and hours standards will be improved in the South as the prevailing standards of the North are lifted higher through collective bargaining. It was on such basis that the conflicting interests of the North and South were reconciled and the opposition of the South was thus removed through the bill as amended.

"Through the adoption of these amendments the bill is made an effective collective bargaining statute. The fear of Fascist control over Labor and capital is definitely removed and made impossible.

"Labor was not happy over the wage and hour provisions of the Senate bill. Capital opposed the more stringent provisions of the original bill. Through the formula adopted the conflict is reconciled to the advantage of unions and employers.

"The amendments proposed by the President of the A. F. of L. provide that:

"1. The board has jurisdiction over wages and hours in any occupation only if it finds that collective bargaining agreements in respect to them do not cover a substantial number of employees of such occupation, or that existing facilities for collective bargaining in such occupation are inadequate or ineffective.

"2. Wage and hour standards established by collective bargaining agreements in any occupation are prima facie of the appropriate wage and hour standards in the occupation.

"3. The board cannot lower the wage standards or increase the hour standards from those already prevailing in the occupation in the community considered.

"4. The board cannot establish any wage or hour classification in any community which adversely affects the prevailing wage or hour standard in the same or other communities.

"5. Industries protected against prison-made goods, which are outlawed in commerce.

"6. The label provision of the original Act, which is a survival of the NRA blue eagle, is eliminated, so as to protect industry from that nuisance.

"7. Government work is removed from the control of the board and placed under the Walsh-Healey Act, as before."

The bill, as voted out by the Labor Committee, contained many other amendments to the Senate bill and it was apparent that when the bill reached the floor of the House additional amendments might be offered. Those adopted by the committee were not objectionable to us.

The bill, however, never emerged from the Rules Committee. It will no doubt be acted upon when Congress again convenes.

(P. 500) So that some of the issues involved in the Black-Connery Bill may be more clearly defined the convention calls attention to the fact that this bill was not introduced by the A. F. of L., neither did officers of the A. F. of L. participate in its preparation.

The bill was not drafted by a committee of the Senate or the House, neither did the Senator who introduced in it the Senate and the Congressman who introduced it in the House, have a hand in its preparation.

The bill when first introduced gave to the commission it proposed to create, authority to set up undefined jurisdiction. The bill quite evidently was intended to establish maximum hours of labor and minimum wage rates, which would protect that part of Labor unable to protect itself. The commission, among other things would have had authority to set up differing minimum wage rates along geographical lines, and within these boundaries to set differing regulations as between certain industries and groups of employers.

With the purpose of establishing a point below which wages could not be paid and hours of labor beyond which wage earners could not be employed, the A. F. of L. is in accord. There exists, however, differences of opinion as to how this most desirable and necessary condition can be secured.

The experiences of our movement with the authority exercised by NRA and the difficulty, if not impossibility, of having the unwise and conflicting decisions of subordinates reviewed and set aside, the experiences of our movement under the National Labor Relations Act give valid reason for most searching examination before we give our approval to the establishing of further boards or commissions having power to determine questions of minimum wage and maximum hours or any other phase of the relationship of employer and employed.

These experiences make us reluctant to approve the creation of any additional boards or commissions having to do with industrial relations.

It seems obvious that our trade union movement should support all legislation necessary to guarantee and protect Labor in its unlimited right to organize; in its unlimited right to choose its own representatives; and its unlimited right to carry on collective bargaining with employers.

The introduction of another principle for regulating hours and wages, after the right to organize and to carry on collective bargaining has been established, raises a most serious problem.

The convention notes with approval the efforts of the President of the A. F. of L. to secure amendments to the original bill which would safeguard the vital interests of our free trade union movement, and which would not work against the practice of trade union organization and collective bargaining by all wage earners of the country.

(1937, pp. 179, 311) Even unions sometimes have difficulty in obtaining redress for their members against employers who default on payrolls, and the individual worker, farm laborer, or domestic servant whose employer refuses payment on some pretext, or because he needs the money for some other purpose, is in a peculiarly helpless position. Irresponsible, fly-by-night concerns without assets to attach in case of failure to pay are a plague in certain industries. Various kinds of laws have been tried to meet different situations—lien laws, semi-monthly pay day laws, laws requiring bonding pay rolls of certain employers, wage collection laws. The collection of unpaid valid wage claims is a primary service which every Labor Department should be equipped to render every worker in the state who needs it; thousands of such claims are presented every year to state labor commissioners, yet in only a few states are these officials granted really adequate power to deal with the recalcitrant or irresponsible defaulting employer. The fact that in those states having good wage collection laws a very high proportion of claims are collected (in California 60 per cent) indicates that in states lacking such machinery an enormous amount of injustice is done wage earners each year on this score.

Organized labor has for years pushed for the enactment of effective wage payment, wage collection, and lien laws, and this year secured the enactment of new laws or amendments in 22 states. Labor commissioners in four states were authorized to accept assignments of wage claims and to collect for wage earners through the civil courts, bringing the number of states that now specifically have granted this power to the labor commissioner to 11. Nearly every state labor department makes some effort to assist workers with wage claims that they are unable to collect, and increased activity is reported in recent years. A study made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that many more states are now collecting at least small amounts than was true a decade ago. Thirty-five states reported some activity in 1936 compared to 18 in 1932.

A small claims court bill passed the U.S. Senate August 6 and will undoubtedly pass the House.

(1938, p. 172) Disappointingly little progress was made in state legislation against the practices complained of by workers who failed to receive the wages due them, or who are not free to spend the wages they earn because they are not paid in full in cash, or because they are not paid at sufficiently frequent and regular intervals, and are thus forced to draw credit from their employers, at a discount, or trade at high-priced company stores with coupons. Actual cases of refusal to pay the agreed wages still occur, and in the absence of legislation the unorganized worker, and sometimes the organized worker as well, is without redress.

It should not be difficult to persuade legislatures to set up the few simple requirements that would enable these workers to enjoy an elementary right, the right to receive and freely spend wages earned. Yet only South Carolina this year adopted an incomplete measure which, moreover, exempts some of the very industries in which the worst abuses are found. While omitting the requirement that wages be paid on regular prearranged pay days at specified intervals, the law requires the notification of all newly hired employees of their rates of pay, and of the time and place when payment would be made—provisions which should do something to establish the pay-day habit and to eliminate certain frequent causes of dispute in wage claim cases. The law requires prompt payment of employees on leaving (whether they quit voluntarily or are discharged); and empowers the labor commissioner to hear wage claim disputes and to assist employees in settling claims, but does not give him the right to take assignments of claims.

Legislation authorizing labor commissioners to take wage claim assignments and to sue for their collection may assume new importance for wage earners in connection with the administration of the new Federal Wage-Hour Law. In those states where the labor commissioners are so empowered, it will be possible for workers either individually or collectively to assign claims for back wages due them under this Act for immediate collection right in the state where the deficiency has occurred, without moving through Washington. Locals unions seeking to enforce the claims of their members can also avail themselves of this machinery. A drive for wage claim legislation in the 25 states still lacking such a provision should start gathering momentum now for the 1939 state legislative sessions.

(P. 153) When the Wages and Hours Bill, S. 2475, was introduced May 24, 1937, the A. F. of L. insisted that certain fundamental requirements be embodied in any such legislation which might be adopted. We proposed that a ceiling for hours and a foundation for wages be incorporated in the Act with no differentials; that wages and hours should not be determined by a board and that prosecution of violators should be by the Federal Department of Justice.

The Senate bill was very objectionable as it contained provisions directly opposed to those contended for by the A. F. of L. No effort was made to amend the bill as it could not be done satisfactorily. It was decided that after the bill had passed the Senate and it reached the House that the House Labor Committee would be asked to prepare a real bill that would be along the lines favored by the A. F. of L.

The President of the A. F. of L. conferred with President Roosevelt on the provisions that he should submit to the House Labor Committee. On August 6, 1937, the House Labor Committee reported amendments to S. 2475, which were unsatisfactory. Congress adjourned before any action was taken on the bill.

This objectionable bill was up for passage in the House December 17 in the special session. In the meantime the President of the A. F. of L. had sent a telegram to all members of the House of Representatives urging them to vote for its recommitment in order that proper amendments could be made to the bill. The C.I.O. opposed recommitting the bill. The House, however, despite opposition, recommended recommitment of the bill by a vote of 216 to 198.

The President of the A. F. of L. then resubmitted the A. F. of L. bill to the House Labor Committee. It provided for a uniform minimum wage of 40 cents an hour and a maximum 40-hour week for workers in substandard industries engaged in interstate commerce, with child labor and convict labor prohibited. Violations were to be punishable by a fine of $100 and prosecutions to be made by the federal district attorneys through the Federal Justice Department. No boards or differentials were recognized. In explaining the A. F. of L. bill the President of the A. F. of L. said:

"The great advantage of the measure we propose is its straightforward simplicity. It carries out in full the letter, the spirit and the objectives of President Roosevelt's recommendations to Congress.

"Its provisions are clear-cut. There is no possibility of escaping or twisting out of them by any manner of interpretation. The law stands on its own feet. It is uniform throughout the nation. It requires no administrative board or machinery to make it effective. It provides for quick punishment of any violation.

"We are unalterably opposed to a complex system of federal wage and hour regulations and their administration by a new federal board, as contemplated by the Black-Connery Bill. Labor, industry and the public are fed up with federal boards. We have had extremely disappointing and disillusioning experiences with the National Labor Relations Board. Nor do we believe that the creation of a federal administrator with district wage boards under him would serve any purpose but to complicate and confuse enforcement of any wage and hour measure."

Finally a bill carrying out to a great extent the recommendations of the A. F. of L. was reported by the House Labor Committee. Up to this time no matter how objectionable a proposed wage and hour bill might be the C.I.O. leaders favored it. They were willing from the beginning to accept the very objectionable Senate bill which provided that wages should not exceed 40 cents an hour and hours not less than 40 a week. This would permit a minimum wage of anywhere between one cent and 40 cents an hour and the number of hours anywhere from 40 hours up.

Injection of objectionable tactics by the C.I.O. inflamed the members of the Rules Committee and they refused to grant a rule. However, at the request of the A. F. of L. on May 6 a petition was placed on the Speaker's desk and in a little more than two hours the necessary 218 signatures were obtained. This permitted action on the bill. The President of the A. F. of L. had sent a telegram May 3 to all members of the House urging them to sign the petition as the bill had been approved by the A. F. of L. On May 24, 1938, the bill was passed by a vote of 314 to 97. It was then sent to conference.

Owing to the fight being made by Southern members of Congress against wage and hour legislation, the Senate Conference Committee was increased to seven to permit two Southern Senators to be added to prevent a filibuster. The conference report was submitted June 13. It did not comply fully with the wishes of the A. F. of L., but was approved by both Houses June 14 and signed by the President June 25. Section 6 provides:

Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce wages at the following rates:

- (1) during the first year from the effective date of this section, not less than 25 cents an hour,

- (2) during the next six years from such date, not less than 30 cents an hour,

- (3) after the expiration of seven years from such date, not less than 40 cents an hour, or the rate (not less than 30 cents an hour) prescribed in the applicable order of the administrator issued under section 8, whichever is lower, and

(4) at any time after the effective date of this section, not less than the rate (not in excess of 40 cents an hour) prescribed in the applicable order of the administrator issued under section 8.

This section shall take effect upon the expiration of one hundred and twenty days from the date of enactment of this Act.

Subdivision 3 of Section 6 undoubtedly provides that if an industrial committee can convince the administrator that not more than 30 cents an hour can be paid at any time within the seven years, then the wages for that industry would never reach 40 cents an hour. They could remain at 30 cents. This would permit wage differentials between industries, but whatever wages are determined for an industry they will not be regional. They will be universal.

It will depend on the administrator, who can veto any decision of an industrial committee, whether the wages will be permitted to remain at 30 cents an hour.

Section 4 creates in the Department of Labor a Wage and Hour Division under the direction of an administrator to be known as the "Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division." The administrator is appointed by the President. The administrator shall, as soon as practical, appoint an industry committee for each industry engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. Such committees shall include a number of disinterested persons representing the public, the employees and employers. In the appointments the administrator shall give due regard to the geographical regions in which the industry is carried on.

These committees will determine the wages to be paid after the second year. During the first year employees shall not work longer than 44 hours and the second year 42 hours. After the second year none shall work longer than 40 hours unless paid for overtime at the rate of one and one-half times the regular rate.

The industries committees and the administrator shall consider among other relevant factors the following:

(1) competitive conditions as affected by transportation, living, and production costs;

(2) the wages established for work of like or comparable character by collective labor agreements negotiated between employers and employees by representatives of their own choosing; and

(3) the wages paid for work of like or comparable character by employers who voluntarily maintain minimum wage standards in the industry.

No classification shall be made under this section on the basis of age or sex.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor at least 250,000 employees in substandard industries will have their wages increased on October 24 to 25 cents an hour.

It is the intention to seek amendments to law as soon as the insufficiency of some of its provisions has been shown.

We are opposed to that portion of Section 14 of the Act which provides for a lower rate of pay for learners, apprentices and handicapped workers. We maintain that all these workers should be paid the minimum rate of pay provided for under the Act.

(1939, pp. 126, 634) A well organized attempt to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act which would have exempted nearly 2,000,000 workers from its provisions presented a grave threat to the continued operation of the Wage and Hour Law. The amendments proposed exempted all workers receiving the guarantee of $150 a month or more from this statute. In addition to the hundreds of thousands of clerical workers who would be deprived of the right to overtime compensation, this provision would exempt all crafts and skilled workers paid on a piece rate or hourly scale where it would be to the employer's advantage to guarantee the employees $150 a month. Other proposed amendments are:

Exempting from the wage and hour provisions 120,000 employees engaged in packing fresh fruits and vegetables; 160,000 employees engaged in canning fresh fruits and vegetables; 13,000 pecan shellers; 68,000 tobacco stemmers and handlers; 250,000 employees engaged in the milk industry (including distribution) and in the making of ice cream and cheese; 125,000 employees engaged in ginning, compressing and storing of cotton; 70,000 employees engaged in the making of sugar, molasses, and maple syrup; 100,000 employees cutting, milling and manufacturing timber in to lumber where the employer has 15 employees or less; 6,000 nursery employees; 30,000 employees engaged in handling, slaughtering, dressing and refrigerating poultry; 30,000 stockyard employees engaged in handling or transporting livestock; 30,000 employees engaged in storing and warehousing all these products; 75,000 drivers engaged in handling and transporting meats, grain, livestock, lumber, cotton, and all other perishable foods.

In addition the amendments would exempt from the maximum hour and overtime provisions among others the following: 55,000 employees of the big grain elevators and exchanges wherever located; 100,000 employees engaged in logging and lumber operations; 10,000 employees engaged in evaporating and condensing milk;

42,000 employees engaged in the wholesale distribution, including foreign imports, of fresh fruits and vegetables; 20,000 employees handling the storage of other commodities; 125,000 employees engaged in handling and packing dried fruits, or in canning dry products for 16 work-weeks; 128,000 employees of the big meat packers for a like period.

It is conservatively estimated that the amendments, if adopted, would exempt 1,000,000 workers from the present wage provisions of the Act and more than 1,500,000 to be exempted from the maximum hours provision.

Three bills containing amendments to the wage and hour bill were granted a rule by the Rules Committee, the object being for the House to consider the three bills and agree to a single measure.

Fearing that Congress was in such a temper that it would adopt a most reactionary measure the President of the A. F. of L. wrote a letter to Representative Barden in which he said:

"It is my opinion that the Fair Labor Standards Act should at least remain as it is. Time will demonstrate the soundness of the provisions of this social justice statute. It has only been in operation about one year. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed in order that we might test the soundness and practicability of the regulatory provisions of this Act."

The members of the House went further than expected. They refused to consider any amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act and the matter will have to be adjusted in the next session.

There is no doubt that a well organized effort is being made to emasculate the law or even to force its repeal. When the House Appropriations Committee considered the recommendation of the Budget Bureau and the President that $2,000,000 be appropriated in the third deficiency bill in order that the administrator of the Act could investigate violators it was stricken out. In his report the administrator pointed out that there were 20,000 violations of the law and that he had only 218 inspectors. The Senate voted to appropriate $1,200,000 and the House accepted the amendment.

One amendment was made to the Fair Labor Standards Act in a separate bill, S. 1234. It provides for the "exemption of any switchboard operator employed in a public telephone exchange which has less than 500 stations." It passed both Houses and was signed by the President.

(P. 158) The passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act failed to exert as great a stimulus on the state legislatures as had been anticipated. State wage and hour bills, introduced in 30 states, did not pass. Extensions of minimum wage are to be noted in Alaska, Maine and Connecticut (where the law has been broadened to include men). Oklahoma failed to correct the error in the title of its minimum wage law which was responsible for the court decision invalidating the minimum wage orders for men and minors, and in fact the whole law just missed being repealed. Coverage of the eight-hour day and 48-hour week laws were extended in Montana and Utah, but on the other hand, the principle of one-day-of-rest-in-seven lost ground in New Hampshire and New Mexico. South Carolina allowed its recent hours legislation for men, women and minors to be enjoined and declared unconstitutional without enacting anything to replace it; so that now the only remaining hours statute in that state fixes a 12-hour day, 60-hour week for women in mercantile establishments. The hours of minors were reduced in West Virginia and Hawaii.

Two new industrial home work laws were passed—California and West Virginia—making 19 states with this type of regulation.

The basic 16-year minimum age was adopted in Alaska, Hawaii, and West Virginia (though in the last-mentioned it was weakened by exceptions). In view of the action taken in Alaska and Hawaii, it is all the more surprising that 37 states and the District of Columbia still fall short of this standard.

(P. 159) Drastic reduction in work hours was necessary in the last decade to prevent widespread unemployment; but if we had cut 10 hours from the work week without adjusting wages, living standards would have been reduced to poverty levels for millions of workers. Major adjustments in hourly wage rates were also necessary to compensate the reduction in hours.

Probably no decade in our history has seen more sweeping wage changes than the 10 years from 1929 to 1939. There were first the severe wage cuts of depression which in four years reduced the average hourly wage of 56c in manufacturing to 46c in 1933. Following these losses, the effort toward recovery under NRA codes brought substantial wage increases and in the next two years depression wage cuts were in large part restored. By 1935 the average wage of factory workers had recovered to 57c per hour. After the termination of NRA, the National Labor Relations Act freed workers to organize, and growing trade unions held NRA wage gains, and by 1937 succeeded in bringing the average factory wage to 64c per hour.

Thus in this brief period of eight years we had a general wage reduction of 10c per hour in the first four years, followed by an increase of 18c in the next four years.

The last two years of the decade gave a striking example of trade union success in maintaining wages; for the sudden business recession of 1937-8 reduced production and prices so rapidly that we were threatened with serious widespread wage cuts. Trade union resistance, together with administration influence to maintain wages, effectively checked wage reductions. We came through this recession with relatively few wage cuts, and these have in large part been restored. In the first half of 1939 factory wages have averaged 65c per hour.

Thus the net result of the last decade is a 19c increase in the hourly wage of factory workers. This increase has not been enough however to bring weekly and yearly income of workers back to the 1929 level with the shorter work week. In 1929, the average factory wage earner worked a 49-hour week at 56c an hour and earned approximately $27; in 1937 he worked an average 39-hour week at 64c per hour and earned approximately $25. In 1939, with industry not yet fully recovered from the 1938 recession, part time and unemployment have reduced weekly earnings to $23.50. Factory workers' yearly income averaged $1,300 in 1929 and $1,175 in 1937.

Thus it is clear that with the shorter work week, workers' incomes are not yet back to 1929 levels. Nevertheless, we have been helped toward a 1929 living standard by the decline in living costs. Living costs indices in 1937 were nearly 12% below 1929. This price decline enabled wage earners in 1937 to support a 1929 living standard, even though the actual cash income received was not as great as in 1929. Measured in the goods our earnings would buy, the average factory worker's income in 1937 at the lower price level, was equivalent to $1,325 per year, compared with $1,300 in 1929.

The above figures are for manufacturing industries, because in these industries records are more complete; it is not possible, with the present inadequate information, to follow changes in hourly wage rates in all industries. Commerce Department figures show us, however, that changes in the average yearly income of all wage and salaried workers in American industry from 1929 to 1937 have closely paralleled those in manufacturing industries. Employees in general in 1929 had an average yearly income of $1,475, which was reduced to $1,310 in 1937, but with lower price levels this 1937 income would buy goods and services equivalent to $1,480 at 1929 prices.

These general averages are at best only very rough indicators of progress since 1929. The figures do not represent the actual wage or the actual yearly income of any individual or of any craft or group of workers; in such averages the unemployment losses of individuals are often discounted because the lay-off of employed workers may be offset by the hiring of others.

These averages do show in general, however, that trade union action in the last decade, together with federal laws affecting workers, has succeeded in bringing about certain gains for wage earners in spite of all the difficulties created by the most severe business depression in our history. Those of us who are fortunate enough to have steady jobs are in general able, in a year of normal activity, to support a living standard equal to that of 1929 with 10 hours more leisure time per week.

Ever since 1926 the A. F. of L. has swung the entire force of the labor movement behind a drive to shorten work hours in order to reduce unemployment. We struggled first for the five-day 40-hour week, then for the 30-hour week, and we have insisted that the work week be shortened without reducing the weekly income and living standard of American wage earners. This great drive, together with the help of federal legislation, has resulted in outstanding achievement, equalled in no other country of the world. While there are still industries where the 44- or 48-hour week is in effect, and in some few cases hours even longer, throughout a major part of American industry the 40-hour week is now prevalent, and hundreds of thousands of workers are already working a 30-hour and 35-hour week. Union building tradesmen and union members in printing trades have 95% of their membership working a 40-hour week or less; and of these, 26% in building have a work week of 35 hours or less, and 30% in printing have a 37½ hour week or less; 10% in building already have the 30-hour week.

American trade unions, American employers, and all those who have assisted in achieving this major economic adjustment may well note that our measures have proved effective. We have prevented the loss of several million jobs through technological changes in industries, we have substituted leisure for unemployment, and we have accomplished this without reducing the living standard of employed workers.

The reduction in work hours to a 40-hour average, and the increase in average hourly earnings to 64c has laid a foundation for unprecedented future progress in living standards and industrial expansion in the United States. This has been a difficult adjustment, and it has been made when American industries were hard pressed in our worst industrial depression. The very difficulty of such an adjustment may have retarded somewhat our recovery from depression, but it has gone far to bring our economy back in balance and restore inherent soundness and industrial health. Present wage scales are a basis for the highest workers' buying power and the largest home market for goods in our history once industry again resumes its normal rate of expansion.

We must next consider the low level of industrial production in this last decade and the effect it has had on our living standards. The year 1937 was intentionally chosen for comparison with 1929 because it was important to show what the living standard is today in a year of nearly normal industrial activity. In every other year of this decade, however, industrial production has been below 1937, living standards have been lower, and in most years there have been many more unemployed. Therefore, while 1937 was the only year by which we could measure achievements, 1937 living standards are by no means typical of the 1929 to 1939 decade.

Even in 1937, when employed workers were able to maintain a 1929 living standard, we cannot overlook the heavy burden of caring for the unemployed which fell upon the shoulders of our wage earners. With more than 8,000,000 out of work, millions of American families had to support relatives who, in normal times, would have supported themselves. The average worker's income was required to stretch over a larger number of persons than in 1929, and consequently, the average per capita or per person living standard for the entire population, even in 1937, was lower than 1929. As noted above, even at the lower 1937 price levels, the average per capita living standard was 7.5% below 1929. Thus while employed workers can maintain a 1929 living standard with shorter work hours, our comparison makes no allowance for the insecurity of working conditions today, the anxiety of not knowing whether one will have a job tomorrow, the burden of supporting unemployed family members. Unemployment compensation payments are an essential help here, but they are not a substitute for work opportunities.

If now we compare progress in the decade just ending with progress in the 10 previous years (1919 to 1929), we find a strong contrast between the previous decade of expanding productive activity and the present 10 years of industrial stagnation. From 1919 to 1929, the average per capita living standard in the United States rose 23% and hours of work were reduced by two per week (from 51 in 1919 to 49 in 1929). From 1929 to 1937, the average per capita living standard declined 7.5% and work hours were reduced by 10 per week.

The only tangible gain to workers in the present decade has been an increase in leisure while adjustment in wage rates pave the way for higher living standards when industry expands. In the last decade the increase in leisure was very much smaller, but the 23% rise in per capita "real" income raised workers' living standards to the highest level of any country in the world. This contrasts with a net loss in the present decade, due to industrial stagnation.

For industry as a whole, however, this decade has brought a major gain, the value of which is not yet apparent, for basic adjustments of work hours and wage rates have placed the national economy on a sound basis, ready to go forward. Industry ended the previous decade with a period of inflationary debauch, which temporarily brought high profits, and then plunged the country into depression. The present decade has on the whole been a period of low profits, and even in 1937 profits were considerably below 1929 levels. But this decade closes with industry in a healthy condition ready to go forward to higher productive activity and greater creation of wealth than ever before.

As noted in the last section, our problem today is to restore industry to full productive activity so that the adjustments of this decade may take effect in higher living standards and increased incomes for all.

(P. 175) Marking the culmination of the long and stubborn legislative battle unswervingly led by the A. F. of L., the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 became law on June 25, 1938. As the minimum wage and maximum hour provisions of the new statute did not become effective until October 24, 1938, the first four months following the signing of the Act were consumed in the setting up of the Wage and Hour Division in the Department of Labor as the agency responsible for the administration and enforcement of the labor standards prescribed in the Act.

The child labor provisions of the Act are administered under the direction of the chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor.

The Fair Labor Standards Act applies only to workers engaged in interstate commerce or those producing goods for interstate commerce. When the minimum wage and maximum hour provisions became effective on October 24, 1938, it was estimated that the protection of minimum standards of the law extended to over 11,000,000 workers.

The initial statutory wage of 25c an hour went into effect on October 24, 1938. This minimum will be advanced automatically to 30c an hour on October 24, 1939, and will remain in effect for six years when the 40c minimum will apply. A large mass of workers in low-paid industries and in low-wage areas have been benefited by the application of the 25c minimum.

The statutory method of maintaining a minimum wage standard is supplemented in the Act by the machinery which enables the administrator to issue minimum wage orders for specific industries. These minimum wage orders must provide for minimum wage determination between 25c and 40c an hour and are based on recommendation of an industry committee made up of an equal number of representatives of Labor, employers and the public. Under this procedure, an industry committee reviews all available wage evidence and hears witnesses from all interested parties and by a majority vote submits a recommendation to the administrator which he can either accept or reject in its entirety but cannot modify in any part. Before accepting a recommendation of an industry committee and embodying it in a wage order, the administrator must hold public hearings in which the basic record of evidence is established.

(1941, p. 71) Through united, concentrated effort all American Federation of Labor organizations have succeeded in lifting the American wage level and in securing decided improvement in conditions of employment. Notwithstanding this fact there are thousands of workers whose wages are still below a subsistence level. This is evidenced by the fact that special drives have been made to establish the minimum wage standards provided for by the minimum wage law in a very large number of industries.

It is a part of the fixed policy of the American Federation of Labor to continue its driving efforts to increase wages for those whose rates of pay may be classified as being in the higher brackets, and to increase the wages of those whose rates of pay are indefensible and whose incomes are in no way commensurate with the requirements of our American standard of living.

Wage earners base their demand for increased wages upon a justified claim to share in increased productivity and increased income which has been created by the production expansion developments arising out of the application of the defense program. Increasing productivity, savings in production costs, reduced unit selling costs, economies which accompany expanding production all along the line have made it possible in general to pay higher wages without reducing industrial profits. . . .

(P. 74) The membership of the American Federation of Labor is moved by a sincere and compelling desire to realize and enjoy a higher standard of life and living. They can only realize this ambition and achieve this noble purpose through the enjoyment of an annual income fully commensurate with the requirements of American citizenship. It is, therefore, the fixed and determined purpose of the American Federation of Labor to continue to demand and secure higher wages and improved conditions of employment for the working men and women of our country.

(P. 624) Wage rates fix the income of wage earners, determine the standards of living for their families, and condition their ability to share in social and economic progress. Our unions, through collective bargaining, fix standards above those minima established by administrative procedure and endeavor to secure for workers compensation based upon their contributions to production.

(Pp. 624-5) Industrial records, cited by the Executive Council's Report, shows that Labor is entitled to larger compensation: production per man hour increased 43% between 1929 and 1941 while labor costs per unit of product declined 6.5%. Wages constituted a relatively small part of production costs in many industries and therefore do not automatically force price rises as some maintain. It is especially important under present conditions for all unions to have adequate industrial and financial information to sustain their wage contentions. While we realize present danger of inflation makes it necessary for the unions together with all other groups to cooperate to curb inflationary tendencies we cannot be deluded into believing that wages should be frozen. Stabilization and maintenance of the status quo are not necessarily the same thing.

As the Executive Council Report points out, wage policies should not be confused with any proposal for price control or price freezing. Wages are incomes paid to persons as compensation for work. Prices are the market valuation of commodities. As the American Federation of Labor had written into the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and later in the basic principles of the ILO, "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce."

Payment for work must be determined between the individual rendering the work and the employer, or between their representatives. This procedure is inseparable from human freedom and dignity which lies at the base of democratic institutions and controls their nature and operations. If we are to defend free institutions we must continue to function as free people, with representation in the making of policies and decisions which concern our well being. Any form of price control will indirectly affect wages when union representatives negotiate for Labor's share of the returns of the employing companies. Direct fixing of wages would constitute income control which, when applied to employers, will involve fixing of profits. On the other hand, price control will indirectly affect profits as well as wages.

What Labor wants from price control is an economic stability that will enable industries to operate and all individuals and public agencies to be able to plan to expend their incomes to the best advantage of all concerned. Without stability there can be no security of income, investments, or other property.

The price control bill of the administration wisely does not propose to fix wages but authorizes the President to fix prices with adequate provisions for hearings within time limits, and with limits on the duration of this authority.

(1942, p. 121) Figures show clearly that the vast majority of our workers cannot earn a decent living for a family of four unless they work overtime to a considerable extent. Since one-third of American families actually will have incomes of $2,500 this year, it is clear that many of them have to depend on more than one member working and bringing in an income.

This is significant, for it shows that standard wage rates in America have not yet reached the point where any but a very small minority of highly skilled workers can hope to earn an adequate living for a family of four in normal times. At present, because much overtime is being worked and many families have more than one wage earner, workers are enjoying a temporary betterment. But until wage rates are lifted to a much higher level, the vast majority of workers' families must live on a very inadequate budget in normal times.

We have not yet established a wage which will carry us into the post-war period at a decent living level, nor at a level which will create an adequate market for industry's products.

(1944, p. 136) The E.C. submitted an informative statement on A. F. of L. policy with regard to our national wage policy. Incorporated in this lengthy report is an important statement as follows:

Your Executive Council cannot impress too strongly on the convention the following facts: Full production and full employment make possible a high level of wages. Increased costs of government and payments on our war debt will require large revenues from taxes. If production and national income are at high levels a relatively low tax rate will bring in the necessary funds. However, if industry operates at low levels, using only part of its capacity, high wages will become a burden which many companies cannot pay, and the necessary taxes on corporations and individuals will also be burdensome at low levels of production. Such burdens tend to discourage the business initiative on which employment depends.

The American Federation of Labor has a definite part to play in the national effort to bring full production and full employment. Our task is to see that wage rates are high enough to provide a good living and furnish the necessary buying power, which alone can make full production possible.

At today's wage rates there is a shortage of workers' buying power. This shortage is so serious that it will undermine the very basis of our future prosperity, threatening to plunge the country into a disastrous business depression.

To correct this shortage, substantial wage increases for all union members must be secured. But our task will not be ended there. Millions of low paid, unorganized workers must also have their wages raised. Full production and full employment will not be possible unless they too receive very substantially higher wages. To secure the necessary wage increases throughout industry we recommend the following program:

1. That all unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor make a concerted drive for wage increases for all workers.

2. That the necessary legislative action be taken to raise substantially the wage floor provided in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

3. That a concerted drive under Federation leadership be carried out during the coming year to assist international unions in organizing workers in their jurisdictions in the low paid industries and in raising their pay; and where there are no international unions having jurisdiction that the workers be organized in federal labor unions and the necessary wage increases secured.

(P. 577) The convention committee submitted a report endorsing the E.C. statement on wage policy which was unanimously adopted by the convention as follows:

Under the caption of "Wages," the Executive Council has presented an exhaustive study of wages and the part they played in maintaining consumers' capacity without which American industry and commerce cannot succeed. It also makes a comparison between wages and the cost of living, supplying a mass of statistical information relative to the subject. The report concludes with the recommendation that all unions in the American Federation of Labor make a concerted drive for wage increases for all workers, that the necessary legislative action be taken to substantially increase the wage floor provided by the Fair Labor Standards Act. That a concerted drive under the American Federation of Labor be put into effect during the coming year to assist international unions in organizing workers under their jurisdiction, and also in the low paid industries, so that necessary increases in wages may be secured for all workers.

In this connection your committee believes it advisable that the record of this convention should contain a reproduction of the letter sent to the President of the United States under date of November 13, 1944, by Secretary-Treasurer George Meany. The letter follows:

November 13, 1944

Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt
The White House
Washington, D. C.
My dear Mr. President:

As a member of your Cost of Living Committee I wish to place before you the reasons for Labor's persistent and determined objection to the way the Bureau of Labor Statistics "Cost of Living Index" is used in wage stabilization. Chairman Davis has given you a report which reviews in detail the work of the Mitchell Committee of experts and gives his conclusions on the increase in living costs since January 1941. I am giving you a special report to clarify certain points which the American Federation of Labor feels have not been sufficiently emphasized.

First of all I should like to point out the difference between measuring prices and measuring the costs of living. The Bureau of Labor Statistics measures prices. It does not measure costs of living. This distinction was made clear by the experts:

The Mills Committee expressly says:

Within the limits established for it, the cost of living index provides a trustworthy measure of prices paid by consumers for goods and services.

And the Mitchell Committee states:

For many policy and analytical purposes it is important to isolate the price factor alone. For these purposes, the index should be as nearly as possible confined to the price factor in the living costs of families dependent upon wages and low salaries.

Thus clearly the index is limited to the measurement of one factor in the cost of living, that of prices, and to that alone; and according to the Mitchell Committee, it should be so limited. This means that it measures prices, but it does not measure living costs.

However, Chairman Davis confuses these terms when he says that the index is "an acceptable approximation to changes in the cost of living for urban workers" and that "it should be regarded as the standard measure of changes in the cost of living for wage earners and lower-salaried employees."

Labor cannot accept this index as a measure of the changes in the costs of living. Also, as to its being a trustworthy measures of prices, the Mitchell Committee finds that due to under-reporting of prices of price-controlled foods, the index has a downward bias of one-half of one point. Thus it is not entirely trustworthy even as a measure of prices. These are two of the reasons why Labor cannot accept the index as even an approximation to changes in living costs.

Secondly, I cannot agree with Chairman Davis' general statement that the BLS index figures "are good basic figures for use in the formulation of fiscal and other governmental policy." This statement should be qualified so as to make it clear that such policies do not include the adjustment of wages. Such a qualification is necessary to avoid any misunderstanding as to the use of the index.

The chief question which your Cost of Living Committee undertook to answer in November 1943 was this: "What is the cost of living today compared to January 1941? No one on your committee has answered the question.

Mr. Davis' conclusion, adopting the findings of the Mitchell Committee, is that the over-all increase in the cost of living from January 1941 to September 1944 is 29 to 30 per cent.

Labor finds, however, that many factors which have greatly increased our living costs are not allowed for by the Mitchell Committee report. By living costs we mean the cost of maintaining the same living standard we had before the war—and there is general agreement on this definition. Our living habits have had to adjust to wartime conditions, often at greatly increased costs. Landlords no longer do the repair and redecorating work they did before the war and we are forced to pay these costs ourselves; rationing of meat has forced us to eat in restaurants at greatly increased cost; inferior gasoline, wear and tear on automobiles by ride-sharing to and from work, the use of worn-out cars requiring much repair have increased the cost of necessary transportation and are only partly accounted for by the BLS; families living in crowded war centers without equipment for home laundering must send their washing out at much higher cost. This type of cost has not been accounted for in the Mitchell Committee's estimates, but our members tell us that such things add greatly to the amounts they must spend to maintain their prewar standard of living. Unless earnings rise enough to cover such costs as these, in addition to those covered by the Mitchell Committee, workers must move to cheaper houses, buy cheaper commodities, and so on, in an effort to make ends meet. Every wage earner family knows that the increase in the amount they have to spend to maintain standards is greater than that shown by the Bureau of Labor Statistics or the Mitchell Committee.

When the Little Steel Formula was established the War Labor Board made plain that it intended to maintain established living standards, as Vice Chairman Taylor's opinion states:

Those groups whose peace-time standards have been broken are entitled to have these standards re-established as a stabilization factor . . . Such labor standards can be preserved without any significant effect upon the broad inflation problem.

And Chairman Davis said:

Because of the need for maximum war production it is necessary that fair and equitable labor standards should not be broken down . . . Not to protect these standards would justly give rise to a sense of insecurity and frustration among the workers who remain at home; and it is only fair to the workers who are drawn into the fighting services that their standards should be protected while they are away.

Thus the public members of the board clearly recognized the principle of maintaining workers' peace-time living standards as a basic requirement for justice both to war workers and to servicemen.

This basic principle, however, has not been upheld. Although the original purpose was to permit wage increases equivalent to the rise in living costs, the Little Steel Formula froze the increase at 15 per cent and wage rates have not been allowed to move upward and have not kept pace even with the rise in prices shown by the BLS index.

One reason for this was the failure of the Bureau of Labor Statistics index to measure the rise in living costs. All those who have examined the index agree that it measures only one element in the increased cost of living, that is, the rise in prices of a selected list of commodities and services bought by wage earners and small salaried workers living in large cities. It does not measure the total rise in living costs for workers generally, or show what this rise has meant to them in reduction of their peace-time living standards. It does not adequately measure such elements as quality deterioration, disappearance of cheaper articles from the market, absence of special sales (which are included in the Mitchell Committee estimate); nor does it measure such other increases in living costs as those I have listed above. The Mills Committee and the Mitchell Committee both feel that it should not measure these items, because, if it did so, it would no longer be a price index suitable for use in measuring price inflation and for other necessary purposes for which it is now an essential measuring rod.

The BLS itself recognizes that its index is not a cost of living index and says so in the statement placed at the head of its monthly cost of living releases:

The index does not show the full wartime effect on the cost of living of such factors as lowered quality, disappearance of low-priced goods, and forced changes in housing and eating away from home.

The Mitchell Committee states:

It is really an index of price changes in a list of customary supplies, kept as nearly constant as possible. (Part I, page 18)

The name of the index should be changed to something more appropriate, such as "Index of Workers' Retail Prices." One recommendation of the Mitchell Committee is that "The index should be given a less misleading name." (Part I, page 20).

All of the changes and refinements suggested by the Mills Committee and others to improve the index, are to improve it as an index to retail prices of goods and services customarily bought by wage earners and small-salaried families in large and smaller communities. These are not intended to make it a cost of living index. The Mitchell Committee expressly states that "What the BLS now tries to supply is desirable" and that to mix additional factors with price changes would only impair its usefulness. Yet these additional factors have a very important bearing on workers' actual living costs and force heavy increase in those costs. Chairman Davis also says that "the BLS must exclude changes in the manner of living if its index is to continue to perform the intended purpose of recording how living costs are being influenced by changes in retail prices." The things he specifically mentions for exclusion are, in addition to "changes in the manner of living," eating away from home, the cost of forced transportation difficulties, increased living costs of migrants. If the index does not measure these things, then it does not measure cost of living.

Clearly then the index is not and cannot be made a satisfactory indicator of increases in costs of living necessary to adjust wages so that the welfare of wage earners can be stabilized.

The Mitchell Committee also shows another reason why the index cannot be properly used for wage determination. It does not apply to many groups of wage earners:

The BLS index relates only to families, only to families living in cities of considerable size, and only to urban families that work for a living. The index is misused when it is applied to individuals, or to small town and rural families, or to families on the verge of poverty. (Part I, page 20)

The Mills Committee also states that for the purpose, of estimating the pressure on present wage rates and the present wage adjustment formula by workers' experience with living costs, a national average of living costs is not satisfactory.

There are millions of workers for whom the national index cannot properly measure even the price changes that affect their living costs. Use of the BLS index to adjust their wages cannot possibly bring justice.

The American Federation of Labor has never agreed to the principle of basing wages on cost of living or on price inflation. The established wage policy of this country has always been based on raising wages as increases in productivity made this possible. This is the only possible basis for an expanding economy with rising living standards.

In wartime however, we have been willing to meet the emergency with emergency measures. At every stage of wartime policy-making the American Federation of Labor has supported inflation control and has loyally supported the war administration even though our living standards have not been maintained and we have been denied fair compensation for work done. We have not asked increased pay to keep pace with the enormous increases in productivity in war industries. We have willingly contributed this to the war effort—and it has amounted to many billions of dollars. The government has profited by more work done for the same costs and through great reductions in costs. We have not asked wage increases to compensate for the substantial rises in productivity which have reduced unit labor costs in civilian industries.

I said we have been willing to accept emergency measures. But even these emergency measures have not been applied so as to give basic justice to wage earners. For one long year technical inquiries into the Bureau of Labor Statistics cost of living index have been drawn across our pathway so as to divert Labor's attention from the main issue—the injustice of freezing wages below the inflation indicated even by the bureau's inadequate index. Thus wages have been kept frozen instead of being stabilized, which was the common understanding of the purpose of the law.

The Little Steel wage freeze has made it impossible to carry out the fair and just wage stabilization policy outlined on October 3, 1942, by your Executive Order 9250 which expressly grants the War Labor Board power to approve wage increases "necessary to correct maladjustments or inequalities, to eliminate substandards of living, to correct gross inequities, or to aid in the effective prosecution of the war." Your order recognized that true wage stabilization must take into account many phases of wage adjustment in addition to adjustments for cost of living. Substandards must be raised; inequities and inequalities must be adjusted; where low wage rates interfere with the prosecution of the war, they must be corrected.

But the Little Steel wage freeze has cut across all these factors of a just wage stabilization policy. It has prevented the proper raising of substandards. It has checked the fair adjustment of inequalities. It has even interfered with the prosecution of the war by delaying correction of very low wages which were creating manpower shortages in foundries and other plants behind schedule in their war production. In fact it has made true wage stabilization impossible.

This freeze has penalized workers as compared to other groups so that the original plan for price control requiring equal sacrifice from all groups, as stated by you, has been sabotaged. This inequality of sacrifice is clear from a comparison of income increases before taxes for different groups. Commerce Department figures show that from 1939 to 1943 the yearly income of the average farmer has increased 204%; the income of the average business proprietor increased 94%; corporation profits rose 329%, but the average worker's income rose only 58%.

The increase in the worker's income in this period was due chiefly to overtime pay, certain war-time bonuses and the longer work week, all of which will disappear with the ending of the war. The straight time wage rate on which he must depend for long term progress has increased less than the rise in living costs. The average American non-farm worker actually receives less real buying power for his straight time hour of work today than he did before the war. Average straight time hourly "real" earnings of all non-farm workers have declined from 65c in 1940 to 60c in 1944. These are Commerce Department wage figures expressed in constant buying power of January, 1941, price levels, as determined by applying Mitchell Committee living cost estimates.

Our concern over the wage freeze is increased because we know its consequences will extend into the post-war period and undermine efforts for full employment. We are equally concerned because of our obligation to those in the armed services to maintain undiminished opportunities to work at compensation which will assure high standards of living. At the risk of wholeness of body and life itself, they are fighting to maintain for us all the institutions of freedom. We shall be derelict in our duty unless we maintain for all those standards of work and pay that help to give substance to freedom. Returning soldiers should be able to resume work with at least the same conditions as when they left. The wage freeze policy has turned downward the line of progress and cut away "real" wage levels established through long years of effort. This is shown in a particularly striking way by the following "real" wage figures, which have been adjusted for the rising in living costs as estimated by the Mitchell Committee, so that they show us nearly as possible the buying power of one hour's work in constant prices—those of January, 1941:

	"Real" Wage In Cents Per Hour
	1935-6	1940	1943
Building trade	106.2	128.3	111.2
Printing trades....	110.3	112.6	103.1

Bakeries	66.1	73.0	66.9
Truck drivers	69.7	79.4	72.6
Street railways	71.7	78.2	71.6

These are union wage scales, the only figures we have to show straight time hourly wage rates as distinguished from "earnings." The BLS average hourly earnings figures include overtime, up-grading, and "incentive" payments and so obscure the trend in straight time hourly wage rates.

In every case the above figures show that the peace-time trend of rising "real" wages has been reversed by the Little Steel Formula. Far from being maintained since 1940, the peace-time living standard represented by these wages has been seriously cut away. In bakeries and on street railways "real" wage rates have been cut down to the level of 1935-6; and the printing tradesman who received $1.10 in 1935-6 have been cut far below that level to $1.03. I am convinced that this destruction of our hard won wage standards, this blotting out of years of progress, has not been a wartime necessity.

So great has been the reduction of workers' "real" straight time hourly earnings in industry as a whole through the Little Steel wage freeze that today 60% of all workers in private industry are receiving less than 85c an hour, the amount necessary (on a 40-hour week) to support a family of four at even the bare subsistence living level provided in the BLS Maintenance Budget; and only 8% receive a wage of $1.30 per hour or more, which is necessary to give their families the health and efficiency standard outlined in the widely recognized Heller Committee Budget.

We have accepted this wage freeze, with its serious reduction in our living standards, at a time when the profits of businessmen and of corporations were reaching unheard of peaks. We know that most employers are able to pay us a just wage without raising prices, and we are fully confident that in the few cases where price adjustments would be necessary these adjustments can be made without causing inflation.

The failure of straight time hourly wage rates to rise as our national producing power expands and our gross national product increases will be an unsurmountable deflationary force paralyzing our efforts for full employment. Reconversion will sweep away the various devices by which workers' take-home pay has been maintained, such as continuous overtime, rapid up-grading, the six-day week and special bonuses in war work. The elimination of overtime, the layoff of extra workers and demobilization of armed forces will reduce consumer buying power by $23 billion when both wars end. Subtracting this from our present level of $128 billion in consumers' income available for purchase of goods and services will leave only $105 billion, according to Commerce Department estimates. But studies of the Commerce Department and the Federal Reserve Board show that we shall need $114 to $116 billion of consumer purchases to maintain full employment. There will be a shortage of $9 to $11 billion unless present wage rates are raised.

We cannot hope to escape the necessity for maintaining high wage levels at home by counting upon large exportation of our products. For sooner or later we must be ready to import an amount of goods roughly equal to our exports, so that the countries who buy from us will be able to pay us. Dumping goods abroad is no answer to the problem of inadequate buying power at home.

Our economic planning for the postwar must keep abreast the military time table both for war production and for postwar plans. We should now be in readiness for the end of the battle of Europe. Readiness in wage policy is an essential. The serious declines in workers' real wages must be remedied now, so that a clear and stable wage policy will be in effect when we enter the difficult period of reconversion. For if wage adjustments were to be left until after V-E day, the resulting chaos would retard reconversion and cause irreparable damage to our whole economy.

Wage rates to be effective in civilian production must be agreed to in advance by management and unions so that they can be incorporated in estimates and plans. We must have ready not only the blueprints for full employment but provisions for the consumer purchasing power to sustain production at that level. Can we offer less to those who have won the war on the home and military fronts?

Justice to wage earners at work and those now in the armed services demands that the government wage control policy be modified so that straight time wage rates can be adjusted to maintain established labor standards.

What the A. F. of L. has proposed as wise policy is contained in our resolution:

Be It Resolved—That the National War Labor Board request the President to issue an executive order which will realistically adjust the Little Steel Formula with the increased cost of living and permit employers and employees to effectuate the newly established policy by voluntary agreement without submission to the National War Labor Board.

Mr. President, this proposal would work out as follows:

There would be a return to the principle and practice of collective bargaining over a wide area. Employers and workers could by mutual agreement increase wage rates to maintain standards of living—up to the proposed 30% over January, 1941. The only requirement would be the filing of the agreement with the WLB.

In cases of disputes, the WLB would be permitted to increase wage rates up to the 30% increase over January, 1941, depending on the particular circumstances found to exist in each case.

Thus collective bargaining would be revived so that it could play its part in providing the necessary purchasing power for full employment. In addition, conditions in the labor market would induce employers to increase voluntarily the wage rates of unorganized white collar and other low income groups, so that they too would share the opportunity for increased wage rates within this new limit.

Sincerely yours,
 GEORGE MEANY,
 Secretary-Treasurer,
 American Federation of Labor.

With these comments your committee recommends approval of the Executive Council's Report.

(Job Evaluation of Army Opposed)
 (P. 538) Res. 129:

Whereas — A S F (Army Service Forces) of the War Department has established at the arsenals and certain other War Department industrial establishments, a job evaluation and wage system which, from the point of view of the shop crafts, is extremely unsatisfactory and unjust, and

Whereas—The job evaluation part of this system has the effect of breaking up the work of the skilled trades into specialized operations and violates long standing trade traditions, and

Whereas—A schedule of wages has been established consisting of five rates of pay for each classification called grades, with these grades overlapping and arranged systematically from the bottom to the top, similar to the schedule of pay under the Classification Act of 1923 as amended, in accordance with the relative skill of the employees as determined by the management, and

Whereas—This system of analyzing jobs and setting wages has resulted in unfairness, favoritism, intense resentment on the part of the workmen, and is unsatisfactory to many of the managements of the arsenals, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 64th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor record itself as unalterably opposed to this job evaluation and wage system, and that the officers of the American Federation of Labor do everything in their power to have the system discontinued by the War Department.

(1946, p. 171) The wage policy of the A. F. of L. as enunciated by the 1925 Convention, was given in a lengthy report by the Executive Council. Due to its historical economic importance the report is given in its entirety as follows:

The Federation Convention of 1925 adopted a wage policy which has played a decisive part in the progress of American workers and in the economic and social progress of our country generally. The policy was stated as follows in the Executive Council Report and the report of the committee considering it:

Increased productivity is essential to permanent increases in our standards of living . . . With improvements in production technique . . . wages must increase so that wage earners may benefit from the material wealth which they help to create, and that financial depression may be avoided . . . High wages is the American policy . . . The industry that cannot pay high wages is an industry self-convicted of inefficient management and wasteful methods. Organized labor may help to indicate the sources of waste and inefficient methods so that management may make the necessary changes . . . Cooperation between all groups concerned with production results in a very genuine partnership that brings reciprocal benefits of the highest value . . . Your committee urges . . . cooperation and the spirit of intelligent responsibility in industry.

During the years since 1925, productivity, as represented in production per man hour has increased rapidly in American industry. Unions affiliated with the Federation, following the above wage policy, have succeeded in raising wages as production per man hour increased. During the period from 1925 to 1939 this policy brought an increase in wages while living costs declined and living standards were thus substantially raised for all groups. In manufacturing industries during these 14 years, production per man hour rose 54% and the buying power of the factory worker's hour of work rose 41%.

In the war years, however, shortage of consumer goods and the danger of inflation made it necessary to modify temporarily the policy of increasing wages in proportion with the rise of workers' production per man hour. From April 1943 until the end of the war, wages were frozen to the Little Steel Formula and only minor adjustments were permitted.

In the first war years, however, from 1939 up to April, 1943 wage freeze, wages rose rapidly in war industries (or "durable goods manufactures" in Labor Department nomenclature). The average weekly wage or take-home pay in these industries rose from $26.50 in 1939 to $48.67 in April, 1943, a gain of more than $22 or 84% in slightly over three years. More than half this rise was due to increases in straight time hourly wages or to upgrading, and the rest to longer hours and overtime pay. These increases, which brought wages to a level far above non-war industries, attracted workers to war plants and assisted greatly in our wartime achievement of manning war industries by voluntary means. By the time of the April 1943 wage freeze, a work week of 48 hours or more was in effect in most war plants, and the average week worked was 46.8 hours in these industries. This level of work hours was held without any further significant change until the spring of 1945.

After April 1943, the wage stabilization regulations permitted few upward adjustments of wages. From then until wages in war industries reached their peak in January 1945, there was a further increase of only $5 per week, to $53.54.

The significant fact is that these wartime gains in the heavy industries were rapidly lost as war production slackened after V-E Day. From the peak of $53.54 wages in these industries fell to $42.57 in February 1946. Straight time hourly earnings fell back almost to the level of April, 1943, at the start of the wage freeze. The drop was due in no small part to down gradings, for as work and employment were cut back in shipyards, airplane plants and other war industries, numbers of workers who had held supervisory positions were downgraded to jobs at lower rates of pay.

Due to the wage freeze, workers in war plants did not receive wage increases commensurate with their increasing production per man hour. War Production Board figures show an increase of 45% in production per man hour in war industries from January 1943 to September 1944, the peak period of the war effort. In September 1944, due to the wage freeze, the average war worker was producing 35% more for every dollar paid him in wages than he had produced in January 1943, according to these same figures. Straight time hourly wages in war industries (adjusted to eliminate overtime) had risen only 11% in the same months. Taking the whole war production period, from 1942 to August 1945, production per man hour in war industries rose more than 60% by A. F. of L. estimates, while straight time hourly earnings rose only 23%. Much of this wage rise was due to wartime bonuses and upgrading which were lost during reconversion.

Wartime wage progress was quite different in the industries manufacturing consumer goods (or "non-durable goods industries"). These industries made slower progress in raising wages during the period before the wage freeze, showing an increase slightly less than $12 in weekly pay from 1939 to April 1943, compared to $22 in the war industries. The wage level before the war was also much lower; average wages rose from $21.78 in 1939 to $33.58 in April 1943. During the wage freeze, progress was about the same in the war and the consumer-goods manufacturing industries. But the significant fact is that after the war the general level of weekly wages in consumer goods industries, after declining very slightly in August, continued to rise while weekly pay was falling off sharply in war industries. By February 1946, wages in consumer goods industries had reached a new all-time peak, even above the highest wartime period. With the drive for wage increases after the war these industries which had no reconversion problem adjusted wages upward as hours were shortened. Each month this spring brought the level of weekly wages or take-home pay to a new peak. Thus the slow increase in the early war period was offset by the absence of decline after the war and for the whole period, 1939 to June 1946, wage gains in consumer goods industries were about equal to the gains in war industries, amounting to about $19 per week in each case. In this period (1939 to June 1946) wages in the heavy or war industries rose from $26.50 to $46.43; in consumer goods manufacturing, from $21.78 to $40.27.

In industries less well organized, wage gains during the war were far smaller. Retail trade is a good example, where average weekly wages rose by slightly over $11 during the entire war period. This was only a little more than half the gain in manufacturing industries. The increase from $21.17 in 1939 to $32.39 in June, 1946, left these industries at a level far below manufacturing. It is significant however that the increasing strength of the Retail Clerks Union, which has quadrupled its membership since 1943, achieved a much more rapid wage increase in the last few years than the earlier period.

The serious effect of the wage freeze was felt by American workers as soon as widespread cutbacks in war work began to reduce work hours. These cutbacks started early in 1945 and increased after V-E Day, so that the average work week in war industries was reduced from 46.8 hours in January 1945 to 41.1 hours in August 1945 (V-J month) and has since declined further to 39.8 in June, 1946, in heavy industries. A similar decline took place in consumer goods manufacturing and service industries.

Workers who had depended on longer hours and overtime pay to enable them to meet the high cost of living, found their take-home pay cut by amounts varying from 10% to 35%.

Unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor sought by constructive means to remedy this situation and raise wages to make up for these cuts in take-home pay. Our policies contrasted sharply with those of unaffiliated organizations.

Immediately after V-J Day, the President, on August 18, 1945, issued

Executive Order 9599 returning industry and labor to free collective bargaining with the sole limitation that wage increases should not break price ceilings. The American Federation of Labor saw the wisdom of this policy, recognizing that price ceilings must be held to prevent increases in living costs and to speed an orderly reconversion of the nation's industries to peacetime work. We cooperated fully with the President's wage policy.

Our unions therefore set out to remedy the lag in wages by measures which would not interfere with reconversion. Throughout the months of September, 1945, to February, 1946, we carried out thousands of wage negotiations with employers, and accepted wage increases which did not, in any case, break price ceilings. Although our no-strike pledge terminated with the end of the war, we carried out these negotiations with a minimum of strikes. By the middle of February, 1946, we had won wage increases averaging between 10c and 20c an hour for some 3,000,000 workers, and in the vast majority of cases these increases were won without strike or threat of strike. Our demands were adjusted to the needs of the reconversion period, for we recognized that workers would benefit most by speeding the transition, so that production per manhour would be increased and output of consumer goods would make up shortages and check inflation dangers. Jobs for veterans were also vital as servicemen were demobilized. Therefore, if we found employers unable to pay the full increase we asked without breaking price ceilings, our unions accepted 5c or 10c in the fall with a provision for reopening the agreement for an additional 5c or 10c in the spring when industry had reached a larger production volume. We also negotiated widespread improvements in vacations, health and welfare plans, shift bonuses and many other advantages for our members which in no way interfered with reconversion.

Some unions outside the Federation did not consider the needs of reconversion. A series of strikes were called in which wage demands were set 30% or $2 a day, and the unions insisted on having government "fact finding" boards set up to determine a wage formula. The oil strike in mid-September was followed by strikes in automobiles, electric equipment, meat packing and other industries, culminating finally in the steel strike of January 1946, when the steel workers insisted on striking although they were offered a wage increase of 15c an hour. The President settled the steel strike by breaking the price ceiling of a strategic commodity, arranging a steel price increase of $5 per ton or 8% before the steel companies agreed to grant an 18½c wage increase. Executive Order 9697 was issued on February 14, 1946 superseding the government wage policy of August 18, and requiring that OPA grant price increases to companies requesting them on the basis of a wage increase approved by the Wage Stabilization Board. The Board was directed to approve wage increases for purposes of price adjustment which it found were "consistent with the general pattern of wage and salary adjustments . . . in the industry or local labor market area" or which it found "necessary to eliminate gross inequities, . . . to correct substandards of living, or to correct disparities between the increase in wage or salary rates . . . and the increase in cost of living."

This provision for paying wage increases by raising prices has had a disastrous effect on the entire economy. It resulted in price increases throughout industry which have caused a rapid rise in the cost of living. From February 14 to June 30, OPA granted 504 industry-wide price increases and some 15,500 increases to individual companies. These increases appeared first in wholesale prices, but were soon carried into retail prices. Cost of living rose 0.5% in April and the same amount in May, but with the cumulative effect of these price adjustments, the rise in June was 1.2%. The price ceiling break resulted in pressure from all groups on OPA and on Congress, for when the price line was no longer to be held, each employer and farmer sought equal treatment. Congress did not pass a strong OPA extension law, and the measure that finally received the President's signature will result in a series of further price increases. The cost of living in August was already 10% above January 1, 1946, and by the year end may be 15% above the first of the year.

This living cost rise brings a serious loss to every one of the millions of persons who have invested their money in war bonds or other savings, and to every one who depends for his living on a pension or Social Security. For each dollar of investments, savings and pensions will buy 10 or 15c less. This drastic living cost rise need not have occurred if the President's wise wage policy of August 18 had been observed and if he had insisted that it remain in effect. Those unions which broke price ceilings to get 18½c followed a short-sighted policy. Early in July their press statements claimed that they had lost most of this increase by rising living costs, and they brought the same losses on all other workers. Had they been really willing to accept smaller increases and adjust their demands by genuine collective bargaining to industry's ability to pay, they would be better off today and so would all American workers. And their members might have saved huge losses incurred in long strikes.

After the 18½c wage formula was established for the steel industry in February the Federation representative on the Wage Stabilization Board insisted that justice required setting 18½c as the Board's pattern for wage increase approval for all workers. His proposal was rejected. Increases of 18½c, however, became the general trend throughout industry as unions covering hundreds of thousands of workers negotiated increases of this amount and their increases were approved by the Wage Stabilization Board.

Throughout this difficult period since V-J Day, unions affiliated with the Federation have an outstanding record of sound relations with their employers. We have negotiated wage increases bringing more than 6,000,000 American workers an addition of more than one billion dollars to their yearly pay entirely without strike. Although strikes have sometimes been necessary, the vast majority of the strikes which have tied up industry and delayed reconversion have been outside the American Federation of Labor. From V-J Day through May 31, some 2,400,000 workers engaged in strikes involving 10,000 or more workers. These strikes included 80% of all workers who struck during the period. Unions outside the A. F. of L. accounted for 77% of those on strike; 18% were in the coal mines where the United Mine Workers sought to establish its great humanitarian reform—the health and welfare fund; all other A. F. of L. unions accounted for the remaining 5%. Out of 2,400,000 workers on strike, only 134,000 were in these other A. F. of L. unions.

Since 1925 the Federation has insisted that wages should increase in proportion as rising output per man-hour increases the worker's production of wealth. During the war the effort of our entire economy was bent to increasing war production, with the result that production per man-hour in war industries rose more than 60% as noted above. This gain was made at the expense of industries producing civilian goods, since the best machinery and the most highly skilled manpower were used for war industries. Since V-J Day however, the Federation can report that production per manhour is already increasing in industries where our members are employed. Preliminary figures show a marked increase in such industries as cement, brick products, newspaper printing, paper and pulp, anthracite coal.

The Federation maintains that no true progress for workers can be made by bringing the government between management and labor in collective bargaining or by government formulas which pay for wage increases by raising prices. Wage increases must be paid out of the increased wealth created by raising production per manhour. Our policy adopted in 1925 states:

American organized labor has held steadfastly throughout its history for voluntary group action expressed through collective bargaining and trade agreements. It has rejected efforts to promote a state control of labor and industry presented under any guise. It adheres only to principles of freedom from domination of the state and believes the only true course of a free people is to solve their problems of life and work through voluntary group action.

We reindorse this policy.

The rise in living cost has been so great since the spring of 1941 that wage increases in a very large sector of American industry have not been enough to give workers the same living standard they had before the war. The widely-accepted Heller Committee budget shows that a minimum adequate living standard for a wage earner's family of four (including taxes) cost $2,042 in the spring of 1941 and $3,079 in June, 1946, (average for the United States). This budget is priced each year and gives a reliable indication of the rise in living costs. The increase since early 1941 is 50%, (without taxes 44%). In spite of all the publicity about high wages in war industries, workers' weekly take-home pay in these industries in June, 1946, was only 37% above 1941 while the cost of a decent living standard had risen 50%. As the Federation pointed out repeatedly, when we insisted upon revision of the Little Steel Formula, workers had to depend on long hours and overtime premiums to pay the high cost of living during the war. Now that the war is over, and industry is back on a 40-hour week, hundreds of thousands of workers have been forced down to a living standard below the 1941 level. This is just what our War Labor Board representatives forecast in the 1944 hearings on revision of the Little Steel Formula. In many industries the cut-back in living standards has been especially serious because living standards were already far below an adequate minimum. We cite retail trade as an example, the largest distributive industry, employing 4,000,000 workers. In this industry average wages were $21.50 a week in the spring of 1941 when it took $40 a week to buy an adequate living; today workers in retail trade receive $32 a week when an adequate living standard costs $60 a week.

In some industries unions have won large enough wage increases to offset the rise in living costs and to maintain or even slightly increase workers' living standards. But few workers today receive incomes of $1.50 per hour or $60 per week which is the cost of an adequate living standard for a family of four.

In spite of wage increases in the first half of 1946 workers' average take-home pay in the heavy industries is lower today than it was when wages were frozen in April 1943 and is 14% below the wartime peak. The average factory wage in June was $46.43 in heavy industries and $40.27 in consumer goods industries.

War workers who were laid off from war plants have taken the heaviest losses. A Labor Department study of 3,600 war workers shows their typical experience. These workers were interviewed in the spring of 1945 and again after V-J Day. About 25% of them, when questioned 5 to 7 months after V-J Day, were still unemployed and seeking work. This alone represents a pay loss averaging well over $200 per worker. Weekly earnings of those who had found jobs averaged 31% below what they had earned in war work, largely because jobs in peacetime work paid less than war jobs. More than one-fourth of the women had left the labor market, mostly to become housewives; but less than 3% of the men had retired from work. Only 15% of all these war workers had kept their jobs in the aircraft, ordnance and shipbuilding plants where they had worked in the spring of 1945. Comparing their earnings with 1941, the Labor Department found the same experience as we have noted above—these workers on the average had taken a serious cut in living standards. Their wages averaged only 26% higher than 1941. As we noted above, living costs have risen 50%.

Since workers have taken such severe reductions in living standards, we may well ask: How is it that consumer buying power is creating such an immense demand for industry's products today? An examination of the state of buying power is most important, particularly as we look to the future. Today's unprecedented demand for consumer goods is due chiefly to three factors: (1) The level of employment is at an all-time peak for peacetime; workers have jobs and incomes. (2) Workers have a certain sense of security because their jobs seem likely to last for a while and because many of them have accumulated some savings, although these savings are far less than the public has been lead to believe. These two factors make them willing and able to spend. (3) They want to buy now to make up the huge shortages of consumer goods which accumulated during the war.

Total wages and salaries of all employed workers in June 1946 were running at a level of 10% below the war time peak. This however was higher than in any previous peacetime period. The figure was $8.6 billion for the month of June '46 compared to $9.6 billion at the end of February 1945 (seasonally adjusted Commerce Department figures). The $1 billion decline is due chiefly to the demobilization of service men who have not yet gone to work in industry. Government wages and salary payments to servicemen and others have dropped by a little more than $1 billion. The total payroll of private industry on the other hand is slightly above the wartime peak. Thousands of workers have shifted from one industry to another, so the total monthly payroll in manufacturing and other production industries has dropped by $500 million, while that of service and distribution industries has increased by about the same amount.

A recent study by the Federal Reserve Board on consumers' savings confirms the statement our representatives have repeatedly made: Industry must depend for its market on high and rising incomes of workers. Savings cannot be counted on to maintain production. The study shows that 62% of the consumers' savings accumulated before 1946 are in the hands of the middle and high-income families—those who receive incomes of $3,000 a year or more. Those families receiving less than $3,000 (or less than $60 a week) hold only 38% of all savings. This low income group represents 70% of all families and includes the vast majority of wage earners.

The study also shows that 20% of American families (9.3 million) received less than $1,000 a year, or $20 a week; they had saved on the average only $20 each, and many actually spent more than they earned. Those with incomes between $20 and $40 a week include 27% of all families (12.4 million); they saved on the average $230 during the entire war. Families with incomes between $40 and $60 a week include 23% of all families (10.3 million) and their average savings were $470 per family. These figures show how very small an amount most wage earners had been able to lay aside.

The higher income families who hold almost two-thirds of the $81 billion of accumulated savings cannot be expected to spend any considerable portion to buy consumer goods. Many low-income families will also hold their savings against a rainy day.

With this year's rapid price increases there is grave doubt whether workers' buying power is adequate to maintain industrial production at full employment levels. The immediate task before us is to build up those economic forces which will bring prices down to a reasonable level. This cannot be done by parades, slogans or buyers' strikes. It requires steady production of the goods needed to make up current shortages. These shortages are the main cause of the inflation. When the supply of goods is adequate to meet demand, the normal reaction of the market will bring prices down. This will result in more benefits to workers and all other consumer groups than any other single economic action. Steady production by workers is essential to accomplish this end, and government controls must also be so adjusted as not to interfere with production.

The American Federation of Labor reiterates the constructive principles which have guided our wage policy in the past:

Progress for workers and all others requires that wage increases be paid for by increasing output per manhour. Where collective bargaining exists and a relationship of square dealing and good faith has developed between management and union, cooperation of the two groups to promote efficiency and increase production per manhour will contribute greatly to the progress of both. Such cooperation should lead to a genuine partnership between management and workers, to the end that the income to pay wage increases will be created, wages will be increased and workers will receive a just and equitable division of profits that accrue from the wealth they produce.

(P. 486) This section of the report of the Executive Council contains details of wartime developments in wage rates and workers' incomes. These facts show how governmental controls have warped the wage structure and prevented a proportional increase in wage rates to compensate for increases in output per manhour. Controls exercised by O.P.A., Civilian Production Administration, and the Wage Stabilization Board still impede collective bargaining—the accepted procedure for adjusting wage rates in accord with economic conditions, output per man, cooperation with management by which workers assume proportionate responsibility for eliminating wastes and proposing economies.

Prices have been raised by O.P.A. because of foreign as well as domestic conditions, while wage rates have been curbed. As a result, serious unbalance is developing between output of consumer goods and consumer purchasing power. Workers' families are feeling the pinch of rising prices and less flexible earnings. This situation would be serious even if workers and management were free to make the best possible arrangements through collective bargaining, but it is more dangerous when Government prohibits payment of increases which management accepts as equitable and practical under present conditions.

Wartime controls are steadily developing into hindrances to reconversion and normal progress with production to serve normal needs.

We therefore urge:

(1) Immediate lifting of price controls, except rents.

(2) Dissolution of the Wage Stabilization Board.

(3) Return to collective bargaining based on workers' contribution to production and capacity of the employer to pay.

(4) The development of union-management cooperation plans with joint responsibility for improving production and reducing wastes that unnecessarily increase costs together with the development of records to show workers' contribution to production and workers' production achievements.

(5) The expansion of union-management machinery through joint agreement upon management techniques which would otherwise definitely restrict the field of collective bargaining.

There are industries and occupations where it is impractical or impossible to measure the individual's production, as in the case of so-called white collar workers for whom the cost of living is of vital importance.

We urge reaffirmation of these present wage policies:

High wages are the distinctively American policy.

Increased productivity and increased output per manhour are essential to continuous increases in our standards of living and provide resources for paying higher wages.

Industries and business undertakings which cannot pay high wages are enterprises self-convicted of inefficiency and wastes. Business enterprises that can pay high wages and do not are either short-sighted as to future prosperity or else unwilling to shoulder the full costs of maximum prosperity.

After fair rates of pay have been determined by management and labor, sustained progress requires that wage increases be paid out of increased output.

During this period of reconversion and reconstruction, progress and prosperity depend upon getting our production facilities into operation at a capacity to supply needs here at home and in the war-devastated areas. Adequate supplies are the surest economic check on inflation. Our unions must exercise good judgment and discretion to secure our gains at the least cost to ourselves and the community.

Our unions must be courageous, far-sighted and insistent upon wage rates that compensate for services given. The wage earners of the United States are production partners in our great and prosperous industries and we offer industries the price-less cooperation of the Nation's tool makers and tool users, who have the know-how that is production skill and who know how to get the most out of the materials of production. Our wage rates must increase proportionately as the productive power we control enables us to increase output. Only high national income will sustain an economy that utilizes the newest in technical progress. High national income is impossible unless producing workers, the largest national group, have high wage rates.

(P. 12) In keynote speech to the convention the President of the A. F. of L. declared—

"Now we are going to fight on for higher wages, because we cannot be made consistently more efficient without sharing in that efficiency. We have not reached the limit. There are a lot of people complaining about high wages and charging that that is what is contributing toward inflation. First of all, you must place in the hands of the consuming public the purchasing power with which to buy the goods that industry produces, and if there is an unbalance between purchasing power and production, we will have the same condition as we have now during this period of inflation. The market must be there, it must be created, and the way it can be created is through the payment of wages, so that the workers of the nation shall possess the buying power adequate and necessary in order to consume the goods which industry produces.

"And then if fewer workers produce more goods, are they to remain down on the wage level they occupied before they were made more efficient? Is it to be a one-sided affair, that only capital of the nation shall be the beneficiaries of efficiency? The answer of 7,000,000 members in the American Federation is 'no,' with increasing emphasis. We are determined to mobilize our economic strength and to force from unwilling employers, if necessary, that wage standard to which we are entitled under this modern development situation."

(1947, p. 16) The importance of high wages to our national economy was pointed out by Pres. Green in keynote speech to convention in which he said, in part:

"There is no doubt but that the wage increases realized by organized labor in the last two years have materially narrowed the dangerous economic gap between excess-profits prices and the purchasing power in the hands of the people. This has kept our economy from spiraling into another depression to date, but we have been hard pressed to keep a firm grip on the tail of the ever-rising skyrocket of prices. Labor's hands are tied. It is, therefore, the direct responsibility of the manufacturers and sellers of our products to return to the American tradition of producing in large quantities for a mass consumer market at the lowest prices possible compatible with American standards. Then—and only then—will we realize a strong, permanent economy with full production, full employment, and purchasing power in the hands of our people sufficient to keep the wheels of industry in full motion.

"I know it is difficult for you not to express your great alarm over this threat of continued inflation, how you find your dollar constantly buying less and how difficult it is for you even with the changes that have taken place to maintain the American standard of living. It is a difficult problem, one that we must deal with, and I know that this convention will make a strong pronouncement upon that subject."

(1952, p. 40) Res. 52:

Whereas—The textile industry has expanded its productive capacity greater than ever before while the workers' buying power and consumer demand has lagged so far behind the increased productivity that now we are faced with a depression in the midst of the defense boom, and

Whereas—According to a study by the American Federation of Labor, based on reliable government and private economic reports, it is estimated that the rise in productivity since 1939 through 1951 is about 38%, as against the factory workers' buying power of only 12%, or less than one-third the rise in productivity, and

Whereas—The American Federation of Labor Executive Council called on the Wage Stabilization Board to accept the following decision and principle, "that workers must advance their incomes proportionately with their producing power in individual plants, otherwise living standards will lag and the economy cannot be kept in balance, and that the WSB approve wage increases resulting from more efficient and increased productivity," therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled endorse this vital principle and economic necessity, and that we petition the Wage Stabilization Board to set forth a new productive regulation in order to rectify a rank injustice done to the workers under wage controls, and be it further

Resolved—That we demand a minimum of 10% in the new wage determination under Walsh-Healey for increased productivity in the textile industry as a matter of governmental policy and a requirement in government purchases.

(P. 468) Your committee recommends the adoption of the first resolve of this resolution.

Your committee is in sympathy with the principle stated in the second resolve, but calls attention to the fact that the Public Contracts Act requires the Secretary of Labor to make his determination of the prevailing minimum wage solely on the basis of factual findings allowing him no discretion to adjust wages beyond such findings. We, therefore, ask that the officers of the Federation give consideration to the possibility and appropriateness of legislative proposals which would make it possible to reflect productivity gains in wage standards on public contracts. Your committee asks the adoption of this recommendation in lieu of the second resolve.

(1953, pp. 290, 538) Important developments in wage negotiations of our unions are reviewed in this portion of the Executive Council's Report.

Termination of the wage stabilization program which had severely restricted wage negotiations between labor and management and the return to free collective bargaining early in the year, placed full responsibility for wage determination once again in the hands of management and labor.

It is a tribute to our collective bargaining system that this sharp transition from wage stabilization to free negotiations has been accomplished without widespread industrial strife. In general, unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor have been able to negotiate substantial wage increases during the past year without resorting to strike action.

During the coming months, the economic climate for the negotiation of wage increases is likely to be less favorable. If business activity should turn downward, employer resistance to wage increases will stiffen. It is therefore important for all unions to keep informed regarding the economic conditions within their own industry or trade so that they can be thoroughly prepared for future wage negotiations and equipped to establish wage standards necessary to maintain the pace of economic expansion and advance in the standard of living established in the past.

American Federation of Labor unions should be proud of the improvements in living standards that they have won for their members. It is the responsibility of our affiliated unions to carry on with increased skill and vigor their central task of bringing within the reach of the nation's workers better living standards.

(1947, p. 629) Res. 10:

Whereas—A. F. of L. and Railroad Brotherhood economists have shown beyond any doubt that the cost of living index put out by the Department of Labor does not reflect the true cost of living, and

Whereas — Big business has promoted the slogan that wage increases mean price increases, and do not take into consideration the increase in productivity, and that the true cause for the increase in prices is to assure more profits for themselves, therefore, be it

Resolved—That we pledge to keep our wage standards at the highest possible level and to improve them if possible, and that all locals be cautioned about adjusting their wage scale with the price index but base their wage demands upon the needs of their members and that they be instructed to resist wage cutting from any source.

(Wage and Collective Bargaining Developments)—(1954, p. 273) Under this title the Report of the E.C. discussed the problems of collective bargaining following a general economic decline. The following concluded this section of the report:

Unions must also be careful not to water down or abandon wage increase programs because of what may actually be only a minor or temporary economic setback for a particular company. Nor should they automatically swallow unsubstantiated pessimistic management forecasts of business prospects. For most companies, sales and profit levels have been so substantial that a modest downturn has not markedly impaired their ability to make reasonable wage improvements.

In the case of individual companies hard hit by severe economic difficulties or for some time in a chronically depressed state, unions have usually been reasonable and realistic in modifying wage increase terms. They cannot be expected, however, to subsidize inefficient firms by accepting or condoning substandard wages.

Recent experience has also shown that negotiating unions should be more cautious than ever not to accept descriptions or summaries of wage bargaining results without careful checking and evaluation of their own. Erroneous impressions have been created by widespread publicity given selected instances in which unions in severely depressed companies have settled for little or no wage increases. Reports which purport to show a prevailing wage settlement "pattern figure" often lack balance and are particularly misleading. Most unions fortunately recognize the limitations of such publicity and do not allow themselves to be stampeded into inadvisably low wage settlements.

On the plus side, it is worth noting that the continued widespread negotiation of wage increases during the recent months of economic retrogression and uncertainty, a period, however, in which the cost of living did not rise appreciably, is a most significant achievement.

There has been broadened recognition that increases in real wages must keep pace with advances in our national productivity, which is today estimated as rising at a rate of about 4 per cent a year.

It has been amply demonstrated and accepted, especially in the light of the record of the past several years, that the rapid forward movement in national productivity makes wage advances possible without requiring automatic rises in the economy's price structure.

Wage increases achieved through collective bargaining in the past year have played an important role in minimizing the speed and the depth of the economic decline. The stimulus they have provided to worker purchasing power has served as an effective aid in bolstering the sagging economy.

Collective bargaining has played an essential role in the continuing improvement of American standards of living. It must now function to restore the advancement and growth stunted in so many areas in the past year.

(Pp. 273, 578) The E.C. Report contained a report on trends in collective bargaining negotiations. The convention committee made the following report thereon which was unanimously approved by the convention:

Our affiliated unions are to be commended for the sizable wage and benefit gains achieved through collective bargaining this past year in the face of the general economic downturn. Union-negotiated wage increases have benefited not only union members but the nation as a whole, for their effectiveness in bolstering wage earner buying power but have played an important role in preventing a more severe economic decline.

Unions have not allowed and must not allow a general economic recession to dissuade them from negotiating justified wage and contract improvements.

The Executive Council cautions unions against being misled by publicity designed to foster the impression that unions are foregoing wage increases. It further cautions against being deceived by employers in a basically sound financial position who attempt to maneuver unions into abandoning wage increase efforts on grounds of the general economic downturn.

In the last year only a relatively few unions, those in the most severely depressed business situations, have had to conclude negotiations without any improvement in wages or fringe benefits. This is heartening evidence of the general recognition that, even in a depressed and uncertain economic atmosphere and with a relatively stable cost of living, wage increases are warranted to improve worker standards of living and to keep pace with the economy's constantly rising level of productivity.

Advances in our national productivity provide a firm basis for substantial wage improvements, apart from the local or particular industry factors justifying wage and benefit adjustments. In fact, our economy requires that the gains in national productivity be paralleled by corresponding increases in wages if consumer purchasing power is to expand sufficiently to stimulate and support prosperous productive expansion.

Action through collective bargaining is the most direct means through which organized labor can exert its influence upon the nation's economy. At a time when Congress and the Administration has failed to take the necessary action to stimulate a more sustained economic revival, it is all the more imperative that organized labor utilize to the fullest its strength through collective bargaining.

The months ahead will be crucial ones for our economy. We urge our affiliated unions to achieve substantial wage gains as a major step toward restoring our nation's economic health and making possible greater improvements in living standards for all America.

(Annual Wage Plan)—(1939, p. 444) The convention non-concurred in Res. 7 by adopting the report of the convention committee as follows:

Whereas—The fluctuation in employment in industry has brought tremendous hardships upon the working people, resulting in a challenge to our democratic system of government with its freedom of speech, assembly, and worship; and

Whereas—The uncertainty of permanent employment and income is greatly retarding our progress toward recovery; be it therefore

Resolved—That this Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record in favor of a living annual wage, and be it further

Resolved—That the National and International Unions, affiliated with this Federation, be requested to attempt to negotiate all new agreements, with the employers for an annual wage, based upon their prevailing or improved wage rates.

Your committee has had presented to it no workable plan by which the present method of paying wages could be superseded by an annual wage system.

Your committee is of the opinion that it would be most unwise for the American Federation of Labor to declare itself in favor of an annual wage system, until a practical plan has been suggested and made the subject of intensive study.

(1947, p. 555) The convention did not take action on Res. 161, but referred it to the Executive Council for study and appropriate action. The resolution requested the A. F. of L. to prepare legislation calling for a guaranteed annual wage of 52 weeks plus a reduction in the hours of the work week.

Controls (also see: OPA, Inflation)

(Standardization Called For Prior To Stabilization)—(1942, p. 595) Res. 106 recommended the adoption "of a policy and an effective program which will establish standards of fair and equal pay for the same work before approving any rigid formula for the freezing of wages or jobs, as advanced by any agency of Government". The resolution was referred to the E.C. for early consideration and such action as necessary to protect the rights and welfare of the wage earners.

(Wage Boards)—(1946, p. 537) Res. 114, unanimously adopted, called for abolishment of both Wage Adjustment Board and Wage Stabilization Board.

Res. 116, also unanimously adopted, protested against administration of Executive Order 9697, establishing the National Wage Stabilization Board and called for revocation of the aforementioned Executive Order 9697.

(1949, p. 8) In his keynote speech the President of the A. F. of L. said—

Then again we ask for no interference on the part of governmental agencies. We don't want Government boards. We don't ask for Government boards. We are opposed to Government boards setting our wage standards anywhere or anyplace. This is a very fundamental principle with our great American Federation of Labor.

(1951, p. 164) Following the failure to arrive at a plan for the reestablishment of the Wage Board which would be acceptable to both labor and management groups, the issue was . . . submitted to the newly formed National Advisory Board on Mobilization Policy. But a vote of 12 to 4, with industry members dissenting, the Advisory Board adopted a plan for the reconstitution of the Board and submitted it to the President.

In line with this proposal, President Truman issued an Executive Order on April 21, setting up a new wage stabilization and disputes board. This order reconstituted the Wage Stabilization Board as an 18-man tripartite body. As regards the disputes functions of the new board, the order stated as follows:

Sec. 405. The board may assume jurisdiction of any labor dispute which is not resolved by collective bargaining or by the prior full use of conciliation and mediation facilities and which threatens an interruption of work affecting the national defense where:

A) The parties to any such dispute jointly agree to submit such dispute to the board for recommendations or decision, if the board agrees to accept such dispute, or

B) The President is of the opinion that the dispute is of a character which substantially threatens the progress of national defense and refers such dispute to the board.

The decisions of the board are binding on the parties only in cases of voluntary submissions, where both parties agree to accept the decision. In the second type of case, those referred to the board by the President, the board's rulings are to have only the status of "recommendations."

This plan was accepted by the United Labor Policy Committee, and on May 8 the new board was formally organized for duty.

(P. 160) On January 11, the American Federation of Labor, together with the C.I.O. and railway unions, presented a joint United Labor Policy Committee statement to the Wage Stabilization Board, setting forth the views of organized labor with respect to the policies which that board should follow in the event that wage controls were invoked. The committee noted that the "submerged status and lack of authority" of the board did not offer "an effective or real opportunity to the representatives of Americans who work for wages and salaries to get their views and problems before those persons having the power of decision in the field of wage stabilization." It asserted that before any acceptable stabilization program could be worked out, the Board would have to have independent decision-making power of its own.

The committee's statement emphasized the importance of preserving collective bargaining as the basis of wage stabilization policy. It stated that "... collective bargaining must continue to be the primary means by which working standards are established and administered. Wage stabilization should supplement—but never supplant—the collective bargaining process. . . ."

The committee also warned that no wage stabilization program should be instituted, or could succeed, unless an overall system of anti-inflation controls were also imposed—on the basis of equality of sacrifice. It noted that loopholes and special interest clauses in the Defense Production Act made it virtually impossible to control the rising cost of living unless that Act were substantially strengthened by Congress, and stated that: "The efforts of the board to fulfill its duty would be discriminatory and futile, if it sought to restrain inflation by penalizing workers for legislative and administrative failures on the other sectors of the anti-inflation front."

The statement went on to give the views and advice of Labor on certain specific problems involved in wage stabilization, such as the problem of "time inequities"; the necessity for approving cost-of-living and productivity adjustments and for recognizing the validity of existing contractual provisions; the importance of allowing for the correction of inequities between areas, industries, jobs and establishments as well as "in-plant" inequities, and the correction of substandard wage rates; and the problems involved in any attempt to control health, welfare, retirement and other benefit plans which are non-inflationary and not properly subject to wage stabilization.

(P. 533) This section of the Executive Council's Report is devoted to a summary of developments in the field of wage stabilization since the creation of a Wage Stabilization Board last September.

The American Federation of Labor has accepted wage stabilization for the present period of emergency, as evidence of its patriotic determination to support the defense program of our government to the fullest extent—even though it is clear that the key to an effective program of inflation control lies elsewhere than in the device of wage restraint. The Federation has cooperated in the administration of wage controls in order that this program might be carried out in a realistic and equitable manner, with a maximum degree of consideration for the needs and interests of American workers and with a minimum degree of interference with the processes of free collective bargaining. It is apparent that this participation has resulted in significant improvements in the administration of this program, and has served the best interests of both workers and the nation as a whole in this period of crisis.

The committee notes that Labor's vigorous protests against the original structure and functions of the Wage Stabilization Board—and against the terms of its notorious Regulation No. 6—have borne worthwhile fruit. The report describes some of the important modifications of the policies of the board following its reconstitution as a result of those protests. In recent weeks further modifications have been forthcoming—notably the board's decision to permit general increases in wages, over and above the 10% formula, to compensate for increases in the cost of living; the approval of deferred increases negotiated prior to wage controls; the new policy on inter-plant inequities; and the decision to remove the wages of workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands from wage stabilization controls. The board has recently exercised its function with regard to the adjustment of labor disputes, for the first time.

However, a number of important steps remain to be taken if gross injustice in the administration of the wage stabilization program is to be avoided. First among these is the development of an equitable policy to permit the free adjustment of substandard wage rates, so that workers in trades and industries where wages have lagged behind those of workers generally may move to a position of parity, without the straitjacket of wage control formulas. Until this is done, those who are least in a position to do so will be compelled to bear an inordinate share of the total burden of sacrifice by being subjected to un-American standards of living for the duration of an emergency of unpredictable length. Furthermore, unless an equitable substandard policy is adopted, these groups will suffer an undue hardship through the use of wage stabilization formulas based upon percentage allowances over some previously existing wage level. The application of percentage formulas to these cases means a continually declining standard of living, since the cents-per-hour equivalent can never be sufficient to compensate for increases in the price of the necessities of life.

A general policy allowing for the negotiation of increases in wages in recognition of increased productivity is also essential to a fair and workable wage stabilization program. Labor has never accepted the concept of the cost of living as the sole criteria for wages, and it never will. Labor must continue to receive a proper share of the proceeds of industrial and technical improvement. The Wage Stabilization Board cannot operate successfully unless its policies assure equity in the distribution of the proceeds of industry.

The status of pension, health and welfare plans under wage stabilization still remains in doubt. These programs are non-inflationary and not properly subject to wage stabilization. The board should remove them from the rigid and unjust controls which have been placed upon them under its early regulations.

The disputes function of the board, based as it is upon voluntary compliance, is a vital and necessary adjunct of the board's operations. However, the committee feels impelled to caution against hasty or unnecessary recourse to the board for the settlement of issues arising under collective bargaining. If the board is to fulfill its proper role as a supplement to—rather than a substitute for—collective bargaining, our object should be to keep out of the board as much as possible, and to exhaust all of the potentialities of collective bargaining before taking our cases before that body. Only then can we safely assume that the traditional processes of free collective bargaining will emerge from this era of controls unimpaired.

(P. 534) There was submitted to the convention by the E.C. a comprehensive report on the formation and activities of the Wage Stabilization Board, and the change in administration of the new board as compared to the old board. The following excerpt from the report directs attention to some important phases of the change (p. 536):

... Emphasis is placed upon the fact that the structure of the National Wage Stabilization Board, its regional boards and commissions is uniformly tripartite in character. There is equal representation of Labor, industry and the public. This structure results in an equality not only in representation but also in influence. There is no other government agency in the defense mobilization effort where the representatives of Labor hold a similar position.

In view of the unusual structure of the Wage Stabilization Board, the fact is all the more significant that both in revising the wage policies of the old Wage Stabilization Board and in establishing new wage policies, there has been almost completely unanimous action by the representatives of Labor, industry and the public. This record substantiates the objections of Labor to the actions of the first Wage Stabilization Board and supports the position taken by Labor representatives on the reconstituted board in their demands for fair and just treatment of wage earners—organized or unorganized. Most certainly this record shows that free men can voluntarily unite to defend the nation at a time of peril.

(1951, p. 168) The Executive Council, at a meeting held in May 1951, made the following statement of policy:

As for wage controls, the American Federation of Labor has accepted the inevitability of wage stabilization. We have done so despite the unchallengeable fact that price increases since Korea cannot be attributed to increased labor costs but resulted entirely from speculation, hoarding and profiteering. Through the operation of the new Wage Stabilization Board, the American Federation of Labor believes that fair wage policies can be adopted and administered, with enough flexibility to permit the correction of hardships and inequities to the nation's workers.

(1952, p. 161) The record of the Wage Stabilization Board for the preceding year was submitted in the Annual Report of the Executive Council. At the conclusion of this section, the following statement was made:

An objective review of the wage stabilization program during the last year demonstrates beyond question that it has acted as an effective brake upon wage increases and improvements in working conditions. Yet this is the price which the trade union expected to pay in exchange for an effective price control program which would preserve the value not only of the wage dollar but of all dollars.

The facts on the record make crystal clear the conclusion that the Congress of the United States has foisted upon the wage earners a shoddy price control program. Time and time again the Congress has shown complete disregard for its obligation to maintain a price control program equal in effectiveness to wage stabilization. Despite the best efforts of the American Federation of Labor to obtain for all wage earners and all consumers some modicum of protection from the inflationary effects of the defense production program, the Congress has seen fit to continue on a path which can lead only to uncontrollable inflation. Unless there is a substantial change in the attitude of the elected representatives of the American people in the very near future, the continuation of the wage stabilization program will not only be useless but it will be a cruel injustice to the wage earners of America.

(P. 404) The convention committee report on this subject was unanimously adopted:

The Executive Council presents in detail unchallengeable facts which point unmistakably to the conclusion that anti-inflation controls are now devoted primarily to stabilization of workers' wages. While there has been no relaxation in the control of wages, the Congress has riddled price, rent and credit controls with the outright exemptions and built-in inflationary features demanded by reactionary business interests. The further inflationary rise in consumer prices is the direct result of this sacrifice of the public interest by the reactionary coalition in Congress, to serve selfish, special interests.

In the meantime, the Wage Stabilization Board rules have been tightly applied. Even the vitally important proposal, made by the A. F. of L. members nearly a year ago, to permit wages to keep up with the rising productivity in our economy, has not been carried out. Thus, while the wages of workers have been held down by regulation, the prices of necessities workers must buy to maintain an adequate living have been climbing month-by-month to ever higher peaks.

The American Federation of Labor has given its support to the wage stabilization program as an integral part of a comprehensive anti-inflation program. Wage stabilization would be both ineffective and unjust in the absence of vigorous price, rent and credit controls. It would be untenable to continue to permit wages to be rigidly controlled while prices and rents remain virtually unchecked. The American Federation of Labor cannot continue to participate in and support the wage stabilization program unless adequate and fully effective controls on prices and rents are restored.

We express our warmest commendation to the A. F. of L. members and staff of the Wage Stabilization Board for a statesmanlike job they have so well done in the interest of all Americans. We also extend our thanks to the labor officers in the Office of Price Stabilization for devoted public service. Throughout this work, our representatives have contributed much to the effectiveness of economic stability despite all difficulties inherent in the one-sided stabilization law.

(National War Labor Board) (also see: Little Steel Formula)—(1946, p. 110) The National War Labor Board established by Executive Order 9017 on January 12, 1942, terminated its activities on December 3, 1945. The wage stabilization functions of the board were transferred to the National Wage Stabilization Board by Executive Order 9672 on December 31, 1945.

Since our last report to the 1944 Convention in New Orleans, Louisiana, and extending to December 31, 1945, the National War Labor Board was confronted with many complex problems. The records will reveal that most of the board's decisions were made with a practical and realistic understanding of the problems involved. During this period the American Federation of Labor members directed their attention to two major problems:

(1) The loosening of wage controls to compete with the rising living costs;

(2) The restoration of collective bargaining between Labor and employers.

(Pp. 171, 216, 486) This section of the report of the Executive Council contains details of wartime developments in wage rates and workers' incomes. These facts show how governmental controls have warped the wage structure and prevented a proportional increase in wage rates to compensate for increases in output per manhour. Controls exercised by OPA, Civilian Production Administration, and the Wage Stabilization Board still impede collective bargaining—the accepted procedure for adjusting wage rates in accord with economic conditions, output per man, cooperation with management by which workers assume proportionate responsibility for eliminating wastes and proposing economies.

Prices have been raised by OPA because of foreign as well as domestic conditions, while wage rates have been curbed. As a result, serious unbalance is developing between output of consumer goods and consumer purchasing power. Workers' families are feeling the pinch of rising prices and less flexible earnings. This situation would be serious even if workers and management were free to make the best possible arrangements through collective bargaining, but it is more dangerous when government prohibits payment of increases which management accepts as equitable and practical under present conditions.

Wartime controls are steadily developing into hindrances to reconversion and normal progress with production to serve normal needs.

We therefore urge:

(1) Immediate lifting of price controls, except rents.

(2) Dissolution of the Wage Stabilization Board.

(4) Return to collective bargaining based on workers' contribution to production and capacity of the employer to pay.

(4) The development of union-management cooperation plans with joint responsibility for improving production and reducing wastes that unnecessarily increase costs together with the development of records to show workers' contribution to production and workers' production achievements.

(5) The expansion of union-management machinery through joint agreement upon management techniques which would otherwise definitely restrict the field of collective bargaining.

There are industries and occupations where it is impractical or impossible to measure the individual's production, as in the case of so-called white collar workers for whom the cost of living is of vital importance.

We urge reaffirmation of these present wage policies.

High wages are the distinctively American policy.

Increased productivity and increased output per manhour are essential to continuous increases in our standards of living and provide resources for paying higher wages.

Industries and business undertakings which cannot pay high wages are enterprises self-convicted of inefficiency and wastes. Business enterprises that can pay high wages and do not are either short-sighted as to future prosperity or else unwilling to shoulder the full costs of maximum prosperity. . . .

During this period of reconversion and reconstruction, progress and prosperity depend upon getting our production facilities into operation at a capacity to supply needs here at home and in the war-devastated areas. Adequate supplies are the surest economic check on inflation. Our unions must exercise good judgment and discretion to secure our gains at the least cost to ourselves and the community.

Our unions must be courageous, farsighted and insistent upon wage rates that compensate for services given. The wage earners of the United States are production partners in our great and prosperous industries and we offer industries the priceless co-operation of the nation's tool makers and tool users, who have the know-how that is production skill and who know how to get the most out of the materials of production. Our wage rates must increase proportionately as the productive power we control enables us to increase output. Only high national income will sustain an economy that utilizes the newest in technical progress. High national income is impossible unless producing workers, the largest national group, have high wage rates.

(Emergency) — (1950, pp. 21, 51, 440) Res. 5, 34, and 83: The report of the convention Committee on Resolutions, considering these resolutions, was unanimously adopted by the convention as follows:

Each of these resolutions is concerned with the proper economic policies that this country should adopt as a result of the current defense program.

This committee has reviewed in detail each of the three resolutions and has been impressed with the careful manner in which they have been prepared. The committee indorses the spirit and object of each of them.

However, the problems raised by the defense program reach far beyond the specific points covered by these three resolutions. For this reason, the committee does not recommend adoption of any particular resolution, but instead proposes that the following statement of policy be adopted by this convention:

On August 10, 1950, the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor meeting in Chicago, Illinois, issued a statement on domestic economic policies. The events of the past six weeks only serve to emphasize the validity of the recommendations enunciated in that statement.

There can no longer be any doubt concerning the danger facing the free world or the necessity for developing as rapidly as possible an adequate defense program. The plain facts are that to prevent further Communist aggression, this nation must be ready to face an extended period—5, 10, or even 20 years—during which a substantial portion of our productive efforts must be devoted to defense purposes.

So long as the actual shooting is confined to Korea, the situation does not require complete, all-out mobilization. It does require a condition of semi-mobilization which from the viewpoint of the economy may prove just as difficult to control and manage.

To carry through the defense program successfully will require all the nation's resources and energies. All groups in our society, Labor, management, farmers, and investors must work together in the common task and share equally in the sacrifices that will be necessary.

To the fullest extent possible, we must rely upon the voluntary action of individuals and groups to accomplish this task. There will be certain problems, however, which previous experience clearly indicates cannot be solved by voluntary action alone. We must be prepared to act promptly and decisively when the need for positive controls is shown.

Positive controls will be necessary to avoid the greatest danger of the defense program, the danger of inflation. In accelerating our defense program in 1950, we will meet this problem more quickly than we did in 1940. Our economy is already operating at close to its full capacity. Industrial production is at a postwar peak. More workers are employed today than ever before in the nation's history. Unemployment has dropped sharply since the spring of this year.

The battle against inflation is as important to the enemy as the battle for Seoul or Taegu. Failure to stem an inflationary spiral will give the Kremlin a victory of the greatest magnitude.

Since the August Executive Council statement was issued, Congress has enacted and the President has signed the Defense Production Act. The new tax bill is almost ready for the President's signature. It is a particularly appropriate time, therefore, to work out an effective program which will allow our economy to absorb the new defense production without the danger of inflation.

In our view such a program must include the following:

Prices

Prices of key commodities have been rising steadily since the Korean invasion. Although the actual rise in the cost of living, index has been moderate, prices of basic commodities have risen 25% and wholesale prices of food over 10%. It is only a matter of time before these are translated into substantial increases in the retail prices of all commodities.

We reaffirm the recommendation of the Executive Council that price controls be imposed as soon as possible. To the extent that it is practicable, prices should be fixed at a level not higher than that prevailing during the month of June.

Price control on every single commodity is not needed at the present time. What is needed is selective price control on key commodities. The Defense Production Act includes a confusing provision apparently prohibiting such selective price controls unless they are accompanied by a cumbersome and inequitable system of wage stabilization. However, we feel that the Act through its exception clause does give the President authority for selective price controls and we urge him to use it.

Wages

While wages have risen sharply since the Korean invasion, wages have remained relatively stable. The simple fact that wage rates have changed only at infrequent intervals when collective bargaining agreements are negotiated explains why wages are bound to fall behind prices in any inflationary spiral.

Although some form of wage stabilization may well be inevitable, it would be contrary to sound economic policies as well as extremely unjust to freeze wages at this time. Before any wage stabilization measures are undertaken, collective bargaining must be allowed to bring wages to a pre-invasion parity with prices.

The form of any wage stabilization program is particularly important. We emphatically reject any rigid formulas which would tie changes in wages with changes in the cost of living. There must always be room for wage changes to correct interplant and inter-industry inequities and for wage increases based on increased productivity.

Controls Over Scarce Materials and Goods

The Defense Production Act gives the President sufficient authority to control the limited supplies of scarce raw materials. We urge him to act promptly to prevent nonessential goods or unscrupulous manufacturers from obtaining materials necessary for defense purposes. Positive steps must be taken to insure additional plant capacity for critical materials.

We note that consumer credit regulations have once more been issued and that restrictive credit regulations have been imposed on the purchase of new homes. Necessary as these regulations may be, we wish to call attention to the fact that their effects are felt most severely upon families of low income and limited financial resources. Instead of relying on these indirect tools of credit restrictions which only serve to penalize those least able to pay it would be far better to emphasize more positive restrictions, cutbacks in production, strict allocations of scarce materials and an effective tax program to limit the use of scarce materials and reduce inflationary pressures.

Manpower

Because unemployment is at a low level, it is likely that manpower problems will arise far more quickly than during the 1940's. The country must plan for this development and make the necessary arrangements to meet this situation.

A program for the most efficient use of manpower must be worked out based on voluntary agreements between unions, management, and the government. There is absolutely no need for national service legislation or for any other type of compulsory manpower controls. The use of force in directing Labor can only prove self-defeating and would wreck the defense effort.

It is important to point out the intimate connection between manpower and production controls. If we allow nonessential plants and services to continue to operate, the workers thus utilized cannot be employed in defense industries. An effectively functioning and ably administered program of production controls can go a long way toward solving any manpower difficulties that may arise.

Administration of the Program

No program is any better than its administration. We urge the President to appoint administrators who will command the respect of all groups affected by his decisions.

For this program to be successful will require very close cooperation between the civilian and military authorities. The first step in this cooperation is for the military to outline clearly and realistically the requirements in men and material for their defense needs. This is absolutely essential if the civilian part of the economy is to function effectively.

This program is neither simple nor easy. There is no painless way to stop inflation. We are convinced that the American people realize this, and are quite willing to undergo any necessary sacrifices to keep alive the forces of freedom and liberty throughout the world.

(Wages and Prices, Wartime)—(1950, p. 288) The E.C. reported on the effect of the Korean War and new military requirements on our economy, and the growing need for controls over prices, with its potential for inflation. Increases in living costs would inevitably bring demands for higher wages.

The Federation took the position that price controls of some sort were necessary. Price controls would automatically place a ceiling under which wages would be negotiated, and wages would be accommodated to this ceiling through the normal processes of collective bargaining. This would make it possible to adjust inequities in wages and to increase wages proportionately with rising productivity. We saw no need for wage controls, which have a deterrent effect by taking away from workers the incentive to cooperate in increasing productivity. If any further controls over wages should be needed, such controls should be so flexible so as to permit (1) adjustment of wage inequities including adjustments for rising living costs and (2) upward revisions as productivity rises.

As we look to the future, your Executive Council recognizes that all-out preparedness is essential to meet the Communist menace. If we value our freedom, our country must be prepared to play its full part and, because we have the world's greatest production facilities, to take the greatest responsibility in the action of the free world to combat Communist military aggression in other parts of the globe. Our country has sought peace. We have pared our military machine to the bone. We are now caught with inadequate weapons while the threat of Communist armed aggression grows in a number of places far distant from our country. We must immediately rebuild our military strength, help our allies to rearm and prepare to transport weapons over great distances. This must be the first call on our production facilities and we must turn to the task all the manpower and resources needed for it.

Federation members may be counted on to do their full part. We emphasize the fact, however, that voluntary measures, not rigid government regimentation, achieve the greatest efficiency and productive results. This was fully proved in the last war. Whatever controls are necessary for the civilian economy should be safeguarded against regimentation and administered in close cooperation with citizens' boards representing Labor, management, farmers and other civilian groups, so that the nation's great citizens' organizations may be mobilized for all-out voluntary effort and initiative. Such voluntary effort is the main reliance of a free people.

(P. 458) This section of the report emphasizes the need for proportionate consumer buying power to sustain maximum production and employment. We commend this section to unions planning strategy for wage increases. High profits and increases in productivity constitute opportunity for increases without inflation.

The effects of defense production now make precautions against inflation an important policy under our present voluntary controls. However, workers and other fixed income persons, have already had their incomes deflated for which there must be adjustment in order not to force lowering of their standards of living. Whatever eventuality there is no just reason for not increasing pay when workers increase output per manhour. Just increases are pay for output—not inflationary in any sense.

We urge unions to act wisely and with awareness of the effects of their policies upon themselves, their industries, and civilian and defense production in order to maintain voluntary controls and escape the regimentation of mandatory control.

(1951, p. 11) In his keynote speech to the convention the President of the A. F. of L. declared:

"You are upset. You are feeling deeply the effects of rising prices, uncontrolled rising prices, and it is a subject that I know this convention will consider and act upon.

"During the past year, we fought hard to persuade Congress to pass an effective price control law. Because the original Act scheduled to expire June 30, 1951, was inadequate, American Federation of Labor officials made very specific recommendations to Congress indicating the ways in which the law should be strengthened. We emphasized that the new Defense

Production Act should include the following changes:

"1. More effective price controls over foods, including a food subsidy program similar to that in effect during World War II.

"2. A strengthened rent control program, authorizing rent controls where needed over all types of dwelling units and permitting the recontrol of areas previously decontrolled.

"3. More effective enforcement of price control, including the authority to license business requested by the President.

"4. Greater control over the quality of the products coming under price control.

"At the same time, we urged Congress to stand firm and refuse to yield to any special interest groups seeking special exemptions or amendments.

"Did the Congressmen and Senators take our advice? All of you know that they did not. Instead, a coalition of reactionary Republicans from the North and Democrats from the South joined together in rejecting our suggestions and inserting in the law instead a number of highly objectionable features.

"There are three of these that deserve special attention:

"1. The Capehart Amendment. This is a specific cost-plus amendment which can mean only one thing—higher prices to American consumers. It makes the Office of Price Stabilization not an agency to control or hold down prices, but an agency to make certain that any increases in costs are passed along to the consumer as rapidly as possible.

"2. The Herlong Amendment. This does for retailers and wholesalers what the Capehart Amendment does for manufacturers. By this amendment, retailers are assured that they will receive the highest prices possible.

"3. The Butler-Hope Amendment. This is the new provision in the law that prevents the OPS from establishing any quotas on the slaughter of livestock. This constitutes an open invitation to black marketeers to operate in the meat business in the same way that they did during World War II.

"The President recently asked Congress to repeal these three amendments. The American Federation of Labor has supported the President's request. There is some question whether Congress will act upon the President's request at this session. Many Senators and Congressmen are saying that because inflationary pressures are not as strong as they have been, this entire question need not be discussed at this session of Congress, but should be postponed until next January.

"The position of the American Federation of Labor on this issue is very clear. Congress cannot avoid its responsibility. Postponing this issue until next January would constitute an admission by Congress that it is unwilling to face the basic economic facts confronting the nation. With the defense program now moving into high gear, it would be an unwarranted gamble with the wages of American workers and the pocket-books of American consumers to expect that inflation will remain quiet until next January. Congress should face this issue realistically and repeal these vicious amendments to the Defense Production Act.

"It will be the purpose of this convention to call upon Congress in a voice that must be heard, that they must act and protect the consumers of America before Congress adjourns."

(P. 161) The Executive Council reported to the convention on developments in connection with wage and price controls and the imposition of wage and price "freezes" contained in a general order and four subsequent classifications and amendments. General Wage Regulation No. 6, setting forth a wage formula, limiting general wage increases to 10 per cent above wage levels in effect in appropriate units on January 15, 1950, was adopted over the dissent of the Labor members of the board. Following the adoption of this regulation the Labor members resigned from the board in protest against the inequities involved in the wage formula and as part of a general protest on the part of the United Labor Policy Committee against current mobilization policies. In a dissenting opinion, the Labor members registered their specific objections to the regulation. Concerning the application of the regulation, the Labor members observed:

"... The Labor members of the board have repeatedly urged that the board move promptly to establish machinery for handling labor disputes. These urgent requests have been completely ignored. . . .

"This is a fundamental issue. No Wage Stabilization Board can hope to set a wage policy and then remain aloof from the controversies which might develop over its application or interpretation. . . ."

On the question of hardships and inequities, the Labor members noted that:

With the application of a rigid arbitrary formula for the adjustment of wage and salary levels, it becomes all the more important for the board to apply policies which are sufficiently flexible to situations where the formula is clearly inapplicable.

... the board majority has utterly ignored the mandate embodied in the Defense Production Act, wherein it is stated that wage stabilization should provide for such adjustments as are deemed necessary to prevent or correct hardships or inequities. We deem it of the gravest importance that the board majority rejected the proposal by the Labor members that this language of the Defense Production Act be incorporated in the wage policy.

On February 7, Economic Stabilization Administrator Johnston approved Regulation No. 6, thereby placing it into effect. At the same time, in a letter to Cyrus Ching, he "requested" the board to reconvene and to draw up new regulations to revise and modify the terms of Regulation No. 6—even though the board had, for all practical purposes, ceased to exist.

The principal modifications recommended by Johnston were: the validation of existing agreements providing for future adjustments in wages in recognition of increased productivity or to compensate for increases in living costs; the removal of health, welfare and retirement plans from the 10% wage allowance; and provision for the adjustment of hardships and inequities, on a case by case basis.

On February 28, the United Labor Policy Committee voted unanimously in favor of the withdrawal of all Labor representatives serving in other posts in the various mobilization agencies. In a statement setting forth the grounds for this action, the committee dealt with the wage stabilization question as follows:

... Wages and salaries of all Americans are now bound under the most rigid controls in the history of our country.

Wage Order Number 6 has been given the force of law by Mr. Johnston's signature. Yet, even as he did so, he admitted that this order requires fundamental revision and improvement to correct some of the grave inequities apparent on its face.

Mr. Johnston's suggestions for correcting these grave injustices are inadequate . . . Mr. Johnston's recommendations freeze injustice by denying less privileged workers the right to obtain through collective bargaining the benefits enjoyed in substantial segments of industry.

Labor's representatives cannot in good conscience return to the Wage Stabilization Board which voted Order No. 6. . . .

We have, however, publicly stated, and we now reiterate, that we are prepared to participate in a reconstituted tripartite wage stabilization and disputes board which would administer a fair and equitable wage policy.

(Exemption for Southeastern States from Freeze)—(1951, p. 277) Res. 11:

Whereas—It is impossible to keep workers from migrating to higher wage-rate areas and so that we might service the various defense plants under construction in the southeastern states, and

Whereas—The cost of living in the southeastern states is on a par with the northern states, and on several commodities, they are much higher, and

Whereas—The wage rates in several southeastern states are below the national average for building tradesmen, and

Whereas—The Wage Stabilization Board has promised to make concessions in substandard wage areas, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in Convention assembled in San Francisco, California, request the Wage Stabilization Board to remove the wage freeze from the southeastern states until such time as their wage rates equal the national average.

(Protest Against Regulation of Service Industries) (P. 286) Res. 31 protested against certain policies and regulations of the Wage Stabilization Board affecting hotel and restaurant workers in particular, and called upon the A. F. of L. to work toward the following outlined program:

1. The attaining of immediate consideration to determine wherein the existing regulations are inappropriate to all service industries, with specific reference to the hotel and restaurant industry.

2. The adoption of appropriate regulations to provide equal treatment to the lower paid employees in the service industries.

3. The establishment of wage rate inequity procedures on an area basis within the jurisdiction of Regional Wage Stabilization Boards.

(1952, p. 478) Incorporated in the special report of the convention Committee on Industrial Relations was the following:

We condemn inflation which necessitates continued struggle of the trade unions to catch up with the rise in the cost of living. We are on record as trade unionists representing the consuming public of modest means—hence, our interest to keep prices down.

We assert, in no uncertain manner, that the enormous rise in the cost of living is not due to the wage increases obtained by trade unions at any time—particularly since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea.

We denounce the action of reactionaries to maintain wage controls while lifting the curbs on price and rent controls. We hereby draw to the attention of all Labor and the consuming public of America that reactionaries in the House of Congress have guaranteed the profits to employers and have left Labor without similar guarantees and protection.

Overtime (also see: Walsh-Healey Act)—(1944, pp. 231, 592) The convention unanimously approved the action of the E.C. in working to have Executive Order 9240 rescinded at the earliest possible date. This order called for the payment of double time for the seventh day worked in any regularly scheduled work week and for time and one-half for work performed on six holidays enumerated in the order. Time and one-half for the sixth day is not required by the order, but is permitted where called for by collective bargaining agreement, or by laws requiring overtime payment for work in excess of eight hours a day or 40 per week. Executive Order 9248 amended the previous order (9240) and authorized certain exemptions by the Secretary of Labor "when necessary to further the prosecution of the war."

Numerous complaints have been received from unions whose membership is employed in various phases of war production regarding the inequitable operation of this order and its arbitrary interpretations by the office of the Secretary of Labor. After reviewing the entire experience of the operation of the order and the extent to which it has upset customs and practices prevailing in the industry as well as standards established by collective bargaining, we conclude that the operation of the order has served to impede, rather than further, the prosecution of the war and that it has failed to serve effectively the purposes for which it was designed. We therefore recommend that Executive Order 9240 be rescinded at the earliest possible date.

(1948, p. 126) The entire problem of overtime-on-overtime arises from the decision handed down by the United States Supreme Court in the Longshore cases. The basic question in these Longshore cases was whether the "overtime" rates set forth in the contract between the East Coast Longshore industry and the International Longshoremen's Association constituted an "overtime" payment under the Fair Labor Standards Act. This issue came before the court in a suit for back pay filed by individuals against their employers. The ILA did not support the suit contending that the employees have received their full wages under the contract.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, employees who work overtime are entitled to an hourly rate equal to 1½ times their "regular rate of pay."

The ILA contract states that any work performed between five p.m. and eight a.m. on week days, after 12 noon on Saturdays, and all work on Sundays and holidays shall be paid at stated "overtime" rate of time and one-half, the regular rate.

The question before the court was whether these rates were true "overtime" rates, within the meaning of the law, or whether these premium payments were merely part of the "regular rate" on which overtime was to be paid. The court decision held that the premium rates paid to longshoremen for work outside of specified daytime hours may not be considered part of the overtime pay required by the Fair Labor Standards Act for work beyond 40 hours per week but must be included in the regular rate of pay on which such overtime is based.

The court decision in favor of the employees immediately created a certain amount of confusion among unions and management, since they did not know to what extent the decision should be applied to their particular collective bargaining situation. Although this decision will have relatively little effect throughout industry, there is considerable danger that anti-Labor elements will attempt to use it as an excuse to tear down the standards which have been maintained for many years under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

At the present time, management's interests are supporting the Goodwin-Wiley bills (H.R. 6534 and S. 2728) which were introduced in the closing days of the 80th Congress. These bills purport to restore the conditions which existed before the Supreme Court's "Overtime on Overtime" decision, but, would actually go much further and establish conditions under which unscrupulous employers might evade the basic requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

(P. 397) Under this caption the Executive Council has outlined the effects of a decision of the Supreme Court on this question, raised under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the efforts of the International Longshoremen's Association to have the Act amended so that they might again deal with their employers in the same manner as previous to the enactment.

There are also resolutions introduced by the International Longshoremen's Association, and one resolution introduced by the delegate from the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor dealing specifically with the paper makers under that Act. There is also a memorandum addressed to President Green from the legislative agent of the A. F. of L. and referred to this committee.

In this a specific recommendation is made, as follows: "We therefore propose that the American Federation of Labor adopt the following policy with regard to the overtime pay legislation:

1. Oppose the Goodwin-Wiley Bill.
2. Support the proposal of the wage and hour administrator with an additional amendment which would be specifically aimed at restoring the overtime pay practices in the longshore industry which prevailed prior to the Supreme Court decision."

Your committee notes that the American Federation of Labor's legislative agent, in a report to the Executive Council, has made a recommendation on this subject. We concur in these recommendations and urge that the subject be referred to the Executive Council to work out the details after consultation with interested parties.

(1949, p. 229) H.R. 858 and companion bill S. 336 were introduced designed to amend Section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 in order to correct a situation which had developed in connection with the so-called "clock overtime" or "overtime on overtime" issue.

In the hearings before the House Committee on Education and Labor, issues were raised as to:

1. Whether the bill should be made retroactive to protect employers against existing claims for so-called "overtime on overtime" and
2. Whether the bill should be broadened to include industry generally instead of being restricted to the longshore and stevedore industries.

The American Federation of Labor in its testimony before the committee opposed both of these amendments and offered an amendment to extend its application to the building and construction industry. This amendment was proposed at the request of the Building Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor. The committee heard extensive testimony on all of these points and reported out H.R. 858 as originally introduced with the amendment proposed by the American Federation of Labor.

The bill as reported would have the effect of furnishing a partial definition of "regular rate" of pay, in that the following extra compensation would not be deemed a part of the regular rate of pay for the purpose of computing statutory overtime and would be credited toward overtime payments required by the law:

1. Premium rate for work on Saturday, Sunday, or holidays, or on the sixth or seventh day of the workweek, where the premium rate is not less than one and one-half the rate established in good faith for like work performed during non-overtime hours on other days.

2. Premium rates for work outside the basic, normal, or regular workday (not exceeding eight hours) or work week (not exceeding 40 hours) established in good faith by contract or agreement where the premium rate is not less than one and one-half times the rate established in good faith by contract or agreement for like work performed during such workday or workweek.

The bill applied only to future claims and was limited to the longshore, stevedoring, building and construction industries.

In other words, the bill validated past overtime practices under collective bargaining or other agreements, thus avoiding the payment of overtime on overtime for the future. The bill passed the House by a vote of 230 to 7 on February 21.

It was then sent to the Senate and referred to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. In the hearings before the Senate Committee the same issues were raised as to:

1. Whether the bill should be made retroactive to protect employers against existing claims for so-called "overtime on overtime."

2. Whether the bill should be broadened to include industries generally, instead of being restricted to the longshore, stevedoring, building, and construction industries.

The American Federation of Labor and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers filed a statement with the committee in support of H.R. 858, as amended and passed by the House. The International Longshoremen's Association testified before the committee in support of the same bill but did not take any position with respect to the retroactive feature proposed by the employers. The government executive departments either supported the proposal for retroactive relief or failed to register any opposition thereto. No serious objection was made to the proposal that the bill be broadened to include industry generally.

After hearing extensive testimony on all of these points, the committee amended the bill so as to validate past overtime practices on the collective bargaining or other agreements, thus avoiding the payment of "overtime on overtime" for the past as well as for the future. It also amended the bill to be made general in its application. On May 23, H.R. 858, as amended by the Senate Labor Committee, was passed by the Senate without a single objection.

H.R. 858, as amended, was then sent to the House and referred to the House Committee on Education and Labor. The committee adopted the Senate amendment by a vote of 14 to 11. The House accepted the committee's action and President Truman affixed his signature on July 20, 1949 (Public 177—81st Congress).

(P. 475) The American Federation of Labor and various international unions supported this bill and it was largely through their efforts that the bill became law on July 20, 1949.

The result of this legislation is that problems of overtime pay for Saturday, Sunday, holidays and certain other occasions can now be completely settled through collective bargaining rather than by recourse to the law or the courts.

(Bacon-Davis Act)—(1949, pp. 49, 387) Res. 39 requested support for amendment of the Bacon-Davis Act whereby overtime rates would be paid for all time over 40 hours per week, with double time for holidays, on all future government contracts in the Caribbean area. Convention referred subject to E.C. for study and appropriate action.

Payment and Collection—(1955, p. 85) The prompt payment of wages has long been recognized by the American Federation of Labor as being vitally important to the wage earner of the United States. When a wage earner is not paid regularly or when wages are withheld for long periods of time, privation and dire need sometimes result. These circumstances force the worker into debt under the most unfavorable conditions. He often may be required to obtain a loan at exorbitant interest rates in order to keep up with ordinary living expenses, especially today with the high cost of living.

Forty-six (46) states now have wage payment and collection laws; only Delaware, Florida, and the District of Columbia are without such a law. It is shameful that the nation's capital should lag so far behind in basic practice long accepted by the country as a whole. . . . For many years the A. F. of L. has supported the enactment of this legislation in the District of Columbia. We can see no reason why the District of Columbia should lag behind these states in the protection of labor standards. Since Congress is the legislative body for the District of Columbia, it is the responsibility of Congress to protect the labor standards of the workers in the District of Columbia.

Readjustment, Post-War—(1942, p. 597) The convention approved the purpose of Res. 111, and referred it to the Post-War Problems Committee of the A. F. of L.:

Whereas—The war effort of our country has dislocated the ordinary economic life of the nation by diverting the channels of trade and industry from peacetime commodity production to essential war production, and

Whereas—According to Selective Service Director Brig. Gen. Hershey the year 1943 will find some ten to thirteen million men in the armed forces of the U.S.A., and

Whereas—At the end of the war these millions of men, along with an equal or greater number of workers now engaged in war work will be released to seek civil employment which will not be available due to the curtailment of civilian consumption during the war and the time lapse necessary to change our war production back to commodity production, and

Whereas—This huge surplus of Labor at such a time of economic dislocation would depress wage levels and imperil working conditions and create a situation that would have serious consequences to Labor and the trade union movement unless steps are taken to bring about an orderly control of this dangerous condition, and

Whereas—Some plan that will maintain the living standard of the workers and assist the restoration of normalcy should come from the labor movement of this country, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor at its 1942 Convention work for the enactment of a law that will procure an adequate readjustment wage paid by the Federal Government to all workers discharged from the armed forces or displaced from war production until they can be reabsorbed into economic life.

(Maintaining Purchasing Power)—(1944, pp. 84, 538) Res. 128:

Whereas—The maintenance of adequate purchasing power is one of the factors essential to post-war full employment, the lowering of taxes, the paying off of the national debt, and the safeguarding of existing savings and other equities; and

Whereas—When the war ends, in whole or in part, hours of Labor are due to ultimately revert to the 40-hour week; therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 64th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor record itself in approval of a wage policy being established for increases in the hourly wage to make up for the loss in total earnings due to the shortening of the hours of Labor, so that weekly earnings under current wage schedules will be maintained and where necessary improved.

Substitutes for Wages—(1950, pp. 330, 498) Res. 113 called for an amendment to existing law so that federal employees and employees of corporations whose stock is owned wholly or in part by the U.S. Government, substituting in higher grade positions, will receive the standard wage rates of the position regardless of the length of time occupied. This resolution concerned primarily mechanics employed in the Government Navy Yards, arsenals, and on the Panama Canal which at the time were prohibited from receiving proper rate of pay when substituting temporarily in supervisory positions.

Supervisory Substitutes—(1951, pp. 304, 513) Res. 75:

Whereas—Existing law prohibits mechanics employed in the Government Navy Yards, arsenals, and on the Panama Canal from receiving the proper rate of pay when substituting temporarily in supervisory positions, and

Whereas—This law is particularly objectionable to employees on the Panama Canal because of the long period of time some employees must substitute as supervisors without receiving the proper salary for the responsibility taken, and

Whereas—In all fairness, an employee assigned to a supervisory position should be given the standard wage of the position occupied, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the officers of the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, be instructed to make every effort to amend existing law, so that federal employees and employees of corporations whose stock is owned wholly or in part by the United States Government, substituting in higher grade positions will receive standard wage rates of the position regardless of the length of time occupied.

Wartime—(1942, p. 118) War production is greatly affected by wage policy, for if war workers feel that their wage policy is not fair and just, morale will be undermined by discontent. Also, wages must be adequate to support a health and decency living standard if workers are to maintain the vigor and fortitude necessary to sustain production at peak levels through the war years.

Wage policy in wartime requires first, therefore, that workers be treated fairly and justly in comparison with other groups in American society. If the income of farmers and business men is permitted to increase, then similarly workers' wages must be permitted to increase. If workers are required to sacrifice wage gains they would secure in normal times, then equal sacrifice must be required of other groups.

Second, every effort must be made to level up the wages of lower income groups. This has a double purpose; to provide an adequate living standard and to prevent wage inequalities in different plants from causing pirating or migration of workers from one plant to another.

The President's anti-inflation program of April 27 called for equality of sacrifice on the part of all groups. It should be noted that per capita income of farmers this year is expected to reach an all-time peak. Salaries of business executives in many corporations have increased markedly since 1940. It is only just that workers continue to receive upward adjustments of wages and it is in fact essential if we are to maintain our place in American society.

Profits of industrial corporations before taxes appear to have been substantially higher in the first half of 1942 than in 1941. Standard Statistics quotes, on the basis of 40 companies, an increase of 32 per cent in net income before taxes. Wages are paid out of income before taxes. Since the first half-year included the changeover of many companies from civilian to war production, with its consequent heavy expenses, the expectation is that profits before taxes will be higher in the final half of 1942 than in the first half. The following point is also made by Standard Statistics: "With taxes taking the lion's share of operating profits, corporate earning power would be affected only moderately by sizeable wage rises." . . .

Many corporations are well able to raise workers' wages, and it is possible to lift thousands of substandard workers to an adequate living standard. Such progress can only be made when private industry earns enough to increase wages. It is vital that the increased corporation earnings of today should flow in proper proportion to workers. If this means that a small portion of industry's earnings flow to workers in the form of higher wages instead of flowing to Government in the form of taxes, these facts must be recognized: (1) The added morale and productive effort which will come as a result of these wage increases means far more to the Government than the small amount by which taxes might be increased if wages were not raised. (2) Much of the wage increase will go to the Government in bond purchases and some in taxes on the higher income of individual workers. (3) Income taken by adequate wage increases this year will be only a minute proportion of the tax income the Government expects to receive from corporation income taxes, according to available estimates. In our democracy, where millions of Government dollars have been spent to relieve those without incomes, wage increases today can accomplish this purpose at a vital moment and at a relatively trifling cost. Unless more of the returns from war production go to wage earners they will go into new war fortunes and menace peacetime days.

Wage increases, given with full ability of companies to pay, are not in themselves inflationary. They would be inflationary only if workers spent them in such a way as to break price ceilings and force prices upward. Inflation is not caused by the income people receive. It can be caused by inflationary spending, but this is an entirely different matter and can be controlled by special measures. It is significant that even if wage increases this year equal last year's volume, they would amount to less than one-fifth of the entire increase in consumer spending power in 1942. Actually wage increases so far in 1942 have been much less than 1941.

(P. 123) In summary we point out basic principles which should guide wage determination in wartime:

An adequate and equitable wage for workers is particularly vital in wartime because of its influence on morale and on the ability to maintain production. Therefore:

1. Wherever companies are able to pay wage increases, workers should share equitably in the wealth they help to create. Since 96 per cent of non-farm families are today receiving less than a minimum health and decency wage for a family of four, wage increases are important for the vast majority of workers. To avoid inflation and lay up reserves for the post-war period, wage increases should go in part into increased social security payments and, except for substandard workers, wage increases should go into war bonds.

2. Where companies claim inability to pay wage increases and are paying substandard wages, the case should be examined on the basis of fact as to the company's financial condition. Negotiations should develop a means of raising wages through economies.

3. It is vital to raise substandard wages so that pay throughout industry will, as nearly as possible, equal the best. This will prevent workers leaving their jobs to find better pay elsewhere.

4. Wages must be adjusted through collective bargaining on the basis of facts as to the company's ability to pay, with recourse to mediation and arbitration if a satisfactory agreement cannot be reached at the conference table. This is the only democratic method of wage determination and the only method which permits of fair and just determination suited to the needs of each situation.

(P. 121) Wages during wartime in terms of purchasing power were considered by the convention. The E.C. Report pointed out that the worker has to bear many costs in wartime which greatly reduce his income. A typical worker who earned 68 cents an hour a year ago (May, 1941) has lost 10 cents of this wage by the increased cost of living, so that his wage today is worth only 58 cents. If he is investing 10 per cent in war bonds, this reduces his spending power to 51 cents. Indirect taxes and the anticipated increase in social security taxes reduce this further to approximately 45 cents. If one counts additional costs due to difficulties of housing and transportation; of families divided because one member has to live away from home to get work in war plant; or where one member is in the armed forces; and add to this the curtailment of installment credit so that payments cannot be spread over a period of time; all these added costs mount up to a sizeable figure. It seems conservative to estimate that they will reduce the worker's spending power per hour of work below 40 cents an hour.

This does not take into account the exceptionally high rents and other costs which many war workers have to pay in war boom towns.

All the evidence we can secure points to the fact that average straight time wages in manufacturing have increased scarcely more than enough to compensate for the rise in living costs in the period from January, 1941, to date. Any real gains in workers' buying power have been due to overtime work and increased employment.

This fact is most significant, for it shows that in spite of substantial wage increases given in 1941 and the lesser gains made in 1942, workers have made little if any real permanent advance in income during the last year and a half. Unless living costs decline or straight time wage rates increase further, workers will be no better off when overtime ceases and employment declines after the war than they were in January, 1941.

(P. 518) Wage policies are important because they have repercussion on production as well as on workers' standards of living. Workers are not seeking to exploit the national emergency for their own profit but we maintain that adequate wages are necessary for sustained production ability and for that inner feeling of justice that results from a fair deal. The basic attack on stabilization lies in the costs written into contracts.

The determination of wage policies will be the responsibility of the National War Labor Board under the recent order of the President setting up the Administration of Economic Stabilization. We urge the Federation members of this Board to go into the problems of wage rates and living standards preliminary to setting standards and making awards and that the Federation provide them with the necessary technical assistance.

Wagner Act, Proposed Amendments In Re Raiding—(1951, p. 283) Res. 24: In order to meet the problems arising out of raiding tactics of the CIO unions, it was proposed:

In view of this situation, and the dangerous consequences arising from such raiding attacks against legally certified A. F. of L. unions, the American Federation of Labor recommends the following amendments to the Wagner Act, when re-enacted by Congress:

1. Require valid proof of a 51% majority by a petitioner against an existing certified union, before allowing NLRB to call an election at an organized mill, through:

- (a) A showing of representation of 51% of the workers in the mill through valid signed membership cards; and

- (b) Rigid examination by the Board of proof presented by the petitioning union, through checks of cards against the payrolls of the company and signatures of the workers, before the Board is permitted to call an election.

2. Require the union petitioning for an election in an organized mill, on a claim of 51% representation, to put up a bond that it represents a majority; which bond shall be forfeited, if it fails to win the election, and be split in a fair ratio between the government and the raided union.

This resolution calls for an amendment of the Wagner Act, when the Taft-Hartley Act is repealed and the Wagner Act is re-enacted. Obviously the proposal is premature. Action taken now would be merely a guess and at best tentative. Your committee believes convention determination should be withheld until consideration is given by Congress to the re-enactment of the Wagner Act.

Wake Island, Et Al., Internees (see: Civilian Internees)

Walsh-Healey Act (also see: Wage and Hour Administration; Housing, 1946; Fair Labor Standards; Wages, Prevailing; Rate in Defense Construction)

(1926, p. 217) The A. F. of L. directs that legislation be introduced in the Congress of the U.S. wherein the necessary laws shall be amended to provide that on all contracts, or work done on behalf of the United States of America, American labor (citizens of the United States) shall be given the preference, and that the hours of labor and rates of wages of the employes so engaged shall conform with the prevailing scale of wages, hours and working conditions in that community and no contractor or agent of the United States Government shall hire alien labor when citizens are available.

(1930, pp. 104, 256) The bill providing that Government contracts should be awarded those contractors who submitted bids considered as most advantageous and satisfactory to the Government, was supported but was not brought to a vote. The present law provides that contracts should be awarded to the lowest "responsible" bidder. A "responsible" bidder is one who can give a bond. Any contractor who secures a Government contract has no difficulty in securing a bond. This permits contractors who employ handy men at very low wages to erect some of the most important structures erected for the Government.

(1934, p. 401) The U.S. Government has awarded contracts to private business and commercial concerns for manufacture, construction or service without any provision or requirement as to the wages to be paid to the employes engaged on this work. The E.C. is directed to take such action as may be necessary for the enactment of legislation making it mandatory that such employes receive the prevailing rates of wages prescribed by the various trade unions in the various industries.

(1935, pp. 137, 450) One of the most important bills introduced in Congress and passed by the Senate failed of passage in the House. This bill which was introduced by Senator Walsh provides that all persons who sell to the government or enter into any contractual relations with it shall conform to conditions contained in the specifications. The bill aims to eliminate sweat shops, the "kick-back" contractors and subcontractors and will compel every person who sells to the government to agree to and observe fair labor conditions.

These provisions must be incorporated in all contracts for construction and for the sale of articles, materials, supplies, equipment, or services including contracts for loans or grants made to the federal government. This measure is designed to establish and maintain fair wages on purchases, loans or grants where federal funds are involved directly or indirectly. According to the report of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor the proposed law would end the paradoxical and unfair situation in which the government on one hand urges private employers to maintain and uphold fair wage standards and on the other award contracts for supplies and construction to the lowest bidder.

When the bill was considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House it was decided by a vote of 13 to 7 to postpone action until the next session of Congress. The leaders of the National Manufacturers Association and the Southern Manufacturers Association sought to have the Committee reject the bill.

(1936, pp. 124, 595) S. 3055, passed by Congress and signed by the President, provided that after September 28, 1936, all specifications and contracts involving the purchase of $10,000 or more of supplies, or loans or grants, will contain provisions that the prevailing rate of wages must be paid; employees must not work more than eight hours in any day or forty hours in any week, and boys under sixteen years of age and girls under eighteen years of age or convict labor, must not be employed. All work must be done in sanitary buildings and decent surroundings. Sweatshops and homework will be eliminated so far as these government contracts are concerned. Contracts can be canceled if any of these provisions are violated. Payments on contracts can be withheld when contractors engage in "kick-back" practices or other violations. Such payments shall be made to the Secretary of Labor who will return it to the defrauded workers.

The Comptroller General will prepare and distribute to every department making purchases a list of contractors who have violated any provision of the law and they will be debarred from further bidding for three years. The law makes it impossible for what are known as "bid brokers" to bid. Their plan is to submit low bids and then peddle the contracts to sub-contractors at prices that make the payment of decent wages impossible.

The law does not apply to construction work. The Davis-Bacon Act only applies to buildings. But there is much other construction work that does not come under that law. Every effort was made, but without success, to have the law cover all construction work.

The passage by Congress of the Walsh-Healey bill came only after persistent agitation. The Walsh bill passed the Senate in the first session of the 74th Congress. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House where it slumbered for many months. March 2 Representative Healey introduced a bill having the same purpose as the bill passed by the Senate. No action was taken on this measure for some weeks. Representatives of the A. F. of L. were persistent in urging action. Members of the committee were interviewed and fourteen of the twenty-five pledged themselves to vote to report the bill favorably.

The sub-committee to which the bill was referred also was not entirely in favor of the measure. After much pressure the sub-committee reported to the full Judiciary Committee. The latter on April 30 voted to lay the bill on the table by a vote of eleven to seven. This aroused the representatives of Labor who immediately began a persistent attack on the members of the committee to reconsider their action.

During consideration in Congress of the measure, the President of the A. F. of L. several times called upon affiliated organizations throughout the country to appeal to their respective members of Congress to vote for the measure. This agitation was kept up until June 2, when the Judiciary Committee voted to report the Healey Bill favorably to the House. The bill was reported to the House favorably June 5 and was placed on the calendar. As the days passed it was apparent that plans were being laid to see that the bill would not be passed. Strenuous efforts were made by the legislative representatives in Washington to have the measure considered. Representatives of the A. F. of L. took the matter up with Speaker Bankhead and through his influence the bill was passed. Stringent penalties are provided for violations of the law.

Prior to the passage of the bill by the House of Representatives and after it reached the White House, the Navy Department and shipping interests entered strenuous objections. Representatives of every chiseling contractor furnishing supplies to the government also urged the President to refuse to sign the measure. However, the first act of President Roosevelt on his return to Washington, June 30, was to approve the measure.

While the law does not cover all contracts made with the government, it is believed that the benefits obtained will be so great that further amendments will be made in the future to include all construction work and reduce the amount of contracts from $10,000 to a lower figure. The bill had the approval of the President of the U.S. who gave every aid in its passage.

(P. 595) The enactment of the Walsh-Healey bill establishes the principle that those who enjoy the benefits of substantial contracts from the Federal Government, must assure to their employes the privilege of working conditions of at least a minimum American standard.

The effective administration of this Act has been delayed by the lack of a suitable appropriation.

The Department of Labor is urged to provide for the appointment of accredited workers' representatives to serve on the staff or advisory committees of the Department and of each of its regional offices, so that the working people may have a voice in the administration of this Act enacted in their behalf.

(1937, pp. 154, 503) The A. F. of L. has kept in close touch with the administration of the Walsh-Healey Law, to make sure that the wage earners will derive maximum benefits from this legislation. The Federation is determined to make every effort in the next session of Congress to strengthen the terms of this Act and to extend the scope of its application.

(1938, pp. 151, 454) The application of prevailing wage standards has been further expanded under the Walsh-Healey Act during the past year. Since the inception of the Act, minimum wage determinations have been made by the Secretary of Labor in sixteen industries:

The lowest wage determination fixed by the Division was 32½ cents an hour in the South in Men's Underwear, and Dimension Granite; and the highest wage determination is for 67½ cents an hour in Men's Hat and Cap Industry.

Since the Act became effective, 9,754 contracts from 11,402 sources subject to the Act were awarded for the purchase of commodities needed by the Government. They were valued at approximately one-half billion dollars ($549,180,355.03).

In the majority of inspections violations that have been found in the field have been rectified through instructions of the Division of Public Contracts. There have been eighty-six legal hearings for alleged violations and fifty-seven of these were settled without an appeal. Restitutions in the amount of $69,393 have been received from employers by the Public Contracts Division and distributed to employees.

The 8-hour day and the 40-hour week with an overtime rate of time and one-half for all hours in excess of all daily and weekly limits set by the law, constitute the standards already set by the Act for all those subject to the jurisdiction of the Act. Only minimum wages call for administrative determination.

To furnish a basis for minimum wage determinations, the Research Section of the Division of Public Contracts surveyed sixty-four industries or groups of related industries during the past year. In these studies Machinery and Allied Products, Electrical Machinery, Apparatus and Supplies, and other industrial groups, each with a number of large divisions, have been considered as single units.

Wage determinations have been scheduled for nineteen industries. Panel conferences and hearings have been held for thirty-one other industries. The Public Contracts Board has proposed wage determinations for seventeen of these industries, which are being currently studied. During the next two months panels and conferences are scheduled for thirty-three industries.

It is estimated that over 2,000,000 workers have been directly affected and almost 28 per cent of the total number of manufacturing employees in the United States have received the benefits of the Act.

(P. 161) Amendments to the Walsh-Healey Government Contracts Act were introduced in both houses of Congress which would have been of the greatest benefit to Labor if adopted. The present law does not apply to contracts under $10,000. An amendment reduced this to $2,000.

Furthermore, they provided that any violators of the law would be prohibited from getting contracts for three years. When the Walsh-Healey Act was before Congress it included vessels, but this was eliminated before passage of the bills. One of the amendments proposed in the bills was to include the word "vessels" including "floating equipment and services." This is similar to the amendment made to the Big Navy Bill and is very important.

No person under sixteen years of age shall be employed nor under eighteen in hazardous employment.

Subcontractors shall be liable to the United States for violations or breach of contracts. Violations shall be penalized at the rate of $10 a day for each minor or convict employed in violation of the Act. The "kick-back" of wages is prohibited. If any employees receive less than the legal wages due them or less than the overtime rate the U.S. shall have the right to recover for the employees the sum they should receive. For the second violation, double the amount will be charged, and for any subsequent offense, triple the amount. In addition the U.S. shall have the right to cancel the contract and make open market purchases.

The bill passed the Senate but the House failed to consider it.

(1939, pp. 124, 412) S. 1032 introduced in the Senate by Senator Walsh of Massachusetts made certain beneficial amendments to the Walsh-Healey Government Contracts Act. It reduced the amount of contracts from $10,000 to $4,000 and included the following representations and stipulations: (a) That the contractor is the manufacturer of or a regular dealer in the supplies to be manufactured or used in the performance of the contract; (b) that all persons employed by the contractor in the manufacture or furnishing of the supplies required under the contract will be paid not less than the minimum wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor to be the prevailing minimum wages for persons employed on similar work or in the particular or similar industries or groups of industries currently operating in the locality in which the supplies are to be manufactured or furnished under said contract, such minimum wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor in no case to be less than the applicable minimum wages required to be paid by employers subject to section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to employees in the particular industry or industries, or branches thereof, for which such minimum wages are being determined; (c) that all persons employed by the contractor in the manufacture or furnishing of the supplies required under the contract will be paid not less than such increased minimum wage; (d) that no person employed by the contractor shall be permitted to work in excess of eight hours in any one day or in excess of forty hours in any one week; (e) that no person under sixteen years of age and no convict labor will be employed by the contractor in the performance of the contract for supplies, and that no person under eighteen years of age will be employed in any occupation or industry which the Secretary of Labor has determined to be hazardous or injurious to the health of such persons; (f) that no part of the contract for supplies will be performed in any plants, factories, buildings or surroundings or under working conditions which are unsanitary or hazardous or dangerous to the health or safety of the employees.

All persons who shall be found by the appropriate court to have interfered with or coerced their employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization to bargain collectively with representatives of their own choosing or engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection shall be contained in a list to be distributed by the Comptroller General to all agencies of the U.S. Unless the Secretary of Labor otherwise recommends no contract shall be awarded to such persons or firms until three years have elapsed from the date the Secretary of Labor determines such breach to have occurred. In exercising his power to make reasonable variations and tolerances from minimum wage determinations, the Secretary of Labor shall take into account the prevailing practices established by collective bargaining in any industry which is the subject matter of such determination.

The bill passed the Senate but no action was taken in the House. February 24, 1939, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs incorporated in the National Defense Act the following proviso:

"Provided, that for the purpose of this Act educational orders shall not be considered as contracts for public work or works or for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles and equipment to carry out the provision of this Act."

This meant that airplanes purchased to be distributed among colleges and schools for the training of pilots could be made by cheap labor. Protest was immediately made to the chairman of the committee. It was pointed out that if the airplanes were built by cheap labor there would be no telling how many accidents would occur because of incompetent workmanship. The provision was stricken from the bill.

(P. 173) The Walsh-Healey Act has been in operation for three years. Its two major requirements are (1) the maximum work-week of 40 hours with the payment of time and one-half for all hours worked in excess of that maximum, and (2) the payment of prevailing minimum wages, as determined by the Secretary of Labor. These requirements apply to all those employed in manufacture or furnishing of materials and supplies for the Federal Government under contracts valued at more than $10,000.

Procedures enabling the Secretary of Labor to determine what constitutes the prevailing minimum wage in a given industry represent the major administrative function under the Act. The determination of prevailing minimum wages usually begins with an informal conference held by the Administrator of the Division of Public Contracts and attended by representatives of employers and organized labor in that industry. The object of the informal conference is to get all interested parties to agree to the definition of the industry and on the method of securing factual evidence on the wage conditions prevailing in the industry. The matter is then referred to a board composed of three members and known as the Public Contracts Board. This board holds public hearings at which wage evidence is submitted for the record by government fact-finding agencies, by labor and by employers. The Public Contracts Board considers the evidence presented at the hearing and transmits its findings and recommendations to the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary considers these recommendations together with any objections that may be offered by the parties concerned. When a final decision is issued by the Secretary of Labor, it becomes unlawful for an employer engaged on government contract work to pay less than the prevailing minimum wage prescribed by the Secretary for the industry in the locality.

Since the inception of the Act, which went into effect on September 28, 1936, to July 1, 1939, some 14,700 government contracts valued at $1,001,134,142 have been made subject to the Walsh-Healey Act. Of these, 6,396 government contracts valued at $528,392,756 have been awarded under the Act in the last fiscal year ending July 1, 1939.

During that year the Public Contracts Board has held 24 informal panel conferences and conducted 19 public hearings for the purpose of recommending prevailing minimum wages in specific industries. In the same period the Board made its recommendations to the Secretary of Labor as to what the prevailing minimum wage should be in 19 industries.

In closing its annual report on the operation of the Walsh-Healey Act, the Executive Council stated: The experience of the past year further emphasized the need for more expeditious and more aggressive enforcement policy if the standards of the Public Contracts Act are to become fully effective."

(1940, pp.138-141, 553) Labor standards on work done in the manufacture of goods to be supplied to the Federal Government under contract have assumed foremost importance to Labor with the launching of the vast defense production program in the summer of 1940.

The Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, which provides for the maintenance of maximum hours and minimum wages on work done on materials and equipment contracted for by the Federal Government, has been in effect since June 30, 1936. The added experience of the past year in the administration of the basic standards required by the Act has served to strengthen and improve the machinery which translates the objectives embodied in this law by Congress into practical operating requirements in industry.

The requirements of the Walsh-Healey Act are simple. They call for a basic work-week of 40 hours and a basic work-day of 8 hours and for payment of overtime at the rate of time and one-half for all work done in excess of these hours. In addition, the most important provision of the Act requires payment in each industry of not less than the wage determined by the Secretary of Labor to be prevailing in that industry. The Act also prohibits employment of boys under 16, girls under 18, and of all convict labor. Conditions of safety, sanitation and health are also prescribed by the Act.

The Walsh-Healey Act calls for the observance of these requirements in the performance of government contracts for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles or equipment amounting to more than $10,000. The requirements of the Act apply, in addition, to contracts for the construction or equipping of naval vessels contracted for after June 30, 1938.

The standards of the Act are stated in, and made a part of, each government contract covered by its provisions. When a government contract covered by the Act is awarded, the contractor agrees to observe these standards in the same way as he agrees to observe the standards of the contract regarding the quality, quantity and character of the product furnished. Failure on the part of a contractor to maintain the labor standards is a breach of his contract in the same way as his failure to meet the manufacturing specifications laid down by the Government.

The most vital provision of the Act is the one which calls for the payment of "not less than the minimum wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor to be the prevailing minimum wages for persons employed on similar work or in the particular or similar industries or groups of industries currently operating in the locality" in which the materials or equipment are to be manufactured under contract. The requirement to pay a minimum wage does not apply to an industry until a determination has been made by the Secretary of Labor of what constitutes the prevailing minimum wage. The process of determination of what the prevailing minimum wage is for a given industry is, therefore, all important. The necessary fact-finding and study of evidence, on the basis of which a prevailing minimum wage is recommended to the Secretary for determination, is done by the Public Contracts Board which conducts public hearings in each industry in which a determination is pending.

During the year ending June 30, 1940, the Public Contracts Board held eight regular hearings and one rehearing for the purpose of recommending prevailing minimum wages in specific industries. Between July 1, 1939, and June 30, 1940, final determinations of prevailing minimum wages were made in four industries, cement, paper and pulp, small arms ammunition and explosives, and fertilizer manufacturing.

Since the beginning of operation of the Act, prevailing minimum wages have been determined for 31 industries. It is estimated that these industries employ a total of nearly 1,500,000 workers.

The prevailing minimum wages fixed by the Secretary of Labor under the terms of the Act have ranged from a low 25 cents per hour for workers employed in the southernmost region of the fertilizer industry to a high of 70 cents per hour for workers employed in the cement industry in the State of Washington.

Three of the four wage determinations made during the past year provide for regional differentials, whereas only six of the twenty-seven previous determinations allowed for a differential on a regional basis. In all appearances before the Public Contracts Board representatives of the American Federation of Labor have sought to establish a single determination for each industry under consideration. We are of the opinion that labor representatives should continue to urge upon the Public Contracts Board a broad interpretation of the requirements of the Act in order to prevent the undermining of the wage structure by setting up geographical wage differentials.

None of the wage determinations made during the past year permitted any sub-minimum rates for learners or handicapped workers. In six of the previous determinations employment of learners and handicapped persons was permitted at less than the minimum rates.

Since the Act went into effect on June 30, 1936, the Federal Government has awarded subject to its terms 27,258 contracts in an amount totaling $2,157,324,159. Of this total 9,065 contracts valued at $761,434,486 were awarded during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. During July and August, 1940, 3,517 contracts amounting to $400,066,776 were awarded under the terms of the Act.

During the four years in which the Act has been in operation the Division of Public Contracts of the U.S. Department of Labor, which has supervised the enforcement of its minimum wage and maximum hour provisions, was able to effect the collection and recovery of a total of $345,046 in the form of restitutions to workers receiving less than the specified minimum wages. The wages so recovered as the result of enforcement procedure were distributed among 41,082 workers.

In addition the Division of Public Contracts has rendered formal decisions finding breaches of contract and violations of the Act. These decisions called for the payment of $103,093 in liquidated damages as well as for the payment of an additional $86,000 on the basis of investigations conducted by the Division.

Despite substantial improvement in the enforcement procedure under the Act, there is still an urgent need for a more rapid procedure in the handling of complaints and a stricter policy of enforcement. The broader coverage of the Act resulting from the operation of the national defense program calls for an increase in the inspection and enforcement staff of the Division and an improvement in the administrative procedures to insure unimpaired maintenance of the standards set up under the Act.

It is important to note that the Public Contracts Act makes available to the Federal Government a significant measure of protection under the national defense program in that it requires that the contract be let only to manufacturers of the commodities needed or to regular dealers in these commodities. This safeguards the Government as well as Labor from awards of contracts for materials and equipment to irresponsible bidders who do not maintain a regular establishment for the production or sale of the materials required by the Government. Thus bid-brokers, fly-by-night traders and other irresponsible bidders purchasing materials from unscrupulous or unfair employers are barred from participation in defense contracts. This safeguard also affords protection to fair-minded employers, whose cost and wage standards cannot be undermined by competition of employers paying sub-standard wages and engaging in unfair competitive practices.

Repeated attempts have been made to rescind the application of the Act to contracts for defense materials on the ground that the application of maximum hours and the operation of enforcement procedures serves to hamper and delay the defense program. Since the provisions of the Act do not place a rigid maximum restriction upon the hours of work permitted but merely call for the payment of the overtime rate of time and one-half for excessive hours, the argument of the opponents of the Act is without validity. The experience of the past four years has shown, moreover, that while the enforcement of the basic standards of the Act has in no instance served to delay production schedules, the application of these standards has given the Federal Government much needed assurance of improved quality in production and increased efficiency resulting from the application of these standards.

We strongly recommend that the officers of the American Federation of Labor continue their unremitting effort to secure full and unimpaired application of the standards laid down in the Walsh-Healey Act to all phases of defense production. . . .

(P. 553) This law (Walsh-Healey Act) in effect since June, 1936, has been more important with the decline in relief production and expansion of defense production. We note that prevailing minimum rates have been determined for thirty-one industries and the regional variations have been asked and granted in a number of industries. We approve the position of the American Federation of Labor in opposing such regional differentiations and recommend continued efforts to maintain the protection afforded workers and industries by the provision of this law which outlaws irresponsible bidders and prohibits the employment of girls under 18 and boys under 16 years of age, together with convict labor.

Our intention has been called to a ruling of the Comptroller General which if continued would place many millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods outside the operation of the law. As a result of the Comptroller General's ruling the Cessna Aircraft Company has obtained exemption from the provisions of the Public Contracts Act on the ground that the manufacture of aircraft engines does not come under the law.

The ruling is of such grave importance that your committee recommends that the officers of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to take up this question so that the ruling relative to the manufacture of aircraft engines and other commodities placed on order, be set aside.

With this recommendation your committee moves approval of the Council's report.

(Amendments)—(1940, pp. 432-3) A number of resolutions were submitted to the 1940 convention seeking amendment of the Walsh-Healey Act to prohibit awarding of contracts by the United States Government or its Departments or Agencies to business concerns which have been found to have denied their employees the right to organize and to bargain collectively. The convention approved Resolution 91 as follows:

Whereas—The right of workers to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing is now the law of the land, and

Whereas—Certain large corporations who bid on government contracts have flagrantly and wilfully violated the law by employing coercion and intimidation and even by resorting to violence to impede or prevent workers from exercising their rights granted to them under the law, and

Whereas—It is intolerable that such employers who have wilfully and deliberately violated the law of the land shall be enabled to make profits on government contracts, and

Whereas—The Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act has already established the policy of granting government contracts only to employers who have complied with conditions as to wages and hours established under the Act, Therefore be it

Resolved—That this Convention goes on record in favor of extending the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act to prohibit the granting of government contracts to concerns which have been found by a recognized government agency to have violated the federal statute guaranteeing workers the right to organize and bargain collectively, and that every effort be made to bring about the enactment of an amendment which will embody this change.

(Pp. 80, 405) Convention directed that efforts be continued to secure amendment to extend its provisions to apply to purchases of $4,000 or over instead of the $10,000.

(1942, p. 68) E.C. called attention to increasing importance of Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act since the beginning of the war. The annual report said in part:

With the Federal Government rapidly becoming the chief buyer, and often the sole buyer of goods produced by American industry, the maintenance of basic labor standards on all production for Government contracts, and the operation of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act which prescribes these standards, have become of foremost importance to Labor. . . .

Although substantial upward changes in the wage structure occurred in all industries producing for the Government to fill war contracts, the pace of prevailing wage determination was greatly slowed down during the past year. . . .

It was further pointed out that under the impact of war conditions, strong pressure developed to lower the standards of the Act. Heaviest pressure of all was directed toward the elimination of premium overtime rates. An amendment to the Act recommended to Congress by the Secretary of Labor became law on May 13, 1942, permitting overtime work at straight pay, but only by agreement in each case between management and unions certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board. A parallel exemption was cited in an amendment to the Wage and Hour Law which permits overtime pay at straight time provided employment is limited to 1 thousand hours of work during any period of 26 consecutive weeks, or, on an annual basis limited to not more than 2,080 hours during any period of 52 consecutive weeks.

Difficulties of enforcement were related briefly by the E.C. in its report despite the fact that there had been an almost 50 percent increase in the field staff due to the unparalleled increase in the volume of government contracts.

The merger of inspection activities of the Division of Public Contracts with the Wage and Hour Division was reported. While commending the limited merger of the two branches of Government, the E.C. made the following statement in its report: "We have no doubt that further coordination and consolidation of field work and informational services is highly desirable. We are unalterably opposed, however, to the complete merger of the Division of Public Contracts with the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor.

"The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, administered by the Wage and Hour Division, has been enacted to establish a floor for wages, to protect workers against sub-standard conditions of employment, and to safeguard them against the evils of the sweatshop. The Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, on the other hand, merely expresses the right of the Federal Government to prescribe basic labor standards and to require that such standards be maintained in the manufacture of all materials and equipment it purchases. While the Wage and Hour Law sets wage standards which are absolute minimum standards, the Walsh-Healey Act requires the maintenance of wage standards prevailing in the industry. We reiterate our view that the determination, administration and enforcement of the prevailing wage standards under the Public Contracts Act need to be strengthened, and that they should be maintained separate and apart from the administration of the minimum wage standards through the wholly unrelated machinery prescribed by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

"To this end also the Executive Council recommends that the Administrator of the Public Contracts Act and the Secretary of Labor be called upon to reconstitute the Public Contracts Board, which is responsible for determination of prevailing minimum wages, in order that the work of the Board be expedited and its position be strengthened to effectuate fully the application of prevailing minimum wages on Government contracts as required by the statute. We further recommend standardization of administrative procedures to afford full notice and opportunity to be heard to workers concerned in the case of all actions pertaining to or affecting labor standards established under the Act."

(P. 546) The convention unanimously adopted the recommendations of the convention committee considering the section of the Executive Council's Report on LABOR STANDARDS ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS, as follows:

(1) That the Executive Council make every effort to have adequate funds appropriated to enable this agency to do effective administrative work. By the end of this year 50 per cent of all production will be for war purposes, to which the Public Contracts Act will be applicable. As the report points out, in the fiscal year 1940-41 government contracts were let at the rate of $423,000,000 monthly while for 1941-42 it increased to $1,320,000,000 monthly. The administration of the Public Contracts Act is of basic importance to workers for under it the Government prescribes and enforces basic labor standards. Under the Act, prevailing minimum rates are determined and enforced. The determination of prevailing minimum wages is a different process from the fixing of minimum wages under Fair Labor Standards so that there is need to retain the distinctive machinery provided under the law—the Public Contracts Board. This Board was abolished in recent administrative consolidation. Unless prevailing wage determinations are kept currently they fail to record wages in effect and may be costly to workers.

(2) Our second recommendation is that the Board be reconstituted. The Executive Council reports that minimum wage determinations were made in only three industries during the past year. As the year has been marked by substantial upward changes it is important that the machinery of this administration reflect changes promptly and effectively.

(3) Our third recommendation is that the Executive Council bring pressure to bear on the Division to keep wage determinations current.

We note with concern relaxation of age standards at which boys and girls may be employed in industry and urge that boys and girls be allowed to stay in school until 18 unless the need for industrial manpower becomes more urgent. The right of youth for opportunity for adequate preparation for the responsibilities of maturity, should be denied only as a last resort. Furthermore, such relaxation of necessary basic standards should be for the emergency only with provision for automatic return to normal standards at the end of the emergency.

(4) We recommend that all relaxation of fundamental labor standards should be specifically limited to the emergency.

(5) We recommend that efforts be made to have necessary safeguards provided for the use of prison labor in war production.

The amendment to law permitting a work week of more than 40 hours at straight time in limited employment of 1,000 hours in 26 weeks or 2,080 in 52 weeks provided there is an agreement in each case between management and a union certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board was in the interests of administrative simplicity but unfortunately it simplified at the lower level.

Most unfortunate was the order amending administrative regulation to permit the use of prison labor on war production without provision for standard hours and wages with deductions for costs maintenance so as to remove conditions of unfair competition.

(1943, p. 57) While the enforcement of the prevailing minimum wage, overtime, and other provisions of the Public Contracts Act continued to gain in importance during the past year, labor standards on government contracts were given but secondary attention by the combined Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division. With the efforts of the Division concentrated on the operations of the Wage and Hour Law, no attempt was made to keep current the application of the labor standards on government contracts required by the statute. Compliance with the standards previously established, however, was continued, although on a diminished scale, through the combined staff of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division. Of the 7,900 cases inspected, 2,600 establishments were found in violation. Enforcement of the standards was based both on complaints received by the Division and on-spot checks conducted by the inspection staff. By July 1, 1943, the Division still had a backlog of 12,283 unadjusted complaints.

In the course of the year, a number of complaints of violation have been received by the American Federation of Labor from unions whose membership was employed on government contracts. In many instances employees had difficulty in ascertaining whether or not they were covered by the Act where the employer refused to divulge this information on the ground that it was secret. Inasmuch as the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division has discontinued publication of government contracts subject to the Act, it often proved difficult to determine whether a violation did in fact exist. Since a large majority of war contractors, through newspaper and magazine advertising, outdoor advertising, and signs displayed on the plants, publicize the fact that they are engaged in war work, it is felt that the refusal of employers to inform employees of their status under the Act is without justification. The Administrator has been urged to provide a requirement in the regulations that notices be posted in all plants covered by the Public Contracts Act specifically stating the applicable labor provisions. We concur in this recommendation, and urge that steps be taken to make sure of its early adoption. We also recommend that the Administrator of the Public Contracts Act be strongly urged to revive and fully extend the operation of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act to the end that minimum labor standards required by the statute be given full application on all government contracts.

(P. 562) Res. 80, relating to problems of the building trades workers in re prevailing wages, was unanimously adopted as follows:

Whereas—The Building Trades Workers, members of the A. F. of L., have been indispensable in the construction of plants for the manufacture of implements of war absolutely necessary for the successful prosecution of the war for the preservation of our democratic institutions for this and future generations, and

Whereas—Upon the completion of these plants, when production and assembly lines are in operation, the management of said plants refuse to pay the prevailing rate of wages to Building Trades Mechanics for work vitally necessary in the operation of said plants, and

Whereas—The prevailing rate of wages is usually recognized as the basic wage scale by private enterprise, the war production plants, mostly under government supervision ought to do likewise, and

Whereas—The continuation of payment of wages below the prevailing wage scale tends to tear down conditions obtained through years of bitter struggle and to lower the American standard of living, therefore be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor exert its influence in an endeavor to have all plants operating under government contract recognize the prevailing rate of wages for the Building Trades Mechanics.

Your Committee concurs with the objects of this resolution to stabilize and unify the wage structure of building trades and metal trades mechanics and laborers by requiring the payment of prevailing rate of wages for them in all plants operating under government contract.

(1944, p. 155) It is to be regretted that the Public Contracts Act was permitted to remain dormant during this crucial period of public contract activity and that no determinations of prevailing minimum wages were made during this time. We again urge that minimum labor standards required by statute be given full application on all government contracts and that provision be made for prominent posting of such standards in every establishment covered, to make sure that the workers are fully informed of their rights.

(P. 587) The following recommendation of the convention committee was unanimously adopted:

We fully endorse the recommendations of the Executive Council that determination of prevailing minimum wages be revived, that such prevailing minimum wage standards be made fully applicable on all government contracts and that all labor standards required by the Walsh-Healey Act be prominently posted in every covered establishment to inform the workers concerned of their rights under the law. Federal government will continue to be a large purchaser of materials and equipment for military operations and for lend-lease, relief and other programs. Labor standards prescribed by the Act must be applied and enforced in the production and handling of goods on all such purchases. To make the prevailing wage requirements effective, current and up-to-date determinations should be made and the Public Contracts Board should be reconstituted for that purpose. Specific assurance should be given that all relaxation in standards agreed to by labor and now in effect would automatically terminate as soon as the conditions justifying such relaxations no longer prevail and in no event would extend beyond the duration of the war emergency. We also urge that effective safeguards be promptly established against the use of prison labor on work contracted by the federal government.

With these recommendations, we ask that this portion of the Executive Council's report be approved.

(P. 426) Res. 78, unanimously approved:

Whereas—There has been for the past several years loans from the government financed under the FHA Act to persons and real estate firms for building of homes and business property, and

Whereas—This money is in a large measure supplied directly or indirectly by members of organized labor, and

Whereas—It is hardly possible for an A. F. of L. craftsman to get work on these houses because of non-union contractors and real estate firms building with non-union labor at a rate of pay below the prevailing standard of wages, and

Whereas—The above mentioned system tends to lower and keep down the living standards all over the country, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor through its Executive Council endeavor to have passed by the next Congress of the United States an amendment to the FHA Act causing the prevailing wage to be specified in all cases where the government insures money for the purpose of constructing or repairing by individuals, real estate firms or contractors.

(1946, pp. 153, 606) The report of the Executive Council indicates that in the course of the wartime years, when the volume of government contracts and government purchases was at its peak, the prevailing wage requirements of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act were rendered ineffective because no new prevailing wage determinations were made throughout the war period. We heartily concur in the Executive Council's recommendation that prevailing minimum wage standards be newly determined in the light of changing conditions and that periodic redeterminations be required to bring the wage standards specified by the Act in conformity with the prevailing levels of minimum wages in every industry affected. We recommend that the officers of the American Federation of Labor take prompt steps to secure the effectuation of the Public Contracts Act in full force, terminating all relaxations of standards agreed to during the war. We also recommend renewed action to safeguard wage standards against impairment through the use of prison labor on work contracted by the Federal Government.

With these recommendations, your committee recommends the approval of this portion of the Executive Council's report.

(1947, p. 649) Res. 37 was referred to the Executive Council to take up with the affiliated and affected organizations, so that the most effective way of securing the results desired can be agreed upon. The resolution follows:

Whereas—The United States Government, in the employment of skilled labor, is following a policy wherein there is no central authority; and in many cases, members of the skilled trades are asked to work for the Federal Government at a rate less than the prevailing rate in the communities where such people are employed, therefore, be it.

Resolved—That it is the consensus of this convention that the United States Government in the employment of skilled mechanics should pay not less than the prevailing rate in the community where they are employed; and that there should be some central authority such as the United States Civil Service Commission or some other commission charged with the responsibility of determining what is the prevailing rate and seeing that such prevailing rate is met by the United States Government wherever skilled mechanics are employed.

(1948, p. 183) The most significant development in the administration of the Public Contracts Act during the past year has been the inauguration of a program designed to increase the minimum wage rates applicable to all employees working on government contracts. This action has long been urged by the American Federation of Labor and was undertaken only after specific requests for action had been made not only by the Federation, but also by numerous affiliated unions. The importance of this program to revise these industry wage determinations, most of which were made before the war, is highlighted by the fact that on June 30, 1948, over $2 billion in government contracts was subject to the Public Contracts Act.

The first public hearing under this new program on January 21 concerned the suit and coat branch of the uniform and clothing industry. As a result of this hearing, the minimum wage for all workers in the industry employed on government contracts was raised from 65 to 85 cents an hour for production workers and from 40 to 65 cents an hour for so-called auxiliary workers. Although this is the only new determination that has been made by the Secretary of Labor, hearings have been held in other branches of the uniform and clothing industry, in the hat and cap industry, and in the textile industry, in all of which American Federation of Labor international unions have participated. In addition, arrangements are being made to hold hearings in the glove, flint glass, and furniture industries, which will involve A. F. of L. international unions. The research staff of the Federation has been cooperating with the particular international unions concerned with these industries in order to assist them in presenting the most effective case possible for an increased minimum wage.

The importance of this new program transcends the significance of the enforcement work under the existing wage determinations which has been proceeding under the same handicaps as the enforcement work under the Fair Labor Standards Act. During this fiscal year, a total of 1,559 establishments operating under the Public Contracts Act were inspected. Of these 593, or 38 percent, were in violation of the overtime, minimum wage, or child labor provisions of the Act, the majority of which concerned the overtime provisions. Because of the significance of the new program, we urge the Department of Labor to hasten its completion, even at the cost, if necessary, of reducing enforcement standards below existing levels.

(Wage and Hour Administration)— (p. 452) This section of the E.C. report summarizes the administrative problems besetting the Labor Department's Wage and Hour Division in administering during the past year the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act.

The report brings out the manner in which the inspection work of the division has been hampered by inadequate funds. It is to be hoped that the new Congress will remedy this defect so that the division can effectively enforce the statute.

Probably the most significant development during the past year has been the program inaugurated by the division of raising the minimum wage rates under the Public Contracts Act. Several new minimums have already been set in industries in which the A. F. of L. affiliates have been interested. This action not only sets higher wage rates in particular industries but also lends support to the efforts of the A. F. of L. to raise the general minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act. We urge the division to continue this policy until all wage determinations under the Public Contracts Act have been brought up to date.

(1949, p. 165) In its report on Labor Standards on Government Contracts, the Executive Council closed with the following:

The importance of this program is difficult to overestimate. In view of the number and value of government contracts, it is exceedingly important that these contracts are not being utilized as the means for subsidizing those business firms which fail to maintain minimum labor standards. We urge the Department of Labor to accelerate this program so that during the coming year all minimum rates under the Walsh-Healey Act will be brought up to date with the prevailing wage practices throughout American industry.

(P. 464) Now that the minimum rate under the Wage and Hour Law is being raised to 75 cents this committee feels that it is particularly important that the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department be given sufficient funds to conduct an effective enforcement campaign. There is no value in an increased minimum wage which cannot be effectively enforced for lack of sufficient funds and personnel.

The report pointed out that the Department of Labor, to supplement its activities under the Fair Labor Standards Act, is also revising the wage determinations under the Public Contracts Law. A number of American Federation of Labor unions have been instrumental in raising the wage determinations affecting industries under their jurisdiction. We urge the Labor Department to continue its efforts to revise these Walsh-Healey minimum rates as liberally as possible so that within the coming year all the out-of-date minimum rates will have been revised.

(1952, p. 446) The Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act requiring adherence to minimum standards is particularly important at this time when government contracts play such a large part in the economy. An all-out drive has been launched by the reactionary forces to destroy the effectiveness of this legislation. The attempt to do so at the end of the last session of Congress by amendments to the Defense Production Act, which would have virtually repealed this law, were successfully foiled by our determined opposition. We were successful in warding off all but the minor weakening amendments offered and should be ready to forestall a renewed attack in the coming Congress.

We note with deep satisfaction that the Secretary of Labor has denied the exemption of the cannery workers from the protection of the Public Contracts Act. We commend the Secretary of Labor for his forthright action whereby he responded to the appeal of the American Federation of Labor and reversed his previous decision granting such exemption.

Unreasonable limitation of funds made available by Congress to the Department of Labor has prevented the making of the necessary determinations of prevailing minimum wages required by the Public Contracts Act. We insist that the Department of Labor be given sufficient funds to enable it to administer properly and effectively these protective standards whose maintenance Congress has directed by law. We ask that our affiliates take the necessary steps to assure adequate representation at hearings held by the department to determine the prevailing minimum wages and otherwise assist in the effectuation of the labor standards under the Walsh-Healey Act.

With these comments and recommendations, your committee recommends the adoption of this portion of the Executive Council's Report.

(Amendments Opposed)—(1954, pp. 383, 472) Res. 31:

Whereas—The passage of the Walsh-Healey Act in 1936, providing for the setting of wages at prevailing rates in the manufacture of goods under government contract, was a milestone in Labor's progress, and

Whereas—This Act served notice that federal funds would not be used to undermine existing wage standards which are particularly important in an industrial economy in which government expenditures account for a significant portion of the national product, and

Whereas—The effectiveness of the Act has been seriously impaired since our last convention as a result of the adoption, in 1952, of the Fulbright Amendment which provides, among other things, for judicial review of all wage determinations made by the Department of Labor under the Public Contracts Act and specifies that any interested person can request a court review of any legal question connected with a determination, with the result that employers are encouraged to delay enforcement by challenging, in the courts, either the amount of the determination or its application on a nationwide basis, and

Whereas—In February, 1953, a minimum wage determination of $1.00 an hour was made under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act for the cotton, silk and textile industry, and immediately the legality of a nationwide rather than a regional, determination was challenged with the result that today more than a year later the case is still in the courts and the effect of the wage determination has thus been nullified, and

Whereas—The same thing happened recently in the woolen and worsted industry wherein a $1.20 an hour minimum wage determination, originally proposed over 14 months ago by the late Secretary of Labor, was finally approved in April, 1954, only to be contested in the courts, and

Whereas—There is real danger that reactionary forces, emboldened by this success, will attempt further to weaken the Act by trying to revive previous proposals which would require the determination of prevailing wage standards on the minimum in a "city, town, village or other civil subdivision" and permit the exemption of a standard-type product sold in the open market, and

Whereas—The reactionary forces of the country, through the National Association of Manufacturers and Chambers of Commerce, now seek to obstruct further the operation of the Act by denying adequate funds for its enforcement, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the 73rd Convention of the American Federation of Labor, urge the immediate repeal of the Fulbright Amendment and oppose all further amendments to the Walsh-Healey Act which would restrict its operation or subvert its objectives.

(Amendments)—(P. 496) The convention approved the following committee recommendations for needed amendments to the Walsh-Healey Act:

1. Full and unchallengeable authority should be restored to the Secretary of Labor to issue minimum wage determinations on an industry-wide basis.

2. The provisions in the law restricting and impairing the effectiveness of minimum labor standards, established by the Secretary of Labor, added to the law by the Fulbright Amendment of 1951, should be repealed.

3. The statutory workweek under this Act should be amended to conform to our recommendation for a 35-hour workweek under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

War (also see: World Peace; War Production; War Labor Board; War Production Board; Post-War; European War; Defense, Labor Policy; Combined Labor War Board; Hawaii, Labor and War; Maritime Legislation; Aid to Britain; Communism; Manpower Commission)

(1940, pp. 201-206) A forthright statement of the implications to Labor involved in the war in Europe was presented to the convention. In tracing the background of the actual war itself, attention was directed to the fact that "the revolutionary movement to displace social and economic organization began in Russia led by a small group of Communists who believed that revolutionary ends justified force and included ethical standards and religious institutions in the social order they hoped to destroy. They denied tolerance to any opposing point of view. Such a revolution of destruction has no common ground with a democratic nation and makes impossible any basis for international relations and confidence. Under a democracy tolerance of individual belief grows from realization of the value of human life and assurance of equal opportunity to all." The part played by Great Britain in the opening months of the war was set forth in Report of the E.C. which said in part:

The full force of the revolution of destruction has been turned against Great Britain in the Battle of Britain. The fate of this last democratic nation of Europe is of importance to every other democratic country throughout the world. If Great Britain wins the Battle of Britain, democracy wins. If Great Britain is defeated, then America and democracy are increasingly menaced and our peaceful pursuit of life is seriously threatened. The threat of war will be brought nearer to our homeland as well as to our homes.

So long as Great Britain successfully resists the attack being made upon her, as she is now doing, we in America can feel reasonably safe. The Atlantic Ocean and Great Britain stand as a barrier of protection to America.

It is quite logical and sound, therefore, that we in America would manifest a deep interest in the Battle of Britain. She stands as the last outpost in the Old World in defense of democracy and the democratic form of government. Figuratively speaking, she stands as the first line of defense against totalitarian aggression in the Western Hemisphere. We hope and pray Great Britain will win. Our sympathies go out to her people, the men and women who make up the British Trade Union Congress, and to all who are fighting a heroic battle against tremendous odds. We favor the extension of all help and assistance possible to Great Britain in her hour of need, on the part of our government, short of war itself."

(P. 202) . . . Whichever way the Battle of Britain may be decided, the democratic countries of the New World must be prepared to defend the New World against invasion and conquest. The U.S. has a responsibility in this crisis not only for defense but for leading in the development of machinery for international cooperation and the marketing of agricultural and industrial output in support of democratic ideals . . .

(P. 526) In acting on the report of the E.C. on the subject of "War in Europe," the convention adopted the following:

The report indicates that whichever way the Battle of Britain may be decided, will depend the rebirth or the death of trade unionism in the Old World.

The Executive Council indicates that the Western Hemisphere, with its existing trade union movement, cannot escape from the results of the savage, brutal, unjustified warfare now desolating Europe.

The report further makes it manifest that our trade union movement cannot escape from the consequences, and that it is essential that we should give every possible activity to the defense of our borders, including the Western Hemisphere, so that a free trade union movement may continue to function within our hemisphere, and serve as an energizing power to assist in reorganizing the trade union movement after the present war is terminated.

In addition your committee calls attention to the fact that as we meet in convention in New Orleans, hundreds of thousands of trade unionists in Europe who, but a few months ago, depended for their protection upon their trade unions, are now prisoners of war, compelled to work as such under the brutal administration of the Axis powers.

In connection with this portion of the Executive Council's Report, special consideration is given to the subject of defense.

Your committee joins with the Executive Council in expressing the fervent hope and prayer that Great Britain will win, recognizing with the Council that she stands as the last outpost in the Old World in the defense of democracy and the democratic form of government. Our sympathies go out to her people, the men and women who make up the British Trades Union Congress, and to all who are fighting a heroic battle against tremendous odds.

We join in the recommendation of the Executive Council in favoring the extension of all help and assistance possible to Great Britain in her hour of need on the part of our government short of war itself. We concur with this portion of the Executive Council's Report.

(Effects of the War on Free Trade Unions in Europe)—(P. 204) In a detailed report on the possible effects of the war in Europe, the E.C. pointed out that the preceding year witnessed "the constantly increasing destruction of free trade unions in Continental Europe by the successful aggression of Germany, Russia and Italy against their smaller and weaker neighbors. Although there is no detailed information available about the fate of free trade unions in these conquered countries we know that they cannot exist for long in the lands ruled by the Nazi, Communist and Fascist dictators. We know that the destruction of a free labor movement is an inevitable corollary of a ruthless, aggressive war economy."

Since free trade unions the world over have been opposed to militarism and territorial aggression, the Nazi Party first suppressed the trade unions and Labor within Germany itself. . . . Freedom of association and assembly was abolished and hours of work were greatly lengthened.

The report briefly covered developments in the trade union field in Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Luxembourg, Holland, Belgium, France, Latvia, Esthonia, and Lithuania. The methods followed in each country were after a pattern. . . . The free trade union headquarters are surrounded and occupied, their bank funds and liquid assets seized. Union leaders are arrested on trumped-up charges, placed in concentration camps and many of them executed. With their leaders arrested and reduced to silence, their publications suspended, and their headquarters confiscated by the enemy, the workers are without defense. For them social legislation and individual rights have ceased to be a reality. Established law gives way to "the authority of occupation" which regulates according to its will hours of work, wages, prices, food rations and the curfew. To the bitterness of defeat is added in full measure the humiliation of slavery. . . .

(P. 526) The convention to which the above report of the E.C. was referred, submitted a statement which was unanimously adopted in which it was stated, in part:

Reference is made to the effects of the war upon the trade union movement of Europe, and the destruction of that movement in all countries where the Axis powers have secured control. . . .

Whichever way the Battle of Britain may be decided, will depend the rebirth or the death of trade unionism in the Old World. . . .

The Western Hemisphere, with its existing trade union movement, cannot escape from the results of the savage, brutal, unjustified warfare now desolating Europe.

The report further makes it manifest that our trade union movement cannot escape from the consequences, and that it is essential that we should give every possible activity to the defense of our borders, including the Western Hemisphere, so that a free trade union movement may continue to function within our hemisphere, and serve as an energizing power to assist in reorganizing the trade union movement after the present war is terminated.

(Labor Policy) (A. F. of L.)—(1942, p. 180) The shock of Pearl Harbor was quickly followed by a message from President Roosevelt to Congress, and a declaration of war. President Green immediately called the Executive Council to meet in special session. That meeting, held December 15, 1941, adopted the following declaration:

At a specially called meeting of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, a careful appraisal of the situation which was created by the recent infamous and treacherous action of the Japanese Government was made. Each member in attendance at the meeting was moved by feelings of righteous indignation and a determination to compel the Government of Japan to pay in full measure for the dastardly attack made upon our Government on the morning of December 7, 1941.

The attack made by the Japanese Government was, in our opinion, part of a plan previously agreed upon by the Axis powers. The secrecy, trickery and treachery employed by the Japanese Government in launching it is characteristic of action heretofore taken by the totalitarian nations.

The declaration of war made against the United States by Hitler and Mussolini was a logical sequence to the understanding which prevailed among the Axis powers.

Now our nation is involved in war.

We face these realities and facts with a solemn and unchangeable determination that Japan and her allies must be defeated at any cost. Neither time, circumstances, difficulties or disappointments must interfere with the achievement of this purpose.

The devastating tyranny which threatens freedom in all lands has now struck at our symbols of freedom and liberty. The seriousness of this danger was made clear and convincing when the Axis group launched a sudden and deadly assault upon our fortifications and our dependencies at the moment when their peace envoys were conferring with representatives of our government. Good faith, honest dealing, frankness, honesty and integrity are words that were never included in the Japanese code of procedure. They know not the meaning of these terms because only trickery, deception, dishonesty and treachery influence and inspire them in actions which they take.

The blow struck at Pearl Harbor and our islands in the Pacific has resounded throughout our nation as a call to service. Nothing that has ever happened has served better to unite all classes of people in America, both in spirit and in purpose.

We are now at war—not only against Japan but against all the Axis powers. No group of our people can indulge in speculation as to what the future course of our nation must be. We have been forced to make a momentous decision. We have chosen our course and there can be no turning back. We must drive through, crush, defeat and subdue our enemies—those who have declared war against us. The preservation of our common heritage, of our freedom, liberty and democracy—all those things which are as precious as life itself—is at stake. Our free institutions must be preserved. Our liberties must be protected. In the race between totalitarianism and freedom, democracy must win.

The call of the hour is for service and sacrifice. Labor has much at stake, perhaps more than any other group which is included in our social, national and political life. It is thoroughly conscious of the issues which hang in the balance. Speaking, as we do, out of an understanding of the heart and mind of Labor, we can assure the nation that Labor is ready and willing to render exalted service. The value of that service will compare with the kind rendered by our heroes in the air, on the battlefields and on the high seas.

The first line of war service is in the factories, the mills, the mines and the transportation system of the nation. These workers serving in the important field of production and transportation must not falter in their devotion and service to our nation. They must measure up to the high standard of excellency established by the skill, genius, training and service of American Labor. Success in the air, on the battlefields or on the high seas is impossible without an adequate supply of war material of all kinds. The instrumentalities of war must be produced by the workers of our nation. They must be supplied to the army and navy in full measure.

The Executive Council profoundly declares that no worker must ever shirk his duty or withhold from the government a full measure of service. Our pledge to give, to work and to sacrifice will be redeemed just in proportion as our workers give their all, constantly, continuously and without interruption to the people of our own nation and to the cause of democracy throughout the world.

In this crucial hour, fraught with grave consequences, the Executive Council calls upon the members of the American Federation of Labor to reach new heights of production and to exemplify in daily service their devotion to our government and their determination to defeat tyranny, despotism and treachery throughout the world. We must place Americanism above and beyond every other consideration.

It is the considered opinion of the Executive Council that this objective can be reached through full and complete compliance with the following stipulations:

1. That a "no strike" policy shall be applied in all war and defense material production industries. This means that all workers employed in war and defense material industries should voluntarily relinquish the exercise of the right to strike during the continuation of the existing state of war except where mediation, conciliation or arbitration is refused by employers.
2. That a national agency similar to the War Labor Board which functioned during the World War be created by executive order for the purpose of dealing promptly with grievances, differences and complaints which may arise between employers and employees. Existing labor stabilization agreements or understandings and their administration shall in no way be interfered with or be impaired.
3. That through the utilization of such agency, mediation, conciliation and voluntary arbitration be substituted for strikes and lockouts in all war and defense production industries.
4. That the mediation and conciliation service of the government be strengthened and, if necessary, increased so that it may be made quickly available for use in the settlement of grievances and disputes which may arise.

5. That due regard for the health, safety, and welfare of workers must be accorded them if and when they are called upon to work overtime or in plants which may be placed upon a double shift or continuous working time basis. In all such situations the standard 40-hour workweek shall be maintained and protected as a basis for wages paid and the standard rule for overtime pay religiously observed.

No one can adequately appraise the value of the service or the extent of said service which the membership of the American Federation of Labor is in a position to render to the government. We offer it freely and without reservation. No citizen of the republic shall give less. This character of service has been given by the members of the American Federation of Labor during the period since the national emergency was declared.

Liberty, freedom and democracy are principles which are very near and dear to the heart of every working man and woman. They understand and know, without a shadow of doubt, that if tyranny and totalitarianism win, free democratic trade unions, democracy and freedom pass out. Life under regimentation, as it exists among laboring people of totalitarian nations, would mean very little to American workers who from the birth of the Republic to the present time have been permitted to enjoy liberty, freedom and democracy. We cherish fondly within our hearts and lives these priceless blessings guaranteed under the Bill of Rights adopted 150 years ago today. In order to protect them and to defend them we offer our service and our lives to our government.

This special session of the Executive Council was followed by a conference with the officers of all international and national unions on December 16, 1941. That conference adopted the following declaration of policy:

We, the officers of the American Federation of Labor and of national and international unions in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, assembled this 16th day of December, 1941, have carefully, thoughtfully and patriotically considered the war emergency into which our nation and its people have been plunged and as well the declaration of principles and of policies submitted by the Executive Council and as adopted and approved by it yesterday, December 15, 1941.

We, unhesitatingly and unequivocally, place ourselves in full accord with the principles, policies and procedures outlined by the Executive Council.

As citizens, as workers, as trade unionists of a free land, we declare the overshadowing issue in the present crisis is the safeguarding of the priceless heritage of freedom, of liberty and the preservation of democracy. The United States is now at war with the Axis powers testing whether democracy will endure or tyranny and despotism will triumph—whether men and races will be free or be enslaved.

The issue is squarely and starkly set before the American people, whether the forces of Hitlerism and of despotism, both in the East and the West, or the forces of democracy and freedom are to survive. We dare not, we must not, delude ourselves. This is a life and death struggle. We are, in very truth, fighting for survival of all we hold dear. Everything that we have, our possessions, our resources, our manpower—must be coordinated, not only to defeat the world conspiracy to enslave all peoples to the dream and will of a few irresponsible despots but to insure our liberties, to restore the freedom of all peoples of the world and to lay the foundations for a real and enduring peace among the nations of the world.

Labor's stake in this struggle is clear, definite and fundamental. Wherever despotism and dictatorship threaten free governments the very foundations of the labor movement are challenged. Labor dare not blind itself to the significance of this crucial hour. Labor cannot remain silent in the face of the existing danger, not only to itself but to everything to which the free trade union movement is devoted—aye, the very right of organization and of freedom of the individual.

In this crisis the American Federation of Labor, representing more than 5,000,000 wage earners, with federated branches in every state, with hundreds of central labor bodies in many of our cities and with thousands upon thousands of local unions spread throughout the land, hereby reaffirms its loyalty to the principles underlying our government and pledges to the President of the United States, to the Congress and to the people of America its undivided support for the most vigorous and rigorous prosecution of this war until final victory is ours.

We declare that in this crisis the one fundamental need is for unity of action. Disunity means destruction. The successful prosecution of the war requires that all of the energies of all our people, regardless of race, color or creed, be concentrated to a common purpose. We, therefore, call upon management of American industries and the leaders of government to join in a program of cooperative action to make our nation not only the mighty arsenal of world democracy but as well a source of hope, of encouragement and of assurance to the enslaved peoples everywhere. We call upon industry to share with us the added responsibilities entailed in maintaining peaceful and cooperative relations. We urge that the leaders of industry join with us in keeping the fires of industry burning and alive and help keep secure the pillars of freedom and of democracy.

We regret sincerely and are deeply concerned with the destructive rivalry in organization that has beset the American labor field for the past few years. We hold all such rivalries and jurisdictional conflicts have no place in an emergency such as faces America and the world today. We, therefore, renew our offer for unity in the labor movement and for the common defense of our nation against mortal danger. We hope our call to this end may not be in vain.

We too call upon the National Labor Relations Board to desist from the formulation or enforcement of any policy, procedure or decision that may create dissention or intensify existing differences and conflicts in the household of organized labor.

We likewise urge that those in governmental position of authority in this moment of national peril forego their unjustified attacks upon trade union organizations and their legitimate functions.

We declare that the right of wage earners to collective bargaining and to function freely and fully in the legitimate sphere designed for them is a fundamental condition which gives opportunity for economic freedom and social advancement. These rights and opportunities must not be impaired. While we reject repressive Labor legislation and insist upon the preservation of the essential democratic right of workers to cease work collectively as a last and final resort, we nevertheless pledge ourselves to forego the exercise of this right during the war emergency and to prefer submission of pending differences with employers to approved facilities and processes for voluntary mediation, conciliation and arbitration. We most heartily endorse the "no-strike" policy voluntarily assumed by all divisions and character of Labor as announced by the Executive Council. Labor needs no restrictions upon the right to strike, when to cease production is to strike at the very heart of the nation. Labor will produce, and produce without interruption.

We commend the Executive Council for its recommendation that there be created a War Labor Board similar to that which functioned so successfully during the last World War. We believe the general principles then enunciated for the guidance of this board should be made the policy of this hour, namely, that neither Labor nor Management should take advantage of such an agency to prosecute either's advantages at the expense of the other's, that industrial relations be preserved and that every stoppage of work essential to adequate national defense be avoided and averted. In this regard we hold that the work and service of all our people are inextricably interwoven and involved whether engaged directly in war or defense work or whether applied to the necessities, safety, comfort or convenience of our civilian population. Total war today is no longer confined to the military forces of the land but embraces as well the civilian population—young and old, men, women and children alike.

Experience has demonstrated that protective labor legislation and hour standards are for the purpose of conserving workers in order to make possible sustained maximum producing power. They are the safeguards to national well being. In war emergencies there may be temporary need for abolishing some standards or for modifying special standards for special industries. All such modifications and changes, however, should be the result of proven need and should be approved in advance by representatives of the workers. The same is true of protective Labor and employment standards established through collective bargaining and trade union agreements.

To assure an uninterrupted flow of production and the maximum of defense effort, organized labor should be accorded by government adequate and effective representation of its own choosing in all defense planning and execution. The validity of such participation by Labor in all our emergency efforts and undertakings is fully justified and its efficiency is demonstrated beyond peradventure of doubt in the experience of the British Government policy. Then, too, our experience in the last World War confirms the soundness of this policy. American organized labor is anxious to contribute all its efforts in all directions for the achievement of our country's impregnable defense and for a speedy and complete victory for the forces of humanity over brutality, of freedom and democracy over tyranny and despotism.

In addition to calling upon untiring and uninterrupted activities of our members to produce an overabundance of the supplies and equipment essential to a total war and in providing adequately for necessities and comforts of our civilian population, we are mindful that many of our members, and members of their families, have been and will be called to the military services of our land. We pledge to them every possible aid and a full measure of devotion. It shall be our purpose not alone to sustain the military forces of our land but as well to safeguard the interests of our civilian population and hold secure the liberties and freedom of all our people in this greatest of all emergencies.

We further pledge ourselves to bring these declarations of policies and procedures to the attention of our respective local unions and general membership with direction that the principles and practices herein declared for and made imperative by the necessities of the occasion be fully and immediately complied with without hesitation or equivocation.

Inspired by these ideals of humanity, of liberty and justice and as herein declared a fundamental national policy, we call upon the working men and women of all America—indeed upon all lovers of humanity and of freedom—to unite in unanimous support of the President of our nation, and its allies, for the prosecution of total war and for the perpetuity and preservation of democracy here and throughout the world.

(P. 25) In the Introduction to its annual report, the Executive Council made the following direct statement of Labor support for the government in the war effort:

In the year since our last convention our country has entered the World War as a combatant, after formally declaring war on the Axis nations. Fateful as this step was of heavy sacrifices, Labor as well as other groups stands squarely behind the administration in support of the action taken. The issues involved in this war are the very heart of democratic institutions and the democratic way of life. We realize that technical progress has conquered space so that distances, oceans and other geographical barriers afford no security against military invasion. Economic interdependence of industrial states has reached such a degree that no modern state can maintain isolation from the others without hampering its development and progress.

From the first the United States has been hampered by the consequences of the surprise attack which destroyed practically all our aircraft equipment in Hawaii and the Philippines. The loss of Wake and Guam and the reverses in Malay and the East Indies cut off our rubber supply and other essential imports. Roused by these disasters, we set about our main responsibilities — production of the necessary equipment and supplies, organization of manpower upon a military basis and maintenance of the will to win.

The organized labor movement, like every other national institution, must for the duration of the war devote its resources and its energies to war problems and war needs. In refocusing our efforts and our purposes, we cannot forget or discard those more enduring rights and institutions that give meaning and value to our nation and to the whole New World. We and the other nations of the Western Hemisphere have conquered a continent and built civilizations which have as their guiding purpose to provide free opportunity for our citizens. This guiding purpose in war time seeks to afford each citizen the right to share in the struggle with equality of sacrifice.

The American Federation of Labor has served our country in the First World War and has the precedents of that service to guide us in serving in this struggle, which is an even greater menace to the principles of individual freedom. Upon the outbreak of hostilities, the American Federation of Labor pledged cooperation and has sought to serve in every possible way. Our report for the current year, therefore, reflects the extent to which we have converted to a war footing. Undertakings and objectives important for human welfare cannot be advanced when our national institutions themselves are in peril. We, therefore, are holding many such commitments in reserve until the war is won, and are putting our energies in leadership which will enable our unions to help maintain community war undertakings on a democratic basis, so that every group of citizens shall have a right to participate and to serve.

In view of our great national need and peril, we preface our report with the policy that only fundamentals should have consideration and action at the present time.

(From Defense to War)—(P. 179)
With the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, on December 7, 1941, the people of the United States dropped any semblance of neutrality in the war initiated by the new despotisms and our nation was unified in support of war. War plans had to be expanded and speeded up. Men were trained for military service and our war production program took on huge proportions. The United States prepared to become the munitions factory for free countries in addition to supplying our own war needs, which include responsibility for the protection of South American countries. Our entrance into the war brought us into a position of world leadership. We are a young nation to take on the responsibilities of the most powerful country in the world. World leadership implies not only responsibility on the part of our government but of every organized group of citizens—Labor, employers, farmers, transportation and communication executives, etc. Each group, by its thinking, the procedures used in dealing with its problems and the spirit with which it carries out its responsibilities, will help determine not only the outcome of the war but the situation and forces out of which peace must be made. Peace can begin only where the war leaves off, and for that ultimate purpose the spirit and institutions of human freedom expressed by the principles of democracy should be maintained active and dependable. This purpose has guided the American Federation of Labor in its formulation of and insistence upon representation in the formulation of war Labor policies and in its relations with governmental war agencies.

The first official war act of the A. F. of L. was the formulation of policies for the guidance of all affiliated unions.

(P. 514) We recommend hearty approval of the prompt action of President Green in calling a meeting of the Executive Council and a joint conference with national and international representatives upon our country's declaration of war upon the Axis countries. American wage earners place their loyalty to this country above all else, so it was fitting that union representatives early pledge their support and cooperation as the government might need it. Endorsement of Federation leadership came promptly and in formal resolution, verbal declaration and in solid, effective cooperation to carry out the administration's war production program.

The declarations adopted by the Executive Council and the Emergency Federation Conference were printed and widely distributed throughout the country, serving to unify all groups for service and making the next steps plain to all.

After mobilizing Labor's support in defense of our country, President Green was called upon to designate six representatives to meet with six other Labor representatives and 12 representatives of industry to formulate a Joint Labor-Management War Program and to implement it by nominating representatives to constitute a National War Labor Board.

We recommend that the leadership of Federation executives in these particulars be approved and heartily commended.

(Roosevelt, President Franklin D., Message)—(P. 347):

The White House

Washington, D. C.

Dear President Green:

Your invitation to attend the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor is always a welcome one, but because of pressing duties here I must deny myself the privilege of being with you.

Will you, however, express to the officers, delegates and members of the American Federation of Labor assembled at this, its 62nd Annual Convention, my cordial appreciation of all they have done to further the war effort? Our production record speaks for itself and for the working people; it is splendid. Everywhere during my recent inspection of war activities, I found the workers doing all that was laid out for them and more. At every turn they gave assurance that they can take whatever it takes to win this war. They are not afraid of hard, continuous, precise and dangerous work. They are walking up to it as their duty and part in the war. They are proud of it.

The various groups which comprise the Federation will, I hope, make available at this time their most statesmanlike leadership. Officers and delegates of the trade union movement, consecrated to preserve the freedom of humanity, can serve today the whole people of this country, as well as the loyal membership.

With best wishes for a convention whose words and actions will contribute to that unity of purpose so essential in this hour when civilization itself is at stake and with warm congratulations, believe me.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

(Labor Pledge of Cooperation)—(1942, p. 268) Labor has an important function to serve. The Executive Orders recently issued limiting the field of collective bargaining; our pledge to forego our right to strike; proposals to stabilize wages by legislation instead of agreement; and finally, the proposed National Service Law by which employment in war industries will be controlled; begin to reveal the sacrifices and discipline that are our part of the war. It is our purpose to parallel these sacrifices with agreements for the maximum of security that can be obtained. If workers must accept positions and employment as directed, then the U.S. Government should accept responsibility for making that employment as safe and as healthful as possible and should provide equal compensation for all unemployed citizens, adequate and equal opportunities for rehabilitation and for the protection of dependents. Wage earners serving in war production or in civilian upkeep should be protected against fear of want and dependency after they have spent themselves in service. Those citizens in the armed service should be assured equal protection.

The months immediately ahead will bring sacrifices and burdens, but we must be prepared to go through with determination and conviction. Freedom in personal living is at stake, without which life loses opportunity. The issue is worth what we have in material substances as well as personal sacrifice.

We call upon all wage earners to prepare to stay in the battle till victory is won.

(P. 592) The following resolution, No. 95, was unanimously adopted:

Whereas—Our nation and the other united nations are waging a war against the aggression of the Axis powers, and which war was commenced by a treacherous and dastardly sneak attack at Pearl Harbor at a time when our President was attempting to maintain this country at peace, and

Whereas—The members of organized labor believe as trade unionists, that in order to maintain free labor and free government, we must dedicate "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor" in this hour of our nation's peril, and

Whereas—We are in this fight to a finish and we are determined to wage relentless warfare until our enemies are decisively defeated and in so doing, there can be no compromise with the hateful forces who oppose us and no bartering with their leaders, and only unconditional surrender can be accepted, and if necessary, our unconquerable troops must fight their way into Berlin and Tokyo to enforce it, and neither the appeasers at home nor the aggressors abroad should be permitted to place us in a position of wasting our sacrifice and our efforts through compromise or surrender of our principles, therefore, be it

Resolved—By the American Federation of Labor, in its 62nd Annual Convention, assembled at Toronto, Canada, October 5, 1942, that we pledge our united strength to our Commander-in-Chief, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and to our gallant armed forces of the army, navy, marines and air service, to achieve a smashing and final victory for free men and women everywhere.

(War Administration Agencies)—(P. 547) After considering the various sections of the report of the Executive Council dealing with war administration agencies, your committee feels that our national war effort is seriously hampered by lack of delegation to final authority to one responsible head and by the absence of a top coordinating board to make final decisions on inter-agency matters and the review of the results of the war administration as a whole and to measure them against needs. We recommend these steps as essential to that end:

(1) Centralization and definite delegation of responsibility for all procurement to the Chairman of the War Production Board who shall in reality be the Administrator of War Supplies for the Armed Forces. Centralization of procurement is necessary for planning contract policies, planning production and scheduling and planning materials and flow of production.

(2) Control over all manpower in the Chairman of the Manpower Commission with an end to recruitment by the Army and the Navy.

(3) That the Secretary of Agriculture be made Food Administrator.

(4) That all rationing be administered by the Director of Economic Stabilization.

(5) That the Director of the Small Industries Corporation be given status and authority if necessary to enable him to conserve these small industries and undertakings which are the backbone of our American economy. Under the centralization of procurement provided by our first recommendation the director should have authority to allocate contracts or sub-contracts, to small companies so that their production facilities might be best utilized in the war effort. This agency should also participate in the concentration program for which controlling policies should make labor policies a fundamental consideration.

(Relaxation of Standards)—(1943, p. 376) On pages 86-87 the E.C. pointed out the dangers posed by the reactionary trend in state legislatures, mainly in the guise of war emergency measures. On page 376, however, the convention proceedings sounded a warning as follows:

Under the guise of the war time emergency there is a grave tendency to suspend or lower the protective labor standards.

We must be vigilant to oppose any such relaxation and press for permanent legislation raising standards. Where such laws already exist they should be protected zealously.

(Labor Representation, War Boards) —(Pp. 116, 384) Labor is gratified at the progress made during the past year to further and strengthen direct Labor participation in war administration. In a number of key government agencies Labor has not yet been accorded a status commensurate with Labor's interest in and contribution to the war effort. Advance consultation on pending policies and direct participation in the formulation of administrative procedures are essential to assure effective and democratic participation by wage earners in carrying out the extraordinary services they are called upon to perform.

Your committee recommends that the Executive Council secure information from all affiliated labor unions of the representatives designated by them to serve on war agencies of the government nationally and locally so that a complete report on Labor representation secured by the American Federation of Labor may be rendered to the next convention.

Your committee recommends further that all national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor be requested to furnish as promptly as possible a complete list of the A. F. of L. members serving in the armed forces to the end that a complete roster of Labor's participation in the service to the nation and in the war may be made available.

Your committee wishes to make a special commendation of the services rendered and the high statesmanship shown by A. F. of L. representatives in war agencies of the government whose efforts have made an outstanding contribution to democratic administration of national affairs in time of war.

(War Service, Labor) (also see: Manpower; Combined Labor War Board; War Bonds; Defense) — (P. 116) More than a million members of our unions are in the armed services and union representatives throughout the length and breadth of the territories served by our flag are cooperating in production and by serving on local war boards. We take sacrifice and changes as a matter of course and interpose objections only when principles are at stake. At the national level we can report some progress in acceptance of the principle of Labor cooperation through representatives of their own choosing as on the Combined War Labor Board, National War Labor Board, the Office of Price Administration, the War Production Board and the War Manpower Commission. In the WLB Labor representatives are an integral part of the board. In the OPA, our Labor representatives are able to make proposals and express dissent and seem to be gaining influence as the agency is now seeking more Labor representatives at the local level; in the WMC, there is Labor representation at every level but the War Manpower Administration has not definitely accepted the national management-Labor committee as a policy committee, or made effective regulations that regional and area management-Labor committees must be consulted in advance of initiating projects. In the WPB, the Federation is represented on the Management-Labor Council at the top level and at last has a representative at the top administrative level, Joseph Keenan, Vice-Chairman in charge of the Office of Labor Production. As Labor representation is provided in the industry divisions, we shall be able to contribute in proportion. Labor, of course, constitutes the combined War Labor Board which has opportunity to advise the President. We have a group of union representatives cooperating with the Treasury Department on war bonds and savings.

(P. 384) The Executive Council reports on the services rendered by the American Federation of Labor representatives and representatives of our unions in providing Labor representation on government agencies engaged in war administration and in the formulation of war policies of our government.

Labor is gratified at the progress made during the past year to further and strengthen direct Labor participation in war administration. In a number of key government agencies Labor has not yet been accorded a status commensurate with Labor's interest in and contribution to the war effort. Advance consultation on pending policies and direct participation in the formulation of administrative procedures are essential to assure effective and democratic participation by wage earners in carrying out the extraordinary services they are called upon to perform.

Your committee recommends that the Executive Council secure information from all affiliated labor unions of the representatives designated by them to serve on war agencies of the government nationally and locally so that a complete report on Labor representation secured by the American Federation of Labor may be rendered to the next convention.

Your committee recommends further that all national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor be requested to furnish as promptly as possible a complete list of the A. F. of L. members serving in the armed forces to the end that a complete roster of Labor's participation in the service to the nation and in the war may be made available.

Your committee wishes to make a special commendation of the services rendered by Joseph Keenan as Vice-Chairman of the War Production Board in charge of the Office of Labor Production. Equal commendation must also be made of the high statesmanship shown by A. F. of L. representatives in other war agencies of the government whose efforts have made an outstanding contribution to democratic administration of national affairs in time of war.

(A. F. of L. Attitude) (also see: Post-War)—(1951, p. 84) The American Federation of Labor has long abhorred war and all that it involves in human loss and material destruction. We, therefore, condemned the unwarranted full-scale invasion of the Republic of Korea by the Communist armed forces of the so-called People's Democratic Republic of Korea abetted and now aided by the Chinese Communist regime and encouraged and supported by Communist Russia. We are in complete sympathy and accord with the Security Council of the UN in declaring this invasion a breach of the peace and pledge every assistance to the UN in bringing to a successful and victorious close the war now in progress and forced upon the free nations of the world.

Developments since the Korean war have tested existing machinery of the United Nations. Unfortunate differences in the United Nations among various countries over policy in pressing military action against aggression to success and victory have raised problems of great significance. Some of the more important of these problems have grown out of our constitutional provision that treaties become the law of the land upon ratification of the Senate. Already one state law has been declared unconstitutional because of a United Nations proposal ratified by Congress.

The right to declare war by the Executive Branch of government without consent of Congress, the sending of drafted citizens to serve under UN command, where political decisions rest with the UN and the extent to which the United Nations actions and decisions may limit determination of our own foreign policy, these and similar problems have arisen and require our careful study in order to determine policies, changes or amendments that may be required and be effected to increase the efficiency of the United Nations and, at the same time, avoid infringing upon our constitutional provisions and safeguards. The Executive Council is fully alert to these and like problems.

War and Defense Bonds (also see: Taxation, Tax Credits on Bond Purchases)—(1941, pp. 256, 548) The convention unanimously adopted a resolution providing that the American Federation of Labor endorses and applauds the voluntary principle upon which the program of defense saving is based, and its approval is especially extended to voluntary pay-roll allotment plans, as sponsored by individual unions and entered into freely by their members in accordance with sound trade union principles.

(1942, p. 599) The convention approved the following committee report on the subject of purchase of war bonds by workers and unions:

The jointly conducted war savings campaign of the Treasury Department and the American Federation of Labor received various comments in the report of the Executive Council and has also been the subject of several resolutions which have been referred to the Resolutions Committee and upon which appropriate comment has been made.

The committee therefore wishes to recommend to the convention the following action:

1. It is recommended that the convention renew its indorsement of the present campaign to secure the investment of not less than 10% of income of all wage earners, as indicated in Resolution No. 85.

2. It is recommended that the convention indorse and commend the policy of the Treasury Department in placing this campaign entirely upon a voluntary basis. Success of the voluntary principle of operation constitutes a splendid example of the superiority of democratic methods over those of compulsion. It is therefore recommended that the convention oppose the substitution of compulsory savings for the present voluntary system.

3. That the pledge made in behalf of the Executive Council by President Green for the purchase of one billion dollars in bonds by members of the American Federation of Labor during 1942 be indorsed. The fact that response by the affiliates and members of the American Federation of Labor has been so enthusiastic as to warrant the prediction of an investment of more than this amount is worthy of commendation. It is recommended that this pledge be renewed for the year 1943.

4. For purposes of expanding and continuing this campaign it is recommended that the convention indorse the payroll allotment plan advocated by the Treasury Department and supported by the American Federation of Labor.

The committee calls attention of the convention to the highly gratifying fact that there is not on record a single instance of a union which has failed to respond to this campaign for the inauguration of systematic savings.

5. It has been found that the success of these payroll allotment plans depends upon the institution of joint labor-management committees. Experience has also demonstrated that where such complete and cordial co-operation does not exist payroll allotment plans are seriously handicapped. The success of this mutual approach to a patriotic problem constitutes a valuable contribution to sane and cordial labor relations. It is believed that its effect is beginning to appear in extending such relations into other areas of labor-management mutual interest.

6. It is worthy of special comment that the Treasury Department has recognized these fundamental facts to such an extent as to have organized in 12 Federal Reserve Districts a series of labor-management meetings to which were invited representatives of Labor and of management in various fields and industries for the purpose of demonstrating the mechanics of their joint operations. It is felt that these labor-management meetings constitute a valuable contribution and should be held wherever practical.

7. The collection of information concerning the contributions made by the American Federation of Labor, its affiliates and members is subject of a special comment in Resolution No. 73 (Record of Bond Purchases by Unions) which the committee has recommended be indorsed by the convention. In connection with the comment upon this resolution the committee has recommended that the American Federation of Labor and the Treasury Department be requested to set in motion machinery for the systematic collection of such information.

At the same time the committee recommends that the importance to the encouragement and expansion of this campaign of proper credit to the splendid efforts of the American Federation of Labor be called to the attention of the Treasury Department, and that the Treasury Department be urged to see that its national and local publicity agencies include equal credit to the union with management in all establishments which have achieved the goals of the present campaign of at least 90% participation by wage earners to the extent of at least 10% of income.

In conclusion the committee desires to call attention to the fact that no portion of the war program appeals more completely to motive of patriotism and enlightened self-interest than does the war savings program. The purchase of bonds constitutes one of the most simple and effective safeguards against inflation. It provides a financial backlog for families which will not only safeguard them during any post-war readjustment but will, at the same time, provide buying power whereby the wheels of industry may be kept moving and employment provided during this post-war adjustment period.

The committee desires in the light of these facts to pay compliment to the splendid manner in which the membership of the American Federation of Labor has rallied to this highly important portion of the war program. It heartily urges the continuation of these same activities. In this connection special emphasis should be placed upon the policies of Labor and management cooperation which has been advocated in the joint program of the American Federation of Labor and the Treasury Department.

(1943, pp. 159-60, 385-386) The convention received a comprehensive report on support of the A. F. of L. to the War Bond Campaign, and unanimously adopted the following recommendations:

... that national and international unions be asked to furnish the American Federation of Labor with complete reports on purchases of war bonds made by local unions as well as national and international unions. ... Labor must see that adequate information is available so that Labor receives due credit for purchases made as a part of already heavy sacrifices on the part of Labor.

The convention endorsed the fine work already performed by the large number of our unions and urged the entire membership of the A. F. of L.

to increase their contributions and intensify their zeal.

Further, in the report the record made by the A. F. of L. was pointed out in the purchase of war bonds which deserves to rank with the remarkable record established by organized labor in war production.

(P. 159) The record made by the American Federation of Labor in the purchase of war bonds deserves to rank with the remarkable record made by organized labor in war production.

From its inauguration the organized labor movement has endorsed and supported the voluntary war bond campaign. At the Seattle Convention a pledge was made that members of the American Federation of Labor would invest at least one billion dollars in war bonds during the ensuing year. This pledge was more than fulfilled. It was renewed at the Toronto Convention and partially collected statistics indicate that already this pledge has been fulfilled and exceeded. The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly endorsed the voluntary payroll savings plan which is, in simplest form, an agreement between workers and management that a certain amount of money, determined by the worker himself, shall be deducted from his wages on each pay period and applied to the purchase of bonds.

Information has come from the Labor Section of the War Finance Division that no instance has occurred of a refusal by a union to wholeheartedly endorse and promote this plan. This is supported by the records of the Labor Section, War Finance Division, which show the existence as of July 1 of 182,895 payroll savings plans under joint labor-management committees in that number of industrial establishments. A recent letter from President Roosevelt to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau contains the further evidence of this success, as follows:

I am proud of the fact that 27,000,000 patriotic Americans are regularly investing more than $420,000,000 a month to help pay the cost of the war. And, since all of this money comes from wages and salaries—nearly 90 per cent from people earning less than $5,000 and the bulk of it from those working in war plants—I do not hesitate to say that the payroll savings plan is the greatest single factor we now have in protecting ourselves against inflationary spending.

Statistical authorities of the Treasury Department estimate that at least $300,000,000 per month of the total of $420,000,000 per month is invested by members of organized labor. This is especially gratifying in that experiences of the Treasury Department have demonstrated that such campaigns do not reach success unless continuously promoted by the union, or unions, in each plant. The enthusiasm with which members of the American Federation of Labor have responded is further evidenced by the fact that this campaign has been conducted with a minimum expense and effort on the part of the Treasury Department.

The American Federation of Labor on July 1 announced a drive in cooperation with the Labor Section of the War Finance Division of the Treasury whereby all affiliates of the American Federation of Labor were urged to underwrite the purchase of some specific article of war material. Every international organization so far approached has enthusiastically responded. Recognition of this campaign was extended to the sponsoring organizations by appropriate ceremonies on Labor Day. The campaign will be continued as a permanent part of the joint cooperation of the American Federation of Labor with the War Finance Division of the Treasury.

(P. 385) The statement contained in the Executive Council's report on the leading part played by Labor in helping finance the war is amply supported by facts. The American Federation of Labor has established an outstanding record of intensive cooperation and notable initiative in backing the American fighters in their battle for victory. The American Federation of Labor was the first to suggest voluntary payroll deductions based upon a payroll savings plan, and to set a definite quota for its members. The pledges made in the Seattle and Toronto conventions and the quotas set have been more than fulfilled. This success is due to the concerted effort by the American Federation of Labor unions to carry on war bond campaigns through organized trade union channels. An important additional contribution has been yielded by the special campaigns sponsored and promoted by unions to underwrite or guarantee sufficient amounts of bonds to purchase specific articles of war materiel.

It is a matter of special importance to organized labor to be able to render a complete account of the contribution made by our unions toward the financing of the war. To this end, your committee recommends that national and international unions be asked to furnish the American Federation of Labor with complete reports on purchases of war bonds made by local unions as well as national and international unions. The purchase of war bonds on the large scale in which it has been made has been a matter of hardship to a great many workers whose resources have been severely taxed by war conditions. Labor must see that adequate information is available so that Labor receives due credit for purchases made as a part of already heavy sacrifices on the part of Labor.

Your committee recommends that this convention endorse the fine work already performed by the large number of our unions, and urges our entire membership to increase their contributions and intensify their zeal.

(1944, p. 255) In a report under this title the Executive Council outlined the role of the A. F. of L. in the campaign conducted by the U.S. Treasury Department for the sale of war bonds. The report stated, in part:

As soon as the United States Treasury Department announced, in April, 1941, its plans for asking the American people to finance a substantial part of the cost of national defense by the purchase of Defense Savings Bonds, the American Federation of Labor accepted this plan with great enthusiasm and became one of its original supporters. . . .

At about the time of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the Federation itself was ready to initiate the greatest single financial commitment ever undertaken by a private organization, the pledge that its members would purchase one billion dollars of War Bonds during 1942.

This famous pledge was a great patriotic stimulant to the entire Treasury program for financing the war. It meant that war finance would not be committed to the hands of the banks and great corporations, but that the workers of America would individually have their share in participating in and directing the finance policy of the nation. . . .

(P. 438) The following report of the convention committee was unanimously adopted:

The report of the Executive Council setting forth the magnificent participation of our members in the War Bond Campaign is highly gratifying. From our limited and incomplete returns we see that our members have invested well over a billion dollars in war bonds. In addition to these purchases made by individual members, local and state bodies and all of the national and international organizations have purchased millions of dollars of bonds.

In cooperation with the Labor Section of the War Finance Division of the Treasury Department, bond selling rallies have been conducted by unions in all parts of the country. Our members have set up the machinery for sales within their own organizations and have then sold the bonds. Our unions have also set up machinery for pay roll deductions and have obtained signed authorizations from our members for pay roll deductions.

Your committee commends the report of the Executive Council on this subject and would recommend that the American Federation of Labor urge all nationals and internationals as well as city central bodies to seek to establish some sort of machinery through which to record the bond purchases made by our membership, so that we may see how far above the billion dollar mark we shall now go.

We further recommend that all A. F. of L. publications be asked to carry an appeal to our members urging them to retain the bonds which they have purchased, pointing out that in so doing they render a double service to our nation and to ourselves.

In conclusion your committee recommends that we renew our firm stand in opposition to compulsory savings.

The result of the voluntary plan of the Treasury Department demonstrates that a compulsory savings plan is not only unnecessary but actually harmful and would result in a reduction of purchases of war bonds, while our present method has proved highly successful.

(1951, pp. 282, 558) Res. 22 called attention to the threat posed by inflation to the savings of workers and proposed:

That the American Federation of Labor urge the government to act responsibly, toward the millions of American working men who own bonds and who are urged to buy bonds, by an anti-inflation program that will make the U.S. Defense Bond a real security rather than a hazard to the future of the bond purchaser. . . .

This resolution calls attention to the difficulties and problems experienced by workers and their families in their attempts to buy U.S. Defense Bonds.

The resolution emphasizes how the forces of inflation have progressively diminished the value of the dollar and along with this, the value of the savings bonds workers have purchased.

The resolution urges the government to develop an anti-inflation program that will make the Defense Bond "a real security," rather than a "hazard" to the bondholder.

In approving this resolution, this committee wants to point out the gravity of the condition now prevailing with respect to the sale of these Defense Savings Bonds. Ever since the end of World War II more savings bonds of the types which workers normally purchased ($25 and $50) have been turned into the banks each month than have been sold to new purchasers. The simple but basic fact is that U.S. Defense Savings Bonds, in their present form, do not constitute a sufficiently attractive investment to workers and families with moderate incomes.

During recent months this situation has been aggravated by the fact that interest rates on all other types of government securities have been rising. It seems strange that the benefits of these higher interest rates are given to banks and insurance companies but denied to the purchasers of savings bonds.

There are a number of specific steps which the Treasury Department can and must take to make the U.S. Savings Bond a genuinely attractive investment for families of moderate income.

Recently, President Green has suggested that the interest rate on these bonds be raised. We strongly support this request. We also suggest that the Treasury Department, by establishing bonds with varying maturity dates, can go a long way toward devising a bond program which would appeal to the many different types of families with moderate incomes.

The American Federation of Labor has consistently supported the Defense Bond campaigns of the Treasury Department. The present bond campaign is of particular importance because a large volume of savings is so necessary to combat inflation. It is in the interest of making this campaign more successful that these recommendations are made.

War Communications (Board) — (1942, p. 208) On September 24, 1940, President Roosevelt issued an Executive Order creating the Defense Communications Board for the purpose of determining, coordinating, and preparing plans for the most efficient control and use of the nation's communication facilities in time of national emergency. . . .

The board is now known as the Board of War Communications. Immediately under the board are four major committees, consisting of the Coordinating Committee, the Labor Advisory Committee, the Industry Advisory Committee and the Law Committee. . . .

Much of the work following the selection of a Labor Advisory Committee has been carried on by a group of technical committees which blanket the whole communications field. The Labor Advisory Committee requested and secured representation on all technical committees which were not purely governmental in character...

Since the United States entered the war, the participation of Labor representatives in the work of the Board of War Communications has steadily increased. On January 7, 1942, the first joint meeting of the Industry and Labor Advisory Committees was held in Washington. As a result of the joint reports at this meeting on the problem of fully mobilizing the manpower of the communications industry to meet the war emergency, and as a result of the joint committee's inquiry into labor shortages, training programs and related issues, the board directed the Labor and Industry Advisory Committees to set up sub-committees to work together in the formulation of a program to submit to the board.

A series of meetings have been held between the committees and with the Executive Director of the War Manpower Commission, and there is every indication that the representative role that Labor has been given in the work of this vital war agency will be a major factor in the more effective gearing of the communications resources of the nation, both human and material, into the war effort.

(P. 509) We recommend approval of the excellent report of organization and plans for operation of the agencies concerned with war communications. This is a field of essential service which makes this progress doubly commendable.

War Displacement Benefits (see: Unemployment Compensation)

War Fund, National—(1943, p. 574)

The opening of the annual convention of the Federation this year coincides with the launching of the nation-wide campaign of the National War Fund, which is seeking $125,000,000 from the American people to assure the continuation of vital war relief services at home and abroad. These war-related services are performed by the USO, War Prisoners' Aid, United Seamen's Service, the American Committee for the Care of European Children, the British, Chinese and Russian war relief societies, as well as the other war relief agencies of the United Nations.

Every member of the Federation, we are certain, understands that the actuating motive of the National War Fund is the humanitarian impulse of every man and woman of this country to render aid and succour to the hapless and suffering peoples of the world. It is universally conceded that working people, and particularly members of the American Federation of Labor have always been in the forefront in responding generously and without stint to every worthy appeal for aid in the hour of distress.

It was therefore natural that the Labor League for Human Rights and its United Nations Relief Committee, the relief arm of the American Federation of Labor, should be among the founders of the National War Fund. The Federation's representatives have helped to create this great organization and today sit in its councils, nationally and in each state and in each local community, sharing in the establishment of its policies and lending of its vast reserves of energy, volunteer manpower, initiative and enthusiasm in the execution of its program.

A new recognition of the important role organized labor can perform in this field, and with it a new responsibility has devolved upon the unions of the Federation. It is generally recognized that the active sponsorship by our unions of a worthy appeal has increased the interest and the generous support of such causes manifold.

It is noteworthy that the structure of the National War Fund is federalistic and parallels in many ways the democratic structure of the Federation. The success of the National War Fund, therefore, depends in great measure upon the loyal support of the people in each local community. In urging all affiliates of the Federation to render all possible aid to their respective community and war chests, through which the National War Fund operates locally, the Federation is confident that its members will contribute overwhelmingly to the success of this great voluntary enterprise.

Since our entry into the war, the Federation has mobilized its entire membership for service on the three major fronts of this global conflict. To recount again Labor's contributions on the production front is at this time unnecessary. Two million members of the American organized labor movement are in the armed services of their country on all the fighting fronts. On the third front—that of morale and relief—Labor's contribution is equally impressive.

There is no need to stress once again the strong bonds which exist between the members of the Federation and our armed forces. Our unions have always eagerly offered their services of skills and crafts, and their open-handed contributions of money to ever improve the recreational facilities and social centers in each community that serve the men and women of our fighting forces.

The strong fraternal bond with our brothers and sisters of the trade union movements in other countries has always been characteristic of the Federation. As a consequence, our hearts go out to the victims of Nazi, Fascist and Japanese savagery.

We welcome the opportunity to render all possible voluntary assistance to the peoples of the United Nations and particularly to our armed forces which is offered to us through participation in the National War Fund. Without the loss of time on the job, members of the Federation through their contributions to their respective community war chests, stand with their brothers on every fighting front and help relieve to some extent the tragic conditions of the peoples of the United Nations.

A further consequence of the program of the Labor League for Human Rights and its United Nations Relief Committee is the development of a new confidence and understanding between Labor and management and between Labor and the rest of the community. This new Labor-community relationship is proof that the democratic way is still the best way. It proves that Hitler and the other totalitarians can never understand—that a democratic people can do voluntarily what totalitarians believe can be accomplished only through force; that they can sink their mutual differences and unite unconquerably in their devotion to a great cause.

The American Red Cross—the only major war service organization outside the National War Fund—also looks to the American people for the fulfillment of its mission of mercy. The Federation through the Labor League for Human Rights has accepted an equal responsibility to support the American Red Cross with its contributions of skills and crafts as well as with its financial contributions.

Representation and participation by the Federation's unions on the executive and deliberative bodies of the American Red Cross, nationally and in each local community, is likewise gradually developing. The successful culmination of this development will assure the most effective mobilization of our vast memberships in the work of this great organization.

This work of healing and of mercy will not end with the war. Side by side with other groups in the American community, the American Federation of Labor, through the Labor League for Human Rights, will help to ease the hard transition from war to peace to the end that human rights everywhere may be preserved and extended.

Your committee recommends that this convention call upon all of its affiliates throughout the country to participate actively in the program.

War Labor Board, National (also see: Wages in Wartime)—(1942, p. 187) The National War Labor Board was established on January 12, 1942. This board is composed of four representatives of Labor, including two from the American Federation of Labor, and two from the Congress of Industrial Organizations; four representatives of industry; and four representatives of the public. Provision was also made for alternate members.

Under the Executive Order, this 12-man board has power to "finally determine" all disputes that affect war production. The Executive Order was drafted following a conference of representatives of Labor and Industry called by the President of the United States within a few days after Pearl Harbor, at which the following three-point agreement was reached on December 23, 1941:

1. There shall be no strikes or lockouts.
2. All disputes shall be settled by peaceful means.
3. The President shall set up a proper War Labor Board to handle these disputes. . . .

(P. 189) Shortly after the establishment of the board, it became apparent that some special machinery had to be worked out for the settlement of intra-union disputes between the American Federation of Labor and the C.I.O. A formula for settling all such disputes, for the duration of the war, was worked out in conferences between President William Green of the Federation and the President of the C.I.O. Under the formula it was agreed that all disputes which were jurisdictional or intra-union in character would be referred to the Labor members for settlement. If the Labor members failed to agree, the issue is submitted to President Green and President Murray who appoint a committee which attempts to compose the differences.

One of the most important principles considered by the board involves its settlement of issues dealing with union security. Board decisions on this issue have generally been in the form of an order for a maintenance of union membership. These maintenance orders, which have varied from case to case, have usually provided that all union members in good standing two weeks after the board order must remain members for the duration of the contract to hold their employment.

Another important task before the National War Labor Board is to stabilize wages in accordance with the seven-point stabilization message of President Roosevelt. In dealing with this problem and with wages, the board has repeatedly rejected all efforts to freeze wages at existing levels. The board has insisted that inequalities which would perpetuate existing injustices be ironed out before wages can be stabilized. In a series of decisions the board has raised wages to remove inequalities between workers doing the same job within a plant, between workers in different plants within the same industry and between workers doing comparable work in the same area.

The officers and members of the American Federation of Labor have given the National War Labor Board their whole-hearted cooperation. The Federation has demonstrated to the nation that its no-strike pledge, backed by democratic representation of workers on a Government body to deal with the problem, has resulted in the minimum of interruptions in the production of the implements of war. Man-days lost through strikes have been reduced to the point where they now constitute well under one-tenth of one per cent of the time worked on war production. This is a record which the American Federation of Labor has chalked up since Pearl Harbor, and which is unequalled in the history of any democratic nation in the world.

(P. 545) This board is one war agency which conforms to the basic principle of organization which the Federation wholeheartedly approves—equal representation for Labor, management, and the public.

We recommend approval of the organization and its procedure for work. This board has in effect become Labor's supreme court and the final authority upon all labor wage agreements. This means that the board will, during the war, decide wage policies for all workers. We have not agreed with all decisions up to date but the remedy for that lies in informed aggressive representation and presentation of cases.

We recommend that the Federation together with its representatives on the board have all decisions carefully studied and underlying principles compiled so that we may anticipate trends and direct decisions along constructive lines. If separate decisions accumulate to develop economic policies, we may be completely enmeshed in conflicting or regressive policies and thus unnecessarily handicapped for the emergency and perhaps for years afterward.

Your committee urges that the Executive Council instruct Federation representatives on the board to give adequate time to its responsibilities and that a group of carefully chosen alternates and substitutes be developed equal to representing the Federation in matters coming before the board.

We recommend further that this tripartite board be made the top authority on all wage policies and issues arising under the Anti-Inflation Act and the President's Executive Order. We have reached the period when war authority must be delegated to an authority with responsibility for final "yes" or "no". Coordination will not get the same result as stream-lined authority. If we voluntarily delegate that authority with assurance of the right of representation we have adequately preserved the principles of democracy.

(P. 585) Res. 75:

Whereas—The National War Labor Board has of late adopted a policy granting only maintenance of union membership, even though the union shop which has been proven the best guarantee against industrial strike has been adopted in nearly every instance where Labor has been strong enough to demand and receive collective bargaining rights, and

Whereas—The union shop has acted as a stimulus to production, making it possible for it to discipline its members and establish peaceful procedures for the settlement of disputes, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor urges the National War Labor Board to abandon its above policy of granting only maintenance of union membership and to grant union shop protection to all workers who have chosen to better their economic position by joining a labor organization.

The premise upon which Resolution No. 75 is presented is not entirely correct.

Your committee is in thorough sympathy with the objectives sought, and for this reason recommend that the resolution be referred to the Executive Council.

(History) — (1943, p. 502) On December 17, 1941, President Roosevelt called together representatives of Labor and Industry for the now historical "Industry-Labor Conference on War-Time Problems". In the course of the meeting, representatives of the American Federation of Labor proposed that for the duration of the war there should be no lock-outs and no strikes; that all disputes were to be settled peacefully through a labor board made up of an equal number of representatives of Labor, industry and the public. This suggestion was adopted unanimously by the participants in the conference. The A. F. of L. accepted fully its responsibility to maintain maximum production and voluntarily obligated itself to forego the use of the strike weapon for the duration of the war.

When this voluntary proposal of a peaceful method of settling labor disputes was presented to the Chief Executive, he embodied it into Executive Order No. 9017 and thereby created the National War Labor Board on January 12, 1942.

An all important fact to be emphasized is that the National War Labor Board was not originally the product of governmental action. The President simply implemented the wishes of Labor and Industry representatives who were aware of their responsibilities in time of war. The War Labor Board came into being with the consent of those whom it was to serve. Unfortunately, this democratic ideal has not been adhered to.

Wage Control: Executive Order 9250

The first departure from the principle of voluntary regulation occurred on October 2, 1942, when President Roosevelt issued Executive Order No.

9250 providing for the stabilizing of the national economy. Acting under authority vested in him by the amendment to the Emergency Price Control Act, the President directed the National War Labor Board to regulate wages.

Executive Order No. 9250 completely changed the nature of the War Labor Board. It now became another governmental war agency created by Executive Order and assigned a job to do. The unique quality of voluntary regulation was considerably altered; only the structure remained unchanged.

This alteration in the fundamental nature of the National War Labor Board can be most clearly demonstrated by describing the evolution of the Little Steel Formula.

The Little Steel Formula

Six months before the National War Labor Board was ordered to regulate wages, its members recognized the need for stabilizing wage rates if inflation were to be avoided. In the International Harvester case of April, 1942 the board indicated clearly that wage control was a necessity if the economic health of the nation was not to be impaired. The only aspect of this conclusion which was not unanimously accepted was the method by which stabilization was to be attained.

There were honest differences of opinion over what percentage of general wage increases were to be allowed to offset increases in the cost of living. When these opinions were expressed by votes of the board members, the majority defined 15% as the proper figure. The Labor members were in the minority. However, they accepted the decision of the majority because they fully recognized the great national emergency with which our country was confronted.

On March 23, 1943, the A. F. of L. members presented to the War Labor Board a formal petition requesting reconsideration of the 15% allowance for correction of maladjustments. The majority of the board was forced to admit that the cost of living had risen well above 15% of what it had been in January, 1941. Nevertheless, the majority did not believe that the spread between wages and the cost of living was sufficiently large to merit increasing the 15% allowance. The net effect of the petition was the admission that if prices continued to rise, then the board would take positive action to remove any injustices.

The "Hold-the-Line Order"

(Executive Order No. 9328)

On April 8, 1943, Executive Order No. 9328 was issued by the President and a national wage policy was both created and enforced by government edict. The substitution of this government-sponsored wage policy for the voluntarily created Little Steel Formula came as a complete surprise to every member of the National War Labor Board. No longer was the wage policy of the board subject to determination by a majority of its members; from now on the Director of Economic Stabilization would control the War Labor Board's wage policy.

The new national wage policy was so unrealistic as to be completely unworkable. Led by the A. F. of L. members, the board issued a unanimous statement that it could not successfully regulate wages under the drastic provisions of Executive Order No. 9328. The board indicated clearly that genuine wage regulation not only limited wage increases but also maximized production. Under the provisions of the newly declared wage policy, production was sure to decline and the nation's war effort jeopardized.

Only after a month had been spent inducing Economic Stabilization Director Byrnes and the President to reconsider Executive Order No. 9328 was a "clarification" issued on May 12, 1943. Even then the provisions of the original Little Steel Formula were only partly restored.

Originally, and under Executive Order No. 9250, the Little Steel Formula had permitted modifications in wages to correct maladjustments, to eliminate inequalities, to eliminate sub-standards of living and to aid in the effective prosecution of the war. Executive Order No. 9328 restricted the basis of wage increases to the correction of maladjustments and the elimination of sub-standards. The "clarification" restored completely the "effective prosecution of the war" principle and substituted the ironing out of wage "inequities" for correction of wage inequalities.

The true significance of the May 12th modification of Executive Order No. 9328 becomes clear when the fact is realized that organized labor had obtained wage increases between January 1, 1941—before Pearl Harbor—and May, 1943, which equalled the 15% allowed under maladjustments; that relatively few A. F. of L. members were receiving sub-standard wages; that rarely did the War Labor Board grant increases on the basis of aiding in the prosecution of the war. In other words, wages of A. F. of L. members could now be increased only under the principle of "inequities" and this basis was so unjustly constructed as to mean essentially a wage freeze.

Wage Inequities and Wage Brackets

Determination of whether or not a wage inequity existed under Executive Order No. 9328 and the May 12th clarification is an involved process. The first step is the creation of a "wage bracket" or range of "sound and tested rates" for every job classification in a labor market. The minimum sound and tested rate is used to determine whether a contested wage rate was inequitable or not. Rates below this minimum may be increased to the minimum. Wage rates above the minimum are frozen for the duration of the war.

The application of the wage bracket concept to the wage rates of A. F. of L. members effectively eliminates the possibility of wage increases for the future. When wage brackets are set up the minimum rate is in most instances a non-union rate. Union rates are within the bracket and cannot be changed. Even worse, organization of workers is effectively hobbled since the wage rates of newly organized employees cannot be raised above the minimum or non-union rate which represents the bottom of the wage bracket.

Finally, there have been numerous instances in which the definition of a job classification has threatened to destroy a working condition for which the American Federation of Labor has fought to attain for many years.

Government Hierarchies

Your committee submits that not only have the members of the American Federation of Labor suffered unjustly from the government imposed regulation of wages, but the National War Labor Board is steadily being subjected to an ever increasing number of other governmental agencies. The finality which characterized the decisions of the original voluntary War Labor Board has steadily been nibbled away.

Under Executive Order No. 9250 the effect of Labor Board wage decisions involving prices were subjected to the scrutiny of the Office of Price Administration and the Director of Economic Stabilization. Under Executive Order No. 9328, its wage decisions are only provisional until both Economic Stabilization Director Vinson and War Mobilization Director Byrnes have given their approval. In other words, the very essence of the tripartite War Labor Board has been denied. One or two men now regulate wages which affect prices. While the number of such cases is, at present, small, the importance of those cases is not. Furthermore, the probability that the proportion of such cases will increase is great. Wage regulation bids fair to become wage freezing in an economy where the prices of other goods and services have not been successfully frozen.

The Smith-Connally Act

As though the treatment accorded the members of the American Federation of Labor by a governmentally dominated War Labor Board was not in itself sufficient to cause them to question the continued validity of the board, Congress has seen fit to further harass and badger A. F. of L. union men. The passage of the Smith-Connally Act was a new high point in anti-unionism in this country. No peace-time national labor legislation approaches this Act in its brazen effrontery. The Act boldly legalizes strikes and places at naught the record of the American Federation of Labor in settling disputes peacefully through the voluntarily created National War Labor Board.

Conclusion

Your committee is fully conscious of the need for wage regulation and for a definite program of fighting inflation, but it does not subscribe to that philosophy of government which assumes that the ends desired justify the means. Your committee does not believe that all governmental edicts purporting to fight inflation are equitable.

Nor do we believe that the national interest is well served when government-fixed wage formulas supplant wage policies hammered out by democratically organized bodies which have been voluntarily created. The Little Steel Formula represented the considered judgment of a majority of a democratically constituted board actively participating in the labor relations of the nation; they were genuine representatives of Labor, industry and the public on the board. Nevertheless, their contributions have been ignored and the judgment of one man now guides the wage policy of the nation. To a people accustomed to democratic principles this one-man rule is repugnant.

Your committee recommends that the American Federation of Labor should formally request the President to initiate action which would restore the National War Labor Board to its former position; return to the board its power to adjudicate finally all labor disputes by democratic process; and remove from its back the ever increasing load of super agencies.

(P. 531) Secretary Meany made the following report for the representatives of the A. F. of L. on the National War Labor Board:

The reason we feel a report should be made to this convention, in addition to the report and action of the Resolutions Committee yesterday, is the fact that we feel there is possibly, in the minds of the delegates some mystery about the War Labor Board and there is possibly some lack of understanding as to just what the board's functions are. In addition, and this is of tremendous importance, we feel that Labor should know just what sort of a board is holding complete power over the economic welfare of 50,000,000 workers. We also feel that this convention should know just what sort of a board we got as the result of a bargain Labor made with our government and the representatives of industry in December of 1941.

We know what we bargained for. We feel now that you should know what we have. And it is also important to make this report so that the general public will know that Labor is aware of what is going on. If we didn't make some sort of a report we might be accused of stupidity, because we didn't get what we bargained for, and the convention and the people represented by the delegates present should know this.

In December of 1941 we made a very simple agreement. Representatives of industry and Labor, with representatives of government, agreed that for the duration of the war, and in the interests of the national welfare, we would substitute peaceful methods in the settlement of labor disputes for the methods available to us under our free democracy. We would substitute a simple method by which men would weigh and estimate the merits of a dispute by a tri-partite system, arriving at a decision as to what was the proper disposition of the dispute. We agreed that this method would be substituted for strikes, lock-outs or any other method in which force was used.

For a short time after the War Labor Board was established, we had this simple method. Each dispute was settled on its merits. Since then we have gradually built up a complicated structure with 12 regional offices throughout the country and with almost complete governmental control over board action.

On the so-called voluntary wage agreements where there is no dispute, in the period of four months early this year, there were 34,000 cases of that type decided by the Regional Boards—not cases affecting 34,000 men but 34,000 cases. These are known as Form 10 cases. These are cases in which the employer and the employee had agreed as to what the wage and working conditions should be in a particular plant or in a particular industry.

Under the complicated set-up we have these cases begin or originate in the local Wage and Hour Office by filling out a form. The Wage and Hour Office then decides if the case comes within the jurisdiction of the War Labor Board. The form is then sent to Washington and from there to a Regional Board. The Regional Board has final power to settle these disputes if there is no price relief or price ceiling involved.

If the Regional Board disapproves there is an appeal open to either the Regional or National Board. If the appeal goes to the National Board, it goes to a research department and then to an Appeals Committee and then to the National Board for final action. The procedure on dispute cases is for the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor to step in, see what they can do to adjudicate the dispute; failing that, to submit it to the War Labor Board and then it goes to the New Case Committee of the War Labor Board, and from the New Case Committee it goes to either a Regional Board, a special commission or a panel. If in turn it goes to the Regional Labor Board it may be disposed of through a hearing officer, a referee or a panel. At the present time the National War Labor Board, with its regional branches has 2300 employees throughout the country. Of these 872 are what are called technical men. We have a Wage Stabilization Division, a Disputes Division, a Legal Division, a Review and Analysis Division, a Research and Statistical Division, and so down the line.

All of this has tended to change the original set-up of this board. We are now in the hands of the technicians, as it were.

In addition, there has been a gradual breakdown on the part of the government in the original structure of the board. Instead of disputes being settled by the good judgment and reasoning of the members of the board, they are now settled by certain rules promulgated by Executive Order, Acts of Congress, and the administrative orders of certain departments of the government. In other words, we do not have a free board. We have a government controlled board at every step of the way.

The board has not been allowed to do a good job. Back in June of 1942 the board promulgated what was known as the Little Steel Formula. Labor protested against this formula on the ground that it was too rigid and that we did not want to be bound by a set of rules that would perhaps prevent us from doing justice in a certain case. However, the board by a vote of eight to four, with the Labor members dissenting, promulgated the Little Steel Formula.

The Little Steel Formula in itself is based on what I would say is some reason, some justice. The theory of it is that the cost of living had gone out of balance with the wage structure of the country, and that therefore, the wage structure of the country should be allowed to rise sufficiently to balance off again with the cost of living. In May of 1942 that differential was 15%. Now that differential is well above 25%, so that if the Little Steel Formula is based on equity it should now be 25% instead of 15%.

However, the government has adopted not the formula but the 15% figure. In March of 1943 the American Federation of Labor representatives on the board moved for the readjustment of the Little Steel Formula as far as its figures were concerned, upward. The board decided against this move again by an eight to four vote, but in its decision, written, of course, by the public members of the board, the board stated that it had control of the formula; that the formula belonged to the board; that it was a decision arrived at by a democratic process, and that while they would not raise the Little Steel Formula at the time, it was stated definitely that if the cost of living continued to rise the formula would have to be readjusted in justice to the wage earners of the country.

That was on the 23rd of March. On the 8th day of April we had the so-called hold-the-line order, and on that day and through that order the War Labor Board lost control of the Little Steel Formula. It had no right after April 8th to change the 15%, which it had notified the public on March 23rd it would change if necessary in order to preserve a balance between the cost of living and wages.

On April 8th the Little Steel Formula and the 15% embodied in that formula became the law of the land. The War Labor Board was stripped to a large extent of its power to readjust wages beyond the Little Steel Formula. The result of this was that the War Labor Board stopped in the middle of its wage stabilization program because it could not apply its reasoning and render its decisions on merit in certain industries where a partial job of stabilization had been achieved. It meant that the board had to readjust its philosophy, readjust its approach to these cases, and it meant that the board stopped working on the 8th of April.

For a period of five weeks the War Labor Board and its regional offices disposed of practically no cases. There was a complete breakdown of the machinery from one end of the country to the other in the midst of war, due to Executive Order 9328 which was issued on April 8th.

Subsequently, on May 12th, the Director of Economic Stabilization, Justice Byrnes, issued a modifying order restoring to the board some of its powers. However, that order is a makeshift. It provides for these so-called wage brackets which are now causing our people so much hardship.

There is no cure for the troubles that beset the War Labor Board except the cure recommended by your Resolutions Committee yesterday to restore to the board its power to act, the power that it possessed when it was originally set up. Under the present machinery all we get on some of these cases is delay after delay.

I would just like to summarize one or two cases for you to show you just what the board is up against and just what the unions are up against who are trying to produce for the war effort, trying to keep their members on the job despite the delays and despite the provocation that comes from the employer's knowledge of the fact that his people will not strike and that they are hamstrung by the War Labor Board as presently functioning.

In June of 1942 the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, a member unit of the American Federation of Labor, signed an agreement with five packing houses in Louisville. This agreement covered everything except the one item upon which they could not agree. They could not agree upon wages. Collective bargaining had gone as far as it possibly could, but they could not agree upon wages because of the fact that the packers felt that they should get a higher price before they would pay higher wages. This case went to the War Labor Board September 24, 1942. It was given to a panel. That panel brought in its recommendations in April of 1943—recommendations which were made after volumes of testimony had been given before the panel and the panel had been advised by the hundreds of technicians and experts in research and analysis who are on the staff of the War Labor Board in Washington.

On July 4th, the panel submitted additional recommendations and on the 27th day of August, 1943, the National War Labor Board unanimously approved of a 10% wage increase for the people who have a starting rate of 45 cents for women and 60 cents for men—people definitely in the low wage group. Thus we had a unanimous decision of the Board rendered on August 27, 1943, on a case that started on June 15, 1942, giving these men and women a 10% increase and a corresponding increase in piece work rates.

On September 16, 1943, 15 months—15 months mind you—after the case started, and a month after the War Labor Board had unanimously decided on this increase in wages as the result of 14 months of study in the case, Judge Vinson, Director of Economic Stabilization, denied the wage increase and nullified the decision of the War Labor Board. He was able to undo in a few weeks what the contestants themselves, the employers who sat on the panel, the employers and workers who sat on the War Labor Board, the entire staff of four or five hundred technical experts of the War Labor Board who had reached a unanimous decision after 14 months of study, and Judge Vinson threw it out after having it in his office two weeks. They are back where they started. This is the type of a governmentally controlled agency in which the destiny of the people you represent for the duration of the war, as far as wages and working conditions are concerned, rests. I submit to you that the present War Labor Board procedure, hemmed in as it is by government control, through administrative order, through Executive Order, through the whims of particular individuals, individuals who have charge of these various departments having supervision over the War Labor Board—I submit that the present condition and the present procedure is provocative of strikes. Under such procedure Labor's no-strike record becomes more important and more commendable than ever before. In addition to every other provocation which we have in these trying times, in which men desire direct and immediate action, we have this government agency delaying cases month after month.

So I say to you here today that it is to Labor's eternal credit that it has built up a no-strike record such as we see in face of the conditions as they are in relation to government supervision of wages and conditions of employment.

Let me cite another case. This involves the Work-Glove industry.

A special commission was set up to study this industry. The War Production Board which is concerned with war production discovered that production was suffering due to a lack of cotton work gloves. A number of women have gone into these industries and we all know that men and women working around machine shops need these cotton work gloves. The War Production Board found that a serious situation existed. They came to the War Labor Board with representatives of industry and representatives of Labor and they asked that the War Labor Board give relief to this industry by a 10% increase that would enable the industry to keep going and meet the manpower conditions which prevail.

The War Labor Board—public members, employer members, and Labor members—with the complete backing of the War Production Board, which is charged with production for war, recommended a 10% increase for workers in 50-cent an hour class, in order to meet this manpower situation.

Despite that recommendation of the War Labor Board, unanimously arrived at, and despite the War Production Board's request that this relief be given in this industry, Economic Stabilization Director Vinson decided otherwise. He said that it just could not be done.

It causes us to wonder at times just whose team he is playing on when he denies the action of a governmental agency concerned with war production for the purpose of increasing war production or preventing a decrease in war production.

The present procedure under which the War Labor Board operates with government control by these various agencies, to me, represents a complete violation of the agreement we made in December of 1941. We bargained for a board which would settle these disputes under the democratic process of majority rule, upon the merits of each particular case. We haven't such a board today.

So, in behalf of the Labor members on this board we want to go on record as favoring the report of the committee submitted to you yesterday, as the only method by which this board can be restored to its power to really give service to Labor and industry throughout this war effort.

We are fully in accord with the recommendation that this Federation request the President of the United States to restore the War Labor Board to its original powers which the representatives of Labor bargained for and thought they received in December of 1941.

We are thoroughly in accord with the recommendation of the committee that this Federation request the President of the United States to remove these super agencies from the back of the War Labor Board.

We are thoroughly in accord with the report of the committee in which they say, despite these handicaps, we have got to carry on and do nothing that will in any way impede our chances of victory.

We are also thoroughly in accord with the report of the committee that under no circumstances do we want a Labor Board for the settlement of industrial disputes that looks anything like this War Labor Board after the war is over.

(1946, p. 110) The E.C. reported on the activities of the National War Labor Board from its establishment until its activities were transferred to the National Wage Stabilization Board, and included in the report special efforts of the A. F. of L. representatives on the board, closing with the following statement:

(P. 114) On December 31, 1945, the President issued Executive Order 9672, terminating the activities of the National War Labor Board, and also establishing a National Wage Stabilization Board to carry out its remaining functions. Thus, nearly four years' activities of the National War Labor Board were completed without a single case left incomplete. Moreover during this period the board disposed of 415,000 voluntary wage applications, and 20,000 dispute cases involving more than 40,000,000 workers.

The outstanding characteristic of the board was its tripartite structure which represented a new development in American industry. While the board's full time staff consisted of only 2,613 employees at its peak, it enlisted on a per diem basis over 5,000 part-time Labor, industry, and public representatives on its regional boards, dispute panels, and commissions. The main contribution of these part-time Labor, industry and public representatives was that every part of the country became acquainted with the tripartite system of settling Labor and industry problems. This has been a worthwhile experiment both for Labor and management, especially for the contribution it gave to the successful prosecution of the war.

(P. 609) The National War Labor Board—as an agency of the Federal Government devoted to settling wartime labor disputes and stabilizing wartime wages—came to an end in December, 1945. The history of that board is a record of the self-discipline which organized labor exercised during World War II.

Despite an unjust, inequitable policy of stabilizing wages without full regard for the other controls necessary to avoid inflation, the American Federation of Labor affiliates accepted the wage controls exercised by the Board. Despite directive orders in particular cases which were a flagrant violation of the principles of free collective bargaining, the affiliates of the American Federation of Labor did not challenge these decisions by striking during the war.

While the passing of the Board has restored a measure of free collective bargaining, the continuance of wage control by its successor—the National Wage Stabilization Board—is a strong curb upon free collective bargaining over wages. In short, the abolition of the National War Labor Board marks only one step in our progress toward economic freedom. While we are happy that the war which brought into being the War Labor Board has ended and that the Board itself has been terminated, we are still a measurable distance from our pre-war freedom. The National Wage Stabilization Board remains.

Wage Formula—(1943, p. 505) The convention declared that your Committee is fully conscious of the need for wage regulation and for a definite program of fighting inflation, but it does not subscribe to that philosophy of government which assumes that the ends desired justify the means. Your committee does not believe that all governmental edicts purporting to fight inflation are equitable.

Nor do we believe that the national interest is well served when government-fixed wage formulas supplant wage policies hammered out by democratically organized bodies which have been voluntarily created. The Little Steel Formula represented the considered judgment of a majority of a democratically constituted Board actively participating in the labor relations of the nation; they were genuine representatives of labor, industry and the public on the Board. Nevertheless, their contributions have been ignored and the judgment of one man now guides the wage policy of the nation. To a people accustomed to democratic principles this one-man rule is repugnant.

Your committee recommends that the American Federation of Labor should formally request the President to initiate action which would restore the National War Labor Board to its former position; return to the Board its power to adjudicate finally all labor disputes by democratic processes; and remove from its back the ever increasing load of super-agencies.

Finally, your committee recommends that the American Federation of Labor should continue its efforts to guarantee that the nation shall be victorious in war. The A. F. of L. has always subscribed to the principle of voluntary arbitration of labor disputes. It cannot and will not, we are sure, after hostilities have ceased, agree to the continued existence in any form whatsoever of the National War Labor Board, and will not countenance domination by the Government in any form or character of its right to bargain collectively fully and freely.

(Little Steel Formula)—(1944, p. 232) Efforts of A. F. of L. members of the Board to formulate wage policies within the limits of sound wage stabilization are dealt with in a comprehensive report of the Executive Council under this title and several sub-heads. A number of resolutions were submitted to the convention dealing with the Little Steel Formula.

The convention unanimously adopted the report of its committee as follows:

(Pp. 508, 510) The National War Labor Board functions as a voluntary creation of government, management and labor, consisting of representatives of those most vitally concerned in maintaining wage policies most conducive to the war effort and least conducive to the causing of inflation. Its purpose is to formulate and prescribe wage policies and wage rates consistent with that purpose. Labor voluntarily suspended the use of the greatest and most sacred of its rights—the right to strike—and to that Board the workers of this country entrusted the most fundamental of their interests—the prescribing of wages and conditions of employment. This convention is deeply and legitimately concerned with that Board's activities—more so than those of any of the numerous other governmental agencies which deal with or affect labor.

Last year your committee had occasion to comment upon the fact that the democratically adjudicated wage policies of that Board, arrived at by representatives of all segments of the national life, had been superseded by government-fixed wage formulas which, by one-man edict, froze all wages at a prescribed and arbitrary level. This year your committee must bring to the attention of this convention an even more shocking spectacle of a refusal by a majority of that Board, consisting of its public and industry members, even to recommend specific action to those with power to alter or modify the existing situation, so that inequities and burdens irrefutably demonstrated to exist under the present wage freeze could at least in some measure be alleviated. But as pointed out by the Labor Members of the Board:

Yet the same public members, who on the one hand plead lack of information, are ready to make pertinent recommendations on wage policies for the reconversion period. . . . The Board's inconsistency is astounding: For over two years now the Board has been handling cases and becoming fully informed of the effect of the Little Steel Formula and the relationship of wages to the cost of living. It has accumulated a mass of evidence on the subject. But the Board now says it is in no position to make any recommendations as a result of that experience and any changes in our economy which have taken place. The Board feels fully competent, however, to make recommendations on matters which have not yet occurred, matters on which it has no experience, heard no cases, and been in no position to make any more than a guess.

In the space of a little less than two years we have witnessed, first, the shackling, and then the abject surrender of a Board originally established by voluntary action of those segments of our national economy most vitally interested and affected as a body, to determine by democratic procedures the problems of wage adjustments of workers in time of war. The events leading up to that surrender, which took place only last month, are as follows:

Early in this year the American Federation of Labor, through its labor representatives on the War Labor Board, petitioned that Board to make specific recommendations to the President to make modifications or alterations of the "Little Steel" formula so as to permit the Board to make wage adjustments more closely in line with increases in cost of living. The basis of that petition, as was the basis of a similar petition presented almost a year before, was that the cost of living had in fact increased to a considerable extent beyond that contemplated under the "Little Steel" formula, so that workers everywhere were suffering a considerable shrinkage in earnings as expressed in terms of purchasing power. In freezing wage levels, the government had promised to maintain the cost of living at a comparable level. This promise, in return for which the no-strike pledge had been given and under which it was agreed to submit all wage issues to the War Labor Board for final determination, was not maintained. Other segments of the national economy were allowed to benefit themselves at the primary expense of wage earners.

On March 15th the Board dismissed this petition without prejudice for reconsideration. A week later the petition was reinstated when the Board decided to accept jurisdiction over the demands of the United Steel Workers to grant workers in the steel industry an increase beyond the limits of the "Little Steel" formula. It is significant to note that the petition of the American Federation of Labor which was on behalf of all workers in all industries, regardless of affiliation or lack of affiliation, was considered only after the Board had decided to take jurisdiction over the Steel Workers' case involving but a comparatively small segment of the country's wage earners. Hearings were held on this petition during the summer. The Board convened in executive session on October 9th to determine whether to make recommendations to the President on the question of modifying the "Little Steel" formula. By this time it had before it the report of the special panel hearing which heard the A. F. of L. petition setting forth many facts indicating a considerable increase in the cost of living and numerous specific instances of the inequitable and arbitrary working of the "Little Steel" formula. It also had before it the Meany-Thomas report indicating an increase in the cost of living of 45 per cent, the Department of Labor's report indicating an increase in the cost of living of 25 per cent, and the report of the special committee of technical experts appointed by Chairman Davis of the War Labor Board which found that the cost of living had increased 30 per cent or double that contemplated under the "Little Steel" formula.

With this mass of evidence before it indicating the great increases in the cost of living, indicating the inequities of the "Little Steel" formula, and indicating that modification of the "Little Steel" formula need not have any inflationary effects, the Board, with labor members dissenting, refused to make any recommendations whatsoever to the President, and, instead, stated that it would present to the Economic Stabilization Director a report setting forth pertinent data regarding the relationship of wages to the cost of living. Thus, not only has the Board suffered its functions to be removed from it, but it has also surrendered even the right of protest. And this in the face of overwhelming evidence that its protest would be extremely well founded. Having at least the right to make recommendations, and knowing that these recommendations would bear great weight it has nevertheless refused to exercise that right—a far cry from the original conception of a Board voluntarily created for the purpose of itself deciding and formulating the wage policies of a nation in time of war, and to which Board organized labor and the workers of the nation had surrendered and entrusted their greatest rights. The characterization of this action of the Board by its labor members as "an inexcusable dereliction of duty" could well be supplemented by terming it also an unwarranted breach of faith.

In comparison with the action of the public and industry members of the Board in refusing to make recommendations for modification of the "Little Steel" formula, the other criticisms to which the Board can rightfully be subjected fade into insignificance.

The injustices accomplished under the so-called wage bracket system, the interminable delays to which a participant in a dispute case is subjected, the taking of jurisdiction in issues not involved in the war effort, all are deserving of more extended comment.

Thus—at the end of the third year of governmental regulation of labor—your Committee submits that the workers of this nation find themselves enmeshed in laws of Congress, executive orders of the President, edicts of the Director of Economic Stabilization, and the directives of the National War Labor Board. Yet, despite this ever-growing bureaucratic interest in the well-being of workers, the American Federation of Labor has been unable to obtain acknowledgment from the Federal Government of the simple fact that the pre-war standard of living for workers is rapidly deteriorating.

In view of the foregoing your committee recommends that the President of the American Federation of Labor immediately after the adjournment of this convention appoint a representative committee to call upon the President of the United States at the earliest possibility and place before him the request that he issue an executive order which will realistically adjust the "Little Steel" formula with the increased cost of living and permit employers and employees to effectuate the newly established policy by voluntary agreement without submission to the National War Labor Board.

The resolutions dealing with this subject matter are as follows:

Resolution No. 33:

Whereas—The War Labor Board has frozen wages by means of the Little Steel Formula whereby a bargaining unit of labor is limited to an increase of 15 per cent in its average straight time rates over the rates prevailing January, 1941, and

Whereas—The cost of living has increased 40 per cent or more since January, 1941, and

Whereas—Employees are justly entitled to increased wages which the employers can and will absorb without passing the increase to the consumer, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this 64th annual convention of the American Federation of Labor hereby instruct its officers to request the National War Labor Board (1) to abrogate the Little Steel Formula as a limit to wage increases thereby permitting wage increases in keeping with the increased cost of living and (2) to promulgate an additional regulation making any increase in wages permissible when agreed upon between employer and employees and when assurances are furnished that such increase will not be passed along to the consumer.

Resolution No. 35:

Whereas—Labor has performed one of the most outstanding miracles of production ever witnessed in industrial history in supplying our Armed Forces with the planes, guns, ammunition, foodstuffs and materials of war, and

Whereas—The no-strike policy of organized labor has been rigidly followed, with the exception of sporadic unauthorized cessations of work, and

Whereas—When Labor pledged that it would remain at work during World War II, it did so with the understanding that wages and the cost of living would be "stabilized," with the resulting rules of wage stabilization, and

Whereas—Wages have been frozen by the Wage Stabilization rules and the cost of living has risen so that the purchasing power of the worker has diminished, and

Whereas—The Bureau of Labor Statistics' latest available data indicates that the cost of living has increased 25.4 per cent over the January 1, 1941, level, and

Whereas—The Labor Members of the President's Committee on the Cost of Living have reported on January 25, 1944, that a realistic rise in the cost of living of 43.5 per cent has taken place over the base date of the Little Steel Formula, January 1, 1941, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record as advocating an increase in the Little Steel Formula, or the liberalization of Wage Stabilization policies to permit the purchasing power of the workers to keep pace with the realistic increase in the cost of living, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor advocate automatic adjustments in wage rates of all workers, both organized and unorganized, without submission to the War Labor Board, and that copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Chairman of the War Labor Board, William Davis, Director of Wage Stabilization, Judge Vinson, and to members of the Regional War Labor Board.

Resolution No. 46:

Whereas—The International Typographical Union at its 1944 Convention made definite requests for a change in policy by the War Labor Board, and

Whereas—Those requests are fair and reasonable for such time as the War Labor Board may need to function, therefore, be it

Resolved—That they are hereby endorsed by the American Federation of Labor as requests to the War Labor Board as follows:

1. That the War Labor Board revert to the principle it established when it announced that a 15 percent increase in the cost of living warranted a 15 percent increase in wages.

2. That after reverting to that principle it discard the obsolete "Little Steel Formula" and set a new ceiling as of a more accurate reflection of the increased cost of living and in no case less than an amount equal to the proved increase in living costs.

3. That it recognize as approved any wage scale up to the increase in the cost of living and in cases of employers not directly charging wages against war materials that increases negotiated up to 50 percent stand as approved.

4. That it reestablish the dignity of the Board so it can function as reason and facts indicate rather than act as automatons at the voice of an alleged stabilizer dictating wages while at the same time unable to enforce or maintain ceiling prices on commodities; and at the same time knowingly ignore the plight of the working people who are kept from helping themselves.

5. That if members of the War Labor Board cannot act as above requested, they seriously consider resigning from the Board in protest against such an unfair and unreasonable method of distributing the burden of the war effort; that they admit failure to carry out the principle they originally announced and which the American people accepted.

In connection with consideration of the Executive Council's Report relative to the National War Labor Board, your Committee gave careful consideration to Resolutions Nos. 33, 35 and 46, all of them relative to the Little Steel Formula, and the necessity of its being guided by a policy which would be in keeping with the maintenance of a real wage in our country. Inasmuch as the Committee has recommended that the officers of the American Federation of Labor appoint a committee for the purpose of laying before the President of the United States the inequities and the injustice contained in the War Labor Board's policy in connection with the Little Steel Formula, we recommend that these three resolutions be referred to the President and the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to assist them in making an appropriate response to the President of the United States.

(1946, p. 110) On February 20, 1945, the Public Members submitted their report to the President through the Economic Stabilization Director. In their comments to the President, the A. F. of L. Members took issue with certain aspects of the Public Members' report. One of the strongest objections was directed to the analysis of the increases of wage allegedly received by the workers of this nation.

In their report, the Public Members substituted "adjusted straight time hourly earnings" for wage rates as the criteria for wage stabilization. Prior to the issuance of their report, the Public Members had refused to measure wages on the terms of "take-home" pay or gross earnings. Instead wages were regulated in the past by adjusting wage rates.

Under this specially devised formula, all types of wage increases were defined as cost of living adjustment. Despite the fact that the Board historically limited increases to offset the rise in the living cost to the Little Steel Formula or maladjustment principle, substandard wage increases as well as adjustments to correct interplant and intraplant inequities were all lumped together as cost-of-living increases. The wage analysis made in the report indicated clearly that the Public Members had altered radically their method of measuring wage increases.

This shift of standards at that time was certainly no mere academic change of thinking. This change was the sole ground upon which the Public Members were able to rationalize their recommendations to the President that the Little Steel Formula should not be modified.

In the summary of their comments to the President, the A. F. of L. Members stated:

That the Public Members have adopted a new measure of wage stabilization; that this change was unannounced to their colleagues on the Board; and that the Public Members are not obliged to explain the bases of their recommendations against changing the Formula are all admissible facts. But the American Federation of Labor Members cannot explain to the workers of America the wage increases which they have only mathematically received. Nor can they explain that an increase to some individual workers fattens the pay envelopes of all workers. Furthermore, they cannot find a convincing answer to the question of why the measuring rod of wage increases was changed at all.

Last, but not least, there remains still another question which cannot be answered frankly. Why must the workers of the Nation be made to bear the brunt of supporting the entire anti-inflation program?

The seven-point program—as a whole—has not been successfully administered. Nevertheless, its deficiencies have been hidden from public view by the success attained in regulating wages. Whenever the program skids more than usual, the customary reaction of Director of Economic Stabilization has been to turn the thumbscrews more vigorously upon wage earners.

Indeed, this behavior has occurred so regularly that a pattern has been established. Executive Order No. 9250 was drastically modified by Executive Order No. 9328. This hysterical outburst had to be toned down by the May 12, 1943, Directive. Now with no more rigid wage control possible, an attempt is being made to whittle down the benefits of vacations, night-shift differentials and other fringe adjustments.

The workers of this Nation call upon the Government to look elsewhere in its seven-point anti-inflation program for improvements. What has happened to the proposals to roll back prices of food and clothes? What plans are being to lessen the load of taxation borne by workers forced to live at a sub-standard level?

The American workers can find no convincing reply to the Public Members' Report to the President as to why our proposal for a realistic modification of the Little Steel Formula cannot be made at once. To the contrary, the very fact that they have had to devise a new formula to deny our appeal indicates the justice of our position.

Although the A. F. of L. Members of the Board were not entirely successful in breaking the Little Steel Formula until after V-J Day, their persistence along this line brought about additional elements of flexibility in the Board's wage stabilization policies, together with other "precedent making" decisions. Such benefits were later extended to industries generally throughout the country.

(Labor Representation)—(1942, p. 582) Res. 74:

Whereas—The State is intervening more and more in economic matters and is exercising increasing influence on production, distribution, profits, prices, conditions of employment, wages and the standard of living of the workers in order to prosecute the war effort more effectively, and

Whereas—When the Government formulates or applies its various economic policies, it is to the interests of the Government to obtain the collaboration of the trade unions and thus be able to secure their technical assistance as well as benefit by their practical competence and experience, and

Whereas—In order to make possible such a desirable objective, the Government should have represented on all agencies set up to control, plan or direct the national economy, representatives of the trade unions, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor recommend to the federal and state governments that such representation be given to the trade unions, and be it further

Resolved—That this representation should be commensurate with and proportionate to the amount of representation given to management.

Your committee, in recommending the adoption of the resolution, believes it highly advisable to emphasize the necessity for direct labor representation on all Federal agencies having to do with the war effort—the question of production, distribution, profits, prices, conditions of employment, wages, and the standard of living.

Labor, because of its long, practical experience, is in a better position than many others to bring practical consideration, in a realistic manner, to the official civilian groups dealing with various phases of the war effort. We now clearly recognize that had experienced trade unionists held membership on the Federal bodies establishing priorities, that much of the industrial dislocation which followed would not have worked as injuriously as it did. The same reference is justified to other civilian Federal agencies dealing with production problems, and those of manpower.

Your committee is convinced that had there been adequate labor representation, some of the mistakes of judgment and policy which have occurred, would have been avoided.

Your committee is convinced that if the full efficiency of our productive system is to be reached, that Labor, at the Federal council and planning table, must be better represented. We must have the invaluable contribution of the technically trained men upon the Federal bodies, but as no one can understand Labor as well as Labor itself, it is essential that theoretical knowledge of the problems should be balanced by the knowledge of those whose lifetime has been given to industrial problems, and in the relationship between management and labor.

(1944, p. 240) A special section of the E.C. Report to the 1944 convention briefly reviewed accomplishments in manpower and production. The closing paragraph pinpoints contribution made by working men and women in the production of war materiel:

The magnificent contribution of the working men and women of the United States is clearly reflected in the production record. In the year 1939 the total production of defense materials amounted to $1,400,000,000. In that same year the total non-war goods production amounted to $87,-

200,000,000. Four years later, 1943, the production of war goods amounted to $81,300,000,000. That same year 1943, the non-war goods production amounted to $105,200,000,000. This nation has succeeded in doing what no other country has done. It has managed to have bullets and butter. Moreover, that record production, aggregating $186,500,000,000 in the year 1943, was achieved after drawing off from the potential manpower for production more than 10 million men.

(Pp. 238, 576) Progress in the production schedule for materiel of war and in meeting manpower requirements are covered in a special report of the E.C. It was pointed out, however, that a number of problems still remain to be solved.

The report of the convention committee and its recommendations were unanimously adopted, including the following:

The record set forth in the first section is an eloquent testimony to the production achievement of American labor. This section further indicates that the various phases of manpower requirements that have during the past months been critical, have, for the most part, been satisfactorily met. This points to the conclusion that though there remain certain critical manpower needs in relation to the war production program, they are not essentially different from those needs which have been satisfactorily met before and without recourse to compulsory labor legislation.

We are of the firm conviction that with the continued cooperation of organized labor and industrial management with government agencies, these problems too can be solved. We therefore recommend the renewed endorsement of the voluntary manpower program carried out under the provision for participation of labor and management on the National Management-Labor Policy Committee in the War Manpower Commission and the regional and area war manpower committees.

A study of the record of the National Management-Labor Policy Committee indicates clearly the quality of the contribution made to the program of this important war agency by the President of the American Federation of Labor and his alternate. The representatives of the Federation have stood four-square for voluntary principles as the basis for our manpower program and have led the opposition to all efforts to substitute compulsion.

We recommend an expression of appreciation of the services of these representatives with instructions to continue their support of voluntary principles.

("No-Strike" Pledge Reaffirmed)—(1944, pp. 85, 539) Res. 133:

Whereas—We believe in the reaffirmation of wartime pledges, therefore, be it

Resolved—By this 64th annual convention of the American Federation of Labor that we hereby reaffirm our determination to fulfill our pledges to the Government and to the people of the United States, and the members of our armed forces, that we will give every possible assistance in prosecuting the present war to a victorious conclusion. That we renew our "no strike" pledge, and reaffirm our determination to continue assisting in financing the war, and as soldiers in the army of production give full service in the production of the implements of war. But that we also insist upon the Government and upon industry, to respect our rights, preserve our agreements, and apply them in good faith, and that our "no-strike" pledge must not be used as a subterfuge to deprive us of long established rights and privileges.

(1947, pp. 12-16) In keynote address to the convention, President Green stated:

"I know that all of you have been moved deeply by charges that have been made by our enemies that labor, in extending organization among the unorganized workers of the nation, has lowered the efficiency and productivity of the workers of the land. That is not true. The American worker stands on a higher plane of productivity and efficiency than any American worker ever stood in all the history of our nation. Efficiency and service have been increased, and productivity has been broadened.

"So, on this auspicious occasion, I want to make answer in a definite way to many of these charges that have been made against the working men and women of the nation and declare to the American people and to the world through facts and figures, that the charges made against us have no foundation in fact.

"I have prepared some figures that I shall now present to you.

"When it became apparent that our nation would become involved in the war which was gradually engulfing practically the entire civilized world, the leaders of our nation realized that the responsibility for production of the materiel of war for all the allied nations would rest on America, and American workers. Our President called for all-out production and the organized wage-earners of our country responded as a man.

"Almost over night swamplands were converted into shipyards from which in record-breaking time poured the needed vessels with which to transport our men and supplies across the oceans. Aircraft factories sprang up in forests and from their assembly lines America's workers sent an almost never-ending stream of planes for use over seas and for defense of our homeland.

"But even before production could be started in many localities roads and bridges had to be built at an amazing speed which meant our construction workers had to leave their jobs and homes and take jobs at distant points. Whole towns and cities had to be built to take care of the workers who had accepted the call for service in America's army of production. Supply depots had to be constructed, homes built, hospitals provided, transportation furnished, sanitary facilities installed, before our factories could be started on their grueling task. But the result of all this is history. America's workers met the challenge and even exceeded the hopes of the most optimistic.

"Our farmlands became the breadbasket for our country and her Allies with even less manpower than before the war started. America's soldiers were the best fed in the world, the best clothed, the most adequately cared for and supplied with the finest materiel for modern warfare. Truly, America had two armies in action—our armed forces, and the army of production. And bear this in mind—that miracle of production was achieved by FREE enterprise and FREE labor working together toward a common objective and for the preservation of American ideals of life and liberty.

"The fighting war ceased over two years ago, but a war-torn, confused, and weary world is still turning to America and America's production workers for assistance in rehabilitating its economic life. Despite unprecedented domestic demand for the output of our industries, America is sharing her vast production with the rest of the world in unequalled amounts. We are now being called upon to meet the needs not only of our own people and our Allies, but those countries which were our enemies in the war.

"We have shown what can be accomplished by free men in a free economy. We know that there is almost no limit to the goods and services which can be produced when workers are free from repression and can give expression to their highest and most creative impulses. Under totalitarian regimes workers have been stripped of their freedom and are not supplied with even the basic necessities of life.

"With the close of the war, however, our production schedule continued to expand. The needs of peace and rehabilitation of the entire world created unprecedented demand for the products of American factories. Improved methods of production and technological advances in methods which were developed to meet a war-time need proved just as necessary after the fighting war ceased and the world was faced with an even greater problem of winning the peace."

War Production Board—(1942, p. 190) Immediately following Pearl Harbor, the Office of Production Management, the Government agency charged with responsibility for war production, undertook to speed conversion to war production and to increase the number of contracts under production. To locate responsibility definitely and to give authority proportionate to the responsibility, on January 16 the President replaced OPM with the War Production Board . . .

The Executive Order which established the War Production Board placed full authority and responsibility in the chairman, with the advice and assistance of the members of the Board, and provided that he shall:

1. Exercise general direction over the war procurement and production program.
2. Determine the policies, plans, procedures, and methods of the several Federal departments, establishments, and agencies in respect to war procurement and production, including purchasing, contracting, specifications, and construction; and including conversion, requisitioning, plant expansion, and the financing thereof; and issue such directives in respect thereto as he may deem necessary or appropriate.

3. Perform the functions and exercise the powers vested in the Supply Priorities and Allocations Board by Executive Order No. 8875 of August 28, 1941.

4. Supervise the Office of Production Management in the performance of its responsibilities and duties, and direct such changes in its organization as he may deem necessary.

5. Report from time to time to the President on the progress of war procurement and production; and perform such other duties as the President may direct.

The Board began preparing orders to limit production in whole or in part by a prescribed time in consumer goods industries. Scarcities in raw materials and impossibility of increasing production facilities, made necessary priorities restricting supplies to firms engaged in war contracts and control over inventories in order to save materials and facilities for war needs.

The Chairman stated that conversion was the only straight, fast way to get ample war production. Conversion of the automobile industry was already in the process under instructions to end by February 1, 1942. Allocation of contracts took place in this industry alone. Industry committees for other industries—the refrigerator, domestic washing machines, radios, phonographs, stoves, furnaces and metal furniture—were asked to consult with WPB to determine conversion programs. As contracts had been negotiated with the War and Navy Departments, conversion in-involved uncertainties for many firms and unemployment for many workers. Unfortunately Labor was not represented in industry committees. The Labor Division set up labor committees which, meeting separately from the industry committees, sometimes had a chance to consider limitation orders in advance of their date of effectiveness. In very rare instances joint committee meetings were arranged with administrators.

In two industries (stoves and agricultural implements) joint meetings with industry advisory committees have been held. In the case of the stove industry the labor advisory committee members sat in at the meeting of the industry advisory committee and contributed to the discussion of problems of employment, manpower, and other pertinent matters.

In the agricultural implement industry, four representatives from Labor and five from management were chosen to make their suggestions as to a constructive plan for readjusting the industry to the curtailed production necessitated by shortage of materials. The labor and industry committees each worked out separate programs then met jointly to discuss different points with the WPB officials.

These two developments represent the first steps toward accomplishing joint consideration by Labor and Industry of conversion problems. Labor has been attempting to bring this about for some time.

Opportunity for joint consideration of programs has not yet gone far enough and it is hoped that this constructive development may be carried further.

From the first the American Federation of Labor has maintained that procurement for total war involved such consequences to our whole economy and our employment structure, that methods of former years should not be followed. We maintained that contracts should be allocated in the light of continuous inventories of plant equipment and facilities and their potential war production capacities, paralleled by inventories of work skills and work experience of the production staffs.

We maintained that the Federal Government had the responsibility for planning for the fullest use of plant facilities and workers in order to have maximum production of war equipment constantly available. Up to date, the War Production Administration has not fully achieved its purpose to reach a maximum in war production material or to convert remaining production facilities into consumer production. As a result there is a scarcity of steel, scarce metals are used unnecessarily for non-military purposes, synthetic rubber has been delayed, and manpower hours of production have been lost.

Procurement as usual has continued so that the great preponderance of primary contracts has gone to the largest corporations. Small companies find it practically impossible to get primary contracts and difficult to get sub-contracts. Business had taken pride in its ability to master executive difficulties, but the experience of private business in this field is not yet incorporated in the giant production undertaking which the Government initiated.

The Government has an additional responsibility for most efficient cost accounting, so that all payments on contracts shall be on a basis of exact information as established by cost and production accounting, and our nation spared unnecessarily high costs.

The American Federation of Labor was anxious to prevent the distress that would attend closing down small plants, and equilly to present a balance between small business and large enterprise in our economy. A Division of Contract Distribution was established but it was separate and uncoordinated with procurement by the Army, Navy and Treasury, and hence ineffective. After considering the problems of small plants, Congress enacted legislation (approved June 11, 1942) directing the Chairman of the War Production Board to establish the Smaller War Plants Corporation with five directors to make loans or advances, to finance the acquisition of equipment facilities, machinery, materials, etc., to enter into contracts with the Government and to perform them through sub-contracts let to small business concerns. This agency should bring considerable relief to small companies. Labor believes and repeatedly urges that war procurement should be directly under civilian control, for we believe the military should not have control over civilian life.

The matters of basic management doubtless will be incorporated in practice before the war is ended. However, in spite of these undesirable overall managerial inefficiencies, our production concerns are turning out products and equipment in amazing quantities, continually breaking records and setting new standards. American workers and employers are genuinely patriotic and are working as never before because they realize the issues involved in this war. Our great system of private enterprise has demonstrated its capacity to rise to an emergency, and Management and Labor stand ready to see production through for the duration.

(Reorganization Recommended) — (1942, p. 545) This section of the Executive Council Report recounts the early difficulties in establishing relations with this agency whose authority and functions were indefinite and whose methods of operation provided no opportunity for Labor to participate jointly with management in those determinations which so vitally concern its welfare.

Persistent insistence upon right to representation has, however, won some recognition until now labor organizations have nominated representatives for certain key positions.

Your committee believes that important service could be rendered in connection with the "Labor-management production drive" if the spirit and methods of union-management cooperation could be applied to the whole effort. As the Executive Council points out, where unions share this responsibility with management excellent results have followed.

We hope that the recent agreements reached with the chairman for the appointment of two vice-chairmen to his staff and for the creation of a War Production Drive Board consisting of two representatives of Labor and two of management, with an impartial chairman, will shortly be effectuated. These provisions will certainly afford opportunity for greatly increased service and participation.

Your committee also hopes that the issues of jurisdiction over war production as between the Army, Navy, Maritime Commission and War Production Board, will shortly be resolved into something like a Ministry of Supply. Centralizing authority over contracts in one agency is essential to that sort of production planning and scheduling which must precede manpower control. Shortages in manpower may develop shortly, but to set up controls before the material side of production has been organized and brought under control, would work serious and unnecessary hardships. Great Britain, Canada, and other countries longer in this war, have centralized control over war production outside of these agencies responsible for carrying on the military side of the war, and have set up over-all military-civilian boards of strategy responsible for decisions between the military and the civilian.

Your committee recommends that the Federation urge early reorganization along lines of clear-cut definite allocation of authority and with an over-all board of strategy to decide over-all policies as directives to coordinate the operations of all war agencies.

(Definition of Defense Worker)—(P. 590) The convention concurred in Res. 90 protesting against the definition of war workers as established by the War Production Board as follows:

Whereas—It seems that the War Production Board has ruled that "Defense Workers" only are entitled to purchase or rent houses that are constructed under Federal Housing Authority regulations, and that the FHA officials claim they are powerless under this interpretation to OK the contract of sale on any such property unless the purchaser can qualify as a defense worker under the provisions of the rulings of said War Production Board, and

Whereas — The War Production Board has defined a "Defense Worker" as a member of the armed forces of the United States or a civilian in the employ of the armed forces or one who is directly engaged in producing munitions or materials for the armed forces of the United States, and

Whereas—This narrow and circumscribed definition of those who are eligible as potential purchasers or owners of property under the Federal Housing Authority program, excludes thousands of our members engaged in construction work on federal housing projects as well as those of a more permanent nature; such as hospitals, dry docks, training stations, and many other activities directly connected with the prosecution of the war effort, and

Whereas—a logical definition of the term "Defense Worker" should include many classifications of workers now concerned and employed directly on work for the purpose of winning the war. It is self-evident that the bus driver who enables a shipyard worker to get to work on time is no less a defense worker than said shipyard worker and the mechanic constructing housing or other facilities which enables the aircraft worker to be more comfortable and happy and therefore more efficient is no less a defense worker in a true sense of the term than the aircraft worker himself, and

Whereas—Representatives of many unions whose principal business it is to furnish workers for the war industry and to keep the jobs rolling are not eligible to rent or purchase homes under the rulings of the War Production Board as hereinbefore set forth, yet it is a self-evident fact that these said representatives are an important part of the defense machinery, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor go on record as protesting the rulings of the War Production Board and its definition of defense worker for the reason that it is discriminatory against many of our members and representatives, that it is unjust in its application and that we petition the War Production Board to change and modify the restrictive terms defining "Defense Worker" and so broaden the scope of that classification as to enable our members who are engaged in any phase of work for the prosecution of the business of winning the war, to qualify as defense workers and as such to be entitled to rent or purchase property through the machinery of the Federal Housing Administration with the approval of the War Production Board.

(Labor Production Division) — (P. 193) As reported to the 1941 Convention, the American Federation of Labor had far from satisfactory representation under the former Office of Production Management. After war was declared this situation became increasingly a hardship and an injustice. Conversion from civilian to war production was speeded up, and unemployment rose sharply in some communities so that they became distress areas. Workers have information which would have been helpful in planning industry orders. In addition, workers needed advance information to plan for their own welfare. The Federation struggled against heavy odds to secure representation for unions on labor advisory committees for industries and then struggled to bring about joint meetings between industry and labor advisory committees. The Labor Division had laid down the principle of proportional representation without definition of membership or requiring objective and comparable data as a basis for decisions. At no time were the functions and authority of labor advisory committees defined. In fact, the labor division of both the Office of Production Management and the War Production Board was never an integral part of the operations of the agency. The War Production Board was a step toward lodging authority for war production in one agency and under one executive. It was logical that the functions of the labor division should be reorganized according to the purposes and policy of the new administration. This was done when the Manpower Commission was created and the division became the Labor Production Division with the following responsibilities:

1. To bring to the Chairman of the War Production Board information and recommendations relating to the actual production problems in which Labor is primarily involved.

2. To promote improved relations between Labor and Management in war industries.
2. To recommend War Production Board policies on Labor matters.
4. To organize labor advisory committees to represent Labor in War Production Board affairs.
5. To distribute war information among workers.
6. To promote stabilization of wages, hours, and working conditions in major war industries through established collective bargaining processes. . . .

The division created a Labor Policy Committee to help guide the decisions, with equal representation for workers and employers. This committee which meets weekly with the director and leading members of his staff, has guided the organization of the division, selection of its key personnel, and formulation of its policies. In addition, it has participated in consultations of the War Production Board as a whole.

To realize the stated objectives of the division, several branches have been established within it. These are the War Production Drive and the Wage Stabilization Branches, the Industry Branch Consultant Service and the Field Operations Section.

Within the War Production Drive Branch is the Industrial Relations Section, which organizes, assists, and services plant Labor-Management committees, and aids in settling labor disputes when requested to do so by the union involved.

The Wage Stabilization Branch, through its administration of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Agreement, has done much to promote stable labor conditions in the industry. Its scope now includes the holding of Labor-Management-Government conferences for the formulation of industry-wide stabilization agreements.

Labor representatives for seven of the WPB's 14 regional and subregional offices will be chosen from Federation ranks. The remaining seven offices will have A. F. of L. members as associate regional representatives. It will be the job of the regional labor representatives guided by a regional labor committee, to aid the workers in the production problems.

Within the last three weeks, as a result of conferences between representatives of the American Federation of Labor and the C.I.O. with the chairman, it was agreed that two Labor men should be appointed as vice-chairmen on his staff and that a War Production Drive Board should be set up consisting of an impartial chairman, two representatives of Labor and two of employers.

(Workers' Problems) — (P. 192)
When a consumer goods industry is curtailed and a portion of its plant converted to war work, special consideration should be given to the following points by the Labor representatives developing their suggestions for the curtailment problem:

1. Workers laid off by curtailment should be certified at once to the employment service.
2. If the loss of jobs is to be permanent for the duration of the war, every effort should be made to place these workers on other jobs as quickly as possible.
3. Cost of transportation to other war production centers, if this is necessary to secure work, is not to be borne by the worker alone. It is important that he have assistance when moving himself and his family to a new home. Little has been done as yet to provide for this important matter.
4. When a worker's family must liquidate their investments in one town in order to move to another town where they can secure war employment, assistance should be given them in liquidating their investments so that unnecessary losses will not occur. In Great Britain the government assists workers in this way and pays part of the expenses of moving to a new locality.

(Union Management Cooperation)
—(P. 194) Union-management cooperation is a logical outgrowth of collective bargaining, and as such has been endorsed by the American Federation of Labor for many years. In companies where a satisfactory relationship exists between management and bona fide unions, union-management cooperation constructively carried out may have many advantages for the company and its workers.

Organized labor has welcomed the stimulus given to union-management cooperation by Donald Nelson in his request early in 1942 to employers and workers in war production, asking them to set up Labor-Management cooperative committees. Up to early August, more than 1,200 committees had been set up. In somewhat more than half the cases, as far as can be ascertained, workers are represented in these committees by bona fide trade unions.

In cases where Labor is represented through bona fide unions in the activities of the cooperative committee, important developments are in the making. The Labor Division of the War Production Board is following these developments carefully. As yet with the production drive in its early stages, it is not possible to reach definite conclusions.

It is clear, however, that through the joint committees representing Labor and Management in equal numbers and concerning themselves with various phases of production, an agement cooperation is being worked out. This growth and development in joint consideration of plant problems is gradually building up a basic democratic structure which will last after the war. Management and unions are learning to work together in a new and constructive relationship.

To union members an immense new opportunity is open to contribute their thoughts and ideas to the betterment of production and the improvement of plant conditions. Members are seizing this opportunity eagerly, so much so that in some of the larger companies, employing several thousand workers, as many as five persons are kept busy full time considering the suggestions that union members have made.

Already these suggestions are making an important contribution in the betterment of production. A number of companies report striking progress in the quantity of production, saving of waste, and better plant procedure since the union-management cooperative committees have been instituted.

Unions have welcomed this development where it is properly carried out because it builds for greater union security and a more constructive relationship between unions and management.

The importance of the trade union as the agency to make Labor-Management cooperation possible and valuable in the war production effort has become very obvious. Through the unions, workers can make a creative contribution which cannot be given where no union organization exists. For this reason some unions have explained to workers that they can give a patriotic service by organizing a union so as to take part in the war production drive and so make their fullest possible contribution to the war production effort. The function of the union in taking responsibility to improve production is to suggest changes in procedure, adjust wage rates where necessary, and handle a multiplicity of other details which cannot be replaced by any other agency. Through the union workers can give a whole-hearted creative contribution which would not be possible except through their own democratic organization which they themselves control.

A serious obstacle to progress exists where management refuses to see the value of the union-management cooperative committee. There are cases where management has refused to organize such committees. There are other cases where although the committee is organized, management refuses to give hearing to the suggestions made by workers, or to treat the committee seriously.

In many plants, on the other hand, top management officials sit on the cooperative committees and when this is the case, the committee becomes a vital and stimulating force in plant production. It is important for top management officials and top union officials to work together if the union-management cooperative committee is to give its greatest service.

The guarantee of piece rates is another important matter. Unless workers are assured by an agreement with the company that their piece rates will not be reduced when they speed production, there can be no possibility of a whole-hearted effort to increase output and improve efficiency. Unions have made this discovery and found that piece rates must be safeguarded.

Unions have also stated that a relationship of confidence and frank and open dealings between Management and Labor must exist, otherwise union-management cooperation cannot make any significant achievement. There have been cases where a company has tried to use the plan to institute a company union, but such cases appear to be rare.

In the larger war plants the over-all union-management cooperative committee, which consists of an equal number of representatives of management and workers, is supplemented by a series of subcommittees. In one plant for example, where six international unions and one federal labor union are concerned, the over-all cooperative committee consists of one representative from each union, making seven union representatives in all and seven management representatives. Subcommittees in this and other plants are responsible for such phases of plant activity as the following: conservation of materials, keeping production records, preventing bottlenecks, keeping tools and machinery in condition, safety, absenteeism, training, general plant efficiency. Committees on publicity and committees on the transportation of workers from their homes to the plant also form a part of the union-management cooperative setup.

In some of the larger plants there are departmental subcommittees, so that each department has its own committee to see that plans worked out by the functional committees above described are carried out in that department and that the workers in that department have an opportunity to make suggestions and contribute ideas which will be quickly cleared to the proper committees.

Another important function of the union-management committees is the opening of information to workers through which they will develop a better understanding of plant operations and the relation of their particular job to the whole functioning organization. In cases where shortages of material are forcing the closing down of certain departments, the bringing of information is particularly important. Thus workers may know whether it is vital to speed up a certain operation so that a few finished pieces of equipment may reach the war front earlier even though other parts of the plant must close down for lack of material.

Because union-management cooperation is bringing information to workers which was never before available to them, it is building a more intelligent approach to work and enabling workers to make a more creative contribution.

(Union-Management Committees)—(P. 691) We likewise commend the American Federation of Labor for the emphasis that it has given to the production drive of the War Production Board through the development of union-management committees. Based on information at the disposal of your committee, we are convinced that this union-management program has done more than any other single thing to increase the production of war materials.

(Labor Management Committees)—(P. 603) Res. 83:

Whereas—One of the most important guarantees of the defeat of the Axis is the continuation of the all-out production effort throughout our nation, and

Whereas—The State of California ranks first in vital shipbuilding and aircraft industries, and

Whereas—In dozens of industries where Labor-Management committees have been set up there has resulted streamlining of production, the saving of millions of man-hours and closer cooperation between the employers and Labor, and

Whereas—Wherever these committees have been set up they build the morale of the workers by making them feel that they are a vital part in the planning and production for victory, and where, in fact, these workers have contributed in plans and suggestions for greater output, and

Whereas—In spite of the obvious benefits of Labor-Management committees, some employers in vital war industries still continue to evade their responsibility in joining with Labor for maximum production effort, thereby creating dangerous and wasteful friction, and

Whereas—Many of the bottlenecks in production still remaining could be ironed out by Labor-Management cooperation, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled calls for the strengthening and further development of Labor-Management committees where they now exist for greater production and for better relationships between Labor and employers, and that this convention further urges the immediate setting up of Labor-Management committees in every one of those industries where such committees do not now exist, and be it further

Resolved — That this convention urges each and every union to exercise its fullest efforts in bringing about the establishment of these Labor-Management committees.

In approving the adoption of the resolution your committee calls attention to the action taken by the American Federation of Labor at its Portland Convention, 1923, known as Industry's Manifest Duty. In adopting the policy of 1923, the American Federation of Labor called attention to the joint responsibility of management and Labor in the field of production and the maintenance of free enterprise.

It was the definitely expressed opinion that free enterprise would be placed in serious jeopardy unless management and Labor cooperated in the field of production, in such a manner as to prevent legislation intended to seriously restrict and handicap management as well as Labor. Should management and Labor fail to cooperate, industrial, economic and social problems would develop which the legislative branches of government—state and national—would be forced to regulate.

Had management responded to the call of the American Federation of Labor following 1923, our present problems in the field of industry would not be of so far-reaching a character. However, while industry as a whole failed to see clearly and act wisely, many employers accepted the wisdom expressed in Industry's Manifest Duty and entered into thorough-going cooperative relations with their organized employees.

It is most encouraging to find that the War Production Board has accepted the basic purpose expressed in Industry's Manifest Duty and has given its active support to the creation of Labor-Management committees as proposed and applied wherever possible by the American Federation of Labor since its pronouncement in 1923.

In this connection your committee is justified in calling attention to the fact that the outstanding material contribution to the present war effort has been made by management and Labor through its cooperative relationship; in fact, the contribution of management and Labor to war production so outstripped the most optimistic estimates of federal agencies that they have actually, in some instances, outstripped the immediate capacity of the country to supply them with necessary raw material.

(1943, pp. 120, 553) The convention considered a comprehensive report by the Executive Council on developments during the year and unanimously adopted the following statement of the convention committee:

This agency is still handicapped by the absence of an over-all board of strategy which we recommended last year. The Office of War Mobilization was a practical step in this direction, but such conspicuous omissions as manpower and civilian supplies from this agency, handicaps it fundamentally. This, together with failure to concentrate all government procurement letting in a single agency, responsible for meeting all national needs, has resulted in many needlessly large stock-piles with shortages elsewhere, unwise concentration of contracts, with resultant manpower problems and shortages in housing and civilian services. But in spite of administrative and managerial failures, industries and Labor have turned out amazing quantities and qualities of the implements of war.

We note with pride and gratification that a representative of the American Federation of Labor is now a vice-chairman of the War Production Board in charge of the Division of Labor Production. Through this representation it is now possible for Labor to make a greater contribution to the war effort. This Labor vice-chairman, Joseph Keenan, has been able to put Labor representation where Labor experience and information are helpful in the development of industry orders and policies. Labor representation in the industry divisions of the War Production Board prevents needless waste of production facilities by favoring the large companies and companies with bad labor policies. As wartime decisions will affect the post-war situation, the benefits from this progress will be lasting. We recommend the Labor vice-chairman be urged to expand opportunities for Labor participation as rapidly as is compatible with constructive results, and that the principle of Labor-Management cooperation be given an opportunity to demonstrate its value in production as well as in the related field—manpower. The problems of both manpower and production must in the last analysis be solved in local production plants. National policies and regulations can only deal with general elements. Their application is a matter for local management and unions to work out. For this reason we further recommend that the Labor vice-chairman get the cooperation of the Management-Labor Council in reorganizing Management-Labor committees into responsible local arms of the War Production Board, dealing with their local production manpower problem.

The spirit of personal responsibility and local cooperation have made our nation a great economic power and can best be depended upon to defend her in this world war. We need to mobilize nationally for cooperation through our great private organizations. It is completely foreign to past experience and the genius of our people, to impose regimentation and to decide local problems in Washington.

(1944, p. 90) The general activities and functions of the War Production Board have been directed by three main influences. First, the nature of the job of the War Production Board has changed from one of concern over the whole war production program to a problem of selective concern over a few lagging and highly critical programs. Such procurement programs as textiles, heavy trucks, rubber tires, forge and foundry have been the major concern of the WPB. The largest part of war production schedules have been successfully met. With a few exceptions the causes for the lagging war production programs can be traced to the problem of low wages.

Secondly, a sizeable cutback problem has developed as the result of changing military requirements. Flexibility in military production schedules is an essential element in modern warfare. The labor offices in WPB, the Office of Labor Production and Office of Manpower Requirements, recognized and accepted the inevitability of cutbacks. What the labor offices did not reconcile themselves to was that cutbacks had to be made without adequate notification to labor or without appropriate planning for the conversion of facilities and the orderly transfer of workers.

On May 25, 1944, the War Production Board set up the Production Executive Committee Staff to review necessary changes in production schedules. It is composed of representatives from the War Department, Navy Department, and Maritime Commission as well as members from the Smaller War Plants Corporation, the War Manpower Commission, and the War Production Board. The Byrnes' Directive of June 5, 1944, instructed the Staff to (1) establish uniform policies for the cancellation of contracts; (2) give "reasonable" notice of cutbacks to labor and management and (3) clear all cutbacks prior to their being put into effect.

The Staff reviews in detail each cutback of a prime contract involving a reduction of $1 million or more in the value of shipments in the current month or in any one of the six succeeding months. In addition the PEC Staff is notified of each change in any single contract which reduces the value of items to be delivered during the current month and succeeding three months by $200,000 or more. Most frequently military necessity, convertibility, and type of ownership—i.e., whether publicly or privately owned—also serve as criteria. By far the most troublesome problem encountered in the handling of current cutbacks is the determination of the impact of a given cutback upon subcontractors.

The long range planning of the PEC Staff is largely concerned with the incidence of VE-Day cutbacks. Full employment during the period between VE-Day and VJ-Day (Victory in Japan) will be attained not only by a proper distribution of military contracts but also by a resumption of civilian production. In this regard, the PEC Staff has prepared for the use of the procurement agencies in planning cutbacks a list of plants showing those which the WPB regards important in the resumption of civilian production.

The third main influence which has affected WPB activity has been the realization that the end of the European phase of the war is in sight.

The War Production Board plans to remove practically all controls over manpower and production. WPB Committees have drawn up detailed plans setting forth the particular orders which will be revoked after VE-Day.

In addition the War Production Board has issued the following reconversion orders:

Priorities Regulation 23 permitted the manufacture of experimental models under certain restrictions. Priorities Regulation 24 permitted the placing of advance purchase orders for machine tools, manufacturing machinery and similar equipment by companies who decided to resume or expand civilian production. Priorities Regulation 25 provided a method by which manufacturers could obtain materials and produce articles which were otherwise restricted, and although restricted could be made available in limited quantities. This latter regulation has come to be known as the "spot authorization order" and in terms of its effect on the production of goods has been the most important.

In all of these orders it was specifically noted that production could not be undertaken if it interfered with the maintenance of military procurement schedules.

There have been changes in the high administrative offices of WPB.

The Office of Labor Production

The 1943 Executive Council Report indicated in some detail the structure and functioning of the Office of Labor Production in the WPB which is headed by a Vice Chairman from the ranks of Labor.

The major units in the Office of Labor Production are Plant Productivity Division, Plant and Community Facilities Service, Division of Shipbuilding Stabilization and the Division of Industrial Relations.

Plant Productivity Division

The work of this Division is divided into two overlapping periods. When the OLP was first established, the Division assumed responsibility for working out the labor production problems arising in the various Industry Divisions of the Board, either independently or through other parts of the two labor offices, as appropriate. The Plant Productivity staff was assigned to different Industry Divisions to perform these operating functions, illustrated as follows:

1. Consultation with labor unions on changes in the basic orders and regulations of the Industry Division, in order to anticipate for the Division the effects upon labor and production and in order to secure labor advice in the administration of the order.

2. Plant investigations wherever production is lagging because of labor difficulties, followed by efforts to solve the difficulty directly or to secure action on the part of other Divisions in the labor offices or other agencies involved in the problem.

3. Preparation of wage cases for presentation to the War Labor Board on behalf of companies whose production is of critical importance to the war effort.

4. Handling of problems which involve more than one Industry Division.

At the same time that the Division was doing the operating job in the Industry Divisions, it was securing the appointment of men from the labor unions to labor assistant positions. The objective was to turn over to these men the daily operating responsibilities, leaving the Plant Productivity Division with a reviewing and coordinating responsibility. The majority of Divisions have labor men on their own staffs to engage directly in both labor production and manpower work.

The labor offices in WPB have been active in promoting the organization of Labor Advisory Committees. After considerable discussion within the WPB, General Administrative Order 2-160 legalized the position of the labor advisory committees within WPB. In all, 18 labor advisory committees have been established and it is proposed to establish 20 additional committees.

The functions of the Labor Advisory Committees stem from the problems which confront the WPB. Depending on the nature of the industry one group of advisory committees seeks to advise the WPB on meeting labor problems in critical military production programs. The other group deals with the problems affecting cutbacks and reconversion which their industries face. The appointment of labor assistants has changed the emphasis of the Division's work. The Division is now more a reviewing and coordinating staff than an operating staff. The Division also performs a number of technical services for the labor assistants.

Labor Assistants to ten industry divisions recruited on the recommendations of the appropriate unions have been appointed from the ranks of A. F. of L. Unions. The ten industry divisions which have such labor assistants are as follows: Building Materials, Chemicals, Containers, General Industrial Equipment, Paper, Plumbing and Heating, Power, Printing and Publishing, Tools and Lumber.

Plant and Community Facilities Service

The Plant and Community Facilities Service concerns itself with plant and community problems affecting the ability of war workers to make their maximum contribution to the war effort.

The Service is divided into four sections: the Industrial Health and Safety Section, the Industrial Feeding Section, the Community Services Section, and the Office of Women Consultants.

The Industrial Health and Safety Section has an overall objective of reducing the manpower loss resulting from accidents and unhealthy conditions in war plants. The In-Plant Feeding Section has for its objective, the installation of restaurant facilities in plants where they are needed, and the improvement of existing facilities which are below standard. The Community Services Section deals with community problems affecting workers adversely, and particularly those which are of concern to unions, such as housing and related needs. The Office of Women Consultants Unit was established to give particular attention to the problems of the many women who have entered American war industries. This office brings together the various agencies concerned with child-care, resulting in the establishment of a number of child-care centers.

The women attached to this office have also worked on many problems of general interest to women, such as adequate locker and restroom facilities, dormitories, work clothes and others.

In all of these activities the Service works closely with the various technical services throughout the government affecting its work, such as, Department of Labor, U.S. Office of Education and the War Food Administration. In addition the Service advises the procurement agencies on particular problems in its sphere of activities.

Division of Shipbuilding Stabilization

Zone standards set by the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee are now applicable to yards employing more than 90 per cent of the nation's shipyard workers. During the year covered by this report, the zone standards were applied to 33 additional yards, making a total of 221 which these standards now cover.

The line of demarcation between the Shipbuilding Commission of the National War Labor Board and the Stabilization Committee has now been more clearly defined and it has been agreed between the chairmen of the two respective organizations that the Commission would be guided by the Interpretative Rulings of the Committee.

A number of sessions of the respective zone conferences were held. Four separate sessions of the Public Zone Conference (A. F. of L.) and one week conference each were held for the Great Lakes Zone and the Gulf Zone.

Office of Manpower Requirements

The Office of Manpower Requirements performs its functions of critical products work, aid to labor assistants, and organization of labor advisory committees jointly with the OLP. Tasks in connection with reconversion have to some extent been divided, with the OLP concentrating on problems of current cutbacks and the OMR, on the long range studies of ways to handle readjustment problems that will follow VE-Day. In addition, the OMR has had the technical job of assuring effective coordination between manpower supply-requirements conditions and WPB policies for controlling war and essential civilian production.

The OMR has throughout served as WPB liaison to the WMC. The office represents the WPB on the WMC's National Manpower Priority Committee, which gives clearances for interregional recruitment. It represents the WPB on the Essential Activities Committee, which is charged by Selective Service with the responsibility of drawing up lists of essential activities and critical occupations for the guidance of local draft boards in deciding questions of deferment; and it advises Industry Divisions of the WPB on Selective Service policy and, where possible, helps them obtain deferments for men needed in plants under their jurisdiction.

Industrial Relations Division

The Industrial Relations Division is composed of an Operations Branch and a Labor Relations Branch.

Field Staff

Labor relations representatives are stationed in every regional office and in many important district offices of the War Production Board. Their major responsibilities are (1) to serve as a central point of information and assistance to the unions in their areas (2) to advise the regional director of the WPB on war production matters which concern labor.

(Reconstruction Problems)—(1941, p. 199) We must not permit our deep concern with the issues of the war which now engulfs most of the world to blind us to the vital problems that will press for solution after the war is over. These problems are stupendous in scope and implications. Unless we are able to solve them, we may again "win the war but lose the peace."

Among the problems that will need to be considered at the close of the present war is the transfer of society from a war-time to a peace-time economy. This will involve major dislocations that will seriously affect Labor and industry. Other problems which are of definite interest to Labor include the following: the substitution of constructive work for war industries; securing employment for demobilized soldiers; provision of employment for women replaced by demobilized men; vocational training for those who have been demobilized and special programs for those who have lost their vocational skill through physical injury or otherwise, and the planning of useful employment to prevent unemployment.

One of the most vital of the postwar problems will be the prevention of wide scale unemployment. Unless steps are taken in advance to cope with the situation, the unemployment which will follow the present war is likely to exceed by far even the staggering unemployment in the wake of the First World War.

Other problems worldwide in character are: the physical reconstruction to repair the devastation of war; the problem of nutrition; and the problem of feeding undernourished peoples and caring for those orphaned by the war. Above and beyond these specific problems is the larger one of planning for a democratic world society in which social justice will prevail and in which men can live in peace.

President William Green, in his recent broadcast to the people of Norway, promised that "the American Federation of Labor will aid in bringing just peace and social justice throughout the world at the close of the war." To do this and to meet specific problems it is essential that we should plan in advance and have definite machinery ready. We must not wait until we are overwhelmed by the vast problem that will confront us at the end of the war.

In his address before the American Federation of Labor in November, 1940, John G. Winant, then Director of the International Labor Office, pointed out that "the task of the trade union movement as well as that of the International Labor Organization is concerned with working out a democratic pattern for the world of tomorrow." He asked for Labor's continued support of the ILO and that we act "as an agency for the reconstruction of a peaceful world and for the shaping of a human democracy."

Labor has a vital stake in peace. It must help in planning for a democratic postwar world in which peace must be combined with social justice. The International Labor Organization, through its tripartite setup in which government, management and Labor are represented, suggests a democratic way of dealing with the reconstruction problems at both the domestic and international levels which will affect our entire social order.

In connection with the preparation of a program for postwar reconstruction, it is the recommendation of the Executive Council that the United States should establish a tripartite commission representing government, management and Labor. This commission should have the assistance of whatever technical staff and advisory committees are necessary and it should draw upon the experience and information of such agencies as are studying postwar labor and social problems and transition from a war economy to a peacetime economy.

We, therefore, urge that a tripartite commission, representing government, management and Labor be created and authorized to study and report upon postwar labor and social problems and to recommend methods of dealing with these problems. Such a commission should be empowered to draw upon the government and private agencies for assistance in its work.

(P. 680) The convention adopted unanimously a recommendation that the American Federation of Labor appoint a committee to study the problem of postwar reconstruction, and that the officers of the American Federation of Labor be directed to request the Congress of the United States to appoint a national committee on postwar reconstruction, in the membership of which there will be represented experienced men from the field of Labor, agriculture, commerce, industry, and the professional groups, chosen or recommended by their respective groups.

(Adjusting Our National Economy) —(1942, p. 586) Res. 80 presented some of the basic needs in postwar planning and was referred to the A. F. of L. Postwar Problems Committee:

Whereas—Still ringing in Labor's ears is the cry that came after the last World War: "Deflate Labor!" the demand for deflation of Labor came from employers' circles and from sections of the public throughout the country, because at that time wages had risen to the highest level that America had ever seen, and, as in the present period, most of America's industries had been transformed from peacetime occupations and production to war needs, and

Whereas—It was of importance for industry in this country to revert to their normal activities for the following reasons:

1. Most of them had to be retooled.
2. The market for their products had been destroyed, and it required rebuilding.

3. No provision was made by anyone to take care of the millions of workers who were thus unemployed, and, by the very reason of their unemployment, great amounts of money were taken away from the national income which were necessary to help industry restore its markets, and

Whereas—In the last World War, just as is the case now, hundreds of shipyards were built and hundreds of thousands of men were drawn into this industry and kindred war industries, and upon the conclusion of the war the whole shipbuilding program was stopped and the vast army of war workers was turned loose on a labor market without demand. The United States found itself with thousands of trucks and automobiles for which it had no use, and it was faced with the nearly unbelievable necessity of choosing whether to sell them for public use or to destroy them, and

Whereas—War and the preparations for war not only disjoint the normal industrial and economic life of the nation but saddle on the people a tremendous tax burden, which the people and the government are naturally anxious to lift. Although this activity and diversion of our resources to the defense of the nation is justified, it still is equally the duty of the government to protect industry and Labor after the war is over, and

Whereas—The inauguration of relief programs, either as a direct dole or in accordance with the philosophy that was developed under the WPA, will not serve to relieve the depressing conditions that are sure to come; because, first, it must be borne in mind that, in addition to all of the hundreds of thousands of people who must necessarily be employed when war industries cease, there will be a return to private life of at least eight million men from the armed forces. It is quite obvious, therefore, that it will not be remotely as easy as promised to carry out the promise that these men will be returned to their former places in industry when they come out of the army. Many of their jobs will no longer exist, and for other jobs there will be available a new vast army of civilian workers, and

Whereas—It seems extremely advisable to take advantage of our experience of the postwar days of the last World War and the efforts of the American Government in attempting to meet and overcome the depression that started in 1930 and continued until 1939, and

Whereas—We believe that the Congress of the United States should now enact necessary legislation which will continue in effect the full tax burden that is operative at the close of the war for a period of at least two years. This, in our judgment, should be done in order to provide the national revenue to enable the Federal Government to subsidize the industries of America so that they may continue to operate on the full-time financial basis, even though markets and fiscal circumstances may only warrant part-time productive operation. Such an arrangement would make it possible for industry to go through what may prove to be a long period of retooling and readjustment of business by advertising and other selling operations, to recreate markets and public demand for consumers' goods of all kinds, and

Whereas—Congress should include in such legislation specific provisions requiring all industries, before the subsidy would be made available to them, to offer substantial proof that they are in a position and willing to guarantee a continuation of the high standard of living to its employees, and that they also stand ready and willing to recognize and to engage in the practice of collective bargaining with their employees through bona fide labor organizations of the employees' own choosing, restoring thereby the short work week and short work day which existed prior to the war effort, and

Whereas—We firmly believe that adequate compensation should be planned in advance for the men who return from the war, and that such a plan should be devised so as to balance these payments with employment opportunities, keeping the purpose in mind of providing these men with an opportunity to live properly without the deplorable alternative of begging from either the public or the government, and

Whereas—Careful planning should be made to redistribute employment to men now working in the war industry, inducted into it as a result of the war emergency, so that in peace time they will not be forced to return to trades and occupations offering lower pay, since this will not be equitable but will create considerable dissension and havoc in their lives, and

Whereas—A continuation by the Federal Government of its so-called "long range" plan of public improvements, as a means of creating employment as well as bringing about social improvements internally, will be very helpful in many respects in satisfying some of these needs, and this policy should be conducted on the same basis as if they were private enterprises. In these enterprises Labor should have the complete right to organize and to bargain collectively, and the government should not compel the workers to work directly for it, but through intermediary private employers if necessary since the workers could thereby handle their grievances without being stultified through the long and frustrating policy of going to Congress and other legislative bodies for satisfaction, and

Whereas—We are firmly convinced that the soundest governmental policy must be based on the capitalistic system of private enterprise, and that the government should engage in industry only to a very limited degree and only in those fields where the manufacture of commodities is required by the government itself, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor initiate legislation on a national scale to implement the objectives sought in this resolution and to implement further these aims by its directives to the various organizations and the exerting of its influence upon the appropriate government legislative bodies, and be it further

Resolved—That the thoughts and proposals contained in this resolution act as a guiding force in the activities of the American Federation of Labor, both in the state and in the nation.

(Dependence on Government Agencies)—(P. 693) The committee refers again to the opening part of that section of the Executive Council's Report which has been referred to it, in which reference is made to the use of various governmental agencies in the negotiating of contracts and the settlement of disputes.

During the progress and for the duration of the war, your committee is fully aware of the necessity to constantly use these federal agencies but we believe that the Executive Council and the Federation itself should constantly teach the members of the Federation not to depend entirely upon the availability of governmental agencies in order to accomplish the objectives and maintenance of our movement. We have in mind, the days that are to come when the war is over, and we believe that the Federation should carry on a constant campaign to teach the membership of our movement to be dependent upon themselves in the strengthening of their organization, to maintain not only the conditions which have been thus far achieved, but to maintain our organization itself by its own strength.

(Return of Workers' Rights)—(P. 594) The convention unanimously adopted Res. 103 calling for the post-war restoration of all rights and privileges surrendered by the workers during the war.

Whereas—Organized labor has already surrendered many of their hard-earned gains in a spirit of national duty to the war effort, and

Whereas—Directives already issued by Presidential authority and legislation now pending in the halls of Congress make it appear most certain that further and even more drastic sacrifices must be made to the workers, and

Whereas—In the administration of the war program there are agencies, boards and individuals who constantly seek to extend their sphere of influence and their powers far beyond the authority vested in them, and

Whereas—It is no longer a mere question of the abrogation of existing agreements with employers, but the very fundamental rights guaranteed by law to a labor organization to bargain collectively and represent its members that are rapidly being swept aside, and

Whereas—It now appears imminent that we are faced with a general "freezing" of Labor and the workers on their job, or in the industry where they work, which means the end of free labor for the duration of the war, and

Whereas—The constant and continued trend to reduce or destroy the long-established functions of the labor movement must have the inevitable effect of destroying the faith of newly organized workers in their union, and

Whereas—We firmly believe that a solid trades union movement is the only institution which is capable and indispensable in either war or peacetime to perpetuate a truly democratic way of life, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor hereby goes on record as declaring our willingness to assume our right and just obligations in the war effort, and be it further

Resolved—That with equal determination we hereby demand and call upon the constituted authorities and agencies of the Federal Government to commit themselves without reservation to a guarantee of the restoration of every right and privilege of organized labor with the passing of the present national emergency.

(1943) A number of resolutions were submitted to the convention requesting A. F. of L. support for separation pay for ex-servicemen and workers; representation of Labor in solving post war problems; Labor participation in post war planning and representation at the peace conference; a post war public works program; shorter work day, etc. These were all referred to the Executive Council to be taken up in connection with the convention action on the general subject of post war problems.

(Domestic)—(P. 162) Upon each trade group will fall responsibility for leadership in facilitating reconversion to a normal economy. Practically every worker, industrial or agricultural, and every member of the armed forces is wondering—"Will there be a job for me after the war?" Upon production, management, and union executives rests major responsibility for getting our economy started on a scale that will afford jobs for all. Upon them and upon the government devolves responsibility for facilitating the conversion of private industry and for prevention of uncontrolled inflation.

The change-over of workers from war industries to civilian production, of personnel from the armed forces to civilian occupations, of women workers from war and civilian occupations back to their homes and households, of workers in civilian industries back to jobs which they prefer, of older workers back to retirement insurance—a change-over of approximately 30,000,000 persons.

Obviously two lines of preparation are necessary to meet this situation: jobs must be available and there must be provided a national employment service competent to advise workers where suitable jobs can be had and to facilitate contact of workers with the jobs. Workers and employers must give their best abilities to plans for the development of their industries after the war. Production plans must be approved, machinery and facilities made ready, sales departments organized to assure markets. Industry and unions must look to the government for policies and agencies to deal with contract cancellation, control of stockpile prices, disposition of war production facilities, preparation and authorization of a public works program, rate of demobilization, educational and training opportunities, an adequate national employment service together with ample social security provisions. This is an extensive program, but it must be extensive to meet the human needs and to help in the reconversion of our national economy.

Labor knows that this program can be carried through and offers its cooperation to that end. Labor will not tolerate mass unemployment, a revival of a public works program at relief rates, or other devices which rob workers of their economic and political freedom. Our refusal is made in the interests of preservation of democratic institutions. Representatives of Labor and of management should join with the government in formulating the basic policies and developing the plans for this difficult period which military developments have hastened or delayed, but which will inevitably confront us. If plans are ready, hardships will be minimized. If plans are not ready, we may easily be involved in difficulties that will make it impossible for us to meet our obligations at home or abroad.

(Union Problems)—A major post-war responsibility of wage earners is to revitalize the labor movement so that it can resume its normal functions. Because collective bargaining was frozen by those responsible for inflation control, increases in wage earners' incomes failed to keep pace with incomes of farmers, corporations, war contractors or total business. No controls have been fixed for the incomes of other groups similar to those imposed for wage earners.

The first labor standard that will shift to a peacetime basis will be the work week. With the end of war production the 40-hour work week will be restored. Upon the union will rest responsibility for negotiating terms of shift or shorter hours without reduction in weekly income. Only by increasing basic wage rates can we escape serious depression forces that facilitate unemployment. In all probability price control will be continued during the transition period, for the cost of living will remain high. Wage earners have relied upon overtime to absorb the deficit between wage rates and increased costs of living. In durable goods industries, where the average earnings are $49.38 per week, the 40-hour week will reduce average earnings to $38.64; in non-durable goods the reduction in earnings will be from $34 to $30.32. Either basic wage rates must be increased or standards of living must go down to depression levels, which will involve a drop in national income. Such a drop would delay revival of civilian industries and efforts to pay war debts.

(International)—Armistice that will end military combat will bring us opportunity and obligation to effectuate our foreign policy. While foreign policy is formulated by the Executive Branch of our government subject to approval by Congress, the will of the people controls decisions in a democratic country. Our responsibility at present is for defense of democratic institutions in the Americas and the islands to which we have made commitments. Any new commitment must be squared with our ability to make good.

Wage earners, like all other groups of citizens, hope that we can use the opportunity at the end of this war to establish agencies and understandings, so that we can regularly consider policies and situations and make decisions that will at least minimize the necessity for wars. We hope that procedures of consultation and cooperation developed by the United Nations can be made permanent and broadened in practice to cover needs of interdependent responsibilities of democratic peoples. We hope that through such an alliance opportunities for democratic freedom and responsibility may be made more secure for all peoples. Experience of the years since World War I have demonstrated that the main key to the maintenance of democratic freedom is the right of wage earners to membership in unions of their own choosing. This right, together with freedom of speech and assemblage, and guarantees of civil freedom, constitute a bill of rights which the united democratic nations ought to assure their allies. Experience further shows that the cooperation of democratic nations promotes democratic ideals and practices internationally, for the plans and purposes of autocrats and dictators mature only with the elimination of democracy. Until such time as democratic institutions are secure in the world, democratic countries cannot enter into treaties of disarmament with non-democratic countries.

Labor realizes that many decisions are being made now that will condition terms of peace, and urges that representatives of civilian groups vitally concerned by these decisions be included in the delegations representing our country in international conferences. We realize that progress toward world peace will be promoted by the development of international machinery to adjust problems that cause wars and by the molding of a world will for peace. We cannot reach this goal by evolving blue prints and resolutions, but we can achieve them by making democratic principles our daily guide in dealing with all issues—both national and international—in scope of effectiveness. Peace and freedom must be achieved each day and each year by free citizens making their individual and collective decisions.

Indispensable to this end is cooperation not only by the United Nations but by the democratic groups within the United Nations. Indispensable to democratic institutions within nations and to deal with matters concerning all nations are the functions of free labor organizations. To safeguard democratic institutions in international conferences, in the peace treaty, and in post-war international agencies, there should be conferences and agreement between the free labor movements of democratic countries.

(Our Good Neighbor Policy)—Our first international obligation is to those countries which with the United States constitute the New World. We have in common many of the same traditions and experiences that are rooted in the will to emigrate to unknown lands—there to build up a life suited to the land and to their own desires. Internationally it was free from the intrigues of power politics and the suspicions involved in balance of power between hereditary monarchies. Opportunity inherent in tenantless and unused lands offered new alternatives. Free governments now exist but there are economic inequalities and conflicts between cultures that make for individual unfreedom. Differences between the resources of the descendants of European immigrants and the descendants of Indian nations have brought about conditions of agricultural and industrial peonage. Latin-American wealth is mainly in lands and in agricultural products. Capital investments for the exploitation of national resources, industries and utilities have been mainly European-owned and controlled. Such United States capital as was there represented corporate enterprise, responsible for dividends rather than for the building up of good international relations.

Since World War I the United States has made a definite effort to bridge the chasms of language, cultural differences and trade forces in order to establish a real community of interests and concern for the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine, which assures our continents against interference from without. Now, as a part of our world war policy, the State Department, the Office of Economic Warfare, the Coordinator of Latin-American Affairs and the Pan American Union are acting to promote goodwill and the exchange of experience in various fields. All Latin-American countries with one exception are supporting the United Nations. To make these relationships economically independent, our government has organized the Inter-American Development Commission for the purpose of long-range economic planning. This commission operates through 21 national committees whose purposes are fixed by the parent body. To serve the commission the Office of Foreign Investment Information was organized in connection with the Export-Import Bank. The commission aims to encourage joint investments of the United States and Latin-American countries for the expansion of Industries in Latin-America and to maintain close business contacts; it will develop a program for training Latin-American young men in the methods of American business; it will serve as a channel for business and governmental collaboration for inter-American post-war planning.

Under the auspices of this network, regional developmental corporations have been set up for the purpose which the name indicates and will serve as long-range post-war economic and social planning agencies.

Supplementing this organization but acting unofficially are coordinating committees set up in most of the Latin-American countries, whose membership is exclusively representatives from business interests.

The workers of Latin-American countries and the United States are vitally concerned in what is involved in this planning. Unless economic expansion results in adequate wages so that production brings higher standards of living; in vocational and apprenticeship training for men and women that will enable them to be skillful resourceful workers able to manage their own lives; and in utilization of the products of industries for higher and broader levels of living for all, it will not bring lasting progress.

The Office of Economic Warfare is including in Latin-American contracts protective labor provisions. The same principle should be incorporated in plans for economic development of all these countries so that there shall not be trade competition based on low standards of life for the workers of any country.

We recommend that the American Federation of Labor take up these proposals with the various government agencies concerned in this field, and establish a formal understanding with the Director of the Pan American Union for the development of permanent facilities for the exchange of information on labor welfare and standards of living in all countries. Formal requests should be made for Labor representation in all these agencies in order that Labor interests may be represented in the decisions on policies.

(Labor Attachés)—We should continue to urge the State Department to include representatives of Labor in its embassies in the major industrial countries.

(Post-War Housing)—Demobilization of the armed forces and termination of employment on war contracts at the conclusion of hostilities will submerge the nation under a tide of widespread unemployment unless specific provision is made in advance for a program of reconstruction and redevelopment of our cities, towns, and rural communities. The war has virtually halted all construction of durable housing. The peacetime housing needs of our growing and shifting population and of our expanded productive economy will be aggravated by the combined deficit resulting from the building inactivity of the last depression and of the war years. If we are to be prepared to launch a well-timed and strategic attack by all elements of our economy and our community against unemployment in peacetime, and if we are to seize this opportunity to build a broad foundation for economic reconstruction and better living, concerted action must be taken without delay to blueprint the strategy and to define the common objectives as well as respective responsibilities of Labor, private enterprise, and of the government.

Responsibility for housing rests with the local community. There must be assurance that every community is equipped to discharge that responsibility. Workers are ultimate producers of our nation's wealth, and they are entitled to participation both as workers and as citizens in the shaping of the plans for the betterment of the community in which they live. Community redevelopment must not be permitted to become an instrument of self-enrichment at the expense of wage earners by real estate speculators, money lenders and promoters. Provision should be made in every city, town and rural county for a duly constituted land and housing authority representative of the people whom it serves. Labor's foremost responsibility is to assure the establishment in every municipality of local land and housing authorities (1) empowered to direct the over-all course of community reconstruction and redevelopment, including land acquisition; (2) equipped to facilitate maximum provisions for needed residential building by private enterprise within standards of sound housing construction and consistent with the long-range plans for community growth, and (3) constituted to carry out a long-range program of slum clearance and low-rent housing for low-income families.

Stable and suitable housing for wage earners is directly related to their employment, for the wage earners' income depends on their jobs. Post-war housing development cannot be unrelated to the reconversion and relocation of industry and with it to the shift of employment opportunities in the transition from war to peace. War has forced mass migration of workers throughout the entire nation, therefore, community redevelopment must of necessity be related to the realignment of employment opportunities in each community, each region and in the entire nation. Neither cities, towns nor rural areas can achieve stable growth or meet the demand for better living without a long-range plan. Such planning cannot be isolated in a single community but must be related to the economic growth, regionally and nationally. This need for regional and national planning should be met through a democratic procedure. Representation of Labor, farmers and of the communities concerned is essential in the regional and national planning bodies which must give assistance and guidance to local communities in the task of reconstruction. Architects, technicians and other professional personnel needed in this work must be the servants of democratically constituted public agencies rather than their directors.

Private initiative should play a leading part in post-war housing reconstruction. Basic standards and procedures should be firmly established to prevent sub-standard building, eliminate speculative profiteering at the expense of the tenant and the home buyer, and to provide for a drastic reduction in the interest charges on all home mortgage financing.

In neighborhoods in which a large degree of economic stability can be achieved, cooperative mutual home ownership should be furthered as a means of making home ownership available to families of moderate income. Many war housing projects of the permanent type can and should be sold to the present occupants on a mutual basis where future stability of employment is assured.

The low-rent housing and slum clearance program interrupted by the war should be resumed and expanded. All federal aid extended to local communities for acquisition of slums and blighted areas should be on the condition that new decent dwellings suitably located be provided, equal in number and in rental to the dwellings eliminated. Temporary war housing must not be permitted to disintegrate into new slums after the war and should be removed as rapidly as possible. Wherever possible and suitable, the sites, utilities and materials of such temporary projects should be utilized in the construction of permanent low-rent housing.

Of fundamental importance to a national program of post-war housing is the elimination of rural as well as urban slums. Cheaper financing should be available to farmers and farm workers who can afford to build their own homes. Construction of decent farm dwellings under the supervision of the Farm Security Administration, for gradual purchase by farmers, should be made an integral part of a farm settlement program which will play an important part in affording demobilized soldiers and war workers an opportunity to return to farming under favorable conditions. The migrant camp program of the Farm Security Administration should be continued as a part of a positive plan to achieve stable settlement of families.

Organized labor's responsibility for the development of a sound program, democratically conceived, cannot be fully discharged without active work of local labor housing committees in every community. To this end we recommend that a continuing program be developed by the Housing Committee of the American Federation of Labor to assist in the establishment of active local labor housing committees by our central labor unions and to encourage the establishment of housing committees by the affiliated national and international unions.

(P. 520) As the Executive Council Report states, the individual aspect of post-war planning is represented by the question: "Will there be a job for me?" The planning aspect involves getting rid of those basic devices that shifted us into a war economy and reconverting into peacetime production. Two main war economy controls are war contracts and war production plants with government control of strategic materials and finished products. In liquidating the war economy, there must be civilian control with a return to private initiative. The government has two major responsibilities in the conversion proceedings: (1) a uniform policy for contract cancellation and (2) administration and disposal of war property and production facilities owned by the government so that conversion will be promoted without contributing to inflation.

As there is no over-all department of supplies, contracts have been made by the various procurement agencies of the agencies needing supplies, and hence divergent policies might be expected if termination of contracts is left to these agencies. We recommend, therefore that the American Federation of Labor urge upon Congress the creation of a civilian agency charged with full responsibility for contract cancellation and consisting of an administrator and a policy board on which industry, Labor and agriculture are represented. There will be hundreds of thousands of contracts to be cancelled. Terms of cancellation should be negotiated so as to enable the companies to utilize their capital for conversion with a minimum of delay. Audits and court procedure or conventional economies on contracts would result in expensive delays for industries and workers. This contract cancellation agency should make quarterly reports to Congress.

The disposal of surplus plant facilities and stock piles of raw and finished war materials and lands acquired for military purposes, is another civilian responsibility to be exercised with knowledge of industrial needs and interests as well as the rehabilitation needs of other countries. These facilities and materials must be returned to a peacetime economy in an orderly and constructive way. We recommend that Congress be asked to authorize a custodian to dispose of these lands, properties and materials, aided by a policy board on which Labor, industry and agriculture are represented. This agency should have full authority to dispose of such surplus properties with the duty of reporting quarterly to Congress.

These two agencies are essential steps in providing maximum employment quickly for those dependent on industries for an opportunity to earn a living and to provide employment for the soldiers who will be mustered out of war duties.

(Union Problems)—We wish to emphasize the importance that the Executive Council places upon the need for a strong responsible union movement in post-war days. Workers will need such an agency to regain positions lost through wage freezing. We recommend that all unions be on the alert to increase basic wage rates as rapidly as possible. Bonus systems disguised as wage incentive plans divert attention from the main objective.

We agreed to wage stabilization as a war measure and the effectuation of wage stabilization agreements we believe is the key to stabilization of the work force. The wage policy now enforced is wage freezing, not stabilization, for stabilization implies adjustments regularly as needed to preserve balance. If this policy cannot be altered sooner, it will be wiped out with the restoration of normal work hours. The shift to 40-hour weeks must be without reduction in weekly earnings.

(International)—We hope that Congress will declare our basic foreign policy without unnecessary delay. Such a declaration is necessary to enable our foreign representatives and the executive branch to develop plans and negotiate agreements. We believe that world organization to keep the peace must begin with understandings reached between the governments of democratic nations and extended as rapidly as possible to other nations which manifest their desire in good faith to cooperate for the objectives served by democratic institutions. The right to representation of Labor and other functional citizen groups must be provided in all world agencies. This right is a condition essential to protection against bureaucracy.

We are especially concerned that agents of the United Nations entrusted with rehabilitation of conquered countries and restoration of local government and agencies of justice shall understand their responsibility to be the mobilization of local forces to restore their own practices and institutions. One of the first groups to be brought into conferences for this purpose should be the workers. If their organizations are destroyed, they should have opportunity to revive some form of collective actions for their services will be needed to revive economic services as well as local government. The representatives of the United Nations should not attempt to govern the territory, but should get together representative groups to develop their own government. We have no patience with proposals for outsiders to reeducate Germany or Italy or any other country. Every country has a right to its own educational system and its own culture. Our only responsibility is to provide opportunities for representative groups to restore their own national life and to act in cooperation with like groups of other nations.

(Good Neighbor Policy)—There are very special ties that unite us to the wage earners of Latin-American countries as well as the other countries of the New World, and we should plan to have an effective part in extending and enriching the objectives of our Good Neighbor Policy.

There are plans under way for the industrial development of Latin-American countries as Inter-American Labor cooperation is needed to imbed firmly in such plans, provisions for Labor to participate in industrial development by higher wage rates, better working conditions and higher standards of living.

We note with gratification the administrative reorganization which all agencies with international obligations under the State Department which facilitates the development of Inter-American Labor plans through two permanent agencies—the State Department and the Pan American Union. This reorganization strengthens our proposal for Labor attaches with embassies in industrial countries.

Our State Department as well as international agencies will be increasingly in need of dependable information on the labor organizations of the various countries in the post-war period. We want statutory authorization of such Labor attaches with provisions for their nomination by the Department of Labor on the basis of practical labor experience and certification to the Department of State. All "labor experts" in governmental departments should be selected by similar methods.

(Post-War Housing)—The Executive Council recommends the resumption of housing programs throughout urban and rural communities and we urge endorsement of this recommendation as a basic provision in all community programs. Construction of houses serves two purposes: (1) provision of jobs for construction workers and workers in supporting industries, and (2) better living conditions for the citizens of the communities.

We recommend that this section of the report be brought to the attention of all central and state bodies with the suggestion that housing be included in all community programs. Private construction should have the leading role in all plans.

Eight resolutions dealing with post-war problems were referred to the E.C. "to be taken up in connection with the convention action" given above, which was unanimously adopted.

(Reconversion)—(1944, p. 7) In keynote speech to the convention the President of the A. F. of L. said:

"We shall continue to serve in the army of production, supplying our brave men who are serving in the armed forces of the nation with the materials they need in order to make the war complete and successful, reaching new heights and setting new standards in production.

"During this convention men occupying highly important positions in our own government, in the army and in the armed forces, will stand on this platform and testify to the grand, wonderful service given by the members of the American Federation of Labor while serving in the army of production.

"In addition to that we will submit to you messages from men who know, whose statements cannot be contradicted, in which they will testify to the valuable service rendered by the members of the American Federation of Labor.

"In addition to winning the war we are moved by a common desire to conclude a just and lasting peace.

We want to establish security and freedom and justice throughout the world. We are united in our determination that a peace shall be concluded that will in itself guarantee security against future wars for the people of our nation.

"We shudder when we think of the experiences through which we have passed and are passing. We cannot think that it was ever intended by Divine Providence that our civilization would develop to a point where we were to be confronted with a cruel war every two or three decades. The worker living in his home, the average American citizen, fired by a single desire for peace, is now demanding that the United Nations shall work out a peace on an international basis that will enable them to feel secure in their homes against the invasion of the enemy.

"Now we are thinking, too, about some of our post-war problems, and those problems will occupy the attention of the sovereign delegates who are in attendance at this convention. We are thinking about the immediate post-war problems of reconversion. We recognize that we must pass from a wartime to a peacetime economy, and we know it is more difficult for the masses of the people to make the transfer from a wartime economy to a peacetime economy than it was to move from peacetime to a wartime economy. We know well that when we are met with the post-war situation there is going to be a degree of unemployment, because it will be impossible to reconvert over night war material production plants created for the exclusive purpose of producing war materials. Civilian plants that were converted from civilian production plants to war production plants must bring about a transfer that will take some time. Then in addition to that, shortly after the war is over we hope our men serving in the armed forces of the nation will come back home. They must find work when they come home. We do not want them to come back to America, their homeland, and there be compelled to undergo the pangs of unemployment again as they did following the last World War.

"So we are urging and will urge at this convention that immediate steps be taken, preliminary steps at least be taken, for the purpose of bringing about a speedy reconversion. That will involve the disposition of surplus goods; it will also involve the cancellation of contracts. Surely we understand the situation well enough to know that we can't postpone consideration of these problems until the last gun is fired and until the last enemy has surrendered. We should begin now. Good judgment tells us we can begin now and should begin now to bring about a form of reconversion.

"After the war we demand, we insist, that work opportunities shall be created and provided for all. During the recent campaign we heard much about that. We are practical people. We know the difficulties that will be encountered. We are fully conscious of all that, but we still believe that if we will diligently and assiduously concentrate our efforts, within a reasonable length of time after the war is over, we can provide work opportunities here in our beloved land for all who are willing and able to work.

"I am of the opinion that after reconversion has been brought about and we have crossed the bridge again back to normal days and normal times we will face a period, at least, of unusual industrial activities because we know that there will be turned loose a demand for civilian goods that will probably exceed, for the moment, our ability to supply and produce. How long that will last no one can tell. It must and surely will last for a considerable length of time. We hope that we can develop an economy here in America that will protect us against the trying experiences through which we passed in the years of 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932. We know we can, we know it can be done. It is not an impossible task; it is a task that will call upon the best that is within us in order to accomplish it, but I am sure that we can realize our objectives.

"Now in planning all this we plan to assist and protect our men serving in the armed forces of the nation. There are more than one and one-half million members of the American Federation of Labor serving in the armed forces of our country. If we add the seven million members represented here, it makes over eight and one-half million members of the American Federation of Labor. Members of our international unions, of which these men in the armed forces are also members, are carrying them as members of their organization in good standing while they offer their lives on foreign soil. In addition, many of our national and international unions, practically all of them, have decided that when the service men return home those who may be members of our unions will be admitted without the payment of initiation fees.

"In addition to that, we are standing solidly in support of legislation that will guarantee protection to these service men when they return home."

(Legislative Program) — (P. 179)
In anticipation of the problems which would be faced when the impact of the reconversion period was experienced, the A. F. of L. presented to the Senate of the U.S. a letter outlining proposals which the Federation believed would greatly assist in avoiding untold hardships to millions of Americans working in war industries and fighting to bring the war to a speedy victory. The Federation letter which was joined in by the Railway Exec. Assn. follows:

"The organizations we represent are unalterably opposed to the passage of any piecemeal legislation to handle the problems of reconversion, with priority given to property legislation. Every consideration of equity and sound economics demands a single integrated piece of legislation which will take care of the human problems of demobilization at the same time that it provides for the security of business enterprise.

"Emergency unemployment compensation, for demobilized workers and servicemen in the reconversion period is an indispensable part of any overall legislation and should not be sidetracked to another committee for separate consideration. There is great danger that contract termination legislation will be passed and the Congress adjourn before any comprehensive legislation is considered to deal adequately with the more pressing human and organizational problems of reconversion. You will agree that every contract terminated means the discharge of workers. Certainly, provision for these workers whose resources must be conserved and fully utilized, is at least as important as settling the financial claims of war contractors.

"We wish to stress again, as we have pointed out in our public testimony that the preponderance of war contractors are in a sufficiently strong position to weather the period of reconversion to peacetime production. The reserves of American industry have never been as high as they are today. American workers, on the contrary, enjoy no such favorable position. When contracts are terminated, the soldiers of production face bleak prospects.

"These are essential truths. They become more forcible every day as war production employment tapers off. The confidence and the full-spirited effort of American workers in military service and in war industries will suffer a severe blow in the midst of war if they feel that their legislators put money settlements of war contracts above and beyond the claims of human beings.

"We are united in urging the following programs:

"1. There must be no piecemeal legislation such as contract termination legislation alone. An integrated program of reconversion offers the only means of preventing the chaos that may overwhelm us on the production front in a short time.

"2. We stand fully behind the principles of the Kilgore Bill, Senate Bill 1823, which provides an integrated attack on the problems of reconversion. We urge that the Murray-George Bill, S. 1718, be amended to include the Kilgore Bill, S. 1823, thus providing a well-rounded program.

"3. Such a program must include, in line with War Mobilization Director Byrnes' proposal, special unemployment compensation benefits in the transition period to take care of unemployed workers as well as discharged servicemen.

"4. An orderly program for reconversion to civilian production is necessary to achieve maximum production and employment during the reconversion period. Establish an Office of War Mobilization and Adjustment to coordinate all federal activities during the reconversion period.

"5. We favor creation of a National Production-Employment Board, consisting of representatives of Industry, Labor, Agriculture and the general public, to form an integral part of the Office of War Mobilization and Adjustment.

"6. Establish a Bureau of Programs to review and develop government programs dealing with reconversion and production, and to encourage the development of private and local programs for increased production and unemployment.

"7. Provide adequate protection for, and incentives to, small business in reconverting to peace.

"We believe these to be the minimum essentials of a full program which Labor can support. Any piecemeal attack on these problems, any effort to put one part of the program ahead of another, will fall far short of what is needed. It will be a severe blow to our economy. It will bring untold hardships to millions of Americans working in war industries and fighting to bring the war to a speedy victory."

(P. 575) Resolution No. 28:

Whereas—The scourge of unemployment that plagued this nation for a decade between 1930 and 1940 was alleviated only by the advent of World War II, which afforded temporary employment to millions of workers, and

Whereas—The cessation of hostilities will cause the closing down of hundreds of war plants and will throw millions of workers out of employment, and

Whereas—Congress in its recent sessions, has been seriously considering post-war industrial reconversion, and

Whereas—The A. F. of L. representing the millions of organized workers within its ranks, is vitally concerned with such postwar industrial reconversion, and

Whereas—A comprehensive industrial reconversion program no doubt will be adopted by Congress before the end of World War II, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor demand Congress, as a part of its post-war industrial reconversion program, enact provisions that will afford the maximum of employment to workers who would otherwise be displaced, even to the extent, if necessary, of government operation of war plants on a non-profit basis

Under the caption "Post-War Legislation" and the sub-heads "Contract Termination" "Disposition of Surplus Property" and "Reconversion," the Executive Council's Report deals with its activities in appearing before committees of the Congress in connection with all legislative measures introduced dealing with post-war legislation.

In closing the report makes special reference to the Murray-Kilgore Bill and the Dingell Bill, both of which were sponsored by the American Federation of Labor, coupled with the information that during the Congressional recess representatives of the American Federation of Labor were cooperating with liberal members of the Congress in drafting remedial legislation which will be introduced in November of this year.

In connection with this report your committee recommends that Resolution No. 28 be referred to the Executive Council.

We further recommend that in connection with the bills mentioned that the Executive Council be requested to carefully study them so that such amendment as may be advisable, including Labor representation on the administrative agencies set up, may be included.

(Construction)—(P. 564) Several resolutions were considered by the convention providing that post-war construction be carried out under a contract system. The recommendations of the convention committee were unanimously approved as follows:

"... a pressing need exists to secure affirmative assurance that all construction sponsored, aided, supervised or directly undertaken by the federal, state or local governments be carried out by private contractors under a contract system."

(Highways)—Pp. 182, 588) Under this caption of the Executive Council's Report there is presented the necessity for a greater extension of the highways with the coming of peace. It gives the names of the bills which have been introduced in Congress to accomplish this objective.

Your committee recommends approval of this portion of the Council's Report, and calls attention of all state federations of labor to the necessity of securing financial contributions through state legislation which is necessary to the further development of the state and national highways.

(P. 564) Resolution No. 109:

Whereas—During the years of the war the established program of highway construction has been interrupted, and

Whereas—Because of that interruption, together with the rapidly developing changes in the commercial and industrial needs of the country, there is today an enormous pent-up demand for highway construction, and

Whereas—State and national legislation looking toward the development and execution of a plan to meet those changes, is currently under discussion, therefore, be it

Resolved—That this Sixty-fourth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor go on record as supporting such legislation, and be it further

Resolved—That this convention be recorded as urging that any program of highway construction that may be adopted be undertaken through the contract system.

To speed post-war growth of industry and trade, rapid development of large scale highway construction is of strategic importance and will help greatly in the nation's effort to achieve full employment. In recommending the adoption of this resolution, we urge that every effort be made by the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions to secure the necessary authorizations and appropriations for a large scale highway construction program.

(Social Security) — (P. 151) The E.C. directed attention to the 1942 legislative program on social security which Congress had thus far failed to enact. The following statement was approved by the convention:

In 1942 we urged legislation to provide an adequate social insurance program with equal standards for all the nation's workers as the first step in post-war planning. It is everywhere accepted that an adequate system of social insurance is essential to maintain full employment and that an adequate social insurance system cannot be maintained without full employment. Congress has as yet failed to consider the legislation introduced in both Houses of Congress on our request.

An insurance system to be adequate must provide incomes for those emergencies which most commonly interfere with income earning; sickness, loss of job, long-time physical disability and disability due to old age. By including all wage earners and small salaried persons under the system and pooling risks, pre-payment amounts may be reduced to the lowest terms.

The goal is clear and simple. The legislative and administrative problems in reaching that goal are not so simple. They are further complicated by the fact that parts of the program are already in existence and have developed certain vested interests and reluctance to change. What American workers want is equal insurance opportunities for all—a policy that would promote mobility and willingness to seek jobs wherever they might exist. Present differences in state unemployment benefits make workers hesitate to accept jobs where their chances for insurance benefits are less.

The principles written into our permanent program should be guided by the understanding that social insurance serves workers employed in industries that are nationally organized and are supplying national and international markets. But insurance is only supplementary to employment. Workers first of all want jobs in which they can use their best skills, so that their maximum production will bring them good incomes. They prefer that job where their homes are, if possible; but if not possible, they must weigh change against a less satisfactory job. Consequently they want their union and the local U.S. Employment Bureau to gather information with a national scope. Because they are reluctant to move, they want the local employment bureau to give all possible clues to jobs with the local industrial area, which draws on the local labor market. The labor market operates without regard to political lines or governmental jurisdictions. An effective national employment service needs to coordinate information from local areas, making information on jobs in one area available to all. Whatever slows down this free flow of information and services, reduces the effectiveness of the services and interferes with workers getting the best possible jobs. Obviously workers will want to carry their social insurance with them wherever they may go for work. They do not want their equities impaired by the fact that they move to another area or region in order to get employment.

(P. 597) The convention unanimously approved the recommendations of its committee covering the several phases of social insurance. (See: Social Security Amendments, 1944.)

p. 12) No convention was held during the year 1945 due to the restrictions placed upon wartime travel. The A. F. of L. issued a program, however, under the title An Epochal Year containing objectives to be followed in the transition period. The general program follows:

Our controlling objective must always be personal freedom. Our institutions have evolved in accord with our basic law—the Constitution of the United States—which assures all citizens personal rights with the responsibility of ordering their own lives. The American Federation of Labor maintains that political freedom has its roots in economic freedom which is a key to freedom of decision. Our government exists to protect our rights and to serve our citizens—not to control their lives.

To better promote their welfare, our government assures all the right of association in voluntary organizations.

The American Federation of Labor holds that national welfare depends upon the welfare of all component groups and is best promoted by informed organized cooperation between groups concerned in specific projects.

All person and group rights involve a responsibility to use them to promote personal and group welfare as an integral part of the public welfare.

With acceptance of the right of wage earners to organize in unions for the purposes of collective bargaining and the promotion of their welfare, comes opportunity for the development of constructive relations with management and efforts for mutual progress. Experience develops understanding and discipline—two qualities invaluable in crisis.

So when the President issued his Executive Orders restricting collective bargaining within the price limits fixed to control inflation, American Federation of Labor unions for the most part recognized that the regulation was to protect the purchasing value of their incomes as well as those of other citizens, and negotiated their wage increases accordingly. Strikes were not numerous nor were they of the nature of revolts. American Federation of Labor unions have learned to weigh the costs of strikes against accepting less than they want with the maintenance of union strength and discipline.

The American Federation of Labor believes that the efforts in this transition period should be guided by goals which will assure the best interests of all people. If our union demands are such as to establish political domination of our economy, the speed of our progress would jeopardize its permanence. Our economic welfare is best furthered through the free enterprise system which assures individual freedom and responsibility and reaches its highest development through the cooperation of all concerned. Our institutions including the unions must serve the welfare of the nation and with equal care preserve opportunity for individual development and personal freedom of action. For realizing our goals we should utilize both private and public agencies depending upon the kind of service needed.

The experiences of war production have demonstrated the capacity of our production facilities and the way in which scientific research can be used to promote national welfare and strength. These experiences justify our demand that every person able to work and seeking an opportunity to earn his living, has a right to a job. We believe it is the joint responsibility of management and unions to cooperate in establishing a balanced economy that can maintain maximum levels of production affording maximum employment at rates of pay that will enable workers and all others to have maximum standards of living. The standards of living of each family are conditioned by the home. Comfortable homes with good surroundings should be available for all and slums abolished. Home ownership should be facilitated for those who wish to own their own homes. Cooperative arrangements are a key to this objective.

As we gather momentum for production at this level we look to the government for these aids:

1. The necessary basic economic statistics to enable us to gauge the results of known policies.
2. A shelf of public works to get into operation.
3. A federal housing program.
4. Equal and adequate educational opportunities for all throughout life.
5. Provision for adequate scientific research including the social sciences and the training of scientists.

Implicit in such a program is co-operation between unions and management to increase output per man-hour and to decrease production costs. Management should provide workers with production and costs records as the basis for this cooperation and be ready to make accumulated records the basis for collective bargaining. Workers should be fairly compensated in the light of these facts. Collective bargaining is the key to fair distribution of returns from joint work among those who contribute to the production undertaking—stockholders, management, producing workers, and adequate reserves for continuous technical progress.

Our basic objective is maintenance of our free enterprise system as the keystone of human freedom. Our immediate responsibility is maintenance of a free trade union movement as an essential component of free enterprise.

(Emergency Unemployment Compensation)—(1945, An Epochal Year, p. 9) Against a background of restrictions on collective bargaining was the repeal of the excess profits tax which with the charge-back privilege constituted a cushion to relieve employers' worries. Congress provided handsomely for industries and veterans in the transition, but refused to provide any aids for wage earners. The tax provisions have even made some production stoppages profitable.

Long in advance of the end of the war the American Federation of Labor asked Congress to provide emergency unemployment compensation for workers, so that they would weather the transition without drawing upon their capital, and to maintain the United States Employment Service as a federal agency fitted to get workers suitable jobs as soon as they were available.

Even after repeated recommendations, Congress refused to make provision to safeguard the interests of workers equally with other interests in the economy and the nation. While federal responsibility with respect to the U.S. Employment Service was lodged in the Department of Labor, after the War Manpower Commission was liquidated, Congress adopted a rider to the $52 billion rescission bill returning operation of the employment service to the states. The President vetoed the bill because he disapproved this decision and because he deemed it unwise to enact legislation by a rider into an appropriation bill. We regard assistance in finding jobs one of the basic services of the Department of Labor which must be organized at the level which will make it most efficient in serving management and workers. Both placement and the administration of unemployment compensation are restricted by state jurisdictions while industries gear into national and international markets and recruit their work forces through personnel departments reaching into all sections of the country. An efficient employment service which can meet the needs of industry while advancing the welfare of workers must be organized along the lines of our national economy.

Congress made other provisions to help business change over from war to peace production. There had been advance planning for contract cancellation. Most war industries were permitted to accumulate reserves for expansion and retooling of plants. An effort was made to dispose of excess war production without interfering with peacetime production. Business got about its responsibilities with little loss of time. Supply lines are being established.

Reconversion means not only making ready the facilities to produce goods needed by citizens of this country and those nations we supply, but it means the demobilization of persons in the armed services and their absorption into the civilian economy, the migration of workers from centers of war production to localities of expanding civilian production, withdrawal from the labor markets of persons not normally employed and a general shifting back to prewar standards of employment.

(Controls) — (1946, p. 121) The E.C. submitted a survey of wartime controls of our economy still in effect. The convention committee approved the report of the E.C. and submitted the following statement, unanimously approved (p. 620):

In connection with its approval of the Executive Council's Report, your committee desires to make special reference to the question of Veterans Retraining and Reemployment Administration.

This entire question of veterans' retraining and rehabilitation is of profound significance to our movement. In general, we share the great public interest in this subject. Specifically, we are immediately interested in the well-being of millions of veterans who are members of bona fide trade unions.

There is no doubt but that the Congress sincerely desired to give every possible aid to effect the readjustment, in peacetime society, of those men and women who have served us in the armed forces. There is also ample proof of the desire of the governmental agencies involved to try to render help to our veterans.

However, because the American Federation of Labor and its interested affiliated bodies were not continuously consulted in planning the administration of many of the programs, there is little coordination between the actual needs of the millions of trade union veterans and the program itself.

Your committee would here but briefly indicate to the convention a few of the problems involved in certain of the rehabilitation and retraining programs which today need our active attention.

First, we would submit that in planning the educational programs there has been relatively far too great an emphasis placed on formal college class work, conducted for college credit on a college campus. While we do fully appreciate the value of formal class work on the campus, we submit that it should be recognized that this form of education meets the needs of only a small percentage of the veterans. . . .

We would further submit that academic courses should not be given to such a great extent on the campus. The need for well planned extension courses should be more generally recognized. It would in many cases be far better to bring the study center to the veteran, than to bring the veteran to the college campus. Incidentally, it is to be observed in this connection, that veterans housing on college campuses would cease to be an emergency problem if such a decentralized program were widely effected.

Furthermore, the tremendous sudden expansion of our nation's educational program at the adult level should present a challenge not only to "give more courses," but even more to evaluate critically the work which is offered as to content, methods and social objectives involved.

We are well aware of the fact that the use of surplus war material for workers' education has not had the sympathetic attention of those handling such materials.

The present program of subsistence and tuition compensation for veterans while they are in training, gives far greater financial benefits to institutions of learning than is given in them to the veteran.

It is to be observed that in order to make sure that the college or other institution of learning receives full tuition benefits from each veteran, the veteran's subsistence funds (as well as his tuition) are cut if he fails to take the full course—without regard to the relative difficulty of the courses themselves. Then too, it should be observed that in contradiction to the traditional American method of encouraging a young man or young woman to work his or her way through college, the present plan penalizes the young man or woman who does work part-time by denying subsistence benefits and tuition proportionately less, as he may work more. Surely this is not a sound practice.

The field of counseling for veterans needs vastly more coordination with our trade union movement. Sound counseling from men and women who actually work on a job; men and women who know a work-a-day world from practical experience and not merely from a textbook on counseling, would give the veteran far more nearly what he wants and what he needs.

Unemployment compensation for veterans is a much criticized program. Yet, probably few who attack it are conscious of the tremendous emotional and psychological as well as economic adjustments that a veteran must make in effecting his return to peacetime living after perhaps some terrible experiences in war. Compensation during this period of unemployment is essential. But surely it is not wise to administer so vast a program for unemployment compensation without conference with our trade unions.

It is to be observed that some excellent work has been done in the field of psychological and emotional rehabilitation. Yet, here too, except in a few incidences the functional ties with our movement should be more fully developed.

Your committee cannot in this limited space, even touch upon all of the many aspects of veterans' retraining and rehabilitation in which the Federation has a deep interest. Yet each phase should be fully examined and critically evaluated to make it of the greatest possible value to the veterans.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Veterans' Committee of the A. F. of L. be adequately expanded to be broadly representative of the interests of the Federation in general, and of the millions of veterans in particular.

Your committee further recommends that the Executive Council explore the possibility of appointing necessary personnel to help conduct the work of this committee.

(Program of Action)—(1951, p. 466)
Toward preserving and promoting international peace and freedom, furthering social justice, and fostering national independence and individual freedom, the 70th Convention of the A. F. of L. proposes:

1. In line with the policy pursued in the signing of a peace treaty with Japan, our government should do everything in its power to have the democracies sign with the Federal German Republic a treaty guaranteeing its unconditional sovereignty and complete national independence. This is the first prerequisite for drawing the German people into the community of free nations and into the Schumann Plan and the Atlantic Alliance where it can assume its rightful responsibilities in the defense of Western Europe and enjoy the benefits of collective security and peace.

2. In accordance with the democratic aims of our nation's foreign policy and in order to prevent the resurgence of any neo-Nazi and other reactionary militarist forces and to assure a healthy German democracy, dedicated to peace, our government should lend far greater encouragement to and support of the genuine democratic forces in Germany—particularly the organized labor movement, whose spearhead is the six-million-strong German Federation of Labor affiliated with the ICFTU and a sworn enemy of all totalitarian ideologies and movements.

3. In pursuance of its repeated efforts to sign a treaty of peace with Austria, our government should hasten the conclusion of negotiations with Russia and, with or without Moscow, proceed, along with our democratic allies, to conclude such a pact of peace and friendship with the Austrian people.

4. In recognition of the utter injustice of the present Italian treaty and its incompatibility with Italy's membership in the Atlantic Alliance, our government should lose no further time—regardless of Russian opposition—to have Britain, France and Yugoslavia join with it in drastically revising the present pact which is a serious hindrance to the Italian people playing their appropriate and rightful role in the European collective security system.

5. In order to strengthen the Atlantic Alliance as an instrument of collective security and peace, Greece and Turkey, whose troops have fought so valiantly and effectively under the UN banner in Korea, should be immediately accorded membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

6. In accordance with the Charter of the UN, our government should initiate a vigorous appeal to the governments of the Middle East to sign a Regional Security and Prosperity Pact which shall include Iran, Israel and Turkey, provide for joint effort in speeding the urgently needed social reforms for raising the living standards and democratic rights of the people, adequate refugee relief, and, under UN guidance, speedily and systematically eliminate every vestige of colonialism and special privileges for foreigners in this vital area.

7. In support of their peace policy in Korea, UN and our government should make every effort to resume peace negotiations with the aggressors provided the truce conference is transferred to a truly neutral area outside and away from the scene of military struggle.

8. In continuation of our policy of unrelenting opposition to Communist subversion and usurpation of legitimate government, we reaffirm support of our government's present policy of according moral and material assistance to the developing democratic resistance movement on the Chinese mainland, to the furtherance of democratization of the constitutional regime on Formosa and the strengthening of its Nationalist military forces thereon.

9. In view of the need for preparing for the day when our nation shall have reached its peak in armament production, our government should now draw authoritative representatives of labor, management, farmers, and the public into a commission to formulate a program for meeting the problems of readjustment resulting therefrom and for ensuring the maintenance of a prosperous civilian economy.

10. In reiterating our support of the Point Four program, we stress that it should be applied with full agreement and participation of the peoples helped in order to promote in the underdeveloped areas education, health, technical and trade union know-how, and the rights and living standards of labor.

11. In order to foster a better understanding among other nations of our democratic way of life and institutions, and in order to combat the persistent Communist and other totalitarian slander campaigns against our country, the convention strongly urges our government to devise ways and means of making the Voice of America ever more effective and assuring it adequate funds for meeting these tasks, all-important to our national security and role of international leadership.

War (Post-) Committee (A. F. of L.)—(1942, p. 552) In anticipation of the many problems which confront the trade union movement when the war was finally ended, the convention adopted the following recommendation of the convention committee which considered several post-war problem resolutions:

Your committee has received a number of resolutions dealing with various problems of the post-war period.

Your committee has become convinced such subjects cannot be given adequate consideration by a number of separate pronouncements or recommendations. It is evident that to deal with this most important subject the American Federation of Labor should create a post-war problem committee to which will be referred all questions affecting our trade union movement which are related to the post-war period.

Council to appoint a post-war problem committee and Res. 16 (dealing with unemployment in the post-war period) be referred to that committee.

(1943, p. 160) A central Post-War Planning Committee, A. F. of L., was appointed which in turn created an executive committee to expedite the preparation and advancement of its work. The following report on the work of this committee was submitted to the convention:

Since the committee is without funds to do extensive research and exploratory work itself, it is setting up relationships with other groups which are making such inquiries. The committee believes that its major usefulness will consist in recommending policies on major post-war problems and in setting forth Labor's relationship to such issues.

The field of study of the committee has been outlined to cover problems and policies of a domestic scope as well as international proposals and policies.

In the domestic field the committee plans to study the responsibility of both government and private initiative in the period of demobilization and reconversion. Involved in this problem is the need to determine what disposal will be made of government-owned plants and facilities and government-owned materials. The committee will also consider the problem of controls for the post-war period—what war emergency controls should be retained, what new ones provided, what controls should be applied and in what degree. There is the definite problem of where and when civilian controls replace military controls; post-war tax policies, and many others.

Life after the armistice will proceed from where it is without abrupt or radical changes. In our own country, the important thing is to have ready plans for conversion with definite provisions for carrying them out. In the government there must be definite provisions and plans for handling cancellation of contracts and agencies to see that all rights guaranteed by the government are made good.

The two basic undertakings are for industries to convert to peacetime production and for workers to find jobs in these peacetime industries. There will be involved the largest change-over ever experienced in this country, which must be effected with least possible long-time unemployment so that we may do least damage to our citizens. Private industries must plan and capital must be ready to make the conversion. There must be a national employment service ready and equipped to cooperate with unions and managements to get workers fitted into suitable jobs with the least bungling possible. To tide workers over the intervals between jobs and emergencies that interfere with work there must be an adequate social insurance system to protect workers against the needless demoralization of relief and unemployment without income.

Our problem will be simplified if the war in Europe ends soon so that conversion can be gradual, but this would only decrease the scope of the problem to be dealt with at one time. The committee believes that unions should begin to consider plans for their memberships and plan to organize committees for that purpose.

In the international field consideration is being given to the safeguards necessary to develop democratic as opposed to bureaucratic agencies and procedures. It is studying relief and foreign rehabilitation, temporary governments and recaptured territories, and permanent agencies to maintain peace and replace war as an instrumentality for enforcing foreign policy. The maintenance and development of the International Labor Organization will be considered, as well as controls in the field of foreign trade, cartels, etc.

The committee has already arranged to have reports on the following special post-war problems:

Education and Social Welfare.

Social Security in the Post-War Period.

Reorganization of the U.S. Department of Labor.

Employment as affected by the development of transportation industry and by the housing industry.

Rehabilitation and Vocational Training.

Self-help and Cooperatives.

Minorities and Underprivileged Groups.

Women's Rights and Problems.

Other industry committees are in the process of development.

The Post-War Planning Committee recommended to President Green that inasmuch as usual methods of celebrating Labor Day would be impossible during wartime, that Labor Day, 1943, be largely devoted to consideration of post-war labor problems, and undertook to prepare "Notes for Speakers" for that purpose.

The committee realizes its responsibility to develop ways and means whereby the membership of unions may know the major post-war proposals together with their implications for Labor and be better prepared for their responsibilities as citizens and voters. It plans to continue "Notes for Speakers."

The committee thinks that the democracies cannot afford to lose the peace after the human sacrifices that have gone into this war. Nations living together on this globe where distances have become unimportant need machinery for collective bargaining in order to establish procedures and agencies for adjusting difficulties. The United States has a major responsibility for achieving this purpose.

(P. 515) We commend the prompt compliance with the directions of the Toronto Convention in the appointment of the Post-War Planning Committee. As the report of the Executive Council states, the committee must consider a gigantic task fully aware of the opportunities involved in a change-over of such huge proportions.

We recommend approval of the work of the committee which has been initiated and urge that its work be aided in these two ways:

First: That the Federation set aside an adequate fund to enable the committee to have the necessary technical assistance; and Second: That the Division on Post-War Studies in the Department of Labor be lifted to the departmental level and its responsible head made the Second Assistant Secretary of Labor, and the Congress be asked to increase the appropriations accordingly. This division has supplied our Post-War Planning Committee with most valuable and useful information so that it is obvious the division with wider scope and larger resources could be of great service to Labor locally as well as nationally.

It is obvious that governmental contributions to post-war planning and reconversion can best be performed by the established agency serving special fields such as the Departments of Labor, Commerce, Agriculture and Interior, and the Federal Reserve Board. These departments which service basic functional groups, can materially aid localities, industries, corporations and plants to facilitate conversion and thereby help mobilize local and individual responsibility.

An inter-departmental council composed of representatives of the agencies with post-war studies and services would provide a needed clearance center of information.

We urge the Post-War Planning Committee to carry through its plans for special reports and industry studies as well as its "Notes for Speakers" as a device to keep the rank and file informed on post-war problems and proposals.

(Pp. 162, 520) The A. F. of L. Committee on Post-War Planning submitted a rather lengthy report to the convention. The following is the report of the Committee on Post-War Planning, followed by the convention action on the separate sections covered:

(Domestic Problems)—(p. 162) Upon each trade group will fall responsibility for leadership in facilitating reconversion to a normal economy. Practically every worker, industrial or agricultural, and every member of the armed forces is wondering—"Will there be a job for me after the war?" Upon production, management, and union executives rests major responsibility for getting our economy started on a scale that will afford jobs for all. Upon them and upon the government devolves responsibility for facilitating the conversion of private industry and for prevention of uncontrolled inflation.

The change-over of workers from war industries to civilian production, of personnel from the armed forces to civilian occupations, of women workers from war and civilian occupations back to their homes and households, of workers in civilian industries back to jobs which they prefer, of older workers back to retirement insurance—a change-over of approximately 30,000,000 persons.

Obviously two lines of preparation are necessary to meet this situation: jobs must be available and there must be provided a national employment service competent to advise workers where suitable jobs can be had and to facilitate contact of workers with the jobs. Workers and employers must give their best abilities to plans for the development of their industries after the war. Production plans must be approved, machinery and facilities made ready, sales departments organized to assure markets. Industry and unions must look to the government for policies and agencies to deal with contract cancellation, control of stockpile prices, disposition of war production facilities, preparation and authorization of a public works program, rate of demobilization, educational and training opportunities, an adequate national employment service together with ample social security provisions. This is an extensive program, but it must be extensive to meet the human needs and to help in the re-conversion of our national economy.

Labor knows that this program can be carried through and offers its co-operation to that end. Labor will not tolerate mass unemployment, a revival of a public works program at relief rates, or other devices which rob workers of their economic and political freedom. Our refusal is made in the interests of preservation of democratic institutions. Representatives of Labor and of management should join with the government in formulating the basic policies and developing the plans for this difficult period which military developments have hastened or delayed, but which will inevitably confront us. If plans are ready, hardships will be minimized. If plans are not ready, we may easily be involved in difficulties that will make it impossible for us to meet our obligations at home or abroad.

(P. 520) As the Executive Council

Report states, the individual aspect of post-war planning is represented by the question: "Will there be a job for me?" The planning aspect involves getting rid of those basic devices that shifted us into a war economy and re-converting into peacetime production. Two main war economy controls are war contracts and war production plants with government control of strategic materials and finished products. In liquidating the war economy, there must be civilian control with a return to private initiative. The government has two major responsibilities in the conversion proceedings: (1) a uniform policy for contract cancellation and (2) administration and disposal of war property and production facilities owned by the government so that conversion will be promoted without contributing to inflation.

As there is no over-all department of supplies, contracts have been made by the various procurement agencies of the agencies needing supplies, and hence divergent policies might be expected if termination of contracts is left to these agencies. We recommend, therefore that the American Federation of Labor urge upon Congress the creation of a civilian agency charged with full responsibility for contract cancellation and consisting of an administrator and a policy board on which industry, Labor and agriculture are represented. There will be hundreds of thousands of contracts to be cancelled. Terms of cancellation should be negotiated so as to enable the companies to utilize their capital for conversion with a minimum of delay. Audits and court procedure or conventional economies on contracts would result in expensive delays for industries and workers. This contract cancellation agency should make quarterly reports to Congress.

The disposal of surplus plant facilities and stock piles of raw and finished war materials and lands acquired for military purposes, is another civilian responsibility to be exercised with knowledge of industrial needs and interests as well as the rehabilitation needs of other countries. These facilities and materials must be returned to a peacetime economy in an orderly and constructive way. We recommend that Congress be asked to authorize a custodian to dispose of these lands, properties and materials, aided by a policy board on which Labor, industry and agriculture are represented. This agency should have full authority to dispose of such surplus properties with the duty of reporting quarterly to Congress.

These two agencies are essential steps in providing maximum employment quickly for those dependent on industries for an opportunity to earn a living and to provide employment for the soldiers who will be mustered out of war duty.

(Union Problems) — (p. 163) A major post-war responsibility of wage earners is to revitalize the labor movement so that it can resume its normal functions. Because collective bargaining was frozen by those responsible for inflation control, increases in wage earners' incomes failed to keep pace with incomes of farmers, corporations, war contractors or total business. No controls have been fixed for the incomes of other groups similar to those imposed for wage earners.

The first labor standard that will shift to a peacetime basis will be the work week. With the end of war production the 40-hour work week will be restored. Upon the union will rest responsibility for negotiating terms of shift of shorter hours without reduction in weekly income. Only by increasing basic wage rates can we escape serious depression forces that facilitate unemployment. In all probability price control will be continued during the transition period, for the cost of living will remain high. Wage earners have relied upon overtime to absorb the deficit between wage rates and increased costs of living. In durable goods industries, where the average earnings are $49.38 per week, the 40-hour week will reduce average earnings to $38.64; in non-durable goods the reduction in earnings will be from $34 to $30.32. Either basic wage rates must be increased or standards of living must go down to depression levels, which will involve a drop in national income. Such a drop would delay revival of civilian industries and efforts to pay war debts.

(P. 521) We wish to emphasize the importance that the Executive Council places upon the need for a strong responsible union movement in post-war days. Workers will need such an agency to regain positions lost through wage freezing. We recommend that all unions be on the alert to increase basic wage rates as rapidly as possible. Bonus systems disguised as wage incentive plans divert attention from the main objective.

We agreed to wage stabilization as a war measure and the effectuation of wage stabilization agreements we believe is the key to stabilization of the work force. The wage policy now enforced is wage freezing, not stabilization, for stabilization implies adjustments regularly as needed to preserve balance. If this policy cannot be altered sooner, it will be wiped out with the restoration of normal work hours. The shift to 40-hour weeks must be without reduction in weekly earnings.

(International) — (p. 163) Armistice that will end military combat will bring us opportunity and obligation to effectuate our foreign policy. While foreign policy is formulated by the executive branch of our government subject to approval by Congress, the will of the people controls decisions in a democratic country. Our responsibility at present is for defense of democratic institutions in the Americas and the islands to which we have made commitments. Any new commitment must be squared with our ability to make good.

Wage earners, like all other groups of citizens, hope that we can use the opportunity at the end of this war to establish agencies and understandings, so that we can regularly consider policies and situations and make decisions that will at least minimize the necessity for wars. We hope that procedures of consultation and cooperation developed by the United Nations can be made permanent and broadened in practice to cover needs of interdependent responsibilities of democratic peoples. We hope that through such an alliance opportunities for democratic freedom and responsibility may be made more secure for all peoples. Experience of the years since World War I have demonstrated that the main key to the maintenance of democratic freedom is the right of wage earnings to membership in unions of their own choosing. This right, together with freedom of speech and assemblage, and guarantees of civil freedom, constitute a bill of rights which the united democratic nations ought to assure their allies. Experience further shows that the cooperation of democratic nations promotes democratic ideals and practices internationally, for the plans and purposes of autocrats and dictators mature only with the elimination of democracy. Until such time as democratic institutions are secure in the world, democratic countries cannot enter into treaties of disarmament with non-democratic countries.

Labor realizes that many decisions are being made now that will condition terms of peace, and urges that representatives of civilian groups vitally concerned by these decisions be included in the delegations representing our country in international conferences. We realize that progress toward world peace will be promoted by the development of international machinery to adjust problems that cause wars and by the molding of a world will for peace. We cannot reach this goal by evolving blue prints and resolutions, but we can achieve them by making democratic principles our daily guide in dealing with all issues—both national and international—in scope of effectiveness. Peace and freedom must be achieved each day and each year by free citizens making their individual and collective decisions.

Indispensable to this end is cooperation not only by the United Nations but by the democratic groups within the United Nations. Indispensable to democratic institutions within nations and to deal with matters concerning all nations are the functions of free labor organizations. To safeguard democratic institutions in international conferences, in the peace treaty, and in post-war international agencies, there should be conferences and agreement between the free labor movements of democratic countries.

(P. 521) We hope that Congress will declare our basic foreign policy without unnecessary delay. Such a declaration is necessary to enable our foreign representatives and the Executive Branch to develop plans and negotiate agreements. We believe that world organization to keep the peace must begin with understandings reached between the governments of democratic nations and extended as rapidly as possible to other nations which manifest their desire in good faith to cooperate for the objectives served by democratic institutions. The right to representation of Labor and other functional citizen groups must be provided in all world agencies. This right is a condition essential to protection against bureaucracy.

We are especially concerned that agents of the United Nations entrusted with rehabilitation of conquered countries and restoration of local government and agencies of justice shall understand their responsibility to be the mobilization of local forces to restore their own practices and institutions. One of the first groups to be brought into conferences for this purpose should be the workers. If their organizations are destroyed, they should have opportunity to revive some form of collective actions for their services will be needed to revive economic services as well as local government. The representatives of the United Nations should not attempt to govern the territory, but should get together representative groups to develop their own government. We have no patience with proposals for outsiders to re-educate Germany or Italy or any other country. Every country has a right to its own educational system and its own culture. Our only responsibility is to provide opportunities for representative groups to restore their own national life and to act in cooperation with like groups of other nations.

(Our Good Neighbor Policy)—(P. 164) Our first international obligation is to those countries which with the United States constitute the New World. We have in common many of the same traditions and experiences that are rooted in the will to emigrate to unknown lands—there to build up a life suited to the land and to their own desires. Internationally it was free from the intrigues of power politics and the suspicions involved in balance of power between hereditary monarchies. Opportunity inherent in tenantless and unused lands offered new alternatives. Free governments now exist, but there are economic inequalities and conflicts between cultures that make for individual unfreedom. Differences between the resources of the descendants of European immigrants and the descendants of Indian nations have brought about conditions of agricultural and industrial peonage. Latin American wealth is mainly in lands and in agricultural products. Capital investments for the exploitation of national resources, industries and utilities have been mainly European-owned and controlled. Such United States capital as was there represented corporate enterprise, responsible for dividends rather than for the building up of good international relations.

Since World War I the United States has made a definite effort to bridge the chasms of language, cultural differences and trade forces in order to establish a real community of interests and concern for the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine, which assures our continents against interference from without. Now, as a part of our world war policy, the State Department, the Office of Economic Warfare, the Coordinator of Latin-American Affairs and the Pan American Union are acting to promote good will and the exchange of experience in various fields. All Latin-American countries with one exception are supporting the United Nations. To make these relationships economically independent, our government has organized the Inter-American Development Commission for the purpose of long-range economic planning. This commission operates through 21 national committees whose purposes are fixed by the parent body. To serve the commission the Office of Foreign Investment Information was organized in connection with the Export-Import Bank. The commission aims to encourage joint investments of the United States and Latin-American countries for the expansion of industries in Latin-America and to maintain close business contacts; it will develop a program for training Latin-American young men in the methods of American business; it will serve as a channel for business and governmental collaboration for inter-American post-war planning.

Under the auspices of this network, regional developmental corporations have been set up for the purpose which the name indicates and will serve as long-range post-war economic and social planning agencies.

Supplementing this organization but acting unofficially are coordinating committees set up in most of the Latin-American countries, whose membership is exclusively representatives from business interests.

The workers of Latin-American countries and the United States are vitally concerned in what is involved in this planning. Unless economic expansion results in adequate wages so that production brings higher standards of living; in vocational and apprenticeship training for men and women that will enable them to be skillful resourceful workers able to manage their own lives; and in utilization of the products of industries for higher and broader levels of living for all, it will not bring lasting progress.

The Office of Economic Warfare is including in Latin-American contracts protective labor provisions. The same principle should be incorporated in plans for economic development of all these countries so that there shall not be trade competition based on low standards of life for the workers of any country.

(Labor Attaches) — (p. 166) We should continue to urge the State Department to include representatives of Labor in its embassies in the major industrial countries.

We recommend that the American Federation of Labor take up these proposals with the various governmental agencies concerned in this field, and establish a formal understanding with the Director of the Pan American Union for the development of permanent facilities for the exchange of information on labor welfare and standards of living in all countries. Formal requests should be made for Labor representation in all these agencies in order that Labor interests may be represented in the decisions on policies.

(P. 523) There are very special ties that unite us to the wage earners of Latin-American countries as well as the other countries of the New World, and we should plan to have an effective part in extending and enriching the objectives of our Good Neighbor Policy.

There are plans under way for the industrial development of Latin-American countries as Inter-American Labor cooperation is needed to imbed firmly in such plans, provisions for Labor to participate in industrial development by higher wage rates, better working conditions and higher standards of living.

We note with gratification the administrative reorganization which all agencies with international obligations under the State Department which facilitates the development of Inter-American labor plans through two permanent agencies — the State Department and the Pan American Union. This reorganization strengthens our proposal for Labor attaches with embassies in industrial countries.

Our State Department as well as international agencies will be increasingly in need of dependable information on the labor organizations of the various countries in the post-war period. We want statutory authorization of such Labor attaches with provisions for their nomination by the Department of Labor on the basis of practical labor experience and certification to the Department of State. All

"labor experts" in governmental departments should be selected by similar methods.

(Post-War Housing)—(p. 166) Demobilization of the armed forces and termination of employment on war contracts at the conclusion of hostilities will submerge the nation under a tide of widespread unemployment unless specific provision is made in advance for a program of reconstruction and redevelopment of our cities, towns, and rural communities. The war has virtually halted all construction of durable housing. The peacetime housing needs of our growing and shifting population and of our expanded productive economy will be aggravated by the combined deficit resulting from the building inactivity of the last depression and of the war years. If we are to be prepared to launch a well-timed and strategic attack by all elements of our economy and our community against unemployment in peacetime, and if we are to seize this opportunity to build a broad foundation for economic reconstruction and better living, concerted action must be taken without delay to blueprint the strategy and to define the common objectives as well as respective responsibilities of Labor, private enterprise, and of the government.

Responsibility for housing rests with the local community. There must be assurance that every community is equipped to discharge that responsibility. Workers are ultimate producers of our nation's wealth, and they are entitled to participation both as workers and as citizens in the shaping of the plans for the betterment of the community in which they live. Community redevelopment must not be permitted to become an instrument of self-enrichment at the expense of wage earners by real estate speculators, money lenders and promoters. Provision should be made in every city, town and rural county for a duly constituted land and housing authority representative of the people whom it serves. Labor's foremost responsibility is to assure the establishment in every municipality of local land and housing authorities (1) empowered to direct the over-all course of community reconstruction and redevelopment, including land acquisition; (2) equipped to facilitate maximum provisions for needed residential building by private enterprise within standards of sound housing construction and consistent with the long-range plans for community growth, and (3) constituted to carry out a long-range program of slum clearance and low-rent housing for low-income families.

Stable and suitable housing for wage earners is directly related to their employment, for the wage earners' income depends on their jobs. Post-war housing development cannot be unrelated to the reconversion and relocation of industry and with it to the shift of employment opportunities in the transition from war to peace. War has forced mass migration of workers throughout the entire nation, therefore, community redevelopment must of necessity be related to the realignment of employment opportunities in each community, each region and in the entire nation. Neither cities, towns nor rural areas can achieve stable growth or meet the demand for better living without a long-range plan. Such planning cannot be isolated in a single community but must be related to the economic growth, regionally and nationally. This need for regional and national planning should be met through a democratic procedure. Representation of Labor, farmers and of the communities concerned is essential in the regional and national planning bodies which must give assistance and guidance to local communities in the task of reconstruction. Architects, technicians and other professional personnel needed in this work must be the servants of democratically constituted public agencies rather than their directors.

Private initiative should play a leading part in post-war housing reconstruction. Basic standards and procedures should be firmly established to prevent sub-standard building, eliminate speculative profiteering at the expense of the tenant and home buyer, and to provide for a drastic reduction in the interest charges on all home mortgage financing.

In neighborhoods in which a large degree of economic stability can be achieved, cooperative mutual home ownership should be furthered as a means of making home ownership available to families of moderate income. Many war housing projects of the permanent type can and should be sold to the present occupants on a mutual basis where future stability of employment is assured.

The low-rent housing and slum clearance program interrupted by the war should be resumed and expanded. All federal aid extended to local communities for acquisition of slums and blighted areas should be on the condition that new decent dwellings suitably located be provided, equal in number and in rental to the dwellings eliminated. Temporary war housing must not be permitted to disintegrate into new slums after the war and should be removed as rapidly as possible. Wherever possible and suitable, the sites, utilities and materials of such temporary projects should be utilized in the construction of permanent low-rent housing.

Of fundamental importance to a national program of post-war housing is the elimination of rural as well as urban slums. Cheaper financing should be available to farmers and farm workers who can afford to build their own homes. Construction of decent farm dwellings under the supervision of the Farm Security Administration, for gradual purchase by farmers, should be made an integral part of a farm settlement program which will play an important part in affording demobilized soldiers and war workers an opportunity to return to farming under favorable conditions. The migrant camp program of the Farm Security Administration should be continued as a part of a positive plan to achieve stable settlement of families.

Organized labor's responsibility for the development of a sound program, democratically conceived, cannot be fully discharged without active work of local labor housing committees in every community. To this end we recommend that a continuing program be developed by the Housing Committee of the American Federation of Labor to assist in the establishment of active local labor housing committees by our central labor unions and to encourage the establishment of housing committees by the affiliated national and international unions.

(P. 521) The Executive Council recommends the resumption of housing programs throughout urban and rural communities and we urge endorsement of this recommendation as a basic provision in all community programs. Construction of houses serves two purposes: (1) provision of jobs for construction workers and workers in supporting industries, and (2) better living conditions for the citizens of the communities.

We recommend that this section of the report be brought to the attention of all central and state bodies with the suggestion that housing be included in all community programs. Private construction should have the leading role in all plans.

(1944, p. 257) The work of the Federation's Post-War Planning Committee was presented to the convention and included a program as follows:

Part I—The Bases of Lasting
International Peace
Guiding International Principles

I. War Is the Enemy. The American Federation of Labor believes that war among the nations waged by the modern engines of death and destruction is the supreme enemy of the well being of the common people of the world. We recognize that our own movement of organized labor — a long struggle of workers for economic and social democracy—has no future of promise in a world living under the threat and burden of the war system. We consider that the elimination of war as an instrument of national policy is a condition essential to the perpetuation and the further development of our democratic way of life.

II. Lasting peace must rest on social justice and include all peoples. We reaffirm this principle set forth by Samuel Gompers at the close of the First World War in the Constitution of the International Labor Organization. This principle has now to be incorporated in the peace settlement at the end of the Second World War. We are in full accord with the way in which it is elaborated in the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms set forth in President Roosevelt's message to Congress, January 6, 1941. We note with satisfaction the declaration of President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Churchill and Marshal Stalin at Teheran, in which they stated, "We shall seek the cooperation and active participation of all nations, large and small, whose peoples in heart and in mind are dedicated, as are our own peoples, to the elimination of tyranny and slavery, oppression and intolerance. We will welcome them as they may choose to come into the world family of democratic nations." It is our belief that these principles must be translated into policies and acts, both now and in the future.

III. The only safety from war is in the international organization of peace. The industry of war has now been taken over by modern science even more completely than the industries of peace. It is no longer a local conflict but spreads its disturbance over the lives of everyone everywhere. Labor is especially aware of its destructive power, which drafts so many workers in the fighting forces and creates economic confusion at home. The conflicts of today have proved that we can no longer rely on our favored geographical position to maintain our national safety. Moreover, the vast majority of the workers of our country realize what it would mean to respond to this changed situation by engaging in that rivalry for power which is inherent in any effort to make ourselves secure through a program of national expansion and militarism. The outcome of such a policy is not security, peace, and a rising standard of living, but increasing suspicion, mounting military expenditures, imperialistic adventures and war. We believe, therefore, it is imperative that the United States do its full part to help develop a general system of mutual security.

IV. Victory is not enough. The total defeat of the Axis Powers is essential to clear the way for democratic international reconstruction; but to stop with that alone would not furnish us with any permanent guarantee of security. The United Nations must be ready and equipped to use whatever means are necessary to prevent the outbreak of war. This will surely require programs for policing and the use of armed forces, but we do not believe that the mere massing of force on the part of the United Nations will be sufficient to provide lasting security. In order to maintain international peace, political and military programs must be associated with a far-reaching economic program which will be designed, not to advantage certain nations at the expense of others, but to organize and utilize the new productive powers of industry and agriculture for the advancement of the standards of living of all peoples. World-wide economic health is essential to security. The American Federation of Labor is convinced that the acid test of the leadership of the United Nations will be whether they can organize the post-war world for this kind of economic and cultural progress.

V. Prosperity can be achieved by a free people under a regime of social justice. We have demonstrated during this war that a free economy can produce goods in unimagined abundance. In the years of peace a sustained high level of production and employment is also possible if there is assurance of economic justice within nations and between nations. To accomplish this, it will be necessary to get rid of that kind of exploitation which tends to concentrate income in the hands of the few and prevents the great mass of workers from having the purchasing power to buy the things they need for daily life. It also will be necessary to lessen the barriers between nations so that there may be a larger interchange of goods and services for all. The basic test of freedom is the welfare of the common man. We hold that under freedom society can be so organized that everyone will have an opportunity to earn his own livelihood.

VI. Freedom of thought and expression must be safeguarded throughout the world. This is the ultimate moral purpose, underlying all others, for which we are fighting the Second World War. Tyrannical governments which would crush out freedom of thought in their own lands endanger spiritual freedom everywhere. In the world community of today, we cannot be indifferent to cruelty and oppression because such indifference strengthens the arm of the oppressor. Mere verbal protests are not enough, and yet we must be careful not to interfere in the domestic affairs of other peoples which are properly their own concern. The growth of freedom throughout the world depends upon the growth of the public conscience without which laws and international agreements are of no avail. We hold that labor organized in free unions has a high place in the development of the conscience of mankind and that in this field its vigilant and active service for the public good will be fundamental for the safeguarding of human rights in the post-war world.

VII. Long-range plans must be made now. While the full realization of these principles will have to await the establishment of final peace, we recognize that piecemeal and experimental procedures will have to be followed in the construction of these new world economic and political institutions. During the transitional period, however, the direction in which reconstruction must move if it is to meet the needs and the aspirations of the common people of all lands should be nevertheless definite and clear. The worldwide depression of the previous decade, and the worldwide war which followed have proved once again that we are members one of another. Poverty, unemployment, and widespread economic insecurity are not endurable in the midst of potential plenty. To organize the economic life of the world so that these possibilities are made actual is the ultimate aim of organized labor. It will be satisfied with no lesser program for the years of peace.

They must not be left as mere objectives and principles, however. The urgency of the situation requires that all of the great functional groups of our society, Labor, business, agriculture, and the professions unite to discover the concrete means by which these aims can be attained. We believe that the primary emphasis should be placed, not on the creation of a new sovereignty, but rather on the development of definite ways of working together in the international field to accomplish these purposes.

Part II—International Program

The program for the establishment of a lasting peace must provide for the continuing cooperation of the nations of freedom in the three great areas of their common interest, security, livelihood, and justice. This cooperation does not involve the creation of a world government, but the acceptance of definite obligations to work together under agreed conditions and within the limits set by them. The basic principles are those of the Atlantic Charter and the other pronouncements of the United Nations, developed along the lines indicated in the first part of this statement.

1. Security

The program for the prevention of war has already been set forth in the Four-Nation Declaration signed by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, and China:

That their united action, pledged for the prosecution of the war against their respective enemies, will be continued for the organization and maintenance of peace and security.

That they recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small for the maintenance of international peace and security.

That for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security pending the reestablishment of law and order and the inauguration of a system of general security, they will consult with one another and as occasion requires with other members of the United Nations with a view to joint action on behalf of the community of nations.

The substance of this declaration was incorporated into the (Connally) Resolution of the United States Senate on post-war policy. Steps should now be taken to insure the speedy realization of these plans. These steps should include:

1. The calling of a United Nations Commission either to establish the "General International Organization," referred to in the Moscow Agreement, or to serve provisionally in that capacity.

2. The transformation of the war-time alliances of the United Nations into an organization for peace. The initial organization for policing will grow out of the military situation at the end of the war and will remain a primary responsibility of the Great Powers. It should be recognized, however, that this is a purely temporary necessity. The program for international security in the future will have to be worked out by the United Nations as a whole. For this purpose the "General International Organization" will need the advice of civilian as well as military experts. The problem is one which will continually change with the progress of science. Therefore, this commission of experts should advise the United Nations concerning all the technical questions involved in armament and disarmament.

Unilateral action and regional understandings are only valid when in accord with the measures taken by the general International Organization and conform to the basic principles of the Atlantic Charter which bind the United Nations to "respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they live," and to make "no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned."

We believe that the United States has much at stake in the maintenance of these foundation principles, and the American Federation of Labor pledges its full support in any steps to supplant tendencies toward unilateralism with genuine cooperative action which will broaden and deepen the mutual relations already achieved by the United Nations.

2. Livelihood

The program for economic and social welfare, like that in the sphere of security falls naturally into two parts: the provision for relief and rehabilitation during the war and transitional period, and the provision for long-range plans and policies capable of development under the conditions of peace.

1. Emergency measures arising from the war. The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) is deserving of universal support. It should have an adequate representation from Labor on its staff. The aim of relief should be to make it possible for the peoples who have suffered in the war to become self-supporting. We do not believe that either they or the United States would profit from continuing charity after the restoration of normal conditions.

2. Long-range planning. A certain number of international functional agencies will be necessary to insure the consistent development of sound economic policies in a world which will be increasingly responsive to the advances in technology due to scientific discovery and invention. The frontiers of the world of Labor are those of economic as well as political geography, and the economic barriers to freedom of intercourse must not be permitted to block the pathway to prosperity. These problems by their very nature cannot be solved in any single set of laws or agreements because the conditions with which they deal are forever changing. It is, therefore, necessary to maintain and create the pertinent institutions for dealing with them.

(a) The International Labor Organization (ILO) has abundantly justified its existence. It should be enlarged and strengthened as an instrument for raising the standard of living of peoples in all countries and for safeguarding the rights of the working people.

(b) The Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) which has now been planned receives the full support of Labor. There should be parallel organizations to deal with problems of health and social welfare, such as the promotion of child welfare, education, the prevention of epidemics, traffic in drugs and traffic for immoral purposes.

(c) In the world of commerce and industry there should be agencies to deal with such problems as (1) the stabilization of foreign exchange, (2) communications and transport on land, sea and in the air, (3) the commercial policy including cartels, (4) fiscal policies and foreign investments, (5) access to natural resources and raw material, (6) to coordinate these activities there should be a United Nations Economic Organization with consultative and advisory functions.

In each case there should be provision for objective studies of the facts which should be made available to the general public.

3. Justice

The program for the reestablishment and development of justice in international relations in the post-war world has a sound foundation in international law, but must be strengthened and developed with the growth of the common interests in the substitution of pacific means of settlement for force and violence among nations.

(1) The Permanent Court of International Justice should be adopted as the supreme judicial tribunal of the international organization.

(2) The scope of arbitration should include the settlement of economic as well as political disputes.

(3) For the settlement of political disputes conciliation is a ready and approved method for which the permanent political structure of the United Nations should be used as well as special bodies for specific problems.

(4) For the safeguarding of human rights, there should be a permanent international institute to study and report to both international and national bodies on the problem of developing the principles and procedures of international justice with respect to groups or individuals.

Part III—Post-War America Guiding Domestic Principles

1. Our immediate responsibility is to win the war. From the beginning, organized labor has recognized that the winning of this war is essential to the promotion of the interests of the common man in our own country and in the world. We have given unstinted support to the war effort, even voluntarily suspending the exercise of the hard-won right to strike. The result has been an achievement of production without precedent in the history of mankind. Such deeds demonstrate that the American Federation of Labor wants no peace of appeasement. We will continue to support the war effort until a complete victory is won.

2. Our long-time responsibility is the well being of all men: Our distinctive function is to promote the well being of workers. In serving this purpose the American Federation of Labor has been both an expression and an organ of American democracy. There has been, there is, and there can be no lasting conflict between a movement created by the working people and democratic purposes and processes. Throughout the history of our country, the working people have asserted and fought for recognition of the worth and dignity of Labor; for the rights of the worker in his job; for a living wage and a rising standard of living for all; for social security; for political freedom; for civil liberties; and for free public education. Confronted by the present period of profound social, economic, and political change, we reaffirm our historic commitment to these ends—to both democratic purposes and democratic means. We expect to be represented in both the domestic and international processes by which the post-war world will be organized.

3. The well being of the worker depends upon his rights on the job. The whole life of the worker is pervaded and molded by his job, by the physical conditions under which he works, by the length of his working day, by the adequacy of his pay, by the extent to which he is protected against arbitrary discharge, and by the nature of the strains under which he works. Only as he engages in an occupation recognized as useful by his fellows does the individual have an inner confidence that he is needed by and belongs to his community. The harmful spiritual consequences of enforced unemployment are no less real than its material deprivations. The essence of slavery—one of the most evil of all human degradations—is to be compelled to work at the dictation of another. The right to work and the right to quit work are among the most basic rights of free men. The free and independent mind, which is the moral foundation and source of our democratic way of life, decay and become corrupted in a society in which workers are insecure.

At long last and after more than a century of severe struggle, the right of the worker to unite with his fellows to protect and advance his interests has been made a part of the law of the land. This right has been given memorable expression in the National Labor Relations Act of 1937, which declares "employees shall have the right to self-organization, -to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

The American Federation of Labor is determined to defend this right against any and all forces that may challenge it.

4. Unemployment is the entrenched enemy. The war has shown the vast productive potential of America, once our material and human resources are mobilized for common purposes. In the short space of three years, we have increased the total productive facilities of our nation by nearly one-half. During this same period we have also doubled the total national income. This remarkable record in production calls for a revision of all former estimates of what is possible and desirable. Future productive capacity can provide better homes, better food and clothing, more adequate medical care, finer communities, and richer educational and cultural opportunities for all. We believe that our country can maintain its internal unity and strength and take its necessary part in promoting world security and economic and cultural advance, only as it creates means by which this higher level of production and employment is sustained. In order to preserve and extend our standards of living, American democracy must enter upon this bold and creative task. The American Federation of Labor refuses to tolerate the defeatism which holds that under a democratic regime of freedom, it is not possible to make this abundance actually available to our people.

5. The stability of our democracy will require the provision of productive jobs and services for the millions demobilized from the armed forces and the war industries. Demobilization allowances for returning soldiers, Federal interim placement benefits for all in the labor market, unemployment insurance and provisions for retraining are all necessary, but in and of themselves they do not touch the heart of the problem. In the last analysis the demobilized can have economic security only as they are employed in productive work. There is no substitute for a job. Close cooperation of private enterprise and government—federal, state and local—will be required to maintain production and employment during this difficult period of the shift from the war to the peace economy. The American Federation of Labor is eager to do its part to organize, and support a national rehabilitation, retraining, production and employment program adequate to meet the needs of all who have served on either the fighting or the home fronts.

6. Free and independent organizations of the people are an indispensable means of checking concentration of economic and governmental power. If the common people are to exercise effectual control over the conditions which determine their livelihood, two things are required. On the one hand, it is imperative that the trend toward private monopoly and the concentration of wealth be reversed. History has demonstrated that concentration of wealth and economic power in private, monopolistic hands undermines the very foundations of a free society.

In our interdependent industrial society, with its vast mass production enterprises, government regulation is necessary to care for the general public interest. It can, however, assume dangerous forms.

We contend that it is only as organizations of Labor, farmers and other functional groups maintain their essential freedom that the danger of both industrial and political despotism can be averted. We therefore demand that in both industry and government more adequate means be provided whereby these functional groups can be directly represented in the formulation, administration, and the evaluation of over-all economic policies.

7. The common good requires the cooperation of the great functional groups. We recognize that organizations of business, of finance, of farmers, and of the various professions as well as of Labor have their indispensable part to play in the development of our common modes of living. Each of these groups should press for the adequate recognition of its own peculiar interests. Fortunately, each of the major functional groups is beginning to understand that the impoverishment of other groups endangers its own security and prosperity.

The workers of the city and the workers of the country have deep mutual interests. The prosperity of the one ultimately requires the prosperity of the other. We believe that the welfare of the nation now requires more than ever the cooperation of farm and city workers.

Impoverished agricultural and industrial workers cannot provide an adequate and stable market for goods and services. All will suffer disaster if the powerful organizations of finance, business, farmers and Labor seek merely to advance their own interests without regard for the consequences on the community as a whole. We believe that the cooperation of these functional groups in the development of a framework of controlling policies for the conservation of natural resources and the progressive organization of our productive powers is a primary need. The American Federation of Labor proposes to do its part to create means for joint consultation and cooperation.

8. Free enterprise is an essential part of the democratic way of life. As political freedom assures the individual basic civil rights which entail corresponding duties, so economic freedom assures economic rights which constitute contract and entail their corresponding duties. We believe wholeheartedly in free enterprise as an essential in personal freedom. The right to start a business and the right to choose a job is the basis of a free life. Free enterprise and free Labor are interdependent. Neither can last without the other. Our free economy rests on community of interests and it maintains itself through cooperative action mindful of the interests of all concerned. Experience has demonstrated that when the rights of free unions are impaired, free enterprise is no longer secure. By free enterprise we mean a progressive economy which provides incentives and opportunities for individuals and groups to take the initiative and to assume the risks involved in launching new forms of productive activity. Thus organized labor means by free enterprise bold initiative for the increase of the range and efficiency of production, not the disregard of the needs and rights of others.

We want a regime of economic freedom, but our enterprise system must demonstrate that it can function so as to husband and utilize, not to waste and dissipate our natural resources. We want free enterprise, but our productive system must be committed to the progressive raising of the national income and the maintenance of full employment. Such a system is necessarily opposed to all tendencies toward monopolistic restriction. We want free enterprise, but we also want an economy which will provide ample support for the health, educational, recreational and similar public services so essential to the welfare of the working people in our industrial society. Finally, we want a program of economic enterprise which will not be repressive, but will support the free exercise of civil and political liberties.

9. Equality of opportunity is an authentic goal of American democracy. Unfortunately this ideal of equality is now denied in many of our established policies and practices. It is denied wherever children or adults do not enjoy equality of educational opportunity. It is denied wherever individuals are deprived of their civil and political rights guaranteed by the Constitution. It is denied wherever workers, because of race, religion or sex, do not have an equal chance to get jobs, and to be promoted in their jobs. The American Federation of Labor is opposed to any and all of these forms of discrimination—whether in the sphere of politics, of education, or of work. We believe that the dignity and worth of each worker should be respected, and that our movement will be handicapped in its effort to promote higher levels of production and employment so long as any of these discriminations are permitted to exist.

10. The preservation of our democracy demands vigorous support of the civil liberties and public education. We live in a revolutionary age. America is in the process of making far-reaching adjustments in both her domestic institutions and her foreign relations. We believe that these changes in economy, government and foreign affairs can and must be made by and for the people. This can be done intelligently and peacefully only as we keep open the avenues of education, association and organization, discussion, investigation, publication and communication. In our fateful period, public enlightenment and free discussion define a social necessity, not a luxury. Those who would curb these basic democratic rights to protect narrow class privileges and those who would abuse them in the slavish service of foreign governments and alien party lines strike at the very foundation of our freedom. The American Federation of Labor, believing as it does in democracy as both means and end, will continue to fight for these rights and to expose and oppose all who would abridge or impair them for any reason whatsoever.

Part IV—Immediate Domestic Program

What we do now determines our post-war adjustment. We maintain that there must be close coordination of war mobilization and reconversion programs. Policies controlling both the letting of contracts and cutbacks vitally affect our peacetime economy and the potentiality of many industries. The issue has already been raised: Shall we have pools of unemployed or shall civilian industries begin resumption of production? Demobilization guided by Labor's dominant purpose can lead us directly into production at high levels or it can provide privileged security for some in an economy of scarcity. We demand that the United States choose production at high levels.

War Mobilization and Reconstruction

1. The American Federation of Labor proposes that Congress authorize the establishment of an Office of War Mobilization and Adjustment with an Economic Commission composed of representatives of the basic economic functional organizations of workers, employers and farmers. Its chairman shall be chosen from the general public. This Economic Commission shall make the policies to guide war mobilization, reconversion and reconstruction and reemployment. Representatives on the Commission shall be appointed by the President from panels submitted by the respective organizations of Labor, Farmers and Business and approved by the Senate.

2. This Office shall coordinate plans for production and reemployment and time demobilization of armies with work opportunities.

3. This Office, in order to facilitate employment after the war, shall be prepared to promote the effective and early resumption of private business by

- a. Negotiation of contract cancellation.
- b. Prompt settlement of claims.
- c. Removal of government property from plants.
- d. Disposition of government surplus property.

There must be over-all policies to assure free enterprise to small as well as big business to lead into maximum levels of production with high levels of employment at pay which makes possible steadily rising standards of living and to promote competitive business to safeguard our home markets.

4. The machinery for demobilization and reconversion should, wherever possible, be existing agencies operating under guiding policies and in accord with the coordinated programs of the Office and reporting to it.

5. The Office of War Mobilization shall make quarterly reports to a joint Congressional Committee.

6. The chairman with the representative policy commission shall provide for effective mobilization of manpower, training and retraining, placement of workers and demobilized servicemen and women, and the reintegration of enlisted persons into the civilian work force.

7. Price control and rationing shall be continued until scarcities disappear.

Veterans

For those in the armed services the American Federation of Labor proposes:

1. Demobilization pay to provide opportunity before adjustment to civilian life.

2. Hospitalization, medical care and rehabilitation for the injured.

3. Effective right to complete education and training interrupted by war service or to retraining.

4. Special assistance in finding employment.

5. Interim placement benefits three months after demobilization and to continue for two years after reentering the work force.

The National Work Force

For all wage earners the American Federation of Labor proposes:

1. Federal interim unemployment benefits for two years.

2. Early enactment of a federal social insurance system covering all workers in private industry and groups of self-employed persons, providing insurance for emergencies interrupting work: unemployment and short-time incapacity, long-time incapacity and old age, with provision that the Social Security Board may enter into compacts with individual states or their subdivisions, for the purpose of extending social security coverage to their employees.

3. A national employment service essential to advise workers of suitable jobs and employers of suitable workers.

4. Restoration of shorter work-week without material reduction in weekly earnings.

During the war wage earners have contributed increased productivity to the war effort without compensation by increases in wage rates. Justice therefore requires that they return to normal hours without material changes in weekly earnings.

5. An end of the evil of child labor.

6. Adequate protective labor legislation at both federal and state levels.

Union responsibilities in an economy of abundance. In addition to its responsibility for craftsmanship and discipline of members, and selection of officers to represent the union and negotiate contracts protecting members' rights and interests, the union must assume the responsibilities accompanying the establishment and maintenance of maximum levels of production and employment. This implies the unreserved cooperation necessary for full employment with review and revision of rules and practices which were developed to protect workers in a depressed and severely fluctuating economy.

Employers' responsibilities. As the price of free competitive enterprise—with profits to cover risks—employers must accept responsibility for directing initiative toward organization of production, employment and marketing that will maintain maximum levels of production and employment.

Through personnel policies and in collective bargaining employers should promote higher incomes for the work force. This is essential to an economy of abundance.

Union-Management Cooperation. After collective bargaining has become a customary practice, it is possible to develop plans and agencies for regularized cooperation between unions and management. Such cooperation contributes to efficient production and can materially lower production costs. It makes possible a real sense of partnership in the day to day problems of joint work.

We urge for all production undertakings genuine collective bargaining as the only basis for union-management cooperation.

Housing. Cities and towns, large and small, have been blighted by the years of stagnation in residential building. Mass shifts of workers brought about by war mobilization and war curtailment of construction activity have multiplied the already acute need for housing.

We propose that work of practical and definite advance planning of rebuilding of communities be undertaken at once as a task by citizens of each and every town. This is an urgent job for local agencies on which private industry, organized labor and government can work jointly toward assurance of economic growth and security after the war. Home reconstruction provides the broadest single base for production and re-employment in major industries. In keeping with other plans for an economy of abundance, we should carry on slum clearance and re-housing of families whose incomes keep them out of reach of the private home-building markets. This must be done through a program of low rent housing with public aid of local housing agencies backed by federal government.

Private initiative should play a leading part in post-war reconstruction with safeguards against speculative abuses in construction and financing. Slum clearance and re-housing of low-income families must supplement private effort to bring decent homes within reach of every family and assure healthy, normal growth to all children—our future citizens.

Public Works. A program of needed public works and services ready to be let to private contractors should be available to supplement private employment in the conversion period and to start as soon as a trend toward production decline appears obvious.

Fiscal Policy. Our national fiscal policy must promote our fundamental purpose—high levels of production and employment. Our accumulated national debt and interest charges thereon will mean sustained high tax rates, but if we maintain high production levels this will not prevent our providing adequate educational opportunities, child welfare, housing, health, public assistance and similar services.

Proposal. We propose representatives of farmers, employers and workers organizations should get together in advance of legislation to agree upon our joint responsibilities.

This program deals only with immediate plans. Additional recommendations will be made from time to time.

This report deals only with fundamental principles which are of basic importance and which are guides in making the blue-prints of concrete proposals for dealing with issues as well as providing the machinery needed to deal with changing economic and political situations and forces.

It is obvious that we are now entering into the period of reconversion through cutbacks by which the procurement agencies adjust production and orders to changes on the fighting front. The turning point in the battle of Europe against Hitler was the loss of North Africa and the inability of the Nazis to defeat Russia by blitzkrieg. They are now fighting a war the Prussian generals know is lost. These facts actuated the insistent demand that Congress enact necessary over-all legislation. That reasoning applies with equal force to our organization which will have responsibility for leadership for our seven million members.

The Post-War Committee has already set up a committee on post-war wages. We have the difficult and urgent problem of readjusting wage rates which have been frozen during a period of unparalleled production activity and increased productivity so that workers' earnings will provide the necessary market for industries converting to basis of maximum production and full employment.

We must also be prepared to counsel workers by industries and by areas on fluctuations in employment and unemployment in order that localities and industries may expand or contract plans. High levels of employment with high national income, because the maximum number of persons are employed at high wages and salaries in producing the things and services the nation needs, is an ideal which challenges our desire and ability to achieve it. Only by the most patient, painstaking planning with sensitive measuring rods to show results can we hope to achieve this ideal.

It is imperative that the Post-War Planning Committee undertake this further responsibility and that means be provided for the employment of the necessary technicians.

(P. 572) Your committee recommends that this convention express its appreciation for the constructive work of the Post-War Planning Committee and its notable contributions in the form of a post-war program and a national forum for the discussion of various post-war problems. The Federation's post-war program was one of the first national documents formulating the goals we hope to achieve through the war and setting up post-war agencies for peace. The Federation realizes we are living in a world community of nations and that unless we organize this community for peace we cannot escape the recurrence of wars. We believe that such world organization is necessary to achieve our sovereign will for peace and instead of limiting our authority and power, makes possible a fuller realization of the spirit and constructive purposes of our people.

As this document points out, there must be equal care to maintain peace on the home front as in world affairs and peace can result only from social justice. For individuals as well as nations, security, a good life and justice must be possible for all.

The committee has outlined the necessary steps to carry us through the transitional period after war is ended. Many of these recommendations have as yet not been adopted as public policy or preparations made by private agencies to achieve maximum levels of employment and production. We are keenly aware that despite much talk of the desirability of full employment with high national income, unless plans and agencies are coordinated to achieve the goal it will never achieve reality. Unless business enterprises and free unions can team together to realize maximum production, we shall have unprecedented unemployment with millions looking to the government for relief, and deflation undercutting the security of investors, management and workers.

We believe that military and production results are such that our Post-War Planning Committee should be reorganized and charged with responsibility for following employment trends by industries, by regions and by areas, and for consultation with employers, with international unions and with representatives of private organizations and governmental agencies, for the advancement and maintenance of employment, for the maintenance of consumers purchasing power at levels that will maintain high levels of employment, and for the maintenance of industrial conditions that assure personal freedom and justice to individual workers and free enterprise for employers.

The welfare of individuals is so closely interrelated and interdependent that only by the procedures and principles of cooperation can we approximate security for all with high standards of living.

We shall need approximately 60 million jobs to provide for all an opportunity to earn a living. The obligations of our Federal Government will necessitate a federal budget of approximately $20 billions. If taxation to produce this sum is not to be unduly oppressive there must be a high national income so that incidents of taxation shall fall on the greatest number of persons. With a national work force of 65 millions we have produced a gross national product of $196 billions; with a work force of 60 millions, gross national production should approximate $173 billions. These figures give us the boundaries within which adjustments will be made.

Changes back to civilian production are already in progress as some military schedules are filled. Production of the weapons of war will continue for replacements or changes in warfare which increase orders in excess of anticipation, and to supply the improvements as use in battle indicates the need.

V-E Day will bring orders sharply cutting war production which will drop still more sharply after V-J Day. Only quick return to civilian production with its rapid expansion can save us from serious unemployment in the transition and after full reconversion. Your committee believes the Post-War Planning Committee should be reorganized and converted into an Employment Committee. To be effective such a representative committee should have the necessary technical and administrative assistance to do an effective job as and when needed. The funds necessary should be allocated to the committee which should make quarterly reports.

We suggest that this Employment Committee consist of the present chairman, representatives of each of the Departments, of minority groups, women workers, the President and Secretary-Treasurer of the American Federation of Labor. This committee shall be the planning and policy making group with an executive committee for administrative purposes.

The activities of such a committee would rely heavily upon a public relations department which has been recommended by past conventions.

By awareness of what is happening and changes in trends, by having in readiness persons responsible for transmitting information and submitting alternate courses of policy, and for bringing together persons and groups concerned in problems, much can be done to avert unnecessary human disasters and to facilitate progress toward sustained high levels of employment. Such procedures have the advantage of strengthening voluntary action and free enterprise, by developing responsibility for action together with informational services to aid in establishing the best action for the particular need.

War Risk Insurance, Marine—(1940, pp. 90, 408) Amendments offered by A. F. of L. to proposed legislation providing war risk insurance against marine perils and marine war risks for American ships, their crews and cargoes, were incorporated in bill. As originally proposed the bill was objectionable to some A. F. of L. marine unions, but with incorporation of proposed amendments, measure became acceptable and was enacted into law.

Washington, George (Anniversary observance)—(1930, p. 391) This convention of the A. F. of L. endorses the observance of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, to take place in 1932, accept with appreciation the invitation of the George Washington Bi-centennial Commission, and pledge this organization to extend earnest cooperation to the United States Commission in all possible ways, so that future generations of American citizens may be inspired to live according to the example and precepts of Washington's exalted life and character, and thus perpetuate the American Republic.

(1931, p. 144) The A. F. of L. convention for 1930 unanimously endorsed the proposal for the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington and directed the E.C. to give such aid and assistance as may be possible in this patriotic work. After conferences with the representatives of the government commission which is charged with the duty of arranging adequate plans for this celebration, a letter was addressed to all state federations of labor and city central bodies urging that these organizations, as well as all affiliated local unions, appoint committees to consider ways and means for proper participation in this celebration either as individual groups or in cooperation with other individuals and community groups.

Labor yields to no one in patriotism and loyalty to our government and in our reverence for the memory of the great man, the grandeur of whose character and achievements grows with the passage of time and whose work, devotion, wisdom, and statesmanship made possible the government under which we live. We wish to give concrete demonstration of this through our hearty and helpful cooperation in all plans and projects for the proper and adequate celebration in 1932. George Washington was born February 22, 1732. The celebration will therefore begin February 22, 1932, and continue until Thanksgiving Day.

We recommend that every delegate to this convention consider himself or herself as a committee of one to work enthusiastically with community groups or individuals whose purpose is the proper celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, or to inaugurate and advocate plans and programs for such celebration.

The officials in charge of the commission headquarters in Washington are prepared to help any group or committee with plans for pageants or other forms of patriotic celebration as may be desired. A letter addressed to the United States Commission for the Celebration of the 200th anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, Washington Building, Washington, D. C. requesting advice, suggestion or printed data will receive prompt reply.

WCFL (Radio Station)—(1940, p. 581) WCFL, owned and operated by organized labor, had asked for permission to double its power. The convention urged the labor movement to cooperate in the attainment of the object of the resolution (No. 185).

Welfare and Pension Funds (see: Pension Plans)

Welfare Department Advocated (Federal)—(1949, pp. 64, 493) The convention was requested through Res. 79 to endorse move being made to create a Federal Department of Welfare of cabinet rank. Referred to E.C. for inquiry and appropriate action.

(1950, p. 155) Res. 79 of the 1949 convention endorsed the establishment of a Department of Public Welfare. The E.C. reported to the 1950 convention that the A. F. of L. had supported legislation for the establishment of a Department of Public Welfare as one of the principal Executive Departments of the Government. The convention reaffirmed need of such a Department.

West Indies—(1942, p. 550) The A. F. of L. was called upon, through Res. No. 11, to support the people of the West Indies in their effort to obtain suffrage and dominion status, etc. The convention adopted the following:

Resolution No. 11 relates to an international situation created by the desire of many citizens of the West Indies to have unrestricted self-government. This problem is of vital interest at that moment because of the World War in which we are now engaged.

Your committee is of the opinion that no organized group is better prepared to deal effectively with this subject than the Anglo-American Trade Union Committee, recently established to deal with the problems of India and similar ones.

Your committee therefore recommends that these resolutions be referred to the Anglo-American Committee which represents the American Federation of Labor and the British Trade Union Congress.

West Point Construction Work—(1930, p. 256) The War Department of the Federal Government has been doing all the construction work that has been done at West Point for the past eight years.

Those in authority have violated the prevailing wage and working standards established in the vicinity of West Point during this entire period.

Every effort so far to change this unfair situation has been met by the opposition of those in charge of West Point, supported by the War Department.

Therefore the A. F. of L. protests against this action of the War Department and requests the E.C. to take up the matter with Government officials in order that wage rates and working standards established in the vicinity of West Point may apply on construction work done by the Government in the future at West Point.

White Collar Workers—(1944, pp. 198, 590) Under the caption "White Collar Workers" the Executive Council reports upon its efforts during the year to secure adequate protection for the 15 million white collar Americans who are imperiled by the existing economic situation. The welfare of these groups was canvassed, and an agreement reached by the representatives of these organizations relative to the proposals which should be presented to the Senate subcommittee. In the hearings held, the representatives of these groups were given an opportunity to present the plight of such workers, and definite legislative proposals were made by their respective committees.

The council's report indicates the urgent necessity of giving every assistance possible to the so-called white collar workers because the position of many of them has become deplorable in view of their failure to secure a sufficient wage to meet the rapidly increased cost of living. The situation for a majority of these groups is a steadily deteriorating economic condition. Their standard of living has been forced downward. No group has been less successful in maintaining a real wage.

These groups, because of the character of their employment, must have the militant support of the American Federation of Labor. We cannot afford to remain silent or idle while a large section of the American workers are being forced to continually lower their standard of living because of an insufficient wage. It should be our definite purpose to extend every assistance to these groups in organizing, and in addition, to speak as well as work for them on all occasions.

Wild Life (Conservation)—(1948, pp 170, 472) The Executive Council reported that the A. F. of L. had supported proposed legislation as follows:

H.R. 2472—To provide expert assistance and to cooperate with federal, state, and other suitable agencies, in promoting the conservation of wildlife by promoting sound land-use practices.

The bill would authorize the Secretary of Interior to cooperate with appropriate officials of each state, or in his discretion with other suitable agencies, to revise the owners and custodians of lands or of waters regarding methods to restore, rehabilitate and improve areas adaptable to feeding, resting, or breeding places for wildlife. It proposed to make available to states, upon request, special workers who are trained in this phase of the farm program on a cooperative basis providing that the amount expended by the Federal Government in cooperation with any state or other cooperating agency during any fiscal year shall not exceed 75 percent of the estimated cost thereof.

This appeared to be a worthwhile program which would go far to restore the balance in wildlife in America. We supported the bill but it died in committee.

(P. 472) Convention authorized continued support of this legislation.

Wire Tapping—(1940, p. 406) The Executive Council called attention to a House Joint Resolution to permit wire-tapping by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the interest of national defense and in the apprehension of individuals engaged in any subversive or "fifth-column" activities.

While the American Federation of Labor is wholeheartedly in sympathy with and will render full co-operation in the national defense program and in the suppression of any Nazi, Fascist, Communist, or other subversive activities, because of potential dangers to organized labor in the original resolution, amendments have been proposed which are now before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce where the resolution was referred after having been passed by the House.

Your committee recommends continued activity to secure satisfactory safeguards for organized labor in any measure adopted.

(1942, p. 158) House Joint Resolution 310 authorizes the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department, and the Office of Naval Intelligence of the Navy Department in the conduct of certain investigations in the interest of prosecution of the war, to make use of intercepted communications without regard to the limitations contained in Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934. Although the American Federation of Labor has expressed its opposition to wire tapping as a general policy, the Executive Council withdrew opposition because this measure is in general essence a war measure—effective only until six months after the termination of the war or until sooner terminated by the President or by Congress. It does not diminish the present power of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the military and Naval Intelligence services to intercept communications. It is intended to make admissible in evidence information with respect to the offenses referred to which may be obtained by wire tapping, notwithstanding the provisions of Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934.

(1953, p. 200) In its report under the general title of "Legislation", the E.C. stated:

Several bills were introduced to permit wire tapping and use of information obtained in certain criminal and civil proceedings. We testified on these bills and filed a brief stating that we recognized the desirability for authorizing the use of wire tapping by proper federal officials after obtaining a court order in cases involving the security of the United States. We recommended certain amendments to the pending legislation to fully safeguard labor's rights and prevent the use of wide tapping as an anti-labor device. We also urged that severe penalties for unauthorized wire tapping be included in any bill submitted to the Congress. The Department of Justice insists it needs this legislation for effective prosecution of espionage and sedition cases. We have discussed the problem with the Deputy Attorney General and are confident that our rights will be protected in any legislation that will be reported. The House Committee on Judiciary took no action on the bills.

(1954, p. 125) Reporting on legislation relating to wiretapping by the Attorney General, the E.C. stated that the A. F. of L. had supported an amendment to proposed legislation authorizing the Attorney General to resort to wiretapping under certain circumstances. The A. F. of L. supported amendment would restrict such powers by requiring a court order prior to such wiretapping. The E.C. report stated:

... We testified for the McCarran bill (S. 3229) which makes any wiretapping by any individual or official illegal except in cases affecting the national security where a court order has been issued at the request of the Attorney General. In these instances an order would be issued only on a showing by the Attorney General that there was a reasonable belief that the security of the country was seriously affected by the actions of the individuals named in the order and the order would be limited to a definite period of time. This bill does not legalize evidence heretofore gathered by illegal wiretapping. The Senate took no action on either bill.

(P. 531) Your committee notes that a strenuous effort on the part of the Administration to enact legislation to legalize wiretapping was defeated. The Federation took a position in support of a bill to legalize wiretapping in cases involving national security but insisted on stringent safeguards. The Federation further insisted that all other wiretapping should be outlawed and made a criminal offense.

We recommend that this policy be pursued in the future.

(Pp. 372, 519) Res. 7:

Whereas—What is known as the "Wire Tapping Bill" but now called the "Anti-Traitor" legislation, demanded by the Attorney General, is dangerously near passage, and

Whereas—This Bill is deeply rooted into the past history of organized labor's struggle through the Pinkerton and Yellow Dog Contract days, now underhandedly recommended by Big Business and Anti-Labor forces, with a cover-up and a smoke-screen of "Anti-Traitor" terminology, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled take action necessary to protest and kill the Wire-Tapping Law.

Referred to officers of A. F. of L. for action in accord with policy.

(1955, p. 151) The E.C. reported that five bills were introduced in the current Congress relating to wiretapping, but that none of the proposed bills met A. F. of L. objections. A new bill was proposed by the A. F. of L. embodying the following principles:

1. Congress should outlaw all wiretapping except in cases involving the national security.

2. Wiretapping should be permitted only in cases involving the national security and only after a federal judge has given a specific grant of authority to a federal law enforcement agency.

3. Information obtained as a result of past wiretapping should not be admissible as evidence in court.

The report concluded: The Administration is still endeavoring to obtain legislation which would permit wiretapping at the discretion of the Attorney General and also legalize use of evidence heretofore obtained. We will continue our efforts to obtain a bill which will protect the rights of the people and put a stop to the indiscriminate wiretapping now being used in many areas.

Wisconsin Act (Labor Disputes Act)—(see: 1940, pp. 328-336) A number of very vital legal decisions were presented to the 1940 convention by the Legal Counsel of the A. F. of L. These included the Simplex Shoe Company, American Furniture Company, etc., briefly covered under their respective headings.

Women (also see: Women and Children in War Production; Equal Rights Amendment)

(1924, p. 63) In accord with the instructions of the Portland convention conferences have been held to develop plans for the better organization of wage earning women. Preparatory to the first conference, an effort was made to ascertain the size of the problem. Our inquiry disclosed that there are approximately 3,500,000 women over fifteen years of age employed in industry of whom about 200,000 are members of trade unions. Two conferences of all national organizations concerned and a number of committee meetings were held in our effort to develop a plan for action and the necessary funds for its creation.

The E.C. asked for a full report on the conferences and the plan outlining methods by which we hope to inaugurate a campaign for the better organization of women. After considering the whole situation the council felt that because of the very few pledges of substantial support to a separate and distinctive movement confined to organizing women wage earners, it was obvious that general concerted action would be impracticable. Furthermore, the council felt the plan outlined would inevitably set up a bureau which would be in a position to encroach upon the prerogatives of the internationals concerned and the A. F. of L.. The council held that this danger could be averted if the work of organizing came under the direction of the executive officers and supervision of the E.C. itself. Because of the business depression and consequent widespread unemployment of the present time as well as the concentration of interest on the political campaign the council felt that the immediate future would not be a wise period in which to launch an extensive organizing campaign but believed that it should prepare and hold itself in readiness to inaugurate a movement with the cooperation of interested international organizations just as soon as a propitious time should come.

The problem of organizing women in industry presents a perplexing difficulty in that by many of the girls and women such employment is regarded as merely temporary. British experience indicates that the turnover in women's unions is nearly complete in five years. This means that aggressive organizing work in shops and factories employing women must be continuous. However, the fact that these women leave industry does not mean their influence is lost to the labor movement. As home-makers, as the wives of trade unionists, and in other relationships of life, they have influence through purchasing in formulating public opinion, and their use of the ballot.

Such women are enfranchised and this is an additional reason why they should understand the labor movement and its purposes. As it becomes increasingly obvious that there is an identity of interest of men and women as workers and as voting citizens it is evident that our plans for organization and education must be better balanced so as to assure coordination and cooperation of all.

After carefully studying the plans developed in the conferences held during the past year as well as the difficulties of organizing work, judgment and experience compel the following recommendations:

1. That responsibility for organizing women in industry be left in the hands of the E.C. at the opportune time with the cooperation of international unions to initiate a drive in such localities as to them seem advisable. As this is primarily an administrative function it should be handled as such.

2. That the Federation can promote the organization of women in industry by making available informational sources and material and by carrying on the educational work necessary to better understanding of the problem of women in industry and the necessity for constructive action.

3. And to endeavor to secure the cooperation of all interested in the protection and the promotion through organization of the rights and interests of the women wage earners of America.

(P. 150) Convention approved of the report of the E.C.

(1925, p. 38) At the request of a number of international officers of trade unions within whose jurisdiction a considerable number of women workers are employed, the President of the A. F. of L. is to work out a plan by which there can be joint planning and concentration of organizing activity under the leadership of the A. F. of L.

It is the purpose of this undertaking to avoid the creation of new agencies or new machinery with consequent additional expense and by the better utilization of resources and personnel to make more satisfactory headway in organizing women employed in industry.

The participating organizations will detail organizers to the localities selected from time to time and the A. F. of L. will designate a representative to act as the coordinating agent and will serve as the clearing center for information and literature.

(1926, p. 158) A special campaign to increase the percentage of organization among women wage earners was begun in New Jersey in March. Some national and international unions have participated in this undertaking through organizers and contributions. Results thus far have not been what they should, due to indifference among those directly appealed to and due to the fact that we lacked an adequate organizing force through which we could carry forward an aggressive campaign.

The problem of organizing women wage earners involves difficult elements growing out of the newness of the employment of women in large numbers in industries. That these problems must be met is evident from records showing that women are more and more seeking employment in industrial establishments. There is need for continuation of this special campaign and for increasing emphasis in all organizing work for organizing women as well as men.

Special organizing literature for women was prepared for the new Jersey campaign made available for all national and international and central bodies.

(1932, p. 243) The E.C. is hereby instructed to petition Congress to enact legislation which will prohibit the U.S. Government and its instrumentalities from purchasing goods to be used by any and all government departments where women and children are employed in the manufacture of these goods after six o'clock post meridian or before the hour of six o'clock ante-meridian or more than 48 hours in any week or where women and children are employed below a wage scale which provides decency and comfort.

Unfortunately our government in its capacity as a consumer buys its goods under a system of competitive bidding which awards the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. Of necessity, this places the union contractor and the establishment operating under union conditions at a distinct disadvantage. On the other hand, this system operates to aid and encourage the unfair employer who seeks only to produce goods at a minimum cost with no regard for the humanities involved.

It is the opinion of the convention that the E.C. might well go beyond the scope covered in this resolution to secure either legislation or executive action to the end that the government in its purchase of supplies insist that advanced employment standards, such as conform to the principles of organized labor, be followed by the manufacturer. Cheapness of manufacture should not be the only consideration in the granting of government bids. There are numerous other factors of far greater importance.

(1934, p. 553) Reaffirmed the principle that women should receive equal pay for equal work.

(1937, pp. 175, 310) Reducing the upper limits set by the states on daily and weekly hours of labor for women and minors, is a helpful preliminary step to the general establishment of the shorter workday. The 54, 56, 60-hour weeks that were set as upper limits decades ago, have long been recognized as obsolete. Only, unfortunately, since violations even of such statutes, continue to occur and to be reported annually by the state labor departments enforcing them, they are not as completely obsolete, in fact, as they should be. Bills to shorten hours were introduced in nearly every one of the 43 state legislatures meeting this year, and some measures of success were scored in 10 states. Pennsylvania (which previously had a nine-hour day, 54-hour week for women) established an eight-hour day, 44-hour week for all workers. Ohio brought its women's hour law down from nine to eight a day and from 50 to 48 a week. Illinois established the eight-hour day, instead of its former 10-hour day, for women and minors, and for the first time set a weekly limit, 48 hours.

New York brought women and minors in hotels and restaurants under the state standard of eight and 48 which governs other types of establishments and brought all workers in these establishments under the one-day-of-rest law.

New Hampshire established the 48-hour week this year in place of 54, but still permits a 10-hour day; Nevada established an eight-hour day and 48-hour week, in principle, but a joker permits evasion wherever an adequate supply of labor is not obtainable. North Carolina again attracts attention by reducing its hours for women from 10 to nine, and from 55 to 48, and at the same time, is experimenting with hours legislation for men, setting for them the standard that formerly applied to women, 10 and 55.

(1942, p. 414) (Need for Organizing) In connection with the change of title for the Journeymen Barbers International Union, to the present one encompassing women workers in the industry, the convention adopted the following statement with regard to the growing need for the organization of women workers in the trade union movement:

This change of title properly takes cognizance of the change in the industry itself. It recognizes the extensive field of service for women, by women.

Your committee would point out that while this change is a technical change in name only for this one international union, it is at the same time a symbol of recognition of the growing importance of women in the trade union movement.

The need of organizing women into our labor movement wherever they work is urgent. Their participation in our bona fide trade unions in such occupations in which they are being called upon to serve is a matter of deepest concern to our movement, to these workers, and to the community as a whole. Millions of women will enter industry this year. Their service to their country, to their immediate community and to the general human welfare is enriched and improved, we believe, to the degree to which they participate with full understanding in the constructive programs of their respective unions.

Your committee would therefore commend this recognition, in form, of the growing place of women in our national industrial life and would further urge that every possible encouragement and assistance be granted to unions seeking to enlist women in our movement.

(1951, pp. 210, 540) The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly emphasized that economic problems of employment do not differ for workers on a basis of sex, nationality, religion or any other standard and that unions should organize workers concerned with problems of work on the job without discrimination.

The American Federation of Labor has emphasized the need of all workers organizing and working together as a matter of principle. Women themselves must be prime movers in gaining equality and bettering their conditions.

The American Federation of Labor early took what was then an advance stand in urging equal opportunity for women to organize as well as equal suffrage for all citizens. Its first responsibility was to get unions to follow this principle by organizing women workers.

In reviewing briefly the traditional policies we find a clear-cut pattern.

The first annual convention of the American Federation of Labor adopted the principle of no discrimination against any worker believing in trade unionism.

The second convention extended to all women's labor organizations representation on an equal footing with organizations of men; a most advanced position for 1882.

In 1885, the convention called on working women of the country to organize.

In 1890, the convention reaffirmed its resolve to organize women and renewed its exhortation of women to join unions; state factory inspectors were urged to appoint women as deputies: it was agreed to initiate organizing campaigns for women; in connection with a display of products at the world's fair, the Federation urged no separation of women's work from men's in displays—only classifications as to whether done by women or men.

Beginning with the convention of 1890, the Federation began its cooperation with women's organizations to secure a U.S. Constitutional Amendment granting the franchise to all citizens—regardless of sex. A joint resolution passed by Congress was ratified by sufficient state legislatures and became the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920.

The Classification Act, which the American Federation of Labor helped to enact, directed that there should be no discrimination on basis of sex in Civil Service.

So far, the policy of the American Federation of Labor was a clear cut effort to secure equal rights for women so that they could have equal opportunity to promote their own welfare and assume responsibility for working on an equal basis with men.

With the beginning of World War I, women workers had greater opportunities to get more skilled jobs formerly given exclusively to men. Consequently, their connection with the labor force became more permanent.

The 1898 Convention adopted the following resolution:

In view of the awful conditions under which woman is compelled to toil, this, the 18th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, strongly urges the more general formation of wage-working women, to the end that they may scientifically and permanently abolish the terrible evils accompanying their weakened, because unorganized, state, and we emphatically reiterate the trade union demand that women receive equal compensation for equal service performed.

In 1903, the A. F. of L. joined with women leaders in founding the Women's Trade Union League.

The 1915 Convention declared:

The trade union movement which has ever been foremost in the age-long struggle for freedom, was among the first to point out the danger of regulating industrial relations for women by law, and to formulate the policy that women workers, aided by men, must organize and work out their own salvation, develop their own ideas, and be responsible for their realization.

The 1917 convention declared: The A. F. of L. reiterates its well defined position and insists that equal pay should be given for equal work without regard to sex.

In 1922, the A F. of L. Convention declared:

International and national organizations that do not admit women workers to membership are urged to give early consideration for such admission. Where women workers are refused admission to international unions having jurisdiction over the industry in which they are employed, the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor is directed to take up the subject with the international unions involved and endeavor to reach an understanding as to the issuance of federal charters.

The A. F. of L. has sponsored and assisted efforts to put a floor under collective bargaining for women workers by legislation, limiting excessive hours of work, fixing minimum wages, and finally by local legislation to bring in the aid of mediation in establishing the principle of equal pay for equal work.

Our program has consisted of a series of proposals to provide equality of opportunity for women workers with men, to promote their own welfare. The A. F. of L. gave substantial aid in removing handicaps that constituted discrimination.

The Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor in 1945 sponsored a federal bill to make the Secretary of Labor responsible for enforcing the equal pay for equal work program under federal jurisdiction. Similar bills have been introduced in succeeding Congresses. This broad proposal necessitates decision on fundamental principles: shall we recommend that equal pay for equal work be included in trade union contracts enforced by unions and their officers, or shall women be advised to secure this standard and its enforcement by federal law and administration? The latter course takes this objective out of the contractual realm, and places it under an administrator, with ultimate enforcement through fines and imprisonment.

Since the Defense Production Administration is counting upon inducing a greater number of women to join the labor force, it is timely that we review our organizing plans, to seek to convince women workers that they should enlist in the ranks of the appropriate trade union for their own best interests as well as in consideration of the welfare of other workers. When women join the labor force, they should share the responsibility of employed persons to keep their standards in line with technical progress. Women, no more than men workers, should not expect to share the benefits of organizations unless they also share in the work necessary to maintain effective and progressive standards.

The American Federation of Labor has always opposed regulation or fixation of wages or hours by law, except minimum standards evolved out of experience, because we believe progress is best facilitated when management and unions agree upon standards which can be reconsidered whenever conditions warrant. Mutual agreement between the two non-governmental groups concerned is a simpler and surer method than amending standards embodied in law or inducing government administrators to modify decisions and policies.

For the reason that standards can keep pace with technical progress more easily through joint contracts administered by non-governmental agents than by legislation administered by political agents, we urge women workers not to put their primary dependence in legislation, but to accept personal responsibility contributing to efforts for progress. The policy of turning first to legislation has the illusory lure of the finality of established policy, but it would leave women without their tool—the union—in securing enforcement of labor laws. Progress for women would become separate from that for men to the detriment of progress for both.

Because of the difficulties of operating partly through legislation and partly through unions, one method would probably drive the other out for all workers. The influence of management would be for the more clumsy medium—legislation and government administration—thus losing the flexibility of non-governmental agencies.

We believe that the more constructive approach to this problem of equal treatment is along these lines: (1) to assure women of equal access with men to opportunities for training for skilled work in order to be equipped for employment. Such opportunity can be utilized by those who want the training; (2) to call on all national and international unions to develop special and sustained plans for the organization of women workers and to establish the practice of equal standards for all without discrimination; and (3) to negotiate all wage scales to provide the same pay for all doing the same or equal work without discrimination.

We believe it unwise to seek federal legislation to accomplish what experience indicates is a matter for organization and contract between the workers and employers concerned. In addition to long established practices, experience under Taft-Hartley demonstrates the un wisdom of putting control over the content of collective bargaining under administrative control. Such control restricts freedom of contract.

(P. 540) Your committee believes that the Executive Council is wise in calling attention early in the defense effort to the need of trade union membership for women who must do their part in defense work. Expansion of both civilian and defense production, together with need for more men for military service means that our chief manpower sources will be women and older workers.

We well know that workers do not do their best work where the work force is part non-union and only a part organized in trade unions. Our first responsibility is to bring women into affiliation with unions to which they are eligible along with new men workers and those coming back from retirement. Organization and education of workers is the responsibility of our unions. There are no short cuts to relieve us of continuous organization efforts. Any discrimination that creeps into organization work, whether based on sex, nationality or religion, limits the potentiality and effectiveness of that union which practices it. Wages, hours and other economic factors respond to economic forces which must be as inclusive as possible to get best results.

We urge that the President of the American Federation of Labor urge upon national and international officials and Federation organizations to give priority to organization of women workers. We urge also the abolition of discriminatory women's rates so that unions shall stand uncompromisingly for equal pay for equal work, and one rate on the job. This policy is necessary to protect the rates and employment for men and living standards for families.

We move also approval of the Executive Council's position that we disapprove dealing with the matter of equal pay by federal law at this time, and make final decision on that policy after more experience. The proposal would increase the authority of the Federal Government to intervene in collective bargaining and union contract—a right which we are finding most troublesome and constrictive under Taft-Hartley.

(1952, p. 226) . . . There can be no question but that women are permanently an integral part of the labor force, working because they must have income to support themselves and their dependents. . . .

Plans for defense and defense production have made additional employment opportunities for women who need these opportunities for their own and their dependents support. Diversion of men to the military services makes entrance into jobs previously barred to women open to such as can get the necessary required training. In such emergencies, training rarely provides for full craft training but trains for special operations. But even this much enables women to get into occupations previously completely barred. This and previous experience indicate that the road to equal industrial opportunities begins with assuring equal access to craft and industrial training. To do equal work with equal efficiency necessitates equal training, understanding and ability to maintain volume of high quality production.

The discipline of daily work under specific conditions where standards must be maintained is good for both women and men workers providing opportunities for creative development.

We recommend the following program for the coming year:

1. That every national and international union within whose jurisdiction women workers are employed initiate a special organization program to turn these women workers into good trade unionists.
2. That the A. F. of L. Director of Organization assist this movement by promoting common undertakings and pooling experience. . . .

It is also important that women workers realize their responsibilities as members of the labor force and assume the duties of keeping step with industrial progress. Even if it should happen that some women workers ceased to be income earners, they would still be better off living in a world where workers are better off as a result of universal sharing in progress.

Women workers who marry and become responsible for family welfare will purchase supplies with understanding of workers' problems and problems of workers' progress. . . .

(P. 445) Committee recommendations unanimously approved as follows:

The contribution made by women workers to our economic life has gained special importance during the present defense mobilization. Women are being called upon in increasing numbers to fill essential defense jobs and to replace men leaving civilian work for employment in defense industries or induction into the Armed Forces.

It is important that these women workers be brought as rapidly as possible into the organized labor movement. Your committee is fully in accord with the Executive Council's recommendation that every national and international union initiate a special organizational drive to bring women workers into our trade unions and that the Director of Organization of the A. F. of L. assist our affiliates in achieving this purpose in every way possible and that he help coordinate this effort.

The Executive Council calls attention to the valuable information on the problems of women workers, collected and published by the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor. Your committee recommends that full use be made of these materials in our efforts to organize women workers.

(Women and Children in War Production)—(1942, p. 197) Women and young people who are entering the labor market in increasing numbers make up two of our major reserves of manpower.

At the present time women are accounting for more of the current upswing in employment than men. Between May, 1941, and May, 1942, 1,700,000 additional women were employed and only 1,400,000 additional men. A great many of these women have been and will be drawn from nonworker groups, as shown by the fact that the number of women who were unemployed during the May, 1941, to May, 1942, period declined by only 800,000. Assimilation of new women into industry involves special problems which must be dealt with in the interest of the workers themselves and in furthering the goals for which this war is being fought. These problems include quality of training, conditions of work, special safeguards on the job, hours and wages, and, for the large group of mothers with children under 16 years, adequate provision for day care of children.

The new woman worker is as entitled to the same program of orientation into this new field of activity as is the male worker who enters industry from agriculture. Both the industry and the worker will profit from careful initial training and intelligent use of personnel advisers.

In both England and Germany it was found that labor laws must be strengthened rather than relaxed to bring about successful employment of women in industry, yet we find in this country that many states have relaxed labor laws affecting the employment of women in industry. By the end of July, 1942, 34 states had taken legislative or administrative action to relax laws which require a day of rest every seven days, restrict night work, and set maximum hours for women workers. Most of the new laws are of a temporary nature enacted for the emergency period only. We must make certain, however, that these women and their families are not victimized by their patriotism and that relaxations and exemptions are not granted unless such a step is vital to an Allied victory. Employers and legislators should also bear in mind the rapid decline in efficiency where health and morale are damaged by long hours or night shifts.

Our experience in the last war and during our present war production program has proved that the work of women in industry is equal, and in many cases superior, to that of men. Wages paid to women workers must be equal to the pay of male workers for the same job. The differential wage rate is disappearing to a degree and it must be eliminated entirely from our production picture. Wages, hours and conditions of work for women can be improved through organization. We call the attention of all international unions to their responsibility to offer this new group of workers membership and the necessary union protection.

Several million potential women workers are prevented from entering the labor market by their responsibility for children under 16 years of age. The mothers' first responsibility is to home and children and they should not seek employment unless the need is imperative. There is a large group of working mothers whose young children are not being adequately cared for during their working hours. According to school reports, the practice of keeping seven and eight-year-olds home from school to care for younger children is becoming more and more prevalent. Increasing number of "latch key" children must unlock an empty house and prepare their own meals after school hours. Such gross neglect will inevitably be reflected in the growth of juvenile delinquency, a problem which we faced during the last war and which is serious in England today. Adequate provision must be made to care for these children and to relieve their mothers of anxiety. Freedom from worry over home responsibilities is important to efficiency on the job.

Community programs for day-care of children, supported by state leadership and guidance and by federal assistance where necessary, are imperative in areas where mothers are being employed in war work. A "Committee for the Care of Children in Wartime" should be formed in each community, with representatives from social agencies, parent groups, labor organizations, employer organizations, educational institutions, and government agencies concerned with defense and public welfare. The program prepared by the Children's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor includes individual counseling service for mothers, foster-family day care, centers for group care, before and after school care for the school-age child, homemaker service, supplementary care for sick children, and training programs for homemaker aides, foster mothers, and group care personnel.

By the end of July, 1942, four states had taken action which in varying degrees relaxes the protection under the law of children in industry. The safeguarding of young workers in wartime industry and agriculture is of major importance. In 1941 more than 3,000,000 persons of 14 years and over, who were in school in April, were actively participating in the labor market during July and August. Figures covering the summer of 1942 will show an even greater influx of students, especially into agricultural labor. Available jobs at good pay will induce many to continue working rather than to return to school in September. Child labor laws and school attendance requirements must be maintained for the protection of these young people. "Children bear the promise of a better world. Our task as never before is to defend and protect them to the end that the promise is fulfilled." The youth of America must be prepared mentally and physically to accept the responsibilities of rebuilding the world when this war is ended.

The American Federation of Labor urges that there be no relaxation in protection of working women and children under labor legislation. Although the course of the war may necessitate some modification of this policy, at the present time it is neither necessary nor advisable that more severe demands be made upon the women and young people engaged in war production.

(P. 468) As men are drawn from their normal occupations into the armed services their places in our economy must be filled. At present the total of our work force including those in the armed services is over 58 millions, about five millions having been shifted from civilian and war production to the military services. As the armed forces are increased they will also be supplemented by an increasing quota of women.

Our industrial and civilian life must be carried on by those left. Already older men have been recalled to industry and women and, unfortunately, children are filling the vacancies. Already 12.6 millions are employed in war production. This number is expected to reach 17.5 millions by the end of the year, and 20 millions by the end of 1943. Workers in civilian production will drop from 29.8 millions as of December, 1941, to 20.5 millions by next December, and to 19.1 millions by the end of 1943.

Of our total population 14 years and over (103.1 millions, about half of whom are males and half females) over 58 millions are already in our national labor force. These 58 million include 84 per cent of all males and 29 per cent of all females aged 14 years and over. Of the remaining 45.1 millions, 8.1 millions are in school, 6.0 millions are physically handicapped, 1.3 millions are institutionalized, 29.8 millions are home makers. Practically all the 8 million males not in the labor force are in school, handicapped, or in institutions, and they are predominantly very old or very young. Nearly 37 million women are outside the labor market. Of these, 29.8 millions are home makers, 4.1 millions are in school, 2.4 millions unable to work, and one-half million in institutions.

It is the 29.8 million home makers who are the potential labor reserves from which must come needed workers to replace men drawn from civilian or war industries and also the women taken into military service. One-half of the home makers are aged between 20 and 44 and nine-tenths are under 65 years, about 79 per cent are married, and more than half have one or more children; 12.7 millions have children under 16 years, nearly one-half have at least one child under 5 years of age, approximately one-fourth have at least one child between the ages of 5 and 9. Two million are single persons. This group—the married women with no children under 16 years, and married women with children over 10 years of age—constitute the most likely reserve labor force that should be utilized before children are taken from education.

It is obvious that more and more women will come into the nation's work force and unions should make their plans accordingly and communities should provide care for their children. We urge that the recommendation of the Executive Council on this case be made effective in every community.

We also emphasize the admonition of the Executive Council that equal pay on the job be made the prevailing practice. This is a matter of justice to the women which will protect the pay of all.

Recent reports on child labor show a shocking increase in illegal employment of minors.

More than twice as many 14- to 18-year-olds went to work in 1941 as in 1940. Figures for 1942 show that this increase is continuing. For 14- and 15-year-olds, in states where minimum age requirements were the same in both years, there was an increase in 1941 over 1940 of more than 75 per cent. Large increases are shown for this group in 1942, and the increase in the number of certificates issued in the first six months of 1942 over the first six months of 1941 was 173.4 per cent in Alabama, 226.8 per cent in Indiana, and 713.0 per cent in the District of Columbia.

The increase in certificates for first regular and first vacation or outside school hours for 16- and 17-year-old workers in areas sending in comparable reports was 132.0 per cent. In the first six months of 1942 as compared with the same period in 1941, the number of employment certificates issued for 16- and 17-year-old minors increased 181.9 per cent in Alabama, 437.4 per cent in Indiana, 734.4 per cent in the District of Columbia, and 1259.9 per cent in Rhode Island. Figures covering certificates issued for this age group during June 1941 and June 1942 show a 109.0 per cent increase in Baltimore, Maryland, a 114.0 per cent increase in 11 cities in Pennsylvania, and a 1596.0 per cent increase in the State of Washington.

Children in the 14- and 15-year-old group are working as delivery boys, peddlers, sales girls, car hops, helpers, and various other occupations including manufacturing. The 16- and 17-year-old group are entering service and non-manufacturing industries but increasing numbers are going into manufacturing industries.

In some states a new certificate is required whenever a minor changes his job. Between 1940 and 1941 and between the first four months of 1941 and the first four months of 1942, there was more than a 200 per cent increase in the 16- and 17-year-olds changing their jobs, and over a 100 per cent increase for minors 14 and 15 years old.

There is at the present time no excuse for tolerance of illegal employment, and we urge all unions and especially central labor unions to do their utmost to see that educational opportunities are maintained and that children are permitted to attend. This is a long-time responsibility which we must fulfill as our obligation to the future.

(1943, p. 134) In the development of the War Manpower Commission program and policies for the employment of women and younger people in industry, we have pressed for the inclusion in these standards, provisions for equal pay for equal work, for upholding of standards with respect to employment of women that safeguard their health, and for standards which prevent the employment of children and younger people in any hazardous occupation.

Women's Auxiliaries—(1925, p. 213)

We believe that it would be unwise and too far-reaching to charter, or to permit recognition with voice and vote, to organizations that are not regularly chartered by the A. F. of L.; and in the case of ladies' auxiliaries this is too far-reaching and may in time bring about considerable dissension. It would also mean that ladies who are not members of trade unions, but are relatives or friends of members of trade unions, could form auxiliaries and apply for admission in central and state bodies with the right of voice and vote, and if written into the constitution it would be compulsory on central bodies and state branches to admit said auxiliaries.

(1941, p. 411) We request and suggest that all national, international unions, state organizations, city central bodies and local unions do all they can to help the officers of the Union Label Trades Department in forming women's auxiliaries in the local unions because men claim that the women hold the purchasing power. We want the women of union men to spend their union-earned wages for union label goods and recognize union service cards and buttons. We believe that women should be educated in regard to union label shop cards and buttons. Therefore, we believe the best way to get the women union-label-conscious is by belonging to a trades union auxiliary.

(1946, p. 244) The report of the Union Label Trades Department to the 1946 Convention contained the following statement:

The importance of women's auxiliaries should be stressed more and more now during the reconversion period. The purchasing power of the women members of a wage earner's family is most important to every marketing place. Too great an effort cannot be made to encourage members of women's auxiliaries and all members of trade unionists' families to buy only union label goods and to use only union services. Through the efforts of women's auxiliaries, many women have come to realize that union emblems are the best safeguards for their bread-earners' jobs and insurance of American labor standards which include wages, hours and working conditions. More and more encouragement must be given to women members of every trade unionist's family to join the American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor. This fact cannot be over-stressed, because while the wage earner may be working to obtain the union scales, his wife, mother, sister and daughter may be spending his union-earned money with merchandisers who are selling the very non-union products that are destroying his or her union standards and reducing his wages.

(P. 416) The report of the convention was unanimously adopted as follows:

Your committee believes that every effort should be put forward by affiliated national and international unions to encourage the formation of women's auxiliaries. Your committee recognizes the fact that women are the actual shoppers in the home and it is only reasonable to assume that unless women are made acquainted with the problems of the American Federation of Labor that they could not be expected to demand union label merchandise and union services when purchasing merchandise or patronizing service establishments.

(1947, p. 457) Under this caption, it is recommended that every affiliated national and international union in the American Federation of Labor encourage the growth of women's auxiliaries. Your committee concurs in this recommendation in the belief that if we are to wage an effective campaign against the Taft-Hartley Law, we must encourage the participation of the wives, mothers, sisters and daughters of trade unionists to not only spend union-earned money for union label merchandise and union services, but they must also be made acquainted with the American Federation of Labor's political program. It is the opinion of your committee that it is essential that the women be encouraged to join auxiliaries.

(1952, p. 555) Convention approved report of progress being made by the American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor and adopted the following statement of the committee:

Your committee notes with pleasure the report of the Executive Council on the steady and substantial progress being made by the American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor. The committee concurs in the observations of the Executive Council regarding the active part which members of women's auxiliaries play in promoting the union shop card, label and service button as well as their advancing the principles of the American Federation of Labor in civic, state and federal affairs and in welfare and charitable organizations; and urges those national and international unions having already established women's auxiliaries to give attention to strengthening them; and encourages affiliated organizations which have not established such auxiliaries to do so at the earliest practical time.

(Equal Pay on Government Contracts) (Res. No. 25)

(1941, pp. 252, 543-544) The convention concurred in a resolution providing that the American Federation of Labor use its best efforts to enact laws that would prohibit the awarding of government contracts to employers of both men and women who pay women lower bonuses, piece rates, hourly, weekly or monthly wages or salaries than is being paid to males similarly employed.

(1946, pp. 227, 470) Headed "Equal Pay for Women," this section of the Executive Council's report tells of the failure of H.R. 5221 and S. 1178 to pass either House during the last session of Congress.

In its report the Executive Council states that it will support the principle enunciated in the title of the bills but that if similar proposals are introduced in the forthcoming session they should be carefully examined before approval is given.

(1948, pp. 122, 395) The E.C. reported support for legislation to provide equal pay for equal work for women and in its report to the convention set out the following reasons for their support:

For many years the American Federation of Labor has advocated certain types of protective legislation for women based on sex differentials, which prohibit night work, exceptionally long hours, limiting weights to be lifted, prohibiting employment in connection with certain persons, providing rest periods, seats, etc. The reason for this policy was conservation of the nation by safeguarding mothers—actual and potential. However, the issue of equal pay on the job, as between men and women workers, is primarily a problem of economic justice to be, in our opinion, best handled by collective bargaining as are other such problems and legislation concerning this issue must be given careful examination before approval is given.

The convention directed the E.C. to continue to work for the enactment of legislation to retain all present advantages and seek to eradicate inequities that occur through failure of present law, to make same pay available to women as men doing the same work.

(1954, p. 161) The E.C. Report under this title pointed out the official A. F. of L. position on proposed legislation, support for which was solicited from A. F. of L. affiliates. Explanation for A. F. of L. position was given substantially as follows:

The Women's Bureau of the Labor Department, beginning in 1945, has sponsored and actively advocated federal legislation to make it possible to enforce payment of equal compensation to women in interstate commerce or otherwise under federal jurisdiction. The A. F. of L. regards this proposal unwise and has withheld its support.

Starting in 1881, the A. F. of L. has championed equal treatment toward women. By practical experience, our affiliates have sought to better wages, hours and working standards for women wage and salary earners. In our Federation, there are 2,500,000 women members in industrial, trade, service and professional skills and occupations. These include textile workers, garment workers, foundry, railroad, stage and screen workers, teachers, shipyard, electrical, printing trades, chemical, office workers and many other lines.

Through direct negotiation and collective bargaining, historic differentials have been eliminated in comparable work. Better job opportunities for women have helped break down traditional barriers against women. These efforts toward betterment will be continued by the A. F. of L.

It was the American Federation of Labor which caused elimination of the wage sex differential insisted upon by employers in the National Recovery Administration codes in 1933-34. President Meany further pointed out that work is "more likely to be 'comparable' than 'equal.'" By relying upon the "comparable" rather than the "equal" standard, we have speeded the progress of eliminating the wage differential because of sex and have removed the opportunities for employers to argue and quibble over the exact identity of jobs in question.

For these and for a number of other reasons, President Meany explained, "I cannot give support to the proposal to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act as you suggest."

(P. 586) The American Federation of Labor has increasingly succeeded through collective bargaining in gaining equal employment opportunity for all women workers. These efforts have not been confined to questions of wages, but have included action against discrimination wherever it might appear to deny equal treatment to women workers.

The most rapid progress toward eliminating wage differentials based on sex can be achieved through collective bargaining rather than through government action. Federal intervention and legal enforcement can be neither as practical nor as effective in this complex area of wage determination as voluntary action through union-management negotiation.

For these reasons, we have opposed, and will continue to oppose, misguided attempts to legislate "equal pay" for women workers.

Women's Bureau—(1936, p. 674) The A. F. of L. hereby endorses and highly commends the work of the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor.

Woodruff (James) Dam, Naming Opposed—(1949, pp. 47, 493) Res. 34 called upon the convention of the A. F. of L. to protest against naming dam on the Chattahoochee River in honor of James Woodruff, on basis of his labor record which was set forth in the resolution.

Woodrum Amendment (Prevailing Rates of Pay on Relief Work)—(1940, p. 433) The Woodrum Amendment eliminated the requirement of prevailing union rates and conditions on WPA work and this section had not been eliminated. Convention authorized E.C. to make every effort to have the prevailing rate of wages provision on relief work restored.

Workmen's Compensation (also see: Industrial Accidents; Government Employees, Canal Zone; Health; also see listing by work classification)

(1924, p. 50) Heretofore society has been extremely jealous of the rights of property. Everywhere the cry has been heard that property must be protected and be protected adequately by law. Personal rights, the rights of humanity, however, have not been sufficiently recognized or protected. These latter rights must receive greater consideration and emphasis in the future. Wherever and whenever called upon to choose between these two, the rights of humanity must prevail and the rights of property must give way.

It is upon this distinction that the old system of employers' liability and the new method of workmen's compensation are founded. The former system attempted to protect property and property alone and to leave the rights of humanity unprotected, under the false assumption that all industrial hazards and accidents are due to neglect. The new point of view is that industrial hazards and accidents are more or less inseparable from modern industry and that industry consequently should bear the cost of compensating those who suffer from the effects of industrial hazards and accidents.

While under this latter method the cost of compensation falls immediately upon the industry, the cost in fact is spread over and involved in the cost of production and is thereby ultimately borne by the community as a whole but under a more humane and constructive fashion than under the older system and not dependent upon public or private charity.

Considerable progress has been made in advancing this new concept of legal responsibility of industry to the risks and hazards involved and in the method and form of compensation to be provided injured workmen and their dependents. With this progress, development and extension of the principles of workmen's compensation there has come the need for a revision of those laws in a number of particulars. Then, too, there has developed the necessity of more nearly equalizing and unifying the provisions and requirements of the workmen's compensation laws in the several states and in the United States. This necessity is accentuated not only in the requirement to place industry upon a more equal condition in the several states but likewise to assure the workmen more adequate compensation and more dependable methods of payment than are provided at the present time.

There is hardly need to affirm that the American Federation of Labor has assumed the unquestioned leadership in the origin, development, extension and constant improvement of workmen's compensation laws in America. It has demonstrated likewise its leadership in the effort more nearly to equalize and unify the provisions and requirements in the workmen's compensation laws of the several states. To give emphasis to this latter part of its program the Executive Council by authorization of a previous convention selected a special committee for this purpose, consisting of Vice-Presidents William Green, Frank Duffy and Matthew Woll.

This committee has been at work for a considerable period of time. It has submitted a comprehensive report to the Executive Council setting forth the minimum and maximum requirements contained in existing laws, with recommendations as to standards which should guide our future activities in this phase of our remedial legislative endeavors. This report has received the careful consideration and full endorsement of the Executive Council, and under authority vested in it, it is the intent and purpose to release this report in the very near future for the instruction and guidance to all interested in furthering humane legislation of this character.

Among the more important changes contemplated in existing workmen's compensation laws are: Revision of those requirements relating to the amounts of compensation to be paid; providing a more adequate and just manner in determining the weekly wage upon which compensation is to be predicated; calling for greater promptness in the payment of compensation; requiring the inclusion of compensation for all trade and occupational diseases; including payment for funeral expenses, embracing compensation, without discrimination, of alien non-resident dependents; prohibiting "direct settlements"; demanding that greater attention be given to the prevention of accidents and occupational diseases; insisting that the principles of rehabilitation of maimed workers and of restoring them to useful self-sustaining occupations shall receive attention, and that all commercial methods of compensation insurance be made inapplicable to cover this form of risks and requirements.

The A. F. of L. is endeavoring to have a bill passed by Congress for the District of Columbia that will be a model for the entire country. The insurance companies have made it an issue and are using every means possible to defeat any legislation that will prohibit private insurance.

When the bill came up for action in the Sixty-seventh Congress, a bill in the interest of the insurance companies was substituted for the A. F. of L. measure. When this reached the Senate the A. F. of L. decided that it was better to urge the defeat of the insurance company bill. The bill was defeated.

The A. F. of L. bill was re-introduced in the Sixty-eighth Congress and was approved by the Committee on Judiciary and it is now on the House calendar for action.

Substantial progress was made last year in improving the compensation laws in several states. For example, there are now twelve American laws (including the federal act for public employes) which compensate occupational diseases. And in New York State in 1924 we secured the non-compensated "waiting period" reduced from 14 to 7 days, thus adding $1,500,000 a year to benefits and increasing the number of cases compensated about fifty per cent. At present there are thirty-six American laws having a "waiting period of seven days or less," (including several having no waiting period).

Since New Hampshire changed her law in 1923, all states except Arizona now provide medical service. Seventeen states, as well as Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the federal government, either place no limit on the duration or amount of medical care or else permit both limits to be indefinitely extended through administration.

As to percentage of wages now paid (Louisiana very recently, West Virginia and Oklahoma since 1922 have raised their scale for total disability compensation) there are now sixteen laws paying 65% or 66% and only eleven as low as 50%.

The last $10 a week maximum weekly payments were abolished in 1923. Eight states, including Louisiana very recently, and Hawaii, now have a weekly maximum of $20 or more.

Twenty state laws now provide permanent total disability compensation for life.

(1925, p. 53) Private insurance companies conducted a bitter and misrepresenting campaign against a workmen's compensation bill for the District of Columbia and it failed of passage. They objected to the compensation fund being controlled by the government. When it is understood that 40 per cent of money paid to insurance companies by employers to protect them under the workmen's compensation law is profit it can readily be seen why they were so anxious to defeat the bill.

(P. 62) The Committee on Compensation submitted its report on compensation legislation and the report has already been published in pamphlet form. The report deals with the principles of compensation legislation and presents model provisions for each of the principal features necessary for an adequate compensation law and gives the legislative status of each provision with comments thereon. The committee's recommendations deal with the following: scope of coverage of compensation legislation, injuries, waiting period, medical service, funeral expenses, percentage, weekly maximum and minimum, compensation periods, second injuries, alien non-resident dependents, administration, settlement of claims, accident prevention, other remedies, insurance, interstate commerce.

It is hoped that the findings and recommendations of the committee will prove helpful in focusing attention upon this question and making available the best standards developed through experience with compensation legislation.

We are deeply conscious of the very great need of securing the enactment of compensation legislation in all states. We realize, however, how impossible it is to secure the immediate passage of ideal workmen's compensation legislation. The opposition to the enactment of workmen's compensation legislation during the initial stage is so great as to prevent the enactment of workmen's compensation laws that approximate the standard set by the A. F. of L. For these reasons we urge State Federations of Labor to work for workmen's compensation legislation that will establish the principle even though all provisions may not be satisfactory. If the principle is established through the enactment of a workmen's compensation law the act, thus passed can be perfected through amendments.

(P. 351) The A. F. of L. would again call to the attention of the delegates and through them to the people, whether organized or unorganized, who are affected by the terms of the "Workmen's Compensation Law," to the necessity of having the fund out of which compensation is to be paid controlled in such fashion that the effect of industrial mishaps will not be made a source of profit to any private concern.

At the present time no greater safeguard is offered to the public, to the worker, and to the employer, than is provided by the exclusive insurance fund under the control and management of the state. This fund eliminates the possibility of profit that otherwise goes to the insurance company, a profit that rests on the hazard of employment and which cannot be dissociated from that hazard. This element of profit is the incentive for the assumption of risk by insurance companies who write policies intended to protect the employer, and to secure to the injured worker the relief to which he is entitled. Out of this incentive of profit, depending upon the assumption of such risk, naturally grows the prudent act on the part of the insurance company to so calculate its charges for the service provided that the element of profit will be but lightly jeopardized, however great the risk of indemnity growing out of industrial mishaps may be.

Therefore, it is evident that however careful or dependable the insurance company may be its operations add greatly to the cost of doing business, because it must, in order to exist, collect more from the insurer than it pays out to the insured. The exclusive state insurance fund, supported by the industries coming under its provisions, is the only agency known at present which eliminates entirely the deplorable system that permits the accumulation of profits from the human misery and suffering that is entailed in industrial accidents.

We, therefore, urge that all efforts be made to establish the state controlled insurance in lieu of the liability insurance that is now sold to employers by insurance companies, whose operations entail, First: A high service cost laid upon industry in the form of excessive premiums, and Second: A burden laid upon the injured through the ever-present effort to hold compensation payments to the irreducible minimum.

The provision of the Fitzgerald bill that will give to the government control of the fund from which compensation is paid was the cause of the bitter attack made upon that measure by the insurance companies. This very fact is a powerful argument in favor of the exclusive control of the compensation fund by public authority, and this principle should not be lost sight of by those who are beneficiaries of this fund.

We again call the attention of the E.C. to the recommendation made at the El Paso convention when the following was adopted: "In connection with occupational diseases, your committee recommends that the Executive Council be instructed to make the necessary inquiry and then draft an occupational disease section, naming therein the various diseases, with their derivatives, for which compensation should be paid, which shall stand as a model for the states, and which we recommend to be engrafted in all state compensation laws."

(P. 356) It is not possible that any compensation law that is perfect will be passed at a single session of a legislature, and it is better to have a compensation law with some defective features than no compensation law at all. A law which is defective can from time to time be amended in those particulars which experience show to be unsatisfactory, and these amendments and improvements can be obtained more readily after a law is on the book than at the time the measure is pending for original passage. It is not intended by this to discourage the attempt to secure the passage of laws containing the model provisions suggested by the Executive Council, but even where they cannot all be secured at one time it yet remains true that where a start is made in the right direction improvement will always be possible.

Therefore, we repeat the language of the Executive Council: "If the principle is established through the enactment of a Workmen's Compensation Law the act thus passed can be perfected through amendments."

(1926, p. 69) Progress has also been made in furthering compensation legislation for those injured or killed in gainful occupations. It is pleasing to record the fact that organized labor is now fully united upon the principles that should govern compensation legislation and that differences having heretofore existed on this subject among the ranks of wage earners in Massachusetts and Missouri have been removed. As a result it is anticipated that compensation measures in those states will soon follow.

In Missouri a compensation law has been enacted. However, it is our opinion that at the instigation of those who profited by the old liability system, the enforcement of this law has been held in abeyance while it is being submitted to the voters of Missouri for approval or disapproval by the referendum method that prevails in that state. It is hoped and believed that the people of Missouri will overwhelmingly ratify this humane legislation and that Missouri will place itself among those states which have extended to working people the protection embodied within practical and scientific workmen's compensation legislation. Every encouragement and aid have been and are being given the organized workers of Missouri toward that accomplishment.

In Massachusetts labor was divided over the provisions of a bill but a complete understanding has been reached and there is every prospect for beneficial changes in the present law.

Within a period of eighteen years forty-two states, two territories, Porto Rico and the federal government have adopted laws to compensate persons injured or the heirs of those killed while employed in industry.

Florida, Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and the District of Columbia have so far neglected their wage earners.

Labor in Florida is preparing to present a bill in the next session of the legislature.

For several years Congress has had under consideration a compensation bill for wage earners in private employment in the District of Columbia. Due to opposition from the insurance companies it has failed of passage. What is known as the Fitzgerald bill and supported by labor provides for a federal fund. The bill supported by the insurance companies was introduced by Representative Underhill of Massachusetts. It provides that all employers must insure with private insurance companies. This feature proved the sole obstacle to the passage of compensation legislation.

The Fitzgerald bill was favorably reported to the House in the 68th Congress. The Underhill bill was substituted for it and approved by it. In the 69th Congress the Fitzgerald bill was also reported favorably by the District of Columbia committee but the rules committee refused to permit it to come to a vote.

One of the occupations that has suffered grievously from lack of compensation laws is that of longshoremen. In 1916 the A. F. of L. convention urged Congress to enact laws that would protect this class of workers.

In 1917 the U.S. Supreme Court decided that persons employed as stevedores in loading and unloading vessels are engaged in work of maritime nature; that injuries received in the course of such work are maritime, and that the rights and liabilities of the parties in connection therewith are matters within admiralty jurisdiction. This excluded longshoremen from coming under state compensation laws.

Various bills have been introduced in Congress to protect the longshoremen. In the present Congress the longshoremen had a bill introduced that is believed will meet the requirements of the Supreme Court. The bill passed the Senate but failed in the House. The rules committee of the House refused to permit it to come before that body. If it had been submitted to a vote it would have been carried by a practically unanimous vote.

With the development of compensation to those injured during gainful employment there followed the recognition for the need of providing compensation for those who suffer by reason of occupational disease. Consequently there has followed the effort to include occupational diseases as being compensable.

In 1915 the A. F. of L. convention declared in favor of "compensation to be paid for death or illness resulting from occupational diseases."

At the present time there are twelve states and the federal government that recognize occupational diseases as compensable. The federal statute includes under the term "injury" any "disease proximately caused by the employment." The Porto Rico law provides compensation for "accidents or sickness occurring because of any act or function inherent in their work or employment and while engaged therein and as a consequence thereof." Several states designate what are occupational diseases.

Another development associated with compensation legislation is that of providing an opportunity of rehabilitation to those injured. The federal government has provided such a law for the rehabilitation of persons injured in industry, agriculture and commerce. This rehabilitation work is one of the functions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. By the enactment of this law the great majority of persons injured while in federal service and believed to be totally disabled have been rehabilitated and returned to civil employment.

One of the significant facts connected with compensation legislation is that no state has passed a compensation law that at first was satisfactory. But there is not a legislature in any state where a compensation law has been in force that has not at every session passed one or more beneficial amendments.

In order to advance more quickly and to promote a greater degree of uniformity of compensation legislation the A. F. of L. has caused to be prepared a survey and report of information and guidance on this subject.

This report sets forth the reasons that prompt organized labor in its insistence and demand for improved compensation laws. It also contains a recital of progress made in the enactment of compensation laws and includes information, advice and guidance regarding all salient features embraced in compensation legislation. This report is available to all trade unionists and is of special importance to those charged with the duty of improving compensation legislation.

One of the outstanding features of compensation legislation is the fact that no backward steps are taken.

This form of beneficial legislation has been accepted by the people generally as one of the great modern legislative achievements to protect the injured and disabled workmen.

(P. 333) It is gratifying to note that more states are realizing that occupational disease should be included among causes for compensation. Experience has proved to the sad cost of the worker that a disease which is proximately the result of the occupation is as deadly in its effect as though he had been torn or dismembered by a machine. Occupational diseases should be defined in compensation laws as injuries and compensable as such. It is for this reason that the A. F. of L. in 1915 declared that occupational diseases should be considered as compensable and that the victim should have the relief so necessary, the same as though it had been awarded because of an industrial accident.

(P. 334) The A. F. of L. realizes how unlikely it is that all states will adopt uniform compensation laws. Such action is no more to be expected than we might look for uniform laws on any of the many subjects on which the states have exercised their rights to deal with, according to the views of their own people. But the underlying principle of compensation is the same throughout all industry. It is a humanly devised plan whereunder some of the economic waste of industry can be compensated for. Regrettable as it is, the fact remains that with our advance in all directions that mark material progress we yet regard seemingly with cynical indifference the ever-growing list of workers killed or maimed in the industrial plants of our country.

The juggernaut of industrialism drives ruthlessly on, crushing, crippling by thousands and hundreds of thousands, our people. It is not because note has not been taken of this dreadful sacrifice to mammon. It is because human flesh and blood remain the cheapest commodity on the market, and those who are responsible for the failure to provide the necessary safeguards have made their choice. In their estimation, it is cheaper to get a new workman when the old one has been destroyed than it is to provide the appliance that might have saved the life or limb of the worker who is to be replaced.

(1927, p. 88) Where a longshoreman employed in stowing freight was injured through the negligence of a hatch tender, the Supreme Court of the U.S. held that the term "seaman" as used in the Act of June 5, 1920, is flexible to cover stevedores engaged as the plaintiff in this case was, and that this statute had done away with the fellow servant rule. International Stevedore Company vs. Haverty.

Where one is convicted of a felony and sentenced to prison, and thereafter granted permission to perform work on the public highways of California, under the direction of the State Highway Commission, and becomes injured, he is entitled to the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act. This rule was adopted by the Supreme Court of California in the State of California Highway Commission vs. Industrial Accident Commission.

By a decision of the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, in deciding the case of Gordon vs. Travellers' Insurance Company, compensation is refused to those suffering from occupational diseases. Here, Gordon was employed by an oil company and was required to stand in crude oil while performing his work and as a result was taken with a severe case of nephritis, totally and permanently incapacitating him.

(P. 244) Enactment of the longshoremen's compensation law was a great victory for the longshoremen. The Supreme Court had declared previous laws enacted by the Federal Congress unconstitutional. This question had to be met as well as opposition of the shipowners who contended that the seaman should be included. After the bill had passed the Senate it was amended in the House by the Committee on Judiciary to include masters and seamen. As masters and seamen are covered by the employers' liability act of 1908 the seamen protested. The House Committee on Judiciary finally agreed to eliminate the masters and seamen and this made it possible for the bill to pass the Senate. Unless they had been stricken out the Senate would not have approved of the bill.

The act providing compensation for the employees of the U.S. suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties was approved September 7, 1916. It provided that the monthly compensation shall be not more than $66.67 nor less than $33.33. The law was changed to increase the monthly compensation for total disability to not more than $116.16 nor less than $58.33. The agitation for the longshoremen's compensation act called attention to the small benefits provided by the federal compensation act and this proved a convincing argument in favor of increasing the rates for federal employees injured during the course of their employment.

(P. 75) The compensation bill for the D. C. failed of passage.

(1928, pp. 80, 305) The Workmen's Compensation Act for residents of the District of Columbia engaged in private employment became a law. The Longshoremen's Act, which is administered by the U.S. Employees Compensation Commission, was amended to cover residents of the District. Compensation insurance will be written by private insurance companies.

Since 1921 the labor organizations of the District have urged the passage of a compensation act containing a federal fund to pay compensation to victims of accidents. Friends in Congress of insurance companies fought the bill. Prior to passage of the act persons injured might sue in the courts, but as the employers had the three defenses—assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and fellow-servant—few ever obtained redress. And the little that happened to be obtained was eaten up by lawyers' fees.

The Central Labor Union of Washington asked that the Longshoremen's Act be amended to include residents of the District. This bill became a law.

Much opposition has arisen because of the premiums charged by private insurance companies. The employers have bitterly fought a federal fund and demanded that compensation policies be written by private insurance companies. They now see their mistake and it is believed they will themselves demand that Congress amend the act to create an exclusive federal fund.

(1929, p. 92) During the past year North Carolina, one of the five states without a workmen's compensation law, enacted such legislation. Florida, Arkansas, Mississippi and South Carolina are still lacking in such protective legislation. Reports from practically all states whose legislatures met during 1929 tell of progressive efforts being made to have workmen's compensation laws improved.

According to Secretary of Commerce Lamont, there are approximately 10,000,000 accidents in the United States every year. These he designates as fatal, serious, or otherwise. The fatal accidents alone, and he quotes "accidents," are close to 95,000. One person out of every twelve, he said, is injured or killed through accidental causes every year. These accidents are divided between: Automobiles, fires, home tragedies and industries. In a radio address on the subject of "Safety as a National Problem," he declared: "The cash value of human sacrifice every year—the price tag on carelessness—is $3,200,000,000." Of this tremendous amount, Secretary of Commerce Lamont "charged off in red—blood red—$1,000,000,000 each year" for accidents in industry.

Estimates made by representatives of the Department of Labor give the following statistics of accidents in the mechanical industries: Killed, 20,000; permanent total disability, 1,627; permanent partial disability, 100,000; temporary disability, 2,500,000, making a total of 2,621,627. These figures do not include accidents in the automobile industry, or in agriculture. In fact, there are no definite figures as to the number of accidents. The persons who carry out the workmen's compensation laws have no definite view as to what constitutes an accident. What is an accident in one state is not an accident in another; but from information gathered from many sources it can be authoritatively stated that at least 3,500,000 accidents of all kinds occurred in all industries in the past year.

These are astounding figures and should awaken the people of Florida, Arkansas, Mississippi and South Carolina to the dangers of ignoring these facts.

Many improvements in compensation laws have been made this year in various states. While the North Carolina law is not what we desired, it is a long step in advance, and in the future changes can be made that will more thoroughly protect the victims of accidents in industries.

(1931, pp. 119, 435) During the next two years opportunity will be presented to appeal to state legislatures to adopt the state insurance fund instead of permitting private insurance companies to continue to insure employers under the workmen's compensation laws.

The National Convention of Insurance Commissioners has decided that there should be an increase in private insurance rates averaging 13.4 per cent nation wide but varying in individual states from no change in the present rate level in Iowa and South Dakota to an increase of 57.9 per cent in Oklahoma.

The A. F. of L. believes that the employers in the U.S. who have persistently opposed the creation of state compensation funds have, because of the excessive rates charged by private insurance companies, changed their minds and will now support legislation that will decrease the rates paid for such insurance. The only way by which a decrease can be obtained is through the creation of a state fund.

It is admitted that the cost of administration in private insurance companies in this branch of insurance is 38 per cent and more while the cost of the administration of the state fund of Ohio is only one per cent of the insurance funds collected by the state.

There was never a better time than now to urge legislatures to adopt the exclusive state insurance fund and prohibit private insurance companies from engaging in the sale of workmen's compensation insurance.

(P. 63) The decision of the national convention of insurance commissioners to increase the rates for workmen's compensation insurance is being opposed in practically every state where advances have been asked. The rates for workmen's compensation insurance have always been excessive because the cost of administration by insurance companies is excessive—in some cases as high as thirty-eight per cent. In Ohio, under the state-fund system, the cost of administration is only one per cent of the money paid in by the employers.

This is an opportune time for all state federations of labor to urge the adoption of the exclusive state-fund plan where it is not now in effect. The employers in the District of Columbia have complained greatly of the cost of workmen's compensation insurance. We will endeavor in the next session of Congress to secure an amendment to the act to provide for funds to be administered by the District of Columbia.

(1932, pp. 114, 304) The E.C. reports the decision of the national convention of insurance commissioners to increase the rates for workmen's compensation insurance and that the decision is being opposed in practically every state where advances have been asked.

The report calls attention to the fact that the cost of administration—which sometimes amounts to 38 per cent of the premium rates—is largely responsible for this demand for increase in rates. It compares this administration cost with the cost in Ohio under the state-fund system where it is only 1 per cent of the money paid in by the employers. It urges that this is an opportune time for all State Federations of Labor to urge the adoption of the exclusive state-fund plan where it is not now in effect; and states that the next Congress will be asked to enact a law providing that the funds shall be administered by the District of Columbia for all business arising within the District. It is one of the surprises of life that with all the facts in evidence of the great saving in cost to the employer wherever the state-fund plan is in exclusive use that he will not join with labor in pressing to adoption a similar law in every state in the nation. As the Council says, "this is the opportune time." A new spirit is abroad in the land and the "old order changeth." If a renewed effort is now made to enact legislation of the character proposed the minds of our legislators may not be closed to facts and the employers may not be deaf to reason.

(P. 403) The A. F. of L. directs the E.C. to initiate at the earliest possible moment a militant campaign with all labor bodies to secure the establishment of state funds for workmen's compensation insurance in each state.

(1934, pp. 83, 372) S. 3186, introduced by Senator McCarran, provided for amending the Workmen's Compensation law for the District of Columbia. When the law originally was considered by Congress, contractors all insisted that private insurance companies should supply insurance for the payment of compensation to persons injured or to the heirs of those killed. Since then, however, the views of employers have changed because of the excessive rates charged by the insurance companies, and also because of the further fact that a number of insurance companies which issued compensation insurance have failed. The bill provides for a state fund and is heartily supported by the contractors.

(P. 576) Reaffirmed declaration that it is imperative that in each state an exclusive state fund should be incorporated in all compensation laws.

(1935, p. 147) Three states have thus far failed to enact workmen's compensation legislation. They are: Arkansas, Mississippi and South Carolina.

A workmen's compensation law was passed in the last session of the Florida legislature. In nearly every state where compensation laws are in effect improvements were made in workmen's compensation laws during the 1935 sessions of these state legislatures. The policy of the labor movement is to secure the enactment of adequate compensation laws. In many instances, these laws are far from satisfactory because of the inadequate compensation awards provided for. However, each year when legislatures meet amendments are offered and in many instances adopted.

The A. F. of L. urges the officers and members of state federations of labor of Arkansas, Mississippi and South Carolina to continue their efforts to secure the enactment of social justice legislation of this character.

(P. 459) The protection of Workmen's Compensation Laws, except in a very few instances, does not cover occupational diseases arising out of conditions of employment.

The recent extension of such benefits in a few states, to compensate workers who become afflicted with silicosis and other occupational diseases, immediately resulted in the removal of large firms to neighboring states where workers are totally unprotected by compensation except in the event of physical accident.

In many states, workers are forced to rely upon the expensive, dilatory, and uncertain processes of litigation under common law because of the refusal of private insurance companies to write compensation coverage for such employees.

The A. F. of L. favors legislation that will provide:

1. That Federal grants in aid be established to match appropriations for the conduct of state-pooled funds for Workmen's Compensation to cover occupational accidents or diseases.

2. That the U.S. Department of Labor be requested to investigate the consequences of unrestricted competition of standards among the states, to determine whether the citizens of progressive states are being penalized in interstate commerce by the mining or manufacture within states which afford little or no protection to the employees.

3. That the U.S. Department of Labor be requested to set up adequate standards which will safeguard the health of the workers involved, and that they be empowered to devise legislative or trade agreements which will cause the effective use of such safeguards by all firms in occupations involving dust hazards.

4. That no department of the Federal Government, including special relief agencies, shall purchase materials mined, quarried, manufactured or sold by firms which do not maintain adequate standards which will safeguard the workers involved.

(P. 491) Announcement was made that South Carolina had enacted a workmen's compensation law.

(1936, pp. 139, 440) South Carolina has enacted a workmen's compensation law, which leaves only two states, Arkansas and Mississippi, which have not passed this character of social justice legislation. In conformity with the action of the 1935 convention, national and international unions having locals in those two states were requested to urge their respective locals to give every aid in securing this legislation.

Most interesting in present day developments in this field is the gradual extension of coverage to occupational diseases. Sixteen states now compensate for some occupational diseases. Those which have coverage for all are California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, North Dakota, and Wisconsin. Rhode Island compensates for thirty diseases, Minnesota for twenty-three, North Carolina for twenty-five, Ohio for twenty-one, and New Jersey for thirteen. Those states which compensate for silicosis are California, Connecticut, Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

It is important that insurance against occupational disease be accompanied by fact-finding studies whose purpose is to discover means of reducing the incidence of the disease.

Industrial hygiene units have been set up, either in the Department of Health or in the Department of Labor, in fifteen states, financed in part with social security funds. These units are equipped to make studies of occupational disease hazards, and are created for the purpose of assisting labor departments in discovering and correcting dangerous conditions in industry. We urge that such units be set up in the remaining states and that wherever possible they be located under the jurisdiction of the departments of labor. In general, the A. F. of L. urges increased appropriations to labor departments and health departments for this purpose. Furthermore, it urges its affiliated unions, city central bodies and state federations of labor constantly to press for the practical application of the results of these studies to the end that the human toll exacted by industrial diseases be diminished.

The recommendation to the 1935 convention that the government should pay a share of the state compensation to victims of injury and occupational disease in industry was considered and it is believed that a satisfactory law to that effect can be enacted in the next session of Congress. This would affect only states that have state pool funds.

(Silicosis)—(1936, p. 134) The fact that 476 men died and 1,500 others are approaching death from silicosis contracted in constructing the Hawks Nest Tunnel at Gauley Bridge, West Virginia, has aroused the country. It has also brought to light the number of deaths from this malady. Silicosis has been a dreaded foe of all underground workers. It is an occupational disease. It creates a form of tuberculosis by the inhalation of silica and dust containing parts of silica which is a quartz crystal.

While the deaths had been accumulating for several years at the Hawks Nest Tunnel, they were not made known until early this year. It was then found that many deaths were occurring throughout the U.S. wherever persons were engaged in underground work.

The A. F. of L. has called upon all state federations of labor to urge the legislatures to include compensation for occupational diseases in compensation laws where they are not already incorporated. A victim of silicosis in Illinois obtained a $20,000 verdict in a damage suit, but the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional. The Ohio Supreme Court also refused payment of compensation to a victim of silicosis because it was not included in the list of occupational diseases.

A resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives calling for the appointment of a Congressional committee to ascertain the facts relating to the health of workers employed in the construction and maintenance of public utilities. An investigation of the Hawks Nest Tunnel tragedy was made but the contractors who were responsible refused to appear and testify. The object of the investigation was to obtain information that would aid in securing state laws providing that silicosis is an occupational disease.

Two important bills were passed by the New York legislature. One of them appropriated $100,000 to aid the State Labor Department in the prevention of silicosis and other dust diseases. The other appropriated $50,000 over a five-year period, beginning July 1, to study control and prevention of silicosis and other diseases contracted by inhaling dust. The bills were signed by the governor.

(Silicosis and Dust Diseases)—(1944, p. 427) Two resolutions, Nos. 91 and 97, were introduced in the convention calling for the extension of workmen's compensation to cover workers affected by silicosis and dust diseases. The convention unanimously adopted the following recommendations to meet the objectives of the resolutions:

Resolutions 91 and 97 are identical and request the American Federation to use all available facilities to have enacted in the various states uniform laws for the prevention of silicosis and dust diseases and for payment of compensation to workers suffering from such diseases in amounts equal at least to the present maximum.

Your committee recommends that these resolutions be referred to the Executive Council with instructions to confer with State Federations of Labor for the purpose of drafting a model compensation law to be introduced in each state legislature (1937, p. 180) Reports from a number of states show that many amendments to workmen's compensation laws were enacted this year.

Progress toward more complete coverage of occupational diseases was made through the enactment of laws in five states (Delaware, Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Washington). All of these laws provide for specific or enumerated coverage, instead of blanket or general coverage. All but Delaware provide compensation for silicosis, though the Washington provision is badly worded and may therefore fail to achieve the desired result.

A vicious measure, bringing silicosis under the occupational disease law on terms more favorable to the insurance companies than to the workers, was passed by both houses in Rhode Island; but the Governor was prevailed upon, after protests from the President of the A. F. of L., to veto it. The bill contained features which have cropped up again and again in state bills and against which state federations of labor sponsoring occupational disease legislation should be on their guard.

These features are: (1) Provision for a board of part-time medical referees, who are drawn from private practice and allowed to continue such practice on the side, in whom is vested final power to decide who is, and who is not, eligible for silicosis compensation; (2) extremely limited compensation and inadequate medical care provisions even for those cases that get by the medical board; (3) failure to compensate for partial disability, which usually precedes total disability or death, and may be long drawn out and costly to the worker and his dependents.

Another restrictive feature which is objectionable to Labor in the occupational disease bill in Michigan "permits" workers who have been exposed to a silica hazard, within four months after the Act takes effect, to waive their compensation benefits under the new occupational disease law. This makes it possible, under threat of discharge, to disqualify all who have been working at dusty trades and to get rid at one stroke of the entire "accrued liability" problem.

Pennsylvania provides a different and much more desirable solution to this problem. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania assumes over a 10-year period part of the cost of paying compensation for those cases in which disability develops only after exposure of five years or more. Whenever a silicosis bill is up for consideration great stress is laid by insurance companies and employers upon the prohibitive cost to the industry of adequate care and compensation. Experience in such states as Wisconsin, New York, and the Province of Ontario indicates that the actual cost is far from "prohibitive," and that the "accrued liability" problem is much exaggerated.

At the present time 21 states and the District of Columbia provide occupational disease compensation, but only nine of the laws are of the blanket coverage type advocated by the A. F. of L. In 16 jurisdictions compensation is payable, though often at a reduced scale of benefits and after many legal obstacles. In New York the insurance companies have collected many thousands of dollars of additional premiums based upon an alleged increased hazard, yet in two years only two awards for silicosis have been made.

Substantial increases in compensation payments were secured this year for workers injured in the course of their employment in Georgia, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina, by increasing the minimum or the maximum or the percentage of wages allowed. Eight states extended their medical care provisions; four reduced the waiting period; and nine brought additional employments or processes under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Regulation of fees charged by physicians or attorneys, or both, was provided in Georgia, Montana, Texas, and West Virginia.

(P. 311) Particular attention is called to the actions of a number of casualty insurance companies operating in workmen's compensation fields in various states in insisting upon physical examinations of employees in industries causing silicosis, since the enactment of silicosis compensation laws, and recommends that in all states in which workmen's compensation is provided for silicosis, state federations of labor should insist that if physical examinations of employees are to take place to demonstrate the incidence and reveal the prevalence of silicosis in certain industries or occupations, that such examinations shall be made by either the state department of health or the body administering the workmen's compensation law, and that such examinations shall not reveal the personality of the employees so examined.

We believe that a report on this subject would not be complete without calling attention to the fact that in those states having state insurance funds, and in which the payments of workmen's compensation are paid from such funds, that the profit motive which actuates casualty insurance companies to follow the course they are now pursuing in respect to silicosis examinations, does not occur.

All state federations of labor should urge upon their legislatures to create state funds exclusively for the workmen's compensation.

(Building Trades)—(1938, pp. 166, 548) S. 531, a bill to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employes of contractors on federal public buildings and public works was introduced in the United States Senate, reported favorably and passed March 25. The House referred the bill to the Judiciary Committee, but no report was made to the House.

At the present time in many of the states the workers on federal public buildings are not protected by state workmen's compensation acts. The bill provided that contractors on federal public buildings shall, before commencing work on the contract, provide for securing the payment of compensation and the furnishing of other benefits to employes under provisions of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. The contractor shall maintain in full force and effect during the term of his contract, and while employes are engaged in work performed under such contract, the security for the payment of such compensation and other benefits. It also provides that where the contract is to be performed within a state having a workmen's compensation law and employes are eligible to such benefits, the contractor shall be deemed to have satisfied such conditions if before beginning work he secures the payment of workmen's compensation benefits under such state workmen's compensation law. Failure to comply with such conditions shall be deemed a breach of contract and a violation of the Act. Contractors must also require subcontractors to provide and maintain protection of the employes to the extent provided in the Act. Any violation on the part of the subcontractors or other persons to maintain such protection shall be deemed a breach of contract. Penalties for violation of the Act shall be a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both. The A. F. of L. will endeavor to have the bill introduced in the next Congress, as it is of the utmost importance to the building trades.

(Pp. 163, 548) The 75th Congress made a number of amendments to certain sections of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act in order to clarify the provisions.

Among them are amendments redefining the term "child"; authorizing the deputy commissioner to waive the requirement, under which a physician furnishing medical treatment, in order to recover the cost of such treatment from the employer, to make a report of the injury and treatment; providing for the construction of the term "wage-earning capacity" as applied to certain cases of partial disability and to remove the ambiguity with respect to the applicability of the provisions for additional 20 per cent compensation when there is a default in the payment of compensation under the terms of an award.

More teeth are put into the penal provisions for the failure to secure the payment of compensation. Under the amendment it is possible to enforce the penalties for such failure against certain officers of a corporation, who are made jointly and severally liable with the corporation, for any compensation or other benefit that may accrue under the Act. In particular, liability with respect to fine or imprisonment is imposed upon such officers. Also, it is now an offense to transfer, sell, encumber, assign, or in any manner dispose of, conceal, secrete or destroy any property by an employer with an intent to avoid the payment of compensation under the Act after one of its employes has been injured.

(Pp. 175, 548) Through a complication of misunderstandings, the Mississippi Legislature failed to pass a workmen's compensation law. The bill exempted employes of railroad organizations. However, the report was circulated that it would not protect the interests of the railroad men and they refused to support the measure. This caused its defeat. When a bill of that nature is introduced in the Mississippi Legislature again copies should be sent to the various railroad organizations in order that no such misunderstandings as occurred on the bill introduced this year will occur.

Arkansas is the only other state that has not yet adopted this meritorious legislation. The Constitution of Arkansas prohibits the legislature appropriating funds for death or injury from accidents. On account of this clause it was necessary to initiate a petition in order to place on the ballot this fall the question of a change in the constitution which will make such a law possible. Sufficient signatures were obtained and the people will vote upon the question in November.

Both employes and employers are earnestly seeking compensation legislation. The opposition appears to come from persons who are securing larger terms for so-called damage suit cases. These persons are known as "ambulance chasers." It is hoped that the petition for a change in the constitution will succeed and the next legislature will pass a workmen's compensation law.

(Occupational Diseases)—(1939, p. 156) In reporting on this subject, the E.C. submitted the following account of progress achieved in securing enactment of better workmen's compensation laws:

At last Arkansas achieved a workmen's compensation law—only, however, to have its operation suspended until such time as a popular referendum can be held. The law is on the whole a good one, compulsory for private employers of five or more, with some exceptions, and providing compensation for a schedule of occupational diseases as well as for accidental injuries, on a fairly liberal scale. There are, however, a number of defects including the numerical exemption, the fact that it is to be administered outside of the labor department, the schedule instead of blanket coverage of occupational disease, and the medical board provision. Idaho and Maryland also enacted occupational disease compensation laws, bringing the total number of such laws to 25.

A number of these newly enacted occupational disease laws carry provisions of doubtful benefit to workers. The insurance companies have been actively promoting a type of bill that places the controlling authority in a medical board, a provision which has this year been incorporated in the laws of Arkansas, Maryland, Idaho and Pennsylvania. Advisory medical opinions, furnished by impartial experts paid by the state are one thing. Binding decisions by a board of doctors who are not full-time state employes, but who are permitted to practice and do practice for insurance companies and employers, is quite another thing. A much more liberal and realistic interpretation of a compensation law is to be expected when claims are decided by lay referees, aided and guided but not superseded by medical experts.

While organized labor in the states has year after year carried on a battle to extend the coverage of compensation laws and to liberalize the benefits, hostile interests (led by insurance companies) have been undermining the administrative sections of these laws, thus indirectly but effectively depriving workers of the very rights that have been won. While these provisions are often so obscure that slight changes may seem comparatively harmless, recent experiences point to the need for careful scrutiny. The insurance lobby has shown itself repeatedly willing to trade small increases in benefits for procedural amendments whose significance is not easily apparent. Thus in Pennsylvania, an increase in the percentage of weekly wage was "traded" for other amendments to the law which more than counterbalance this supposed gain, and interpose many legal technicalities between the claimant and his award. The Pennsylvania worker who is injured after the new law took effect may lose his rights under the Act entirely, simply because he has failed to file formal notice of the accident even though the employer had full knowledge of the accident and the injury. The employer or carrier is no longer penalized for persuading the worker to agree to a lump-sum commutation which is actually in violation of the Act. The Department of Labor and Industry is barred from assisting the claimant who has signed an incomplete agreement and failed to secure his full rights under the Act. Widows and dependents will lose very large sums—amounting in some cases to 80 per cent or more, of the death benefits formerly paid—because of a new provision which deducts sums paid to the disabled worker during his lifetime, from the death benefit. In presenting his claim and arguing his case through the maze of confusing new legal language, the worker is now also deprived of the right to be represented by a member of a labor organization. Obviously, the chief gainers under the new law are the lawyers, the doctors, and the insurance companies. These, and other amendments, are of a type that are being promoted under the guise of innocent changes intended to simplify the compensation laws and reduce costs.

(P. 385) The convention unanimously adopted the committee recommendations as follows:

In that portion of the Executive Council's Report captioned, "Workmen's Compensation and Occupational Disease," your committee recommends aggressive action with a view to remedying lax interpretations in existing workmen's compensation laws, so as to fully protect the right of the worker, and the further recommendation that the laws be administered by the labor department, or a commission created specifically for this purpose, one member to represent Labor, the member to be recommended by the state federation of labor. Your committee further recommends to the state federations of labor that they continue in their endeavor to secure complete coverage under these laws, and the establishment of a state fund for the payment of all benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

(P. 194) Although the state workmen's compensation laws antedate the Social Security Act by many years, they are properly a part of the security program. Security for the worker means steady income, protection against the calamities which threaten that income, whether accident, illness, unemployment or old age. In reorganizing and enlarging the whole program of social security the states need to improve the workmen's compensation laws, especially in expanding their scope to all industrial diseases, in eliminating private-profit companies from the compensation business, and in placing administration of the laws under state departments of labor or industrial commissions on which Labor is represented. The worker affected by an occupational disease needs to have technical information on the conditions of work constituting the exposure to hazard which he cannot secure for himself to prove his claim. If the administration were entrusted to departments of labor the necessary information would be available and the worker would get his just compensation.

We must make renewed efforts in every state to get revisions of the workmen's compensation laws to include all types of industrial disability, from disease as well as accident. The term "injury" should not be confined to accidents and a specific list of occupational diseases but should be inclusive of all injuries resulting from the occupation. If the compensation laws are so revised that the cost of injury properly attributable to industry is compensated by it, the expansion of general disability insurance to care for the other workers temporarily or permanently disabled can more easily be included under the unemployment compensation or old age insurance laws.

We should look ultimately to incorporating the workmen's compensation laws into a coordinated federal-state system with adequate federal standards governing the payment of benefits. It is particularly desirable both in the interests of honest payment of benefits and of economy that a single government insurance agency in each state carry the insurance. It has been sufficiently demonstrated that private-profit companies charge excessive rates and make it difficult for the worker to receive fair treatment. In all parts of the program affecting social security the profit motive should be excluded from operation. The interests of the beneficiaries and reasonable economy in handling the funds should be the dominant consideration.

(P. 633) The Executive Council in its annual report to the convention recommended that eventually workmen's compensation legislation should be coordinated with the national social security plan, to improve standards of security for workers and for administrative simplicity and economy.

The convention concurred in the suggestion of the Executive Council in the following statement:

... workmen's compensation which was our first step in a social security program, should be advanced and coordinated with provisions against other emergencies.

(1940, p. 127) Stock and mutual insurance companies are continuing their efforts to prevent the spread of state funds, especially the establishment of such funds as the exclusive insurers for workmen's compensation. It has been repeatedly demonstrated that a much larger percent of the premium paid goes to compensate injured workers under the single government fund than under private insurance agencies.

There is a growing tendency for private insurance companies to fight the payment of benefits and for courts to give technical rulings preventing the payment of benefits which in all equity should be paid. The employer pays the premiums to protect his workers when they suffer industrial injuries. Neither the employer nor the worker is benefited by too narrow and technical interpretation of the laws. Only the insurance company profits by the worker's misfortune. We recommend that legislatures take action to amend the laws to achieve the true intention of workmen's compensation. We urge especially the replacement of private insurers by single state funds which will not have a selfish interest in preventing fair treatment of injured workers.

(P. 562) Your Executive Council warns of the continued opposition of stock and mutual insurance companies to state workmen's compensation funds, and the growing tendency of private insurance companies to fight the payment of benefit claims.

We recommend that the Federation and its affiliated unions renew their efforts to promote the real purpose of workmen's compensation by securing legislation which will preclude narrow, technical interpretations of the laws to the detriment of injured workers, and will replace private insurers by single state funds.

(Exclusive State Funds Recommended)—(P. 380) Convention commended states which had succeeded in having improved their compensation laws and urged all state federations to be ever watchful in endeavoring to improve and strengthen their existing workmen's compensation laws, and endeavor to have established laws providing for exclusive state funds.

(Washington State)—(1942, p. 624) The A. F. of L. was requested, through Res. 138, to oppose a bill to provide for the refund of several millions of dollars collected by the State of Washington as taxes, thus eliminating the payment of workmen's compensation in the State of Washington. The resolution was referred to the Executive Council for investigation and appropriate action.

(1943, p. 89) At the conclusion of the section of the E.C. Report under this title (covering state legislation in this field) the following program was included:

Despite the outstanding improvements achieved this year in workmen's compensation laws, only a beginning has been made. Organized labor cannot relax its efforts in this field until the following goals have been reached by every state: (1) compulsory coverage for all industrial accidents and diseases; (2) commission or board administration; (3) insurance by exclusive state funds; (4) unlimited hospital and medical care; (5) benefits of not less than two-thirds of wages payable during entire period of disability; and (6) establishment of second-injury and rehabilitation funds.

(P. 377) We urge state federations of labor to follow the example set . . . to the end that all states may have a uniformity of law giving the greatest protection and benefit to the worker.

In conclusion your committee repeats its warning that the greatest possible interest should be taken in all laws introduced in state legislatures which would have for their purpose the detrimental restrictions of labor unions or protective labor laws, or the setting aside of any existing laws under the guise of the war emergency, which would render them ineffective and weak. We should resist vigorously restrictive legislation and press unceasingly for remedial and beneficial legislation.

Your committee calls to the attention of all national and international unions as well as the American Federation of Labor the necessity of all local unions being affiliated with the various state federations of labor. This is essential to the defense of Labor in procuring favorable legislation in the legislatures of their respective states and would supply the necessary cooperation to foster the enactment of laws beneficial to the workers.

(1944, p. 428) Res. 96:

Whereas — The workmen's compensation laws in the several states are not uniform and vary in the amounts of weekly benefits paid and total amounts paid for injuries and death, and

Whereas—Montana is one of the few states where the total compensations paid for injuries and death, are high, running from $8,400 for deaths, up to $10,500, for total permanent disability, and running up to 500 weeks for total permanent disabilities, and

Whereas—Labor in Montana is continually confronted with attempts to amend the compensation law by lowering its standards to meet the standards of the neighboring states, and

Whereas—Such attempts, if successful, are detrimental to the welfare of Labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor be requested to circularize the several states urging them to amend their workmen's compensation laws so they be uniform and standardized upwards, looking toward the benefit of the workers.

This resolution calls upon the Executive Council to take steps to bring about uniform compensation laws in the various states with benefits equal at least to the present maximum.

Your committee recommends that this resolution be referred to the Executive Council for appropriate action, and it is also recommended that consideration be given to securing the enactment of a federal workmen's compensation law.

(1946, p. 606) While the ultimate goal of the American Federation of Labor is a comprehensive, unified system of social insurance, it is recognized that workmen's compensation—the oldest of the social insurances in America—is embodied in separate state laws. These laws vary widely in the protection they afford wage earners and a review of their effectiveness is long overdue. The American Federation of Labor favors for all states:

1. Compulsory insurance under workmen's compensation laws, covering all workers without exception.

2. Coverage by exclusive state funds, eliminating the profit motive from a program designed to give protection to workers and their families.

3. Maximum weekly benefits sufficient in amount to support the worker and his family during incapacity due to injury without his having to rely on additional aid from public or private charity. (Present maximum benefits of $15.00 to $20.00 per week existing in many states fail to meet this standard.)

4. Full coverage for every type of industrial disease with no lesser payments in cases of disability from disease than from injury.

5. Effective enforcement of accident prevention laws and regulations by every available means.

6. The establishment of workmen's compensation committees in each state federation of labor which, with the aid of competent legal experts, will study their state laws and assist in carrying out the above principles by: (a) proposing and supporting legislation to improve their laws, (b) keeping in touch with workmen's compensation commissions to see that administration is on a high level and the rights of workers protected, (c) cooperating with the U.S. Department of Labor and with the American Federation of Labor in creating more uniformity in the workmen's compensation laws and eliminating special provisions which favor employers, such as reduced amounts for silicosis cases, unusual proof for hernia cases, waivers, etc., and (d) cooperating with rehabilitation agencies.

(1948, p. 419) The convention adopted recommendation of the committee reporting on Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act (June 24, 1948) and "urged state federations of labor to use this Act as a precedent to amend their state workmen's compensation acts."

(1951, pp. 351, 513) Res. 105 called upon the A. F. of L. to prepare and present to Congress suitable legislation providing for workmen's compensation coverage for all occupational diseases.

(1953, pp. 202, 638) Included in the E.C. Report on state legislation, was a report on workmen's compensation. The convention adopted its committee report on the subject:

During the past year many states have made improvements in their workmen's compensation legislation. However, these laws still remain basically inadequate to meet the needs of workers whose earning capacity can so quickly become impaired or destroyed by occupational accidents and diseases. Each state federation of labor should conduct a detailed study of the workmen's compensation laws and develop a specific program for improvements in the workmen's compensation statutes in their respective states. We ask that the American Federation of Labor provide increased and improved services to guide and assist our state federations in this work.

(1954, pp. 413, 487) Res. 113:

Whereas—There are untold thousands of workers in industry ranging from the drop forge and boiler shops to the textile mills and lumber mills who are suffering from permanent damage to one of their most valued possessions, namely, their hearing, with little or no chance of recovery and little or no chance of compensation under existing workmen's compensation laws, and

Whereas—Because of the lack of necessity for compensation payments, industry pays little heed to the situation and takes no steps to abate hearing-damaging noise in the factories and mills so that the list of persons with permanent, partial and total hearing loss grows tremendously, and

Whereas—Loss of this important member of the senses subjects the person to greater danger of life and limb, deprives him of many of the enjoyments of social and family life and creates for him much embarrassment in his daily associations, and

Whereas—The International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers has conducted wide studies in this matter and has taken official action at its last convention to vigorously promote legislative enactment in all states to provide corrective and compensatory measures, realizing full well that the cost of compensation will compel employers to institute noise abatement programs and engineering processes that will conserve the hearing of millions of workers, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled take official cognizance of this serious situation, by instituting a national movement of corrective and compensatory legislation and by taking such steps as may be deemed expedient to compel noise abatement programs in industry, and be it further

Resolved—That copies of this resolution be supplied to all state federations of labor and international unions with the urge that these organizations exert their utmost influence to bring about accomplishment of the purposes of this resolution.

(Workmen's Compensation Commission) (U.S. Employees) — (1939, p. 420) Continued support of U.S. Employees Compensation Commission was pledged through Res. 70 as follows:

Resolved—That this 59th Convention of the American Federation of Labor reaffirms its approval of the commission and the manner in which it has administered the laws under its jurisdiction; and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor reaffirms its stand for the preservation of the present form of administration of the Federal Workmen's Compensation laws by maintaining the United States Employees' Compensation Commission as an independent establishment; and be it further

Resolved—That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to all members of Congress.

(1943, p. 410) Res. 43, unanimously adopted as follows:

Whereas—The United States Employees' Compensation Commission was originally established largely at the urging of the American Federation of Labor to administer the workmen's compensation law covering government employees and since it has subsequently been charged with the duty of administering federal workmen's compensation laws applicable to longshoremen and other harbor workers in private industry, workmen in private employment in the District of Columbia; and the large body of workmen employed on federal emergency projects, and

Whereas—The United States Employees' Compensation Commission since its establishment has consistently performed its important functions in a humane and sympathetic manner that reflects credit on the system of administration of workmen's compensation legislation by an independent bi-partisan commission, and

Whereas—The increase in the number of employees now within the scope of federal workmen's compensation laws and the possible extension of such laws to other employments within federal jurisdiction makes the administration of these laws a matter of greater interest to the American Federation of Labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor reaffirm its stand for the preservation of the present form of administration of the federal workmen's compensation laws by maintaining the United States Employees' Compensation Commission as an independent establishment, and be it further

Resolved—That the Executive Council be instructed to request that the U.S. Employees' Compensation Commission, its records, and functions, be returned to the national capital at the earliest practicable date, and be it further

Resolved—That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to all members of Congress.

(1940, p. 411) The U.S. Employees' Compensation Commission was originally established largely at the urging of the A. F. of L. to administer the workmen's compensation law covering government employees, and its field subsequently extended to cover similar laws applicable to longshoremen and other harbor workers in private industry, workmen in private employment in the District of Columbia; and the large body of workmen employed on federal emergency projects. The A. F. of L. subsequently formally approved the commission and the manner in which it has performed its duties. The 1940 Convention reaffirmed approval of the A. F. of L. of the commission and its administration of the laws with which it is entrusted. The A. F. of L. further reaffirmed its stand calling for the maintenance of the commission as an independent establishment.

(1944, p. 469) Res. 7 was unanimously adopted as follows:

Whereas—The United States Employees' Compensation Commission was originally established largely at the urging of the American Federation of Labor to administer the workmen's compensation law covering government employees and since it has subsequently been charged with the duty of administering federal workmen's compensation laws applicable to longshoremen and other harbor workers in private industry, workmen in private employment in the District of Columbia and the large body of workmen employed on federal emergency projects and

Whereas—The increase in the number of employees now within the scope of federal workmen's compensation laws and the possible extension of such laws to other employments within federal jurisdiction makes the administration of these laws a matter of greater interest to the American Federation of Labor, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor reaffirms its stand for the preservation of the present form of administration of the federal workmen's compensation laws by maintaining the United States Employees' Compensation Commission as an independent establishment, and be it further

Resolved—That the Executive Council be instructed to request that the U.S. Employees' Compensation Commission, its records, and functions be returned to the national capital at the earliest practicable date, and be it further

Resolved—That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to all members of Congress.

Works Progress Administration—(1936, p. 645) The E.C. is directed to petition the Works Progress Administration for an immediate ruling providing for sick leave and vacations with pay for all Works Progress Administration workers.

(P. 596) Under the so-called "Security Wage" many local officials under the WPA, either through a lack of understanding or favoritism have attempted to advance men into trades without the proper care so necessary to the training of apprenticeship for skilled craftsmen. In the employment of all skilled workers under the WPA there be a bona fide board set up for the examination of such mechanics as employed, into the fitness of these mechanics for the prospective assignments and that such board consist of one (1) member of the craft so examined, one (1) employer of recognized standing in the community, and one (1) representative of the WPA service engineering department, and that only men passed by these be employed on skilled work to the end that the government receive the proper grade of work in its respective endeavors.

(1939, p. 169) The Executive Council reported on the work of the WPA and other relief employment projects in a special section of its annual report under this title. The report closed with the following:

The review of these facts makes clear the enormous extent of the unemployment and relief problem still to be solved. Continued lag in industrial and trade activity with the resulting unemployment make necessary continued provision for those who are dependent on some form of public assistance in order to be able to survive. We have seen that work relief on WPA projects has constituted the largest single instrumentality of such assistance. It has also been noted that 70 per cent of this activity was devoted to construction which, given the designation of "work relief," has actually represented one of the largest known programs of public works that has ever been undertaken by any nation. We believe it is important to recognize that such public works programs, involving thus far the construction and repair of nearly 80,000 public buildings, 66,000 bridges, 380 airports, and the building of 350,000 miles of highways, cannot and should not be dealt with as work relief but should be embodied, within definitely prescribed limits, into a planned permanent public works program. Such a long-range program planned for the most effective and economical expenditure of public funds to fill real and pressing social needs should supplement private employment until the flow of investment into private enterprise is brought up to the levels necessary to attain full private employment. Such a long-range program of public works projects providing private employment under contract at not less than prevailing wages would do much to soften the impact of the recurrent fluctuations of business and construction activity upon employment.

A special sub-section titled "Prevailing Wage Problem" related experiences under Section 15(a) of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1939 which did away with the requirement that not less than the prevailing hourly wages be paid to the workers employed on WPA projects. The sub-section closed with: One thing is certain—no available data on cost of living hertofore assembled can justify the absurdities of such a schedule nor its destructive effect upon the structure of prevailing wages in all communities.

(Prevailing Wage Problems) — (P. 172) A special section of the E.C. Report was devoted to problems arising from General Order No. 1 which did away with the requirement that no less than the prevailing hourly wages be paid to workers employed on WPA projects, which order was adopted despite opposition of organized labor and its sympathizers.

(P. 521) The report of the convention committee was unanimously adopted as follows:

Under the caption "The Prevailing Wage Problem," the Executive Council reports upon the provisions of General Order No. 1, approved by Commissioner Harrington, WPA, on August 15, 1939.

This order relates largely to wage rates to be paid those employed on WPA work.

Your committee heartily concurs in the Executive Council's statement that no data relative to the cost of living can justify the absurdities and inconsistencies of the wage rates provided for in General Order No. 1.

Your committee likewise concurs with the Executive Council's statement that the security wage contained in such a schedule must have a destructive effect upon the structure of prevailing wages in all communities.

(P. 445) Res. 10, referred to the Executive Council for consideration, with full approval of the objectives of the resolution, proposed the following:

Resolved—That there exists a need for a continuing program of government "enterprise" as distinguished from "relief" sufficiently broad to provide employment for workers who are properly qualified, who are willing and able to work, decently diligent in the pursuit of a job and diligent in their application to the job after they have been successful in getting it. Such a program could and should involve the establishment and construction of a super highway system for the nation, flood control and reclamation work where such projects are feasible and necessary, construction of needed air traffic facilities and air traffic safeguards, re-forestation, proper housing for government agencies, construction and modernization of schools, slum clearance and other activities in which the government has a legitimate and recognized interest, such programs to be set up as a continuing national policy and to involve cooperation on the part of the state and local governments with the Federal Government such a program to pay standard wages and observe standard working conditions in the communities in which such works are undertaken and to be carried out on the basis of contracts competitively arrived at where this type of project is most likely to be advantageous or under properly supervised government force account work; be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled endorse a program along this line and use their best efforts to secure legislation to accomplish the intent of this resolution.

(Prevailing Wage)—(P. 503) Res. 77 called upon the convention to petition the President and Congress to restore the prevailing wage on all WPA projects. Convention unanimously adopted the resolution.

(P. 445) Res. 9 protested against the curtailment of WPA work and the departure from the prevailing wage requirements; urged that a special session of Congress be called to remedy the errors made. In lieu of the resolution as such, the convention adopted the committee recommendations as follows:

Your committee in lieu of acting on the resolution, recommends that this convention approve of the action taken by the special conference called by President Green in Washington, July 12, 1939, to consider the extension of the WPA hours to 130 per month, and the elimination of the prevailing wage which had previously prevailed.

After this national conference had declared its position, it appointed a committee to present the conference decision to the President of the United States; the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House.

In addition, the American Federation of Labor actively interviewed members of Congress in an effort to have the prevailing wage restored. It failed in this effort because a majority in Congress believed it was carrying out the Administration's desire in eliminating the prevailing wage.

Your committee is informed that since the regular session of Congress adjourned, the Attorney General has handed down an opinion holding that Section 15 (b) of the Emergency Act of 1939, approved June 30, 1939, permitted WPA to pay the prevailing wage on work already begun before July 1, 1939.

Your committee regrets to inform the convention that up to the present time it has been impossible to learn whether the Administration of WPA intended to accept the opportunity presented by the law and the opinion of the Attorney General.

We, therefore recommend that the Executive Council continue to press for the restoration of the prevailing wage, and for the full application of the decision reached by the national conference called by the American Federation of Labor to consider the subject.

(Public Works)—(1940, p. 132) We believe that in the development and expansion of the defense program it is vitally important that a clear-cut separation be made between public works and work relief. There is no practical reason and little justification for the transfer of basic construction projects from the normal channels of private building under contract to work relief activity at sub-standard wages. The transfer of a large portion of defense construction work to relief employment will serve to perpetuate the WPA as a permanent institution by eliminating the private sources of employment normally provided by contract work.

We reiterate our recommendation of previous years in favor of a long-range permanent public works program designed to meet the immediate public works needs of the nation and yet provide the necessary means of expansion and curtailment of public works projects in harmony with general economic conditions. The large-scale program of military construction called for by national defense should provide a convenient starting point for the organization of a permanent public works administration.

We also recommend that full provision be made for the welfare of the unemployed wage earners and their families, administered through federal and local public assistance channels. Relief work should be continued to the extent to which it is truly needed. But the administration of this work should be considered an inseparable part of the general public assistance program, relying upon the network of public employment offices for fitting the most appropriate relief employment to the needy unemployed, and for relating the entire program to the other phases of unemployment relief and public assistance.

(P. 552) The Executive Council calls attention to a most significant policy and trend which has interfered with the recovery of private industry and has created obstacles impeding a decline in relief expenditures and normal contraction of the relief program. This trend and policy is illustrated by the invasion of the construction industry by transferring construction of public projects from contracts with private companies to WPA undertakings with wages and labor standards below those fixed by union agreements and prevailing in private industry.

The result has been to undermine by legislative enactments and by administrative rulings the constructive policy of prohibition of destructive competition between public and private construction work. The Executive Council points out that since the summer of 1939 at least seven out of every 10 WPA workers have been employed in the construction of public works. By administrative ruling the WPA directed that labor on all contract work should be supplied from relief rolls and only in the event labor could not be supplied by this source could the contractor employ workers through the normal channels. As a result practices subversive to trade skills have been set up which will plague the workers of the construction industry while the industry itself has been prevented from exercising its normal pull toward recovery.

These policies are unfortunate and harmful and we recommend every effort possible to secure reversal. We recommend that emphatic and positive action be taken to prevent the extension of such short-sighted policies into defense construction as a policy calculated to destroy confidence in the good faith of the government, thereby undermining morale and national unity when most needed. We recommend full provisions for the needy and unemployed workers but under conditions that will not interfere with their readjustment in the normal business structure and future progress. The first step to this end is the proposal we have repeatedly endorsed and urged—a long range public works program designed to conform to changing business trends and adjust to need for greater employment. We must find remedies for relief that do not interfere with permanent relief and which strengthen our free democratic institutions.

(Sewing Projects)—(P. 506) Through a resolution introduced in the 1940 Convention attention was directed to the excess cost of manufacturing clothing under Works Projects Administration projects notwithstanding the fact that workers under WPA are receiving sub-standard wages. The effect on employment in private industry has suffered thereby. Convention authorized the Executive Council to study this problem and take appropriate action.

(Encroachment on Construction Industry)—(Pp. 570-574) Five resolutions were submitted to the convention dealing with the activities of the Works Projects Administration in the building and construction industry. The following was adopted:

We must be alarmed at the fact that 80 percent of WPA employment, as reported to the Congress of the United States by the Administrator for the Works Projects Administration, has been in the building and construction field. This report is amazing when one considers that it is a report of an agency originally created and intended to be purely temporary in an emergency to provide for relief and to act as a stop-gap due to the lack of private employment.

Private industry to this time has not been able to supply employment and, as time goes on, our government through WPA is giving the building and construction industry more and more competition in an industry which under normal conditions is second only to that of agriculture in the number of men employed. Not only have these activities curtailed the opportunity of free untrammelled labor for the present, but they have borrowed on the future of the building and construction industry to the extent that normalcy is further delayed.

For the past five years we have been faced with the most serious threat of all—competition of the Government of the United States for the work upon which the building and construction contractors of the nation ordinarily would bid and upon which we as workers would be employed by these contractors. The whole future of the building and construction industry is threatened if such a move should continue. We cannot impress upon you delegates too emphatically the real, far-reaching effect of such competition.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the WPA be removed completely from the building and construction field and that their activities be continued on a purely temporary basis operating in localities where there is pressing need for projects of a non-construction nature and on which a maximum of common labor can be employed.

Your committee further recommends that the American Federation of Labor, its departments, state federations of labor, central bodies, national and international unions, and directly affiliated unions, urge the membership to communicate with the President of the United States, members of the Senate and House of Representatives and appropriate sovereign state officials to use their influence to have activities of the Works Projects Administration curtailed as set forth above.

(1941, p. 127) The Executive Council feels strongly that the relief needs must be met through federal and local public assistance channels and that the problem must not be obscured by emergency conditions. Special attention should be paid to the needs of families subjected to unemployment and privation because of industrial dislocations incidental to defense. Relief work should be continued wherever truly needed but its allocation should not be in conflict with available private employment. Closer integration of relief administration with the placement work of public employment offices should be achieved. Above all, planning must be begun to make provision for workers whose employment will terminate at the end of the emergency. This planning for the post-emergency should stem from the local communities which are most likely to be affected. Central labor unions and their committees are urged to call upon agencies of the municipal government to undertake studies of industrial and power resources of each locality as well as of housing and other community facilities to make possible the formulation of an integrated national program based on the needs and objectives of each locality.

(P. 676) . . . The Executive Council's report presents a comprehensive, factual account of the impact of defense on our relief and work relief problems. Far-reaching dislocations taking place throughout our economy have brought about large-scale job displacement and acute distress among workers in many communities. Shifts from civilian to defense production, application of priorities, and curtailment in the supply of raw materials are the major sources of defense unemployment. Confused and ineffective organization of the defense production program and failure to consider employment as one of the basic guiding factors in letting defense contracts were in large measure responsible for the new wave of unemployment. A firm policy with regard to subcontracting of defense orders as widely as possible, in such a way as to spread employment equitably among all communities and all sections of the country is most urgently needed.

Available data on the distribution of WPA employment bring out lack of integration between the new work relief need and the distribution of relief employment. The WPA has undertaken a large number of so-called "defense projects," most of which involve building and construction work which could readily be done by private contractors employing qualified union labor. We recommend that the use of contract method on all building and construction initiated by the Federal Government be made a requirement under the Emergency Relief Act and under policies and procedures of all federal agencies.

The relief needs of the nation are still extremely large. Emergency conditions must not obscure the vital urgency of the problem, and relief needs must be fully met through federal as well as local public assistance channels. We urge that special attention be devoted to the needs of workers' families subjected to unemployment because of dislocations incidental to defense, and that relief employment be continued wherever truly needed and wherever its allocation is not in conflict with available private employment.

We emphasize the need to achieve closer integration of the relief administration with the placement work of public employment offices, with active advisory participation of union representatives.

Planning must be without delay to provide for workers whose employment will terminate at the end of the emergency. Such planning, to be effective, must be from the roots up. Central labor unions and their committees should be urged to initiate studies for each locality, to determine the industrial and power resources of the community, as well as of housing and other facilities, which would make possible an integrated national program reflecting real needs of each community.

(1942, p. 623) Res. 142 charges the Works Projects Administration with the placing of unskilled workers in jobs requiring the skill of qualified tradesmen to the detriment of efficient work as well as to the destruction of wage standards and requests that the Executive Council cooperate in securing the liquidation of the Works Projects Administration and the transfer of its function and appropriation to the P.W.A.

Resolution referred to the Executive Council with instructions to investigate its contents and cooperate with the organizations involved in securing correction of the conditions about which complaint is made.

World Court of International Justice—(1924, p. 71) On February 24, 1923, the late President Harding submitted a message to the Senate containing advice to him from the Secretary of State dealing with the establishment of a permanent Court of International Justice and advocating that the U.S. participate officially in court.

No action was taken by the Senate at that time. In his message at the opening of Congress, December 6, 1923, President Coolidge pointed out that for nearly 25 years we have been a member of the Hague Tribunal and had long sought the creation of a permanent World Court of International Justice. President Coolidge pointed out the fact of the present existence of the permanent Court of International Justice and advocated that the U.S. become a participant in this court. No action was taken by the House or by the Senate until April 7, 1924, when Senator Pepper introduced a resolution in which he advocated that the U.S. Government should take the initiative in the establishment of a new court of international relations totally dissociated from the League of Nations. On this resolution hearings were held before a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate.

Representatives of the American Federation of Labor appeared before the subcommittee and advocated that the United States become a participant in the permanent Court of International Relations as now established. They pointed out the fact that 54 nations are now participants in the permanent court; that it is unthinkable that the nations now participating would consent to the dissolution of the present court and the establishment of a court in accord with the provisions of the Pepper resolution. A great number of people testified before the subcommittee, all in favor of the U.S. becoming a member of the present Court of International Relations. Hearings were closed. Up to the present time no report has been made by the subcommittee to the whole committee. On May 8, 1924, Senator Lodge, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted a resolution (S. J. Res. 122) proposing a statute for a World Court in accordance with the resolution of Senator Pepper, entirely separate and apart from the present established Court of International Relations. No action has been taken on this resolution.

World Federation of Trade Unions (also see: United Nations; Forced Labor; Foreign Policy; International; Communism, etc.)

(1944, pp. 69, 72) The Executive Council reported the obvious growing need for a free trade union organization in Europe which resulted in the action of the Federation in placing a representative in Europe to meet with trade union officials and keep the A. F. of L. advised on developments which lead to the formation of local trade unions in the United States Zone of Germany in line with patterns which had previously prevailed. Provisions for an amalgamation were reported to the convention. The need for an Inter-American economic organization was also reported to the convention which unanimously adopted the report of its committee.

(1946, pp. 59, 72, 433) In these sections of the report the Executive Council sets forth attitudes manifested and representations and activities engaged in having for their objective the reestablishment and functioning of free trade unions in the several European countries—and in promoting free trade unions wherever possible.

The American Federation of Labor can play an ever more strategic and perhaps decisive role in the critical European situation. The key to the future in Europe lies with the reconstructed and slowly reviving free labor movement. The extent to which this is recognized on truly democratic lines, will determine in a large measure, which way Europe will go in terms of the basic struggle that is ensuing between democracy and Russian totalitarianism. The extent to which the trade unions of Europe develop along free trade union lines will contribute much to the final decisions that Europe makes in the titanic political war between two basically different concepts of America and Russia.

The American Federation of Labor has always maintained that genuine free trade unions are the bulwark of modern democracy. The disastrous experience with Communism, Nazism, Fascism, Falangism as well as the tragedy of two world wars have confirmed the historical correctness of our position.

As the strongest free trade union federation in the world and functioning in a land which plays a decisive role in the international scene, the American Federation of Labor must now assume new and greater responsibilities for preserving and extending the ideals of genuine trade unionism. Today there is no longer an international rallying center for free trade unions. To the contrary the International Federation of Trade Unions has been replaced by a federation of unions dominated by the Soviet Government and its satellites and is nothing more than a caricature of a free trade union movement.

The WFTU was conceived by the Russian dictatorship and was created as a successor to the notorious and now defunct Red Internationale of Labor Unions. In its brief period of existence the World Federation of Labor has clearly and unmistakably proven itself as an agency to foster Russia's expansionist foreign policy. It has vigorously and regularly defended Russian imperialistic interests. It has delayed and prevented the revival of bona fide trade unions in Germany and elsewhere. It has consistently and violently denounced the British Labor Government and its general secretary has hailed and pictured the Russian terror now gripping the workers of Hungary, Poland, Roumania and Yugoslavia as "now enjoying freedoms which were previously unknown in other countries."

In Czechoslovakia, where those who control the WFTU likewise influence the affairs of state, not a single word of protest has been raised against a governmental decree permitting but a single trade union organization called "The Revolutionary Trade Union Movement" dominated and controlled by the government. Neither has the WFTU uttered a single word of condemnation against the barbarous mass deportations of workers from the Sudeten—many of whom had suffered in Hitler's prison and concentration camps for anti-Nazi activities while some of the Communists now in the Prague government directing these deportations were still supporting the Stalin-Hitler Pact. Here in Washington, D. C., at its meeting last month, the executive board of the WFTU echoed the Russian hypocritical cry about war propaganda being spread by monopolists and large capitalists but not a single word was said about the aggressions of the Russian Communist imperialism which has already snuffed out the independence of 11 nations between the Arctic and the Aegean and is now seeking to strangle Turkey and provoke chaos in the Arab world.

The WFTU cannot serve as a bridge from the free western workers to the oppressed Russian workers; it cannot function as a vehicle of rapprochement between the free labor movements of the western world and the enslaved workers of Russia and her puppet states. The setting up of an international trade union body under the control and domination of Russia and Russian occupied countries and colonial and semi-colonial lands, marks a dangerously backward and extremely harmful departure in international unionism. This reactionary development is fraught with the gravest consequences for the free organized labor movements everywhere.

While apprehensive regarding the objectives of the WFTU, and the slave and imperialistic foreign policy of Russia, we entertain only the best of good wishes toward the Russian people. Our sympathy goes out to them in their feudalistic bondage and slavery. We sincerely desire to look forward to the day when the Russian workers and peasants will have the right and enjoy the benefits of free trade unionism and association and cooperation at home as we enjoy these rights and benefits. We hope it may not be long before they will take their rightful place in the ranks of an international movement of free trade unions and join with us in the onward march of free labor.

Our country has not sought one cent of reparations or advantage, no territorial annexations or commercial privileges out of the recent world conflict. The American people have poured billions of dollars into aiding the Allies during the war and since military hostilities have ceased the United States has provided 71 per cent of all the UNRRA supplies—the bulk of which has gone to Soviet-dominated areas. Our nation has made heavy sacrifices in human lives and natural resources and material goods in order to crush Axis and Fascist tyranny. Certainly all this has not been done to replace one tyranny by another.

It is in a tense and turbulent international situation such as this that the American Federation of Labor must be prepared to face its urgent and manifold tasks. Through the League for Human Rights, the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates have contributed millions of dollars of relief to Labor's underground fighters against Axis tyranny in Europe and Asia and as well to the victims of Nazi-Fascist terrorism in all lands. Through the Free Trade Union Committee we have maintained direct, active and increasingly fruitful contact with the suppressed trade union bodies of war-torn lands. We have published special bulletins in English, French, Spanish and German advising European Labor about the policies and practices and achievements of the millions of workers in the American Federation of Labor. We have even published one issue of bulletin in the Russian language but the Soviet leaders have thus far denied passage of this issue through the Iron Curtain and its distribution among workers of the USSR.

Representatives of the A. F. of L. have rendered yeoman service in assisting the Japanese workers in rebuilding their unions on a firm and free basis. At the first possible opportunity, the A. F. of L. helped the workers of Italy to take their first steps toward reestablishing bona fide free trade unions. During the past year two representatives of the A. F. of L. have been working in Europe. Through them we have been able to help trade unions to get the supplies necessary for their operation and to initiate plans for relief. By these efforts we were helpful in clearing away the political and military obstacles which prevented the reconstruction of free trade unions in Germany—so vital to the democratic regeneration of the German people.

The Executive Council has intervened actively with President Truman, the State Department and the Office of Military Government for returning to the German trade unions the offices, property and financial assets which had been stolen from them by the Nazis.

The task before us as free trade unionists is great. Unless the trade unions of Germany and of other lands are given leadership by the free trade unions with a rallying center this field will be pre-empted by those who would communize our free trade union organizations. A program of facts and information for European workers giving concrete reports on wages and working conditions of the American workers is essential. Likewise information about the Soviet economy and the so-called trade unionism in Russia is desirable. Exchanges of workers and leaders from various industries and international unions must be encouraged and become part of our regular activity in Europe. Relief must be provided to the reviving free trade unions and leaders and to other democratic forces who are struggling to liberate themselves from totalitarian control. These and other activities must be engaged in if we are to make freedom of the workers safe throughout the world.

We are pleased to record the fact that provision has been made by the American Federation of Labor to set up a European office through which to service European trade unionists and that likewise provision has been made by the A. F. of L. to supplement the services of the Free Trade Union Committee by the selection of a direct appointee.

Strategically Germany is the economic heart of Continental Europe and can give leadership as well in the field of Labor. It is therefore important to aid them to move quickly and surely toward free trade unions for their progress and protection, for the security of Europe and lastly, to safeguard free trade unionism in the United States. We cannot continue to prosper in isolation in the field of Labor any more than can our government prosper in isolation! Only by our joining hands with the visible forces of democracy throughout the world can we hope to make the democratic way of life more dynamic and effective and fully secure us against the constant encroachments and unwarranted and vicious assaults of every type and of every stripe of totalitarian dictatorship.

(1947, p. 187) . . . The American Federation of Labor has also been engaged in sharp conflicts with the WFTU which has loyally endorsed Russia's expansionist foreign policy seeking to exploit and enslave German labor and to treat the German trade unionists not as brothers but as second-class citizens put on probation under WFTU supervision and Moscow domination.

The increasing and varied volume of correspondence with trade unionists of every continent is irrefutable proof of the growing interest in, and support of, the ideal of democracy and free trade unionism as expounded, advocated, and applied by the American Federation of Labor. The WFTU has been put on the defensive and exposed as a fifth-column of Soviet imperialism and a purveyor of totalitarian propaganda. Because of the information in our publications and our constructive initiative and leadership in international political affairs as well as in economic questions, the WFTU is now regarded by more workers as totally bankrupt as an international trade union federation and utterly incapable of and unconcerned with defending the interests of Labor.

(Pp. 471, 476) It is only natural that the A. F. of L., as the strongest body of free trade unions in the world should come into head-on collision with the WFTU. Everything that has happened since this caricature of a world federation of unions was set up has confirmed our evaluation of it as a camouflaged and delicately controlled instrument of Soviet imperialist interests and foreign policy. It has dismally failed to defend the interests of the workers on the economic field. As an international body, it has thrown its weight behind government coordinated unions in Czechoslovakia and has put the stamp of approval on the so-called trade unions in all the other Russian satellite countries. In these unfortunate lands, the trade unions have been transformed into parts of the state apparatus of the brutal dictatorships exploiting and oppressing the workers.

The WFTU has also turned a deaf ear to the widespread protests against the persecution and arrest of tried and true leaders of the bona fide trade union movement in these overrun countries. The role of the WFTU as an instrument of the aggressive and expansionist foreign policy of the USSR has been most painfully confirmed by its refusal to heed the repeated requests of the Austrian trade unions for help against the Soviet attempt to secure Russian imperialist domination of Austria by the seizure of the so-called German assets. In Germany, the WFTU has treated even the most courageous trade union fighters against Nazism as second class citizens. The only prescription it could offer for the ailing Ruhr coal fields is forced labor. The largest affiliate of the WFTU—the so-called Russian Trade Union Council—does not enjoy any of the most elementary rights of organized labor in free lands. Its machinery has even been turned into an agency to facilitate the savage deportation of millions of workers to infernal slave labor camps in the most God-forsaken regions of the Russian empire.

In the Social and Economic Council of the UN, the WFTU consultants have hewed to the CP line, studiously avoided all basic issues confronting world labor, and stubbornly fought against the constructive initiative and positive programs offered by the consultants of the A. F. of L.

A growing uneasy feeling now permeates the ranks of the WFTU affiliates west of the Iron Curtain. The rank and file is realizing more and more that there is something fundamentally wrong with an international trade union organization which dare not even discuss the problems of world reconstruction—let alone try to help the rebuilding of war-wrecked economies and to foster the protection and promotion of the rights, liberties, and interests of the working people. In fact, many affiliates of the WFTU are now part of the Russian Fifth Column which is frantically seeking to sabotage postwar reconstruction and doom the toiling people to poverty, misery and chaos.

... There is even more profound disillusionment in large sections of the WFTU at its adamant refusal to utter a word of protest against or even dare discuss the alarming spread of forced labor and "political convicts" from Iron Curtain zones. Being controlled by the Russian bloc, the WFTU has not opposed and has even approved the reckless dismantling of industrial plants whose operation is vital to the livelihood of German workers and the development of strong free trade unions.

While the WFTU bureaucratic machine, securely in the hands of Communist stooges, has worked overtime to slander the aspirations of British and American democracy, it has never made the slightest criticism of Russian expansionist imperialism. It could not be otherwise. The overwhelming majority of the membership of the WFTU is to be found in Russia, its satellite states, and in federations like the French and Italian over which the Communists still have a stranglehold.

Your committee is glad to report that the International Labor Relations Committee has carried the fight to this WFTU, exposed its false role and energetically sought to counteract its dangerous activities with positive constructive programs for strengthening free trade unionism and rescuing free trade unionists from famine.

Though there is still much to be done before world labor will again be able to reconstitute a genuine international federation of free trade unions, we have made real headway. The forces dominating the WFTU realize this. One of the primary reasons for the steps recently taken to reestablish formally and openly the Comintern is to prepare a machine for replacing the WFTU in the event that it should become seriously weakened or be stripped of such bona fide trade union affiliates as the British Trades Union Congress, the labor unions from the Netherlands, Scandinavian countries, Switzerland and Latin America.

In this light it is no accident that the A. F. of L. has been the principal target of the officials of the state-controlled unions in the countries under the yoke of totalitarian dictatorships. We are proud of our friends in the democratic world. And we are glad to be judged by the nature of the enemies we have made. This convention of the A. F. of L. must resolve to expand its educational and relief activities in behalf of free trade unionism and democracy. The A. F. of L. will give the proper and deserving answer to the Comintern—no matter under what guise or label those who pull its strings operate.

(P. 476) Res. 114 proposed that... the 66th Convention of the American Federation of Labor instruct and empower the Executive Council to invite the outstanding leaders of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and independent unions to a roundtable conference to consider the advisability of working out a plan to carry on a common foreign policy of American organized labor to cooperate with the State Department and the President of the United States in the most effective development and application of the international and foreign policies of the Government of the United States.

The convention committee, which was unanimously adopted, reported as follows:

While your committee understands and heartily sympathizes with the sincere desire of the introducers of this resolution for unity of Labor and its active participation in the vital field of foreign policy we cannot recommend acceptance of its proposed concrete action.

As long as the C.I.O. is an affiliate of the WFTU, whose policies and activities are largely molded and dictated by organizations which are not free and are only the subservient tools of totalitarian governments, the C.I.O. is not in a position to exercise its free judgment, to make a free decision, to speak clearly and act independently on international problems confronting American and world Labor.

Your committee further notes the fact that not until the C.I.O. severs its connections with the WFTU—a body controlled by foreign governments—and not until it is prepared to reunite with the mainstream of American Labor, the A. F. of L., in the organic unification of trade unionism in the United States, will the very commendable objective of this resolution be attainable.

(Seamen's and Dockers' Division)—(1949, pp. 271, 421) The Maritime Trades Department reported that the WFTU had set up a special Seamen's and Dockers' Division which could be used to carry out the orders of the Cominform, and is, therefore, a threat to the free trade union movement throughout the world and to world peace.

The convention unanimously approved the following committee recommendation:

Your committee recommends that this fact be widely publicized and that full consideration be given to this threat by the delegates from the American Federation of Labor at the meeting to establish the new world trade union organization. In working out a program of opposition to the Communist-dominated waterfront unions, fullest consideration must be given to the proposals of the Maritime Trades Department, and all of its affiliated unions.

World Health Organization (UN)—(1948, p. 98) The Executive Council briefly traced the origin and work of the World Health Organization, pointing out the interest of the workers in this body and its objectives.

(P. 490) The convention adopted the following committee report on the World Health Organization:

We endorse the evaluation of this special agency of the United Nations made by the Council.

Your committee notes with satisfaction that the A. F. of L. consultants to the UN have taken steps to secure representation in this body and have prepared plans for active participation in its work with a view of having this agency take measures for international action to promote the health standards of the laboring people everywhere.

World Trade Union Conference, Proposed—(1944, p. 278) On November 2, 1943, Sir Walter Citrine, Secretary of the British Trades Union Congress, issued a call for a conference of representatives of the organized workers of all countries to meet in London on June 5, 1944.

It was set forth in the call for this conference that it was being convened for the purpose of considering the most pressing problems, both of policy and of organization, affecting the interests of the working people and thereby promoting the widest possible unity in aim and action of the international trade union movement.

In making reply to this invitation sent to the American Federation of Labor, it was pointed out that the American Federation of Labor was affiliated with the International Federation of Trade Unions; that it was of the opinion that international trade union matters should be dealt with through this agency, and that if a conference of the representatives of organized workers throughout the world was convened it should be called by the International Federation of Trade Unions.

Furthermore, the call issued by Sir Walter Citrine made it clear that he had extended invitations to the representatives of organizations which were not considered as bona fide labor organizations and, in addition, to dual unions in the United States and Canada. Because of this fact the officers of the American Federation of Labor declined the invitation to participate in this so-called world conference of alleged representatives of organized labor in all countries throughout the world, which was called to meet in London on June 5.

Correspondence passed between the President of the American Federation of Labor and Sir Walter Citrine dealing with this subject. In this correspondence the President of the American Federation of Labor made clear the reasons why the American Federation of Labor could not and would not participate in such a world conference.

On May 3, 1944, Sir Walter Citrine publicly announced that the plans to hold a world conference of alleged representatives of Labor were cancelled and that no such conference would be held. This ended the matter. The conference was never held and because of that fact the Executive Council considers the matter a closed incident.

(P. 454) In his reply to the Fraternal Delegate from Great Britain to the 1944 Convention, President Green made the following statement:

"Now my good friend, Brother Horner, referred to our labor conference or world conference to be called in England. I am thoroughly aware of the motives that inspired the British Trades Union Congress to call such a world conference.

"But it occurs to us that, first of all, if a world conference should have been called, it ought to have been called by a world agency, such as the International Federation of Trade Unions, a world trade union organization in which the American Federation of Labor is represented and in which the British Trades Union Congress is represented—free democratic trade unions. For some reason or other this agency did not participate in the call for a world conference.

"Then we do not understand why those dissident forces in our own country who have launched upon a dual movement for the avowed purpose of destroying the American Federation of Labor should participate in such a conference and endeavor to tell the American Federation of Labor, the great American labor movement that has functioned for three-quarters of a century, what it shall do. For that reason, Brother Horner, and for other reasons, it is my judgment that the American Federation of Labor will not be represented at the world conference, such as is being called to meet in London next January. We want to establish unity here; we want a united labor movement here; we believe that unity and solidarity should be established here. We stand as we have always stood, and we are not responsible for the division . . . here at home.

P. 629) Res. 149 proposed the calling of an international trade union conference in the United States. The resolution was covered in the special report of the Special Committee on International Relations, approved by the convention.

(P. 574) Under the caption, "Proposed World Trade Union Conference," the Executive Council's report calls attention to the invitation received to the proposed world trade union conference. In replying to the invitation the Executive Council voiced the opinion that questions relative to international trade union relations should be dealt with through the International Federation of Trade Unions. It was evident that the invitation had been sent to representatives of organizations which were not considered to be bona fide trade unions, and in addition to some which were dual to the unions in the United States and Canada. Because of these facts the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor declined to accept the invitation, and through correspondence the President of the American Federation of Labor informed Sir Walter Citrine of the reasons why the American Federation of Labor could not see its way clear to participate in such a proposed conference.

Yellow Dog Contracts (also see: American Plan)—(1925, p. 310) The E.C. was directed to investigate the practice of employers requiring employees to sign a contract to withdraw from their union affiliations in order to retain their jobs or to secure employment.

(1926, p. 305) The A. F. of L. reaffirms its opposition to the practice generally called the "yellow dog contract" as un-American in principle and industrially unsound. Because of the vital connection between this practice and organization problems for our unions we endorse the proposal of the E.C. that further study be given to formulation of legislation to outlaw "yellow dog contracts" and that the council be authorized to take such further action as its study shall suggest.

(P. 339) The A. F. of L. desires to call attention to the development and use of an alleged form of contract which some anti-union employers are compelling employees to accept.

Under the guise of a contract for employment, wage earners, are compelled to surrender their trade union membership, and pledge themselves to take no collective action with fellow employees relative to their terms of employment, or to become members of trade unions while remaining in the firm's employ.

The employee, as a price of securing or retaining a job, is forced to surrender his right to voluntary association. Such alleged contracts contain a fundamental injustice, their existence constitutes an imminent danger not only to the workers but to all the people of the U.S.

The employers who make use of them are advocates of the so-called and misnamed "American Plan." They are members of powerful organizations. Having applied their right to free association and organized their city and state bodies, federating these into national associations they apply the individual contract to their employees for the purpose of making it impossible for them to exercise their right as free men and American citizens, to organize for self-protection and the promotion of their welfare.

The employers making use of individual contracts in many instances organize for the specific purpose of devising and applying ways and means of preventing their employees from enjoying their equal right to organize.

The individual contract popularly known as the "yellow dog," is intended to so deprive the wage earners of one of their most necessary and essential rights as free men that industrial autocracy can be established and function unchallenged.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that "all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," but supporters of the so-called American Plan denounce this basic and divine truth. They deny the existence of equality of rights and of opportunities for all American citizens and announce that employers alone shall have the right of organization in the industrial field.

There is no mutuality in the "yellow dog" contract. Being devoid of this it lacks the vital essential of a contract. The employee surrenders his right to voluntary association, while the employer's right to organize remains unquestioned and unlimited.

There is but one purpose in these contracts. They do not guarantee continuous employment for any definite period of time, they do not guarantee the payment of any specified wage rate. They contain but one specific condition, the provision that in return for the privilege of working the workman will completely surrender the right of taking any collective action with fellow employees, or become a member of a trade union.

Such alleged contracts are contrary to public policy, for their specific purpose is to prevent American citizens who are wage earners from exercising an all-important right. They are contrary to public policy because they seek through the law of contract to destroy one of the basic rights established by the federal constitution.

Such contracts have but one purpose, the creation of class rights and distinctions in the industrial field, through the building up of a legal fiction that under the law of contract, workmen may lawfully surrender the right to voluntary association. The recognition of such contracts as valid instruments, their application to workmen in general, would soon establish a condition in industry under which organization would no longer be possible for workmen.

The employers, through their associations, would dominate the lives of the workers, as thoroughly as the barons dominated their serfs, or as the masters did the peons before the enactment of the anti-peonage law.

The "yellow dog" contract is a challenge to our American institutions. It is intended to destroy the exercise of a most essential right. Its existence creates a condition which our movement must recognize and prepare to overcome.

The negro was prevented from being forced into a second condition of slavery by the enactment of the anti-peonage law. No one in the United States can now enter into any contract to work for another for the purpose of paying debts. Such forms of contract for labor are illegal. The employer forcing one upon a workman is punished by imprisonment.

The "yellow dog" contract is as fully destructive of human liberty as a condition of peonage. It shackles the workman's hands, it prevents him from voluntary association with his fellow workmen, it prevents him from having a voice in determining the terms of employment and conditions of labor. It makes him a voiceless human cog in the machinery of industry. It transforms him into a helpless victim, made such so that the employer may establish autocracy in industry.

The A. F. of L. has always been pledged to vigorously oppose every form of autocracy. It denounces and condemns in the most vigorous terms any system of industry which tends or undertakes to subjugate free men by reason of their necessities or weaknesses. It now calls upon trade unionists to meet this present challenge to human rights and unflinchingly and intelligently attack that form of autocracy which is manifesting itself through "yellow dog" contracts.

(1928, p. 264) The Board of Education of Seattle, Washington, has demanded that as a condition of employment or reemployment teachers of that city must sign individual contracts declaring that they are not members of the American Federation of Teachers or any local thereof, and that they will not become members during the term of the proposed contract.

The President of the A. F. of L. has correctly stigmatized the action of the Seattle Board of Education as un-American, and an insult to the teachers because it deprives them of their constitutional right to join an organization animated by the highest American idealism.

The act depriving our loyal and patriotic teachers of their privileges as citizens may be the entering wedge of a movement to deprive all public service employes of their fundamental civic rights, therefore, the E.C. is directed to protect the rights of the teachers.

(1929, p. 92) During the year several bills to make "yellow dog" contracts legally null and void were introduced in various legislatures. Most earnest agitation was conducted in California, Illinois, Ohio and Wisconsin.

But the latter state was the only one in which there was success. The bill that became a law in Wisconsin followed the principle of the Ohio bill and then extended it to similar contracts made by cooperatives in agricultural, horticultural and dairy products. It makes illegal any contract or agreement to join or not to join a member of any cooperative association.

Most sincere thought has been given the construction of legislation to make illegal "yellow dog" contracts. Some of the most prominent attorneys favor the Ohio bill. The attorney general of that state in an extended analysis declared it to be constitutional. While on the face of it the Wisconsin law appears to be worded to meet any court proceedings some lawyers contend it will be declared unconstitutional. The consensus of opinion, however, is that both laws are constitutional.

(1931, pp. 119, 410) Labor has made great headway toward declaring "yellow dog" contracts invalid and void. Members of the various state legislatures undoubtedly learned of the viciousness of these contracts through a report of the discussions held on the floor of the Senate when Judge John J. Parker's appointment was up for confirmation to be a member of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Wisconsin was the first state to declare such contracts unlawful. Four states have been added to the list this year. They are: Arizona, Colorado, Ohio and Oregon. The Indiana legislature passed an anti-yellow dog contract bill but it was vetoed by the governor. A bill introduced in the Massachusetts legislature failed of passage because the Supreme Court of that state to which it was referred for an advisory opinion declared it unconstitutional.

After the defeat of Judge Parker in the Senate, pamphlets were prepared and distributed throughout the United States in which the debates were incorporated and information regarding the "yellow dog" contract given to labor officials in order that they could appear before legislative committees in the interest of this legislation.

Labor's anti-injunction bill which will be presented to Congress prohibits "yellow dog" contracts. We believe public sentiment is sufficiently strong against this form of contract as to render unsuccessful any attempt to strike such provision from the bill.

Now that five states have enacted legislation prohibiting these contracts it should be an encouragement to the labor movements of other states to urge the passage of similar measures by their respective legislatures.

It might be well to report that 10 of the U.S. Senators who voted to confirm Judge Parker's appointment will not be members of the next Senate. Senators Allen, Blease, Grundy, McCulloch, Ransdell and Steck were defeated on that issue. Senators Baird, Gillett, Goff and Gould declined to be candidates.

(Oklahoma City Teachers)—(1943, p. 594) Res. 10:

Whereas—The Board of Education in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, has offered to the teachers of the city a "yellow dog" contract providing that no teacher shall be employed who is a member of the American Federation of Teachers or any other labor organization of teachers, and

Whereas—Such a contract is a distinct violation of the fundamental principles of democratic government for which the American Federation of Labor has battled over the years and for which we are now waging global war, and

Whereas—The right of public employees—local, state, and national—to affiliate with organized labor is generally recognized throughout the nation, and

Whereas—The resurrection of the outmoded yellow dog contract in Oklahoma City is an alarming example of the attempt to use the war effort for the purpose of crushing organized labor, and

Whereas—The danger of the spread of the yellow dog contract to other unions is a serious threat to all organized labor in the nation, and

Whereas—The Board of Education and the Superintendent of Schools in Oklahoma City are hampering the war effort by compelling organized labor to battle against totalitarian practices on the home front at a time when undivided effort should be used in waging war against the enemies of democracy on the battle front, and

Whereas—The President of the United States has stated that the American Federation of Teachers can contribute much to winning the war and establishing a lasting peace, therefore be it

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled in Boston, Massachusetts, in October, 1943, condemn the Board of Education of Oklahoma City and the Superintendent of Schools, for attempting to enforce a contract which conforms to the principles of the Axis dictatorship rather than to the philosophy of American democracy, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor congratulates the Central Labor Union of Oklahoma City and the Oklahoma Federation of Labor for the courageous battle against this outrageous violation of the principles of American democracy, and be it further

Resolved—That the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions render all possible assistance to the international union of the American Federation of Teachers and to organized labor in Oklahoma in this battle to eliminate the vicious yellow dog clause from the contracts of the teachers of the city.

Your committee believes that the enforcement of a yellow dog contract in Oklahoma City prohibiting teachers from affiliating with organized labor is a challenge to the entire labor movement as well as to the teachers' international union. It is unthinkable that any employer in this enlightened age of American democracy would resurrect the outmoded yellow dog contract which was prevalent a quarter of a century ago. The board of education and superintendent of schools who are responsible for the education of the children of Oklahoma City have compelled those who teach in the schools to sign a contract which in industry would be subject to prosecution under federal law. Such regimentation of employees in the public schools should serve as a grave warning that the battle for democracy exists on the home front as well as on the battle front. The boys in the armed forces from Oklahoma City are fighting and dying for a principle which is being violated in their own home town.

The committee, therefore, concurs in this resolution and urges the Executive Council to use every possible means including legal advice in assisting to abolish the yellow dog contract in the public schools of Oklahoma City.

(1944, pp. 63, 79, 430, 431, 615) Res. 75, 76 and 124. Resolutions were submitted to the convention actively supporting legislation which would prohibit the use of federal funds by any public or private agency for the payment of wages or salaries to workers employed by such agencies on any public works program under a so-called yellow dog contract agreement.

On recommendation of its committee, the convention unanimously voted to adopt Res. 76 as follows:

Whereas—Certain funds such as are now available under the Lanham

Act for the maintenance of schools and other activities, and

Whereas—These funds are being used in some states and communities to enforce the yellow dog contract against teachers, and

Whereas—There is danger that tomorrow such funds may be used to enforce the yellow dog contract on all the vast postwar federal, state and local public works programs, therefore, be it

Resolved—That the 64th Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, assembled in the City of New Orleans, Louisiana, November 20, 1944, go on record as actively supporting legislation which would prohibit the use of federal funds by any public or private agency for the payment of wages or salaries to workers employed by such agencies on any public works program under a so-called yellow dog contract agreement.

Youth Administration, National (see also: Apprenticeship Training in Program of NYA; Local Advisory Boards on Vocational Education)

(1939, p. 212) Our Committee on Education gave special consideration to the problem of youth organizations. We are not unmindful of the fact that opportunities for self-development must be available in the formative years and adapted to successive stages of growth. The most far-reaching consequence of emergencies—whether war or economic depression—is interference with the growth and education of the next generation. The consequences of malnutrition or denial of educational opportunities in youth cannot be remedied by abundance at some later time. In these years of social and political turmoil that have shaken social foundations throughout the world we have seen still worse wrong done to the children of those nations who have organized their defenseless children in their immaturity in support of propaganda based on unsound social principles.

We recognize that the educational institutions of every country are organized in support of national institutions. When this is done through responsible agencies in accord with national opinion freely expressed the results represent the level of social progress at which the nation is living. But when policies are developed arbitrarily and there is imposed upon a growing generation unsound principles of living, a great wrong is done which is irreparable in nature. Responsible citizens seek to protect youth during its period of immaturity rather than harness boys and girls in the promotion of causes however good in themselves. It is we believe a sound principle that we as a nation should disapprove organizations of the immature except for purposes that have to do with their personal development. Youth movements are easy tools to power or revolution when concerned with other purposes.

We find a tendency of the National Youth Administration to deal with the problems of youth as though they were in conflict with the interests of the rest of the community. We believe that the distress of youth in this depression while it has a special appeal is only one portion of the dire distress which befell young and old alike. The remedy for all is the same—to get our economic agencies in action to provide the materials and services for the kind of life we wish to have. As a relief measure we do not believe there should be division based on immaturity. However, we do believe that regardless of the fortunes of the family income, boys and girls should have opportunity to continue their education through secondary schools and through academic work if able and willing to do the work. We, therefore, heartily recommend the program of the National Youth Administration that enables youth to remain in school, and urge its continuance in connection with the Office of Education. That portion of its work which provides services to persons without work experience we believe should be developed in connection with the U.S. Employment Service and a Juvenile Employment Division. Schools themselves should not undertake placement though they need to keep in close touch because of their knowledge of the students and because they should know how effective their training proves itself outside school walls. The transition from school to job has always involved difficulties but the depression has blocked many normal channels.

That portion of the National Youth Administration's activities concerned with vocational training we hold should be done by existing agencies, expanded as needed, and should be subject to those regulations and safeguards which society has deemed wise. It is socially and economically dangerous to provide potential resources to enable undertakings to be independent of existing agencies charged with performing that function under safeguards provided by law.

Annually 2,250,000 boys and girls come from schools and colleges to the world of work, seeking a chance to earn a living and thus becoming self-dependent members of society. During the past 10 years the number of unemployed reached 15 million, has never fallen below seven million, and is even now 10 million. Meanwhile, the steady stream of young persons from universities, colleges and high schools has found doors closed to professions, technical work, to apprenticeship for crafts and to positions in commerce and industry where less pretraining was required. During the past 10 years many of these young persons became a part of the great army of unemployed together with other young persons, the middle-aged and the old.

There were in 1937 approximately 3,900,000 unemployed persons between the ages of 16 and 25, or approximately one-third of the total unemployed. Moreover one-fourth to one-fifth of those who have jobs worked only part time. Unemployment is certainly not primarily a youth problem but its high proportion among youth gives to young people a special concern for its widespread character amongst their own number.

Young people from the ages of 16 to 25 constitute approximately one-sixth of the population—or 23,000,000 in round numbers. This ratio of youth to adults has not always remained constant. It changes with declining birth rate and increasing longevity. In 1870 there was one youth to every two adults; today there is one youth to every three adults. This means that the competition between youth and adults tend to increase not decrease. It tends to explain much of the difficulty of the young in finding employment. Unless constructive measures are found the situation lends itself to propaganda that would create a spirit of conflict between the young and the mature. Society has steadily increased its educational requirements by strengthening its compulsory school attendance and by prohibiting gainful employment of children. At the turn of the century there were 700,000 in our high schools; today there are 6,000,000. Similarly our colleges have grown five-fold in less than four decades.

Union labor is proud of its record as one of the founders of our public school system. The American Federation of Labor has for nearly six decades made responsibility for improving and expanding educational opportunities available through tax-supported institutions, one of its primary duties. Through child-labor and compulsory school attendance laws we have tried to safeguard our own and all other children from work exploitation during their period of development. We have steadily urged more adequate school structures and their fullest use by the community. We have offered teachers Labor support for academic freedom for sound teaching and union organization for dealing with their economic problems. We have urged enrichment of the curricula for all and their adaptation to the needs of those preparing for all walks of life. We now particularly urge revision of the curriculum of secondary schools. Before the twentieth century only a small percentage of our population received a high school education and the high school curriculum is still dominated by the needs of those going into the professions. Such a curriculum is pre-vocational training for the professions and does not always interest boys and girls with abilities that fit them for commercial or industrial occupations. Pre-professional training should be recognized as vocational training, so that high schools shall realize the need to plan the common training, fitting those in all walks for citizenship under democratic institutions.

We are convinced that democracy is a way of life and not merely a form of government and that future citizens must be trained for their responsibilities in a democracy. If our citizens are to have a sense of social unity and personal responsibility essential for the democratic way of life, they must learn their first lessons in our public schools. The school should not only prepare pupils for life as workers but also as members of a community. It is this preparation for our common life in the community and in the nation that is the chief responsibility of secondary schools. Vocational training whether for the professions, the trade or general industry is supplmentary to this basic preparation for citizenship.

Knowledge of the world in which we live and understanding of individual relationship to community life are essential to a sense of responsibility for democracy. The school has its part to contribute to the discipline which prepares youth for the democratic way of life. The rights and privileges of democratic life must be sustained by corresponding duties and disciplined responsibility. As the high school finds its special educational function and develops a response to the interests of boys and girls in what constitutes our common life, boys and girls will not leave school in order to find something of real interest. Development of secondary schools and organization of the curriculum to give them preparation for living is essential to justify our compulsory school attendance laws.

Because we believe there is a unity in the whole of life and that youth is preparatory for maturity and old age, we think organization on the basis of youth for other than educational or recreational purposes is unwise. Youth cannot solve the problems of maturity nor is it in a position of responsibility. The organizations of youth should fit the young for their responsibilities, not setting them in conflict with those who have had experience and responsibility. Experience and information are necessary to responsibility and to preparation for responsible living with its rights and obligations. Youth organizations are usually deliberately or unconsciously controlled by adults who have purposes to serve. In its own interests youth should be protected against such designs until in position and of a maturity to make its own decisions.

While we make provisions for the mental and physical development of youth, we must not neglect to provide individuals with opportunity for development of the spirit which determines the kind of relations an individual has with his fellow-men and interprets to him his relationship to the universe. What one sees in life will largely determine the value he will attach to other people's lives and fix his sense of responsibility in dealing with others. We believe that the home, the church, and society have a responsibility to provide wide freedom for individuals to seek spiritual growth and discipline. Freedom for individuals must rest on freedom of speech and freedom of thought with appreciation of the responsibilities and duties that accompany freedom of living. We must assure religious freedom in order to assure social progress for ourselves and our children.

In lands where personal freedom has given way before governmental control of the machinery and rules of life and work, we have watched the governmental development of youth movements in the service of political ends—disrupting homes and those basic ties that develop out of the mutuality of rights and duties. Labor wants to protect the boys and girls of the United States from such a perverted fate and to assure them balanced development. The meaning of life for youth grows out of their relationship to their parents and families and out of their religious training and spiritual development. During their temporary dependence upon their elders is the period for learning responsibilities and rights they will be expected to exercise in maturity. An understanding of basic human relations, developed in youth, makes valuable citizens, prepared to maintain democratic institutions. What society does for its children brings rich rewards in national progress. Protective laws, social services, educational opportunities, are all necessary provisions but they cannot insure honesty, integrity in living, or understanding of the importance of so living that every relationship in life is constructive and that all with whom we come in contact are bettered by that relationship. Character and understanding of the purpose of living are what can make youth and adults contribute to human betterment and progress, and they are the ends which our proposals would serve.

Every age has a responsibility for the young. The American Federation of Labor shares in that responsibility which includes provisions for material well-being and opportunity for physical, intellectual and spiritual development. We as an organization can be responsible only for assuring opportunities and the right to benefit by them, but the development of personality and spiritual capacity in our young lies outside the reach of our organization and devolves upon the home, the church and those teachers whose own personalities give them power to help the young grow in insight and wisdom. In order to conserve influences that are necessary to discipline and ideals in living, the American Federation of Labor declares for freedom of religion and religious training as the most fundamental contribution we can make to the children of the future.

(P. 619) The youth problem in every civilized state has today become a matter of real concern. In the totalitarian states the regimentation of youth have been the basis by which dictators have sought to perpetuate themselves. In many of the democratic countries the plight of unemployed youth has become a threat to the stability of the social order. In recognition of the reality of the special problems with which youth are confronted today, special commissions have been set up and exhaustive researches made in this and other countries. In previous reports to this Federation of Labor, the notable research studies of the American Youth Commission has been appraised. In the pages of the Executive Council's Report there has been set forth an extended discussion of the youth question which deserves the study of the delegates to this convention.

The Council's Report gives consideration to the trends in National Youth Administration. It is clear from what is here set forth that this is a matter which comes very definitely within the concern of labor and toward the solution of which labor can make a significant contribution. For labor speaks out of decades of concern for child life; it has stood valiantly as the champion of the abolition of child labor. It has urged the extension of educational opportunities in order to meet some of those requirements. It has also urged the expansion of recreational opportunities for all. It has taken those methods calculated to meet youth needs at the point where they can best be met.

Out of Labor's experience there has come some clearcut conclusions. In the first place, while unemployment among youth is an increasingly serious problem, it is impossible to resolve this problem apart from the total problem. Youth are a part of the body politic; they are an indivisible part of every nation. When unemployment abounds, youth are among many other sufferers; when jobs are plentiful, youth will find work.

In the second place, labor realizes the wisdom of extending secondary educational opportunities to our youth to meet the need of unemployed youth in many of our communities. While raising the school age level is not a permanent solution for the question of youth unemployment, it does place upon the educational authorities a responsibility which they are better equipped to meet than any other agency in the community.

The decision of the National Youth Administration to develop a Juvenile Employment Division in the Labor Employment Offices, to assist in the placement of young people in their labor market, should materially help in finding work for youth.

Your committee notes the concern of the Permanent Committee on Education for the activity of the National Youth Administration in connection with vocational training. The difficulty that has arisen in the National Youth Administration is due to the confusion in the minds of this agency as to whether their function is to perform vocational training or work experience of a pre-vocational character. It is the considered judgment of your committee that vocational training of our youth should be done through existing educational agencies adapted to meet this need. On the other hand, in the matter of work experience of a distinctly pre-vocational character, your committee agrees with the present policy of the National Youth Administration.

But what has become clear is the need for a revision of our high school curriculum to meet the changing needs of industry as well as the expanding needs of youth. As the secondary school becomes a common school for all of our youth, it is clear that we must have more in the way of pre-professional training and pre-vocational education for our youth.

Your committee cannot do better than to make its own the closing paragraph of this significant section on youth from the Council's Report: "Every age has a responsibility for the young. The American Federation of Labor shares in that responsibility which includes provisions for material well-being and opportunity for physical, intellectual and spiritual development. We as an organization can be responsible only for assuring opportunities and the right to benefit by them, but the development of personality and spiritual capacity in our young lies outside the reach of our organization and devolves upon the home, the church and those teachers whose own personalities give them power to help the young grow in insight and wisdom. In order to conserve influences that are necessary to discipline and ideals in living, the American Federation of Labor declares for freedom of religion and religious training as the most fundamental contribution we can make to the children of the future."

Work Training Projects—(1940, pp. 157-160) Obviously the resident projects will overlap with the apprentice training field. As yet they are without the safeguards which have been found necessary to apprentice training standards of workmanship and wise direction for human welfare. Projects for defense have more recently been considered. This program, which began under relief auspices, now has some aspects of permanency, and it is high time for organized labor to evaluate the entire program and to consider all possible and probable consequences.

(P. 585) A year ago the Executive Council in its annual report gave extended consideration to the problem of youth and the growth of youth organizations which have been set up in this country to meet some of the emergency problems of youth. The Council noted a tendency on the part of the NYA to "deal with the problems of youth as though they were in conflict with the interests of the rest of the community." In the judgment of the Council this was unfortunate as the "distress of youth in the depression is only one part of the dire distress which befell young and old alike."

The Council on the other hand heartily commended the program of the NYA that enabled youth to remain in school and urged its continuance in connection with the Office of Education. In the same report the Council asserted in unequivocal terms its belief that the activities of the NYA concerned with vocational training "should be done by existing agencies expanded as needed and should be subject to those regulations and safeguards which society has deemed wise. It is socially and economically dangerous to provide potential resources to enable undertakings to be independent of existing agencies charged with performing that function under safeguards provided by law." The Convention Committee on Education, recorded its approval of this point in the Council's report while commending the policy of the NYA in providing work-experience for unemployed youth.

Thirteen months have elapsed since that action was taken by the Federation. In the intervening months a new appropriation of $135,000,000 has been made by the Congress to the NYA for the new fiscal year. In the meantime the nation has embarked upon a defense program which has not only made important changes in our procedure but promises to reduce substantially the volume of unemployment. According to representatives of the U.S. Department of Labor the defense program should provide employment for at least one-half of the present unemployed within less than a year. The enactment of a Universal Selective Service Act has provided a new agency under which our youth from 21 to 35 years may be brought under a public authority. Within a year the peacetime strength of our army will be brought up to 1,800,000. For the most part young men will compose that army. If, therefore, the reasoning of the Council a year ago is correct that the problem of youth unemployment is a part of the larger unemployment problem, then surely, the need for NYA as an emergency agency will be lessened as provision is made to reduce unemployment by one activity or agency of government.

The Council is concerned about the over-lapping of NYA projects with the apprentice training program. It is concerned as well about their invasion of the defense field.

Your committee is of the opinion that all NYA activities which are clearly invasions of the vocational educational field should be terminated. The splendid exploratory work done in the field of junior employment service should be shifted to the U.S. Employment Service.

Apprenticeship Training — (1941, p. 427) The American Federation of Labor is emphatically opposed to the inclusion of apprenticeship and trade training in the program of the National Youth Administration. The Permanent Committee on Education after conferring with officers of the National Youth Administration has established a working agreement with the N.Y.A. providing that no trade training or apprenticeship training shall be included in the program of the N.Y.A. It is distinctly understood that vocational training under the N.Y.A. shall be exploratory in nature and designed merely to determine the aptitudes of young people and provide work experience. Apprenticeship training and actual trade training are to be left to other agencies of education.

Youth and Trade Unions—(1935, pp. 81, 495) The effects of world-wide depression upon the younger generations in all countries have been a matter of anxiety to all concerned with problems of statesmanship.

The problem was brought before the International Labor Conference in Geneva at its last meeting in June. The problem in this country was first formulated in a report made by the Department of Labor in response to a Senate Resolution by Senator Walsh requesting information and recommendations with reference to young people emerging from educational institutions and at present without permanent employment. The report by the Secretary of Labor showed approximately three and one-half million persons between the ages of 18 and 29 inclusive without gainful employment. This large group at a most impressionable period of their development, denied entrance to the normal activities of the nation, constitutes a serious problem.

This problem, Labor believes, can be solved permanently only by such changes in our national economy as will provide opportunities to earn a living to all those who need such opportunities.

Labor does not believe that the problem can be solved by an attempt to find jobs in private industries for this large group until our industries are operating at a higher level.

On June 26, 1935, the President created the National Youth Administration, because, as he said, we should do something for the nation's unemployed youth since we can ill-afford to lose the skill and energy of these young men and women.

The Youth Administration is organized with an Executive Committee consisting of government officials and an executive director.

The major objectives of the National Youth Administration are: (1) To find employment in private industry for unemployed youths, (2) To provide employment for youths of certified relief families at work relief projects suited to their abilities and needs, (3) To provide vocational training or retraining for youths without specific skills, (4) To extend part-time employment to needy college students and small cash assistance to needy high school students.

All persons between the ages of 16 and 25, no longer in attendance upon full time school and not regularly engaged in remunerative employment come within the scope of its program. Youth relief employment will be open to the young members of relief families; aid will be extended to students desirous of finishing their college education and financially unable to do so. Financial aid will be available to high school students not to exceed $6 per month—this aid to cover text books, food, clothing, car fare and similar essentials.

The program seeks to provide employment for approximately 150,000 youths; college aid to about 120,000 young men and women; high school aid to 100,000 and provisions for post-graduates in part-time employment to the amount of $30 a month.

In addition to assisting needy high-school students, the National Youth Administration will give financial help to approximately 125,000 college and university students who would otherwise not be able to complete their college education, and to worthy students who are ready for college but who need financial assistance in order to obtain a higher education.

Twenty-eight million dollars has been allocated for student aid activities. Reports from relief rolls show that approximately 700,000 students were compelled to drop their schooling in 1934-5.

The Youth Administration is designing state directors to build up local participation in the program.

The National Youth Administration is under the Works Program Administration and is one of the chief administrative units of that program.

(1936, p. 571) A large number of youth have recently entered labor's ranks, finding employment in various industries.

Among these young people there is a sturdy and growing tendency to enlist in the organizations of labor.

Various national, international and local unions recognizing the need of developing trade union consciousness among their younger members have instituted as a regular part of union procedure educational and athletic activities, increasing their membership considerably among the young wage earners.

The A. F. of L. will undertake a campaign to promulgate union consciousness, organization into their respective national, international and federal labor unions and education among America's young people.

(1938, pp. 185, 481) The consequences of the recent depression and consequent and recurring unemployment, have fallen heavily upon young persons—depriving them of those growth opportunities which should be the right of every young person and a place in the work world in which to earn a living—a right necessary to self-dependence. It is a serious matter when boys and girls are made to feel there is no place for them in our social system. It was to meet this situation that the National Youth Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps were created as emergency measures.

The Civilian Conservation Corps is headed by a Director who has the cooperation of federal and state agencies. The War Department is responsible for clothing, feeding, housing, transporting and demobilizing those enrolled for the camps; for health, welfare and educational services; for discipline within the camps, and their general administration. These are functions for which the War Department has most competent personnel. Work projects of the camps are supervised by the Forestry Service, the National Parks Service, and the Soil Conservation Service. These camps have demonstrated their value as training and adjustment agencies for young men.

The National Youth Administration is under the Works Progress Administration. It was designed primarily to maintain morale for unemployed youth without incomes. For boys and girls in school it provides financial aid through jobs. For the unemployed out of school, youth rehabilitation and stimulation of educational interests are the main objectives of the work projects provided. Vocational guidance and registration in employment offices are major factors in the service.

These emergency undertakings have shown up permanent needs and have developed constructive methods. It is our social duty to provide more equal educational opportunities for all and to do this we must face the fact that the greatest cause of inequality in educational opportunity is economic. During past years efforts of radicals to direct and warp the minds of youth have been more serious and more determined than ever before. Propagandists seek control over the education of the next generation, as short cuts to establishing theories or to gaining control.

The Advisory Committee recommended that these two agencies be merged under the title National Youth Service Administration and placed under the Office of Education. This proposal, in addition to making the services permanent, would provide for the integration of this work with that of governmental agencies normally concerned with the duties involved. Youth should have opportunities but it should also be made conscious of its obligations to home, community and the heritage left by past generations.

Youth (Training for Service) — (1944, p. 225) No one will deny the right of the nation to require service of every youth. No one will deny the duty and indeed the privilege of every youth to render that service.

The need of a thorough physical examination and health building program for every youth must be a basic requirement. The need for developing in youth an appreciation of both exacting discipline and creative initiative is essential. The need for affording youth an opportunity for developing a deep sense of moral, civic and social responsibility must be a part of that program.

The form and substance of the program is too technical and too complex a subject to be dealt with in this report, but it should receive very thorough study. We, therefore, recommend that the Standing Committee on Education prepare a report on this subject within the near future and transmit that report to the Council.

(P. 610) This section of the Executive Council's Report deals with the subject popularly known as universal military training for all youth of the nation. Your committee agrees with the position of the Executive Council that the form and substance of such a program constitute too technical and complex a problem to be dealt with hastily and without adequate study and investigation. The problem is one which is civilian in character as well as military and is not related to the immediate war emergency. Modern warfare demands far more than mere military drill in the usual meaning of the term. The mechanic, the technician, the truck driver, or the cook may be equally important to modern warfare as the soldier who carries the gun. The man who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a modern soldier of the highest type. Elsewhere in this report the vital importance of vocational training in the national defense program is pointed out.

Your committee recommends, therefore, that consideration be given not merely to a program of universal military conscription for youth but to a complete program of total national defense. We, therefore, urge (1) that this convention go on record against any hasty ill considered plan for universal military conscription for youth; (2) that we request the President of the United States to appoint a national committee representing the armed forces, organized labor, management, farm organizations, and educational organizations to make a thorough study of this problem and to recommend a program of action; and (3) that the Permanent Committee on Education continue to study this problem in terms of national and international developments; (4) that adequate funds be granted to the United States Office of Education to establish a research department which will be able to assist in the study.
